[The suicide of the Caṇḍala]. – A certain srotaṅganna had taken rebirth in an outcaste (caṇḍala) family. Time passed and he attained a man’s years. When he had to practice his family’s craft, he refused to kill living (prāṇa) beings. His parents gave him a knife (śāstra) and closed him up in a room with a sheep (eḍaka), saying: “If you do not kill this sheep, you will not be allowed to go out to see the light of day (read: je ming) and get food.” The son thought and said to himself: “If I kill this sheep, I would end up by practicing their trade. Even for my life, how could I commit such great crimes?” Then he killed himself with the knife. When his parents opened the door to look in, the sheep was standing up in a corner of the room (ekāntena) and their son was dead. At the moment he died, he took rebirth among the gods. A person like that sacrifices his own life to safeguard pure morality, and this is the sense in which we speak of the morality of abstaining from murder.

II. Abstaining from theft

1. Definition of theft.²¹⁷

Taking what is not given (adattādāna), knowing that an object belongs to another (paraparigrahītasamjñā), forming the intention to steal it (steṇyacetanāsamutthāpana), taking the object (dravyagrahaṇa) and leaving the original place, saying: “This object belongs to me”: that is theft (steṇya). Not doing that is abstaining from theft. The rest, viz., stratagems (upāya), plots (nirūpaṇa), up to the fact of laying hands on some land that is not abandoned (aparīyaktabhūmi) are auxiliary to theft (steṇyopakāra).

There are two kinds of wealth (vasu), that which belongs to another (paratantra) and that which does not belong to another (aparatantra). The fact of taking (grahaṇa) an object belonging to another constitutes the sin of theft (steṇyāpatti).

Five conditions are needed for there to be theft: they are explained in the Daśakuśalakarmapathaḥ of Aśvaghoṣa, JA, Oct.-Dec., 1929, p. 269: [Tatra katham adatta]dāyī bhavati: parakīyaṃ ca bhavati, paraparigrahītasamjñā ca bhavati, steṇyacittaṃ ha patyupasthitaṃbhavati, upakramaṃ ca karoti, sthānā ca ..., nvāgataḥ adattādāyī bhavati: “How is one a thief? There is the property of another, one knows that it is the property of another, one has the intention of stealing, one goes ahead to carry it out and [one changes] the position [of the object]. That fulfills [the five conditions] to be a thief.”

This teaching is repeated and developed by Buddhaghosa in Sumaṅgala, I, p. 71; Atthasālinī, p. 98 (tr. Tin, Expositor, I, p. 130): Pañca sambhārā honti: parapariggrahitāṃ, parapariggrahītasāññitā, theyyacittaṃ, upakkamotenāharaṇaṃ ti. Chappayayogā sāhathikādayo va. Te ca kho yathānūrūpaṃ theyyāvahāra pasayhāvahāro paṭicchannāvahāro parikappāvahāro kusāvahāro ti imesaṃ avahārānaṃ vasena pavattā: “There are five factors constituting [theft]: another’s possessions, the awareness that it is another’s possessions, the intention to steal, the execution and removal that results. There are six ways of stealing: with one’s own hand, etc. One or another of these ways will be carried out according to the circumstances, dealing in false weights and measures, by force, by fencing stolen objects, by intrigue or by forgery.” – See also Koṣa, IV, p. 155-156; Hardy, Manual, p. 465-467; Bigandet, Gaudama, p. 417.

There are two kinds of objects belonging to another (paratantradravya): i) that which is in a village (grāma) and ii) that which is in a forest (araṇya).²¹⁸ Taking them with the intention of theft (steyacitta) is committing a sin of theft (steyāpatti). If the object is in the forest, an enquiry (nirūpaṇa) should be made to know which kingdom it is neighboring and, if this object has an owner, it is forbidden to take it.

In the Vinaya, all kinds of renunciations of theft that are characteristics (lakṣaṇa) of honesty are dealt with.

2. Benefits of renouncing theft.

Question. – What are the benefits of not stealing?

Answer. – A man's life (manuṣyajīvita) has two aspects, i) inner (ādhyātmika) and ii) outer (bāhya). To take his wealth (vasu) is to deprive him of his outer life (bāhyajīvita). Why? Because life is maintained thanks to (āśritya) to food (āhāra), clothing (vastra) bedding, etc.; to steal them or remove them from the person is to deprive him of his outer life. A stanza says:

All beings subsist

Thanks to clothing and food.

To take them away or to steal them

Is to deprive them of life.

2) Furthermore, the wise man says: By taking an object by theft and appropriating it, one will be able to live in abundance, but soon one must die and after death, one will fall into hell (niraya). Even if the family and relatives have enjoyed the larceny with you, one will be alone in suffering the punishment and one will be unable to avoid it.” With such thoughts on these matters, the wise man will be incapable of committing theft.

3) Furthermore, there are two ways of taking what has not been given (adattādāna): i) by larceny, ii) by pillage; the two together are called adattadāna.

In regard to adattādāna, theft (steya) is more serious. Why? Because it is very vile (aśubha) to commit burglary (saṃdhicchedana) or to steal (steya) the wealth (dhana) which people need to live. Why? Because it is stealing from weak people (nirbala) who are threatened by death. Of all plundering, theft is the most serious. Thus a stanza says:

In time of famine (durbhikṣa), when the body is starved

And one is suffering great torment,

The wealth of others must remain untouchable

Like a great mass of blazing coals.

If one takes another's wealth.

The owner weeps and mourns;

Even if he were the king of the gods

He would feel as much torment.

Although the fault of the murderer is serious, he is the enemy only of his victim; the thief, however, is the enemy of everyone who possesses something. Those who violate the other rules of morality can find people in other countries who would not find them guilty; the thief, on the other hand, is punished in every country.²¹⁹

Question. – However, there are actually people who praise the heroism of brigands; then why not indulge in brigandage?

Answer. – Taking what has not been given is bad in itself (akuśalanimitta). Although brigandage has special (viśeṣa) characteristics, it itself is bad. It is like good food mixed with poison (viśasaṃkīrṇa) and bad food mixed with poison; although the good food and the bad food are different, the poison mixed with them does not change. Or it is as if one were walking in fire, [sometimes] in the daytime (tejas) and [sometimes] in the dark (tamas); although day and night are different, one's feet get burned in the same way.

But actually fools (bāla) are ignorant, in this life and the beyond (ihaparatra), of the retribution (vipāka) of merits (puṇya); lacking loving-kindness (maitricitta), when they see people using force to encroach upon one another and rob another's wealth, they praise the violence. The Buddhas and the saints (ārya) who are full of love and compassion (karuṇā) for the entire world understand well that the misfortune of the three times (tryadvaduḥkha) [which threatens thieves] is inevitable and there is nothing in brigandage to boast about. This is why we know that brigandage is bad; good people (satpuruṣa) and ascetics (yogin) do not indulge in it.

3. Punishments for theft.

As the Buddha said, theft (adattādāna) has ten punishments:²²⁰

- 1) The owner of the object (dravyapati) is always angry [with the thief].
- 2) The thief experiences great anxiety.
- 3) He acts inopportune (read: fei che hing) and without thinking things out.
- 4) He is associated with evil people and avoids honest people.
- 5) He violates the rules of morality (kuśalanimitta).
- 6) He is punished by the king.
- [165c] 7) He does not retain any wealth.
- 8) He plants the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) of actions engendering poverty (dāridrya).
- 9) After death, he falls into hell (niraya).
- 10) If he is reborn among men and manages with difficulty to obtain wealth, the “group of five” (pañcasādhāraṇa)²²¹ will be the prey of the king (rājan), thieves (caura), fire (agni), water (udaka) or the prodigal son (apriyadāyāda); even [treasures] buried in the earth are lost.

III. Abstention from illicit love.

1. Definition of illicit love.²²²

Later sources such as the Daśakuśalakarmapathā, JA Oct.-Dec., a929, p. 269; Kośa, IV, p. 157-158; the Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 76; Mahāvvyutpatti, ch. 280; and in part, Samaṅgala, I, p. 72 and Atthasālinī, p. 98 (tr. Tin, Expositor, I, p. 130) consider as illicit:

1) If a woman (strī) is under the protection of a father (pitṛrakṣitā), a mother (mātr-), a brother (bhrātr-), a sister (bhaginī-), a husband (pati-) or a son (putrarakṣitā), or under the protection of the people’s laws (lokadharma) or the king’s laws (rājadharmā) and one has intercourse with her, that is illicit sexual activity.

Even if a woman has no protector, the law holds her under protection. Who are the women protected by law? All women who have gone forth from the world (pravrajitastrī) and those who, still staying at home (grhasthā) have taken the “morality of a day and night” (rātrīdivasaśīla)²²³ are protected by law.

[It does not matter whether one has intercourse with them] by force (bala), by means of a gift of money (dhana) or by deception (vañcana).

2) If one has intercourse with one’s own wife (kalatra) when she has taken a vow (samādānaśīla), is pregnant (garbhīṇī) or is nursing a child (pāyayantī) – or in a forbidden way (amārga) - that is the illicit practice of sexual activity.

Intercourse with these women, including courtesans (ganikā, veśyā) crowned with a flower garland (mālāguṇaparikkṣiptā)²²⁴ as a sign of being betrothed, is called the practice of illicit sexual activity. Not to do any of that is kāmamaithyācāravirati.

a. Intercourse with a forbidden woman (agamyā). - Kośa: Another’s wife, mother, daughter, paternal or maternal relative; - Daśakuś.: Sarvā parastrī, dharmadhvajā, gotrarakṣitā, grhīṭapanyā veśyā, krīṭisambhadhinī: “Another’s wife, she who has the banner of the law, who is protected by her clan, the courtesan whose hand has been promised, she who has been bought.” – Mahāvvyut., no. 9456-9463, continues the canonical list from pitṛrakṣitā up to mālāguṇaparikkṣiptā; - Sumaṅgala and Atthasālinī (L.c.) consider as illicit ten classes of unmarried women and ten classes of married women.

Intercourse with animals is included as illicit also along with intercourse with prohibited women; cf. Daśakuś., Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 76.

b. Intercourse with one’s own wife in a prohibited way (amārga, anaṅga), i.e., anything that is not the yoni. – Daśakuś.: mukha, varcomārga, dārakadārikājaghanarandhra, hasta; - Mahāvvyut., no. 9226-9227: praviṣṭaḥ sparśasvīkṣtau, prasrāvakaṇaṇe, prastāvakaṇaṇasya mukhe, varcomārga vā.

c. Intercourse in an inappropriate place (adeśa): - Daśakuś.: bodhisattvālaya-ācāryopādhyāyadakṣiṇīyamātrpitṛgurusamnidhiḥ: “In the dwelling of a bodhisattva, of a mother, father or a guru”: - Kośa (L.c.); In an open place, a temple (caitya) an hermitage (aranya).

d. Intercourse at an inappropriate time (akāla): - Kośa: When the woman is pregnant, when she is nursing her baby, when she has taken the vow of an upavāsa

²²⁴ Mālāguṇaparikkṣiptā is an accepted expression: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 286; III, p. 46, 54; Aṅguttara, V, p. 264; Mahāvvyutpatti, no. 9463: Tsa a han, T 99, k. 37, p. 271b24-25; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 113, p. 585b4. – According to the explanation of Buddhaghosa in Papañca, II, p. 113, p. 585b4, it is a woman on whom someone has thrown a Question. – If a woman is under the protection of a man (puruṣakṣitā) and the man is angry, if she is under the protection of the law (dharmarakṣitā) and the law is violated, [all intercourse with her] merits the name of illicit sexual activity (kāmamithyācāra); but if it is her own husband (bhāryā, kalatra), what intercourse is illicit?

Answer. – 1) If she has been permitted to take the vow [of chastity] for one day, she falls under [the protection] of the law (dharmā): even though being married previously, today she is not free (svatantra). But beyond the time of the vow, she is no longer protected by the law (dharmarakṣitā).

2) The pregnant wife (garbhīṇī bhāryā) has a heavy body and feels loathing for previous delights. Moreover, [conjugal intercourse] might injure the fetus.

3) When she is nursing a baby and one has intercourse with her, the mother's milk (stanya) dries up. Moreover, if her mind is attached to sexual pleasures, the woman will not look after her child.²²⁵

4) By a forbidden manner (amārgasthāna) means anything that is not by way of the female organ (yonī).²²⁶ The mind of the woman loathes [such practices] and to force her to such improprieties merits the name of illicit sexual practice. Avoiding all of that is called renunciation of illicit sexual practices (kāmamithyācāravirati).

Question. – But if the husband (pati) does not see, does not know, or does not deplore [the unfaithfulness of his wife], of what is the lover guilty?

Answer. – 1) It is as a result of a basic mischief (mītyāṭva) that illicit sexual activity (kāmamithyācāra) is spoken of; this mischief is not gotten rid of [by the ignorance or the silence of the husband]; therefore there is a fault.

2) Moreover, it involves all kinds of guilt: the pleasure of the married couple is to be two bodies in one and the same flesh; to remove that which the other loves and destroy this deep feeling (maulacitta) is a crime,

2. Punishments for prohibited sexual activity.

[This sin] involves serious punishments: bad reputation, bad name, people's hatred, few pleasures and many fears; one is afraid of being chastised and insulted. Since one is afraid of being discovered by the husband or the companions, one multiplies the lies (mṛṣāvāda). Blamed by the āryas, [prohibited sexual activity] is the sin of sins.

simple garland in the idea that she will become his wife (esā mebhariyā bhavaissatī ti saññāya tassā upari kenaci mālāguṇaṃ khipantena mālāguṇamattenāpi parikkhaṭṭā hoti).

The libertine should say to himself: “My wife and the wife of another are equally women; there is no difference in body and in passions between the one and the other. Under these conditions, why should I have violent and anxious thoughts? The man who follows bad thoughts and profligacy destroys the happiness of the present existence (ihajanman) and future existences (aparajanman).” – [Note: Good name, good reputation, physical and mental well-being are obtained in the present lifetime; rebirth among the gods, acquisition of the Path and nirvāṇa are obtained in future lifetimes.] – Moreover, putting oneself in another's place, the libertine controls his mind; he says to himself: “If that man took my wife, I would be angry; if I take his wife, why would he be any different from me? I shall master myself as I would like others to master themselves in what concerns me; this is why I will not commit [adultery].”

Moreover, as the Buddha said, the libertine will fall into Kien chou ti yu (Asipattraniraya)²²⁷ where massive sufferings are prepared to welcome him. If he is reborn among men, the hall-ways of his home are disordered; dissolute women and people of damaged reputation are always encountered there. Illicit sexual relations are a calamity (upadrava) like a poisonous snake (āsīviṣa) or a great fire (mahāgni); if it is not quickly avoided, misfortune and suffering will ensue..

According to the Buddha, there are ten punishments for illicit sexual relations:²²⁸

- 1) The deceived husband seeks revenge.
- 2) The libertine has a badly kept wife who always quarrels (vivāda) with him.

²²⁷ Cf. Suttanipāta, v. 673:

*Asipattavanaṃ pana tiṇhaṃ taṃ pavisanti samacchidagattā;
jivhaṃ baḷisena gahervā

“Next they go into the cutting forest the leaves of which are swords and their limbs are cut off. [The guardians] seize their tongue with a hook and rain blows upon it.”

In their dictionary, Rhys Davids-Stede present Asipatta as “a late feature in the descriptions of ‘Purgatory’ in Indian speculative theology.” Actually this hell is an integral part of the early Indian cosmography, whether Brāhmanical, Buddhist or Jain (cf. Kirfel, Kosmographie, p. 148, 151, 152, 156-158, 162, 165, 167-172 for Brāhmanism; p. 200, 204, for Buddhism; p. 326 for Jainism). As far as Buddhism is concerned, Asipattavana is mentioned in sources as early as the Suttanipāta, v. 673, and the Devadūtasutta (Majjhima, III, p. 185; Tchong ha han, T 26, no. 64, k. 12, p. 505b10; Teng yi a han, T 125, k. 24, p. 676a9). According to the latter sūtra, the great hell (mahāniraya) has four gates that each open onto four secondary hells: Gūthaniraya, Kukkulaniraya, Sumbalivana and Asipattavana. The latter is defined: Tassa vāteritūni pattāni hatthaṃ pi chindadanti pādaṃ pi chindanti hatthapādaṃ pi chindanti kaṇṇaṃ pi chindanti nāsaṃ pi chindanti kaṇṇanāsaṃ. So tattha dukkhā tippā kaṭṭukā vedanā vedati na ca tāva kālaṃ yāva na taṃ pāpaṃ kammaṃ byantihoti: “The leaves of this forest, agitated by the wind, cut the hands, feet, ears, nose and nostrils. The tortured criminal experiences painful feelings, sharp and bitter, but he does not die before having expiated his sin.” – In later cosmography, the Asipattavan is part of the sixteen utsāda situated, four by four, at the cardinal directions of the eight hells: cf. Kośa, III, p. 150-151; Przyluski, Aśhoka, p. 132-136; below, k.16, p. 176c-177a.

²²⁸ Nandikasutta, in Feer, Extraits, p. 245-246; T 81, p. 899b19-23.

- 3) The bad dharma (akuśaladharma) increase from day to day and the good dharma (kuśaladharma) diminish from day to day.
- 4) He is unable to defend his life; his wife (bhāryā) and children (putra) are left alone.
- 5) His wealth (dhana) is spent in one day.
- 6) His business goes badly; he is always suspected by people.
- 7) He is not loved by his relatives (jñātī), his neighbors (parivāra) and his friends (mitra).
- 8) He plants the karmic causes and conditions (karmahetupratyaya) that produce disrupted homes.
- 9) At the destruction of the body (kāyasya bheda) at the end of his life (jīvitaparyavasāna), he dies and falls into hell (niraya).
- 10) If he is reborn as a woman, many men share her; if he is reborn as a man, his wife will be unchaste.

These are the various reasons for not committing [this sin]. And this is what is meant by renunciation of illicit sexual practices (kāmamithyācāravirati).

IV. Abstention from falsehood.

1. Definition of falsehood.²²⁹

²²⁹ See the canonical definition of a liar in Majjhima, I, p. 226; III, p. 47, 55; Aṅguttara, V, p. 264; Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1039, k. 37, p. 271b: Musāvādī hoti: sabhāgato vā parisagato vā nātimojjhagato vā pūgamajjhagato vā rājakulamajjhato vā abhinīto sakkipuṭṭho: evaṃ bho purisa yaṃ jānāsi taṃ vādechīti, so ajānaṃ vā āha: jānāmīti, jānāṃ vā āha: na jānāmīti, apassaṃ vā āha: passāmi, passaṃ vā āha: na passāmi, itti attahetu vāparahetu vā āmisakīñcikkahetu vā sampajānamusā bhāsītā hoti: “He is a liar: summoned to appear before an assembly, a gathering, a family circle, a guild or a tribunal, and interrogated as a witness to tell what he knows, he says that he knows when he does not know, he says that he does not know when he knows; he says that he has seen when he has not seen, he says that he has seen when he has not seen; thus he consciously tells lies sometimes for himself, sometimes for others, for some material advantage.”

Later scholasticism determines the conditions necessary for there to be falsehood: Daśakuś., JA, Oct-Dec. 1929, p. 269: Tatra kathaṃ mṛṣāvādī nāma: vastu ca bhavati, vastupattitaṃ ca bhavati, vithasaṃjñī ca bhavati, vitathacittaṃ cha bhavati, mṛṣāvādaṃ ca bhāṣate: ebhiḥ pañcabhir aṅgaiḥ samanvāgato mṛṣāvādī bhavati: “How is one a liar? There is something true, there is something false, he knows that it is false, he has the intention to deceive and he speaks a lie: the person who fulfills these five conditions is a liar.” – Buddhaghosa in Sumaṅgala, I, p. 72; Atthasalinī, p. 99 (tr. Tin, Expositor, I, p. 131): Tassa cattāro sabhārā honti: Atathaṃ vatthu viṣaṃvādanacittaṃ,, tajjo vāyāmo, parassa tadatthavijānanan ti. Eko payogoāhatthiko. So kāyena vā kāyapaṭi addhena vā vācāyo vā paraviṣaṃvādakakiriyāya karane daṭṭhabbo: “Falsehood has four constitutive factors: a false thing, the intention to deceive, a corresponding effort and communication to another. There is only one way to lie: personal action. This should be understood as the fact of deceiving another either by body or something in “Falsehood” (mṛṣāvāda). – With an evil intention (aśubhacitta), wishing to deceive another, concealing the truth (satya), offering words different [from the truth]: this is called falsehood (mṛṣāvāda). The sin of lying arises in dependence on the intelligibility (samavabodha) of the words pronounced, for if these are not understood, there could be an incorrect comment (vitathavākhyā), but it would not be a lie.²³⁰ “When one knows, to say that one does not know; when one does not know, to say that one knows; when one sees, to say that one does not see; when one does not see, to say that one sees; when one understands, to say that one does not understand; when one does not understand, to say that one understands: this is what is called falsehood.”²³¹

Not to act in this way is to abstain from falsehood (mṛṣāvādavirati).

2. Punishments for falsehood.

Question. – What are the punishments for falsehood?

Answer. – The liar first deceives himself, then he deceives others. He takes the true to be false and the false to be true. Deception relating to true and false (anṛtasatyaviparyāsa) prevents the gathering of good dharma (kuśaladharma); it is like a closed vase (praticchannaghaṭa) where water cannot penetrate. The mind of the liar is without shame (apatrāpya) or modesty (hrī); he closes the door to the divine destinies (devagati) and to nirvāṇa. When one thinks about these punishments, one does not lie anymore.

Consider also true speech (satyavāk) and how great are its advantages (anuśaṃsa): these advantages arise by themselves and are easy to obtain: they are the power of all monastics (pravrajita); virtuous lay people (guṇin grhastha) also share them with the monastics.

Moreover, the truthful person has a straightforward mind and, by this straightforwardness, he easily succeeds in escaping from sorrow. It is like a thick forest: if the direction followed is correct, one comes out of it easily.

Question. – If falsehood brings such punishments, why do people lie?

Answer. – There are fools (mūḍha), people of little knowledge who, upon [157b] meeting with some difficulty, an enemy, or an obstacle, try to escape from it by lying. They ignore that their difficulties will increase and that they will be punished in this very life (ihajjanman); they ignore that the future life connection with the body, or by speech.” – See also Kośa, IV, p. 158 seq.; Hardy, Manual, p. 468; Bigandet, Gaudama, p. 418.

(aparanjanma) also has great punishment in store for them. – Furthermore, there are people who, even knowing the punishments reserved for lying, nevertheless lie under the sway of desire (rāga) hatred (dveṣa) or delusion (moha). – Finally, there are people who, although feeling no desire or hatred, bear false witness of the faults of others and even think they are right: these after death will fall into hell (niraya).

This is how Kiu k'ie li (Kokālika), the disciple of T'i p'o t to (Devadatta), looked for the faults (ādinava) of Chō li fou (Śāriputra) and Mou k'ien lien (Maudgalyāyana).

1. [Kokālika proclaims the misconduct of the two disciples everywhere].²³³ – One day, when the summer retreat (varṣa) was over, these two men were traveling through the land²³⁴ and were caught in a great rainstorm. Having come to the house of a potter (kumbhakāra),²³⁵ they spent the night there. In this house, ²³² For this KokaĒika (in Pāli, Kokālika) see above, Traité, I, p. 62F. – According to Buddhaghosa (Suttanipāta Comm., II, p. 473: Śārattha, I, p. 216), this is Kokāliya-the-lesser, son of Kokāli-seṭṭhi and a resident of the monastery of Kokāli; he is different from Kokāliya-the-great, a brāhmin by origin and a disciple of Devadatta. The Chinese sources do not recognize this distinction, since they know only one Kokālika whom they make out to be the disciple of Devadatta.

In the following story, faithful to a process of compilation dear to itself (cf. Traité, I, p. 457F, n. 3), the Mppś has brought together several sūtras and avadānas about Kokālika, so as to present a complete story. I [Lamotte] have distinguished three parts to this story and have given distinct references for each of them.

On the other hand, it does not seem to be known to the Pāli sources (Jātaka, IV, p. 242 seq.; Dhammapadaṭṭha, IV, p. 91 seq.) which explains the origin of the conflict between Kokālika and the two holy disciples differently: Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana, in search of rest, had come to spend the rainy season with Kokālika who had promised not to reveal their presence to anyone. After the rains, when the elders were about to return, Kokālika at once informed the inhabitants and reproached them for their lack of hospitality. The citizens loaded the saints down with all kinds of gifts but the latter were not accepted, and Kokālika, who was hoping to receive some gift, was disappointed. The elders promised the inhabitants to visit them again, and when they departed, were accompanied by a great following of monks to whom the inhabitants paid great respect. The gifts were distributed among the monks and Kokālika did not get anything. He became insolent and the two great disciples left the place. The angry populace asked Kokālika to bring them back immediately or to go away himself. But the elders refused to come back and Kokālika, very annoyed, went to Śrāvastī to the Buddha where, notwithstanding the Buddha's remonstrances, he began to speak ill of the two disciples (cf. Malalasekera, I, p. 674) there already was a woman²³⁶ who spent the nights there secretly, but the two disciples did not see her. During the night, this woman had a dream (svapna) and had an emission.²³⁷ The next morning, she went to the water to bathe. Kokālika, who was there by chance, saw her. Kokālika knew how to distinguish traces of sexual emotions but without knowing exactly whether they had taken place in dream or not. Immediately he affirmed to his disciples that this woman had had sexual relations with a man the preceding night. He asked the woman: “Where did you sleep?” She replied: “I stay temporarily at the house of the potter.” He asked with whom, and she answered: “With two bhikṣus.” At that moment, the two disciples came out of the hut. Kokālika saw them, looked them over and declared that these two men were definitely impure. First, he felt jealous (īṣya); then he went everywhere, in the cities and the villages, proclaiming what he had seen. He went up to the Ganges divulging this slander.

²³⁴ Rājagṛha and its environs (T 212 and T 1464).

2. [Intervention of the god Brahmā]²³⁸ – In the meantime, Fan T'ien wang (Brahmā devarāja) came to see the Buddha. But the Buddha had gone into his silent cell to practice meditation in solitude;²³⁹ all the bhikṣus also had closed the doors to their cells and were practicing meditation; there was no way to rouse them. Brahmā then thought: “I have come to see the Buddha but he is in meditative stabilization (saṃādhi); I shall go away.” Thinking again, he said to himself: “The Buddha will come out of concentration soon; I will wait for him here.” He went to the cell of Kokālika, knocked on the door and said: “Kokālika! Hey, Kokālika! Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana have pure, sweet and gentle minds (viśuddhamṛdutaruṇacitta). Do not say anything bad against them for, during the Long Night (dīrgharātra) you will suffer.” – Kokālika asked him: “Who are you?” – He answered: “I am Brahmā devarāja.” – Kokālika said: “The Buddha said that you had attained the state of non-returner (anāgāmin). Why then have you returned here?” – King Brahmā thought and spoke the following stanza:

To want to measure the immeasurable Dharma,

When one is unable to grasp its nature (nimittagrahaṇa)!

The person who wants to measure the immeasurable Dharma

Che song liu, T 1435, k. 47, p. 344b27-28: Yā punar bhikṣuṇī saṃcintya śukraṃ visarjayet svapnāntarāt pāṭayantikā: “Sī qua religiosa voluntarie semen emisit, aliter ac in somno, erit pāṭayantikā.”

Having spoken this stanza, Brahmā went to the Buddha and told him what had happened. The Buddha said: “Good! Very good! You have spoken well.” And the Buddha repeated the stanza.²⁴⁰

To want to measure the immeasurable Dharma

When one is unable to grasp its nature!

The person who wants to measure the immeasurable Dharma

Is only a stupid layman.

Brahmā devarāja, after hearing the words of the Buddha, disappeared suddenly and returned to the heavens.

3. [The obstinacy of Kokālika, his death and fall into hell].²⁴¹ . Then Kokālika went to the Buddha and, having bowed his head to the Buddha’s feet, he stood to one side (bhagavataḥ pādau śirasā vanditvaikānte ’sthāt). The Buddha said to Kokālika: “Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana have pure sweet and gentle minds (viśuddhamṛdutaruṇacitta). Say nothing bad about them for, during the Long Night (dīrgharātra) you will suffer.” – Kokālika said to the Buddha: “I dare not disbelieve the Buddha’s word (buddhavacana); however, I know what I saw with my own eyes; I know perfectly well that these two men actually committed the sin.” Three times the Buddha reprimanded Kokālika in this way, and three times Kokālika did not believe him. Rising up from his seat (utthāyāsanaṁ), he went away.

When he went back to his cell, pustules (piḍakā) appeared on his body: the size of a grain of mustard seed (sarṣapa) at first, they grew bigger and bigger to the size of a bean (mudga), a jujube (kola), a mango (āmālaka). When they were as large as a bilva fruit, they exploded all together (prabhid-) like a blazing mass. With tears and cries, Kokālika died that very night and went to the Lien houa ti yu (Padmaniraya) hell.

During the night, a Brahmādeva went to the Buddha to say: “Kokālika has died.” Another Brahmādeva said: “He has fallen into the great Padmaniraya.”

When the night had passed, the Buddha asked the community (saṃgha) to assemble and said: “Do you want to know how long is the life (āyuhpramāna) in the hell (niraya) where Kokālika has fallen?” – The bhikṣus answered: “We would joyfully learn it.” The Buddha answered: “If there were sixty measures (droṇa) of sesame seeds and a man came every hundred years and removed one sesame seed (tīla), these measures would be exhausted before the stay in the A feou t’o (Arbuda) hell would be ended. – Twenty stays in the Arbuda equal one stay in the Ni lo feou t’o (Nirarbuda) hell. – Twenty stays in the Nirarbuda hell equals one stay in the A lo lo (Aṭaṭa) hell. – Twenty stays in the Aṭaṭa hell equals one stay in the A p’o p’o (Hahava) hell. – Twenty stays in the Hahava hell equals one stay in the Hieou hieou (Huhuva) hell. – Twenty stays in the Huhuva hell equals one stay in the Ngeou po lo (Utpala) hell. – Twenty stays in the Utpala hell equal one stay in the Fen t’o li kia (Puṇḍarika) hell. – Twenty stays in the Puṇḍarika hell equals one stay in the Mo ho po t’eu mo (Mahāpadma) hell. Kokālika has fallen into the Mahāpadma hell.²⁴²

His great tongue (mahājihvā) has been stretched out and nailed [to the ground] with a hundred spikes; five hundred plows are plowing it.²⁴³ Then the Buddha spoke these stanzas:

[158a] At man’s birth

An axe is put into his mouth

With which he cuts himself

When he speaks wrong words.²⁴⁴

²⁴² These are the cold hells (śītaniraya). The Pāli sources (Samyutta, I, p. 152; Aṅguttara, V, p. 173; Suttanipāṭa, III, 10) list ten whereas the Mppś and the other Chinese sources (T 99, p. 351c; T 100, p. 470b) list only eight. Thus they reveal their affinity with the Sanskrit Sarvāstivādin school which knows only eight cold hells: cf. Divya, p. 67; Avadānaśatka, I, p. 4, l. 9; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 172, p. 266a; Kośa, III, p. 154; Dharmasaṃgraha, ch. 122; Mahāvīyutpatti, no. 4929-4936. - On the other hand, the cosmography of the Chinese Dīrghāgama (T 1, k. 19, p. 125c; T 23, k. 2, p. 286c; T 24, k. 4, p. 329a) knows ten cold hells, like the Pāli sources; this is easily explained because the Dīrghāgama belongs to the Dharmagupta school (cf. Watanabe in Hoernle, Remains, p. 18; Bagchi, Le canon bouddhique, I, p. 202-203; Przyluski, Concile, p. 354, seq.; F. Weller, Die Ueberlieferung des älteren buddhistischen Schrifttums, Asia Major, 1928, p. 180). According to corroborating accounts, (Dīpavamsa, V, v. 45, 47; Mahāvamsa, V, v. 6, 8; Kathāv. Comm., p. 3; Vasumitra, p. 16; Paramārtha, in P. Demiéville, L’origine des sectes, MCB, I, 1931, p. 23, 59-62; Bhavya in Walleser, Sekten, p. 81, Yi tsiang, tr. Takakusu, p. 20), the Dharmaguptas descend in direct line, by the intermediary of the Mahīśāsaka, from the early Buddhism of the Śthaviras whose Pāli scriptures are supposed to represent the authentic traditions. The similarities between the Pāli scriptures and those of the Dharmagupta are thus naturally explained; this has already been noted for the Vinaya (cf. E. Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke des Bhikṣuṇī-Pratimokṣa des Sarvāstivādins, LLL1926, p. 187; Przyluski, Concile, p. 314-315).

²⁴⁷ The story of Kokālika has a sequel, told by the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 12, p. 603b19 seq. in these words: Then Maudgalyāyana said to the Bhagavat: “I would like to go to this hell to convert this man.” The Bhagavat answered: “Maudgalyāyana, one should not go there.” Again Maudgalyāyana said to the Bhagavat: “I would like to go to this hell to convert this man.” Then the Bhagavat remained silent and did not oppose him. At once the venerable Maudgalyāyana, as quickly as a strong man bends his arm (seyyathāpi nāma balavā puriso bāhaṃ pasmareyya), left Śrāvastī and came to the great Padmaniraya. At that time, the bhīṣu Kokālika was being burned and a hundred oxen were plowing his tongue. Seated in the air with crossed legs (paryāṅka ābhujya), Maudgalyāyana snapped his

If by consciously (saṃcintya) nourishing defamatory suspicions in this way, one ends up by persuading oneself (niścaya), it is just the same as a lie. And the liar ends up by not trusting the words of the Buddha (buddhavacana); he will suffer the punishments we have spoken of. This is why one should not lie.

fingers to speak to the bhīṣu who looked at him and said: “Who are you?” Maudgalyāyana answered: “Kokālika, I am a disciple of the buddha Śākyamuni; I am called Maudgalyāyana, of the Kolita family.” Immediately, the bhīṣu, looking at Maudgalyāyana, spat this insult at him: “Now that I have fallen into this bad destiny, at least could I not avoid your presence?” Hardly had he said these words when a thousand oxen were working on his tongue. Seeing this, Maudgalyāyana became even more sorrowful and felt remorse. He disappeared and returned to Śrāvastī to the Bhagavat; having bowed his head down to the Buddha’s feet, he stood to one side. Then Maudgalyāyana told this story to the Bhagavat who said to him: “I told you that you should not go to see that wicked man.”

The present passage of the Mppś answers to this definition perfectly, better than the Ambalaṭṭhikā-Rāhulavādasutta (Majjhima, no. 61) with which the “sermon on falsehood” has been identified as early as 1879 by H. Oldenberg in his edition of the Vinaya Pitaka, p. XL, n. 1: The Buddha went to Ambalaṭṭhika to his son and washed his feet in front of the latter. Then the Blessed One spilled a thin stream of water into his basin (pariṭṭaṃ udakāvasesaṃ udakhādhane ṭhapetva), saying to Rāhula; “Do you see this thin stream of water? As thin as this is the faith of those who are not ashamed of a deliberate lie (evaṃ pariṭṭaṃ tesam sāmāññaṃ yesaṃ na ’tthi sampajānamusāvāda lajjā). – Then he emptied out a thin stream of water (taṃ pariṭṭaṃ udakāvasesaṃ chaḍḍetvā) and said “Do you see this thin stream of water being emptied? As discarded as this is the faith of those who are not ashamed of a deliberate lie.” – Then he turned the basin upside down (udakādhānaṃ nikuṭṭitvā) and said: “Do you see this upside-down basin? So inverted is the faith of those who are unashamed of a deliberate lie.” Finally he placed the basin upright (udakādhānaṃ ukkuṭṭitva) and said: “Do you see this empty (rittaṃ tuccaṃ) basin? As empty like this is the faith of those who are unashamed of a deliberate lie.”

After this short introduction on falsehood, by means of the comparisons of the elephant in battle and the mirror, the Buddha taught his son to look at his thoughts, his words and his actions, to exert himself day and night in the good dharma and to purify all his actions.

The Chinese correspondent of the Ambalaṭṭhikā-Rāhulovāda is in Tchong a han, T 26, no. 14, k. 3, p. 436a-437b, which S. Lévi has translated in Notes sur diverses inscriptions de Piyaḍasi, JA, May-June, 1896, p. 475-485. The two recensions are essentially identical. R. Senart, Les inscriptions de Piyaḍasi, II, 1886, p. 206, comments: The sūtra does not take falsehood solely as its subject but rather as a point of departure; one could say that the exhortations on lying which form the entrance into the subject, are submerged in the bulk of the sūtra.

But comparison between Majjhima, no. 61 and Tchong a han, no. 14, does not exhaust the problem: the “Exhortations to Rāhula” with which we are concerned also occurs in two Chinese texts that have not yet been examined. These are two versions of the Dharmapada, the Tch’ou yao king, T 212, k. 11, p. 668a and the Fa kiu p’i

When Lo heou lo (Rāhula) was a child, he was careless about his speech. [When the Buddha was present] and someone came to ask Rāhula: “Is the Buddha here?”, Rāhula answered mischievously: “He is not here.” When the Buddha was absent and someone asked Rāhula: “Is the Bhagavat here?”, he answered mischievously: “The Buddha is here.” Some people reported this to the Buddha, who said to Rāhula: “Go and get some water in a basin (udākadhāna) and wash my feet.” – When Rāhula had washed his feet, the Buddha said to him: “Put a cork in the basin (chanda tam udakādhānam).” Rāhula obeyed this order and put a cork in the basin. The Buddha said: “Pour out the water.” When Rāhula had emptied the water, he asked him: “Has the water come out?” Rāhula answered: “It has not come out.” – Then the Buddha said to Rāhula: “In those who have no shame (lajjā) falsehood (mṛṣhāvāda) empties the mind and the elements of the Path (mārgadharma) cannot penetrate it.” It is the same here.

As the Buddha said, falsehood has ten punishments.²⁴⁹ What are these ten?

- 1) The mouth has a foul odor,
- 2) The good deities avoid the liar; the Amanuśyas use him as their messenger.
- 3) Even when he tells the truth (satyavac), people do not believe him.
- 4) He never takes part in the councils of the wise.
- 5) He always meets with criticism (abhyākhyāna) and his bad reputation spreads everywhere.

king, T 211, k. 3, p. 599c-600a. There also the Buddha uses his basin to instruct his son but, whereas T 212 has roughly the same scope as the Rāhulavāda of the Majjhima, the T 211 contains no formal condemnation of lying:

“When Rāhula had washed his feet, the Buddha said to him: Do you see the water in which you washed my feet in this basin? – Rāhula answered that he saw it. – The Buddha continued: Could this water be used again to drink or to wash? – Rāhula answered: This water cannot be used again. Why? Although this water was initially pure, it has been soiled by washing the feet; this is why it cannot be used again. – The Buddha said to Rāhula: It is the same for you. Although you are my son and grandson of the king [Suddhodana], although you have renounced worldly pleasures to become a monk, you have not applied yourself zealously to guard your body and your speech; the defilements of the three poisons (triviśa) fill you up and enmesh you; like this water, you cannot be used for anything.”

The fundamental subject of the Ambalaṭṭhikā-Rāhulavāda is the reflection which the monks should bring to all his actions, physical, vocal or mental (paccavekkhitvā kāyena vācāya manasā kammam kattabbaṃ).

Under these conditions, can it reasonably be assumed that by recommending to monastics and lay people of both sexes to study and meditate on the “Sermon to Rāhula on falsehood”, the emperor Aśoka had in mind the Ambalaṭṭhikā-Rāhulavāda? Winternitz in History of Indian Literature, 1933, p. 607, says that by specifying “on falsehood”, Aśoka meant to contrast Majjhima no. 61 and Majjhima no. 62 (which also has the title of Rāhulavāda) and that “consequently Aśoka must have known both texts.”

On the other hand, the exhortations to Rāhula told here revolve exclusively around falsehood and answer perfectly to the Bairāt summary.

²⁴⁹ Nandikasūtra, in Feer, Extraits, p. 246; T 81, p. 899b23-26.

6) People have no respect for him and even if he has some authority, nobody obeys him.

7) He is always sad (daurmanasya).

8) He plants karmic causes and conditions [which will merit his] being criticized.

9) At the dissolution of the body (kāyasya bhedaṭ) at the end of life (jīvitaparyavasāne), he will fall into the hells (niraya).

10) If he is reborn among men, he will always suffer criticism.

Not committing all these lies is “to abstain from falsehood” (mṛṣāvādavirati), and this is called the proper discipline of speech (vāksaṃvara).

V. Abstention from liquor.²⁵⁰

1. Various kinds of drinks.

“Not to drink wine” (madyavirati). – There are three kinds of wine: i) cereal wine (surā), ii) fruit wine (phalamadya), iii) herb wine (oṣadhimadya).

Fruit wine. – Grapes (drākṣā), berries of the A li tcha (ariṣṭaka) tree, and other similar fruits give fruit wine.

[158b] Herb wine. – Any herb mixed with rice flour (read mi mien = saktu) or sugarcane (ikṣurasa) juice can change into wine. Also the wine derived from the milk (kṣīra) of hooved animals: any fermented milk can give wine.

Briefly (samāsataḥ), liquors, dry or wet, clear or cloudy, that cause excitation (kampana) or weakness (pramāda) in the human mind are called wine.

They should not be consumed, and this is what is called abstaining from liquor (madyavirati).

Question. – Wine can combat cold (śīta), strengthen the body and rejoice the mind. Why not drink it?

²⁵⁰ The classical formula (e.g., Aṅguttara, IV, p. 248; Mahāvīyutp. no. 8505) is: surāmaireyamadyapramādashānavirati, i.e., renouncing fermented rice drink (surā) and the fermented drink of ingredients (maireya) when they are still intoxicating (madya); because they are the cause of all failings (pramādashāna); cf. Kośha, IV, p. 85-86.

The Mppś recognizes three kinds of intoxicating drinks:

a. The liquor of grains, in Sanskrit sūra, in Tibetan, hbruḥi chan (Mahāvīyut., no. 8505 is, in the strict sense, the fermented drink of rice (annāsava), arack.

b. The wine from fruits, extract of raisins (drākṣā) or berries.

c. The intoxicating drink from any fermentation process whatsoever, such as sugar-cane juice (ikṣurasa).

Answer. –The benefits of wine for the body are very rare, but the damages (upaghāta) are very numerous. This is why it should not be drunk. Wine is like excellent food into which poison has been mixed. What are these poisons?

2. Disadvantages of liquor.

As the Buddha said to the upāsaka Nan t' i kia (Nandika), wine has thirty-five disadvantages.²⁵¹ What are these thirty-five?

- 1) In the present (iha) lifetime, wealth (vasu) is exhausted. Why? When one drinks wine and becomes intoxicated, the mind loses any moderation (mātra) and one spends without reckoning.
- 2) Drink is the door to all illnesses (sarvavyādhidvāra).
- 3) It is a source of quarreling and disputes (vigrahavivādamūla).
- 4) The drunkard is not ashamed of being seen naked (nagna).
- 5) He has a bad name, bad reputation and is not respected by people.
- 6) Drink ruins knowledge.
- 7) The drunkard does not get the good things that he should obtain, and he loses those that he has already obtained.
- 8) He tells people all his secrets (guhya).
- 9) He misses all kinds of business and realizes nothing.
- 10) Drunkenness is a source of grief (śakamūla). Why? Drunkenness involves many lapses (hāni) and when one awakens, there is shame (hrī), confusion (apatrāpya), sadness (daurmanasya) and grief (śoka).
- 11) Physical strength (kāyabala) progressively diminishes.
- 12) Beauty (rūpa) changes.
- 13) The drunkard no longer respects his father.
- 14) He does not respect his mother.
- 15) He does not respect monastics (śramaṇa).
- 16) He does not respect brāhmanas.
- 17) He does not respect his uncles or old people. Why? Because, in his grief and the troubles of drunkenness, he no longer makes distinctions.
- 18) He no longer venerates the Buddha.

- 19) He no longer respects the Dharma.
- 20) He no longer respects the Community (saṃgha).
- 21) He mixes in the intrigues of evil people (durjana).
- 22) He distances himself from beauty (bhadra) and wholesomeness (kuśala).
- 23) He becomes an immoral person (duḥśīlapuruṣa).
- 24) He has neither shame (hrī) nor embarrassment (apatrāpya).
- 25) He does not guard his six sense organs.
- 26) He lets himself go (read tsong ki: 120 and 11, 49) and neglects himself (pramāda).
- 27) People hate him; they are not pleased to see him.
- 28) He is rejected by serious people, his relatives (jñāti) and his friends (mitra).
- 29) He cultivates bad dharmas (akuśaladharma).
- 30) He abandons good dharmas (kuśaladharma).
- 31) He does not enjoy the trust (prasāda) of intelligent (medhāvin) and learned (pañḍita) people. Why? Because of the lapses (pramāda) due to wine.
- 32) He is far from nirvāṇa.
- 33) He plants the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) for madness (unmāda).
- 34) At the destruction of the body (kāyabheda) at the end of his life (jīvitaparyavasāna), he falls into the bad destinies (durgatī), into hell (niraya).

[158c] 35) If he succeeds in being reborn as a man, he will always be mad (unmatta).

These are the various faults of drink. This is why one should not drink. Some stanzas say:

Wine wastes the intellect (buddhi),
 Beauty (rūpa) is changed and is ruined,
 The mind is agitated and disturbed
 Shame (hrī) is diminished.

Wine ruins memory (smṛti) and excites anger (krodha),
 It ruins joy (muditā) and breaks up families.
 What is called “drinking”
 Really is taking the poison of death (mṛtyuviṣa).

²⁵¹ Cf. Nandikasūtra, in Feer, Extraits, p. 247; T 81, p. 899b26-c12.

One is worried when one should not be worried,

Then one laughs when one should not laugh,

One cries when one should not cry,

One strikes when one should not strike.

One speaks when one should not speak,

One is no different from a madman.

Wine removes all good qualities (guṇa).

The person who has self-respect does not drink.

SECOND PART: THE MORALITY OF PLEDGE (SAMĀDĀNAŚILA)²⁵²

I. Morality of the lay person or avadātavasana

§ 1. – The fivefold discipline of the upāsaka.

1. The Pañcaśīla.

Abstinence from the five sins (āpatti), [murder, theft, illicit sex, use of intoxicating drinks], constitutes excellent physical discipline (kāyakuśalasamvara); abstinence from falsehood (mṛṣāvāda) constitutes the excellent discipline of speech (vākkakuśalasamvara); the whole thing is called ‘discipline of fivefold morality characteristic of the lay practitioner’ (upāsakapañcaśīlasamvara).

Question. – If the eightfold discipline (aṣṭavidhasamvara) and the means of pure livelihood (pariśuddhājīva) constitute morality (cf. p. 771F), why is not the upāsaka, in his discipline of speech

(vāksamvara) not subject to the threefold discipline [which forbids slander, harmful speech and thoughtless speech, cf. p. 771F] and is not subject to the means of pure livelihood (pariśuddhājīva)?

Answer. – 1) Lay people (avadātavasana) residing at home (grhastha) who enjoy worldly pleasures (lokasukha) and at the same time cultivate fully both wealth (viitta) and virtue (guṇa) are unable to practice the laws of morality (śīladharma) completely; this is why the Buddha has them observe [only] five precepts.

2) Moreover, of the four sins of speech (caturvidhavākkarman), [lying, slander, harmful speech and frivolous speech], lying is the most serious (garīṣṭa).

3) Moreover, lying is [always] cultivated (kou tso = saṃskṛita) by the [wicked] intention (cittotpāda) [from which it originated]; the other [sins of speech, sometimes are refined, sometimes not refined.

4) Moreover, it is enough to list falsehood to include the very fact of the other [sins of speech].

5) Moreover, of the good dharmas (kuśaladharma), truth (satya) takes first place. Speaking true words (satyavāk) is observing entirely the four kinds of right speech (samyagvāk).

6) Finally, lay persons [avadātavasana] living in the world are officially called to busy themselves with family affairs and to give commands; this is why it is hard for them to observe the rule [forbidding the speaking] of harmful speech (pāruṣyavāda). But lying, a serious fault due to its refinement, should never be committed.

2. Five kinds of upāsaka.²⁵³

There are five ways of taking (samādāna) these five precepts (śīla) which makes five kinds of upāsakas: 1) upāsaka of a single practice (ekadeśakārin), 2) upāsaka of limited practice (pradeśakārin), 3) upāsaka of developed practice (yadhūyaskārin), 4) upāsaka of complete practice (paripūrṇakārin), 5) upāsaka who has renounced sexual activity (samucchinnaṛāga).

1) The ekadeśakārin takes (samādānati) only one of the five precepts (pañcaśīla) and does not pledge to observe the other four.

2) The pradeśakārin takes either two or three precepts.

3) The yadhūyaskārin takes four precepts.

4) The paripūrṇakārin takes all five precepts.

According to the Mppś, it seems that some upāsakas choose from the five rules constituting the discipline of the upāsaka and observe only one, two, three, or four rules. In this case, one wonders if they deserve the name of upāsaka. According to Kośa, IV, p. 73, every upāsaka pledges to observe the five rules, but may transgress one or another subsequently, and it is this breach that makes the distinction among the various classes of upāsaka.

5) The samucchinnarāga is the person who, having taken the five precepts, makes the following oath (praṇīdhāna) in the presence of the teacher (āchārya): “I will not have sexual relations with my own wife.”

These are the five precepts (pañcaśīla).

3. The reward of the upāsaka.

[159a] Some stanzas say:

Not killing, not stealing,
Abstaining from forbidden sex,
Telling the truth, not drinking wine,
Living correctly (samyagjiva) constitutes the pure mind.

The person who practices these
In both lifetimes escapes from sadness and fear,
The merit of morality (śīlapuṇya) becomes attached to him,
He is always accompanied by gods and men.

In the world six seasons²⁵⁴ are necessary
For flowers to develop their bright colors.
But one has these annual flowers
In one single day in heaven.

The heavenly tree²⁵⁵ spontaneously produces
Flowers, garlands (māḷya) and necklaces (keyāra).
The red flowers are like the brightness of a torch (dīpajvāla),
All the colors are intermingled in them.

²⁵⁴ The Indian year is divided into two, three, five or six seasons (ayana). The six seasons are known in the Brāhmaṇas; beginning with spring, they are: vasanta, grīṣma, varṣā, śarad, hemanta and śiśira. See G. Thibaut, Astrologie, Astronomie und Mathematik, 1899, p. 10-11; Yi tsing, transl. Takakusu, p. 102.

²⁵⁵ This is the Pārijātaka

There are heavenly garments in immense quantities.

Their colors appear in every hue.

Their cool whiteness provides shade from the sun,

They are light and [their texture] is unbroken.

Their gold threads make embroidery pale

Their decoration is like vapor:

These wondrous garments

All come from the heavenly tree.

Brilliant pearls (manī), ear-rings

Precious rings to ornament the hands and feet

At will, all these desirable things

Are given by the heavenly tree.

Golden lotuses (suvarāpadma) with stems (daṇḍa) of vaiḍūrya,

With diamond (vajra) stamens,

Tender and fragile, with penetrating perfume

Are produced by the celestial pools.

*K'in che, Tcheng and K'ouang heou*²⁵⁶ guitars

Set with the seven jewels (saptaratna),

Marvelous instruments with pure sounds,

All come from the heavenly tree.

The Po li tche tou tree (Pārijātaka)²⁵⁷

²⁵⁶ Chinese guitars having five, twelve and twenty-three strings respectively (cf. F. S. Couvreur, Dictionnaire classique de la langue chinois, Sien-Hsien, 1930, p. 594a, 680b, 680a). But Kumārajīva seems to be too precise in his translation, and the musical instruments used by the Hindus at this time were undoubtedly simpler: see M. Dubois, Notes sur les instruments de musique figurés dans l'art plastique de l'Inde ancienne, BAA, XI, p. 38-49.

King of all the heavenly trees,
Is found in the Houan hi (Nandanārāma) garden.
There is none like it.

Observing morality is working the field
In which the heavenly tree grows.
Heavenly food has the taste of ambrosia (amṛtarasa);
Taking it chases away hunger and thirst.

The heavenly maidens (apsaras) have no eunuchs to guard them;
They are free of the problems of pregnancy.²⁵⁸
Pleasure and debauchery are but joys for them.
After a meal, one does not have a bowel movement.

He who observes morality, always concentrating his mind
Can be reborn in the land (bhūmi) of his choice.
He is free of difficulties and problems
And will always enjoy the four happinesses.

With the gods, he enjoys sovereignty (aiśvarya);
Sadness and grief no longer arise for him.
The objects of his desires arise as he wishes,
The light of his body illuminates the shadows.

All these various joys
Result from generosity and morality.

[159b] Whoever wishes to have such a reward
Should exert themselves zealously.

Question. – Here it is a matter of the virtue of morality (śīlapāramitā) by means of which one attains buddhahood; then why praise heavenly happiness (divyasukha) [which rewards simply morality and nothing else]?

Answer. – The Buddha said: “Three things (vastu) necessarily and inevitably bring fruit of retribution (vipākaphala): by means of generosity, great wealth (mahādhanya) is obtained; by morality (śīla), rebirth in fortunate places is obtained; by meditation (bhāvanā), deliverance (vimokṣa) is obtained.”²⁵⁹ When one limits oneself to practicing morality, one is reborn in fortunate places; when meditation (bhāvanā), wisdom (prajñā) and loving-kindness (maitrīkaruṇā) are joined, one obtains the path of the threefold Vehicles (yānatrayamārga). Here we are limited to praising morality [which ensures], in the present lifetimes, virtue (guṇa), knowledge (bahuśrūtya) and happiness (sukha) and, in the future lifetime, a reward like that celebrated in the [preceding] stanzas. Just as sugar is put into a bitter medicine so that the child can swallow it, so morality is praised above the other virtues so that people can observe it; when a person observes it, he will make the great resolve (praṇidhāna) to arrive at buddhahood. This is how morality (śīla) engenders the virtue of morality (śīlapāramitā).

Moreover, all people are attached to happiness (sukha). Of all worldly happiness (laukikasukha), heaven (svarga) is the greatest. If a person hears about the many kinds of happiness in heaven, he will busy himself in observing morality. Then, when he hears speak of the impermanence of heaven (svargānityatā), he will feel distaste (nirveda) and will seek for deliverance (vimokṣa). Finally, when he hears about the infinite virtues (apramāṇaguṇa) of the Buddhas, he will develop loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) and, based on the virtue of morality (śīlapāramitā), he will reach the state of buddhahood. This is why there is no fault in speaking about the reward for morality here.

²⁵⁹ Dāna, śīla and bhāvanā make up the three meritorious actions (punya-kriyāvastu) studied in Dīgha, III, p. 218; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 241; Itivuttaka, p. 51; Nettipakaraṇa, p. 50, 128; Kośa, IV, p. 231.

²⁶⁰ In the Vedas, upavasatha is the day of preparation preceding the Soma sacrifice. The word has passed into Buddhism, not without having gone through transformations: in Pāli, uposatha; in Sanskrit, upoṣadha (Mahāvastu, I, p. 155, l. 13; II, p. 177, l. 20; III, p. 97, l. 20; III, p. 98, l. 2; Avadānakalpalatā, VI, v. 76, p. 197), and, more frequently, poṣadha (Lalitavistara, p. 25, 41, 55, 76; Divyāvadāna, p. 116, l. 21; 121, l. 18; Mahāvvyutpatti, no. 9101, 9287). In Jaina Prakrit, there is posaha. Hence the traditional Tibetan translation gso-sbyon “that which nourishes

²⁵⁸ Actually, all the gods are “apparitional” (upapāduka); see Kośa, III, p. 27, 165.

Question. – For the lay person (avadātavāsana) living at home (grhastā), is there not the fourfold morality [of the upāsaka] or are there yet other rules?

Answer. – There is also the “morality of a day-and-a-night” (rātrādīvasaśīla). If it is observed during the six fasting days (upavāsadvāsa) of the month, the merit (puṇya) is immense (apramāṇa).²⁶¹ If one pledges (samādādāti) to observe it, during the twelve months [of the year], from the 1st to the 5th of each month, the merit is even greater.²⁶²

1. The taking of vows by the Upavāsatha.²⁶³

Question. – How does one take this discipline of one day?

Answer. – Here is the rule for taking the discipline of one day:

Bending one’s knee (jānumaṇḍalaṃ pratiṣṭhāpya) and joining one’s palms together (añjaliṃ praṇamya), one should say the following:

(gso = poṣa) the merits and which washes (sbyoñ = dhav) sins”. The person who is practicing upavāsa is called upośadhika (Mahāvastu, I, p. 205, l. 7; II, p. 8, l. 20), pośadhika (Mahāvvyutpatti, no. 8726), pośadhoṣita (Divyāvadāna, p. 118, l. 27) or upavāsastha (Kośa, IV, p.44).

In early Buddhism, the word designated the day preceding the lunar quarters, a sacred weekly day or Sabbath. The early religious communities prior to Buddhism used these days to explain their doctrines (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 101). The Buddhists followed their example and, on the fifteenth day of the lunar fortnight, they held a chapter of the order on which the Dharma was explained (Vinaya, I, p. 103). They also chose one or another of the upavāsa days for the recitation of the Pratimokṣa. During the upavāsa days, the lay adepts (avadātavāsana) often took it upon themselves to fast and observe some limitations. This practice is called ‘discipline of a day and a night’ (rātridivāśīla), for it is taken for 24 hours only on the 4th, 6th or 15th days of the month; it is also called eightfold morality (aṣṭāṅgaśīla) for the lay person pledges to observe eight interdictions other than the fast (upavāsa).

It is this morality that is in question here. The main text is the Aṅguttara, I, p. 205-215 (tr. Woodward, Gradual Sayings, I, p. 185-195), summarized in the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 16, p. 624b-526a. – See also P’i p’o cha, T 1545, k. 125, k. 124, p. 647b; Kośa, IV, p. 64-69.

²⁶¹ The Mppś will explain (p. 835F) the origin of these days of fast. The four fasting days are the 8th and the 14th day of the dark fortnight (kālapakṣa), the 8th and the 15th of the bright fortnight (suklapakṣa): see Yi tsiang, tr. Takakusu, p. 63, 188. But the texts prefer six days of fast per month, the 8th, 14th, 15th, 29th and 30th days: cf. Hiuan tsang, tr. Watters, I, p. 304; Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 24, n. 2; Demiéville, Versions chinoises de Milindapañha, XXIV, 1924, p. 77

²⁶² This was the half-month upośadha of the Bhagavat, in Mahāvastu, III, p. 97. The lengthened fast is of Jain inspiration.

²⁶³ The Mppś here adopts the ceremony in use by the Sarvāstivādins, a ceremony recorded in the Che song kie mo pi k’ieou yao yong, T 1439, p. 496b 3-20. It consists of the following rituals: 1) taking refuge in a humble posture, 2) declaration that one has taken refuge; 3) confession of past sins, 4) taking the eight vows. 5) taking the fast, 6) declaring one’s intention. – See details in text; cf. Kośa, IV, p. 65.

I, so-and-so (amukha) today, for one day and one night, take refuge in the Buddha, take refuge in the Dharma, take refuge in the Saṃgha. – This is repeated a second and a third time.

I, so-and-so, have taken refuge in the Buddha, have taken refuge in the Dharma, have taken refuge in the Saṃgha. – This is to be repeated a second and a third time.

Today, with a sincere heart, I, so-and-so, confess (pratiseṣayāmi) every bad physical action, every bad vocal action, every bad mental action that I have committed, out of desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) or delusion (moha), in the present life or in past lives.²⁶⁴

With pure body, pure speech and pure mind, I pledge (samādādāmi) to observe the eightfold discipline (aṣṭāṅgaśīla) that constitutes the upavāsa [in the language of Ts’in: dwelling in common]:

1) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, abstained from killing living beings, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will abstain from killing living beings.

2) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, abstained from theft, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will abstain from stealing.

3) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, abstained from sexual activity, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will abstain from sexual activity.

[159c] 4) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, abstained from lying, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will abstain from lying.

5) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, abstained from drinking wine, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will abstain from drinking wine.

6) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, did not sit on high and elevated seats, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will not sit on high and elevated seats.

7) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, did not wear flower garlands, did not anoint their bodies with perfume, did not wear perfumed clothes, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will not wear flower garlands, will not anoint my body with perfume and will not wear perfumed clothes.

8) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, did not sing or dance, did not play music and did not go to shows, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will not sing or dance, will not play music, and will not go to shows.²⁶⁵

After having undertaken the eightfold discipline (aṣṭāṅgaśīla), [he continues]:

Just as the Buddhas, until the end of their life, did not eat past mid-day, so I too, so-and-so, will not eat.²⁶⁶

²⁶⁴ See also this confession of sins followed by a declaration of purity in the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 16, p. 625b.

²⁶⁵ These eight vows, in slightly different form, occur in Aṅguttara, I, p. 211-212 (Tseng a han, T 125, k. 16, p. 625b-c); Aṅguttara, IV, p. 255-256 (Tchong a han, T 26, no. 202, k. 55, p. 770b-c; Tchai king, T 87, p. 911a-b; Yeou p’o yi to chō kia king, T 88, p. 912b-c; Pa kouan tchai king, T 89, p. 913a-b.)

I, so-and-so, pledge (samādadāmi) to observe the eightfold discipline and to imitate (anusiṅṅ-) the qualities of the Buddha. This is the upavāsa: making the vow of observing it is meritorious: during successive lifetimes, one will not fall into the three unfortunate destinies (durgati) or into the eight difficult situations (akṣaṇa).²⁶⁷

I no longer seek the worldly happiness of a noble cakravartin king, of a Brahmā or a Śakradevendra. I wish for the cessation of my afflictions (klesā), I wish to arrive at omniscience (sarvajñāna) and to attain Buddhahood.

2. The taking of vows of the upāsaka.²⁶⁸

²⁶⁶ In agreement with the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikas, the Mppś makes the fast or upavāsa, in the proper meaning of fast, consist of the renunciation of taking a meal outside of the proper time; the other eight renunciations are the members of the fast (upavāsāṅga). The Sautrāntikas do not hold this opinion for, they say, according to the sūtra, immediately after the renunciation of having a meal outside of the time, the person fasting should say: “By this eighth member, I am imitating the rule, I am conforming to the rule of the Arhats.” Cf. Kośa, IV, p. 68.

²⁶⁸ Here also the Mppś adopts the ceremony used by the Sarvāstivādin school which is more complicated than the old ceremony.

a. Originally, it seems that one became upāsaka simply by taking refuge: cf. Āṅguttara, IV, p. 220; Saṃyutta, V, p. 395; Sumaṅgala, I, p. 234: “How, O venerable one, does one become upāsaka? Mahānāman, one becomes upāsaka by the mere fact that one has taken refuge in the Buddha, in the Dharma and in the Saṃgha.”

However, in some old canonical texts we see that the candidate, having taken refuge, then asks the Buddha or the preceptor to consider him as an upāsaka. In the Sanskrit version of the Mahānāmasūtra (cited in Kośavyākhyā, p. 376, l. 31-32) and its Chinese translation (Tsa a han, T 99, no. 928, k. 33, p. 236c15-16), the candidate, after taking refuge, says to the Buddha: upāsakaṃ mām dhāraya “Consider me as an upāsaka”. Similarly in Dīgha, I, p. 85; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 113; Āṅguttara, I, p. 56; Vinaya, II, p. 157, the candidate says: Ahaṃ bhagavantaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi dhammaṃ ca bhikkhusaṅghaṃ ca; upāsakaṃ maṃ bhagavā dhāretu ajjatagge paṇupetaṃ saraṇaṃ gataṃ: “I take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṃgha; may the Bhagavat consider me as an upāsaka from this day on as long as I live (pāñchi upetaṃ), [as] an upāsaka who has taken refuge.”

b. The ceremony is more complicated and the vows more strict in the Sarvāstivādin sect, as may be seen according to present passage of the Mppś, taken from the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya (Che song liu, T 1435, k. 21, p. 149c; Che song kie mo pi k’ieou yao yong, T 1439, p. 496a): 1) In a humble posture, the candidate takes the triple refuge; 2) He declares that he has taken the triple refuge and asks to be considered as an upāsaka; 3) The ordination master gives him the five precepts (pañcaśīla) incumbent on an upāsaka, and the candidate shows his agreement with each of them.

c. If the two rituals are compared, it may be said that there are two kinds of upāsaka, the one who has merely taken refuge, and the one who, having taken refuge, has further vowed to observe the five precepts. This distinction is made in the Āloka, commentary on the Aṣṭasāhasrikā, ed. Wogihara, p. 331, l. 22: One is an upāsaka because one has taken the triple refuge or because one has [further] taken the five precepts. Thus there are two kinds of upāsaka according to the twofold reading attested in the Vinaya: “May the master consider me as an upāsaka who Question. – How is the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla) taken?

Answer. – Here is the ceremony for taking the fivefold discipline:

Bending one’s knee (jānumaṇḍalaṃ pratiṣṭhāpya) and joining one’s palms (añjaliṃ prāṇamya), one says:

I, so-and-so, have taken refuge in the Buddha, have taken refuge in the Dharma, have taken refuge in the Saṃgha. – to be repeated a second and a third time.

I am an upāsaka of the Buddha Śākyamuni: may I be considered as someone who has taken refuge from today until the end of my life.

The master of discipline (śīlācarya) then says:

You, the upāsaka, listen: The Tathāgata, arhat, samyaksambuddha, who knows and sees beings, has set five precepts for the upāsaka; you will observe these rules for the rest of your life. What are these five?

1) It is a rule for upāsakas, as long as they live, not to kill living beings. This is why, as long as you live, you will no longer consciously kill living beings.

If the upāsaka is capable of observing this rule, he should say yes.

2) It is a rule for upāsakas, as long as they live, not to steal. This is why, as long as you live, you will no longer steal.

If the upāsaka is capable of observing this rule, he should say yes.

3) It is a rule for the upāsakas, as long as they live, to abstain from illicit sexual relations. This is why, as long as you live, you must abstain from forbidden sexual relations.

If the upāsaka is capable of observing this rule, he should say yes.

4) It is a rule for upāsakas, as long as they live, to abstain from lying. This is why, as long as you live, you should no longer tell lies.

If the upāsaka is capable of observing this point, he should say yes.

[160a]5) It is a rule for upāsakas, as long as they live, not to drink wine. This is why, as long as you live, you must not drink wine.

If the upāsaka is capable of observing this rule, he should say yes.

has taken the triple refuge”, or else, “May the master consider me as an upāsaka who has taken the triple refuge and who has taken the five precepts.”

d. Hence the discussion amongst the scholars. The Aparātakas (scholars from Konkan) and the Sautrāntikas, basing themselves on the old formulas brought together under a, think that one becomes upāsaka just by taking refuge. On the other hand, the Sarvāstivādins and the Vaibhāṣikas from Kaśmīr, reasoning from their more complicated ceremonial, are of the opinion that one can only be upāsaka by possessing the discipline, i.e., by taking the five precepts. – The arguments may be found in P’i p’o cha, T 1545, k. 124, p. 645 seq.; Kośa, IV, p. 71-76.

This is the fivefold discipline that the upāsaka undertakes to observe (samādadāti) during his life. He will pay homage to the Three Jewels (triratna), the Jewel of the Buddha, the Jewel of the Dharma and the Jewel of the Saṃgha of bhikṣus; he will exert himself energetically in meritorious actions (puṇyakarman) and so reach the state of Buddhahood.

3. Why celebrate the upavāsa of six days of fasting.

Question. – Why are the six fasting days (upavāsāsivasva) chosen to take the eightfold discipline (aṣṭāṅgaśīla) and to cultivate merit?

Answer. – During those days, the evil demons pursue people and try to take their lives; sickness and calamities make these days unfavorable (aśiva) for people. This is why, at the beginning of the cosmic period (kalpa), the saints (ārya) recommended that people keep the fast (upavāsa), cultivate goodness and gain merit (puṇya) [during these fasting days] in order to avoid calamities. At that time the rule of fasting did not involve the observance of the eightfold discipline; the fast consisted merely of not eating for one day. Later when the Buddha appeared in the world (prādurbhūta), he gave people the following advice: “For one day and one night (rātridivasa) you should observe the eightfold discipline in imitation of the Buddhas and you should abstain from eating past mid-day.”²⁶⁹

Such virtue will lead people to nirvāṇa.

Thus the Buddha said in the Sseu t'ien wang king (Caturdevarājasūtra):

²⁶⁹ Fasting and observation of the Sabbath had a popular origin; they were adopted by various religious Hindu orders before becoming a Buddhist institution. The Buddha distinguished three kinds of uposātha: that of the cowherd (gopālaka), being inspired by self-interest; that of the Jains (nirgrantha), formal rather than sincere; that of the saint (ārya), consisting of a purification (paryavadāna) of the entire being (cf. Āṅguttara, I, p. 205-207; Tchong a han, T 26, no. 202, k. 55, p. 770a-b). Moreover, as the parivrajakas and the tīrthikas took advantage of the fast days to recite their scriptures in public, the Buddha followed their example: he ordered his monks to dedicate their fast days to recite the Prātimokṣa together, to read the Dharma and to preach (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 101-102).

²⁷⁰ This sūtra is part of the Chinese Āgamas: Tch'ang a han, T 1, no. 30, k. 20, p. 134b14-135b7; Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1117, k. 40, p. 295c-296a; T 100, no. 46, k. 3, p. 389a-b; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 16, p. 624b-625a (incomplete). It is reproduced in the Li che a p'i t'an louen, T 1644, K. 2, p. 184b9-185b13. Furthermore, it was subject to a separate translation entitled Sseu t'ien wang king, T 590 by the efforts of Tche yen and Pao yun, who visited Kaśmir in 394 and 397 respectively, then returned to China where they worked at Tch'ang ngan. – The corresponding Pāli version is in two consecutive sūtras incorporated in Āṅguttara, I, p. 142-145.

During the monthly six days of fast,²⁷¹ the messenger-princes (dūtakumāra) and the four kings of the gods (caturdevarāja)²⁷² examine (anuvicaranti) beings. If the people who cultivate generosity, observe morality and honor their parents are few in number (alpaka), they go to the Tao li gods (Trāyastriṃśa) and inform Ti che (Śakra); Śakra and the gods²⁷³ are unhappy (anāttamanas) and say: “Surely the armies of the asuras are increasing and the armies of the devas are decreasing.” If the people who cultivate generosity, observe morality and honor their parents are many (bahu), the gods and Śakra are happy and say: “The armies of the devas are increasing and the armies of the asuras are decreasing.”

One day, seeing the joy of the gods, Che t'i p'o na min (Śakra devānām indra) spoke this stanza:

He who, for six days and the marvelous fortnight,

Pledges to observe pure morality,

To the end of his life

Will be my equal in virtue.²⁷⁴

The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: “Śakradevendra should not have spoken this stanza. Why? Śakradevendra has not expelled the five obstacles (read: wou chouai) nor the three poisons;”²⁷⁵ How could he claim that by ²⁷¹ Whereas the Caturdevarājasūtra speaks of a fortnight (pakṣa), the Mppś speaks of a month; whether there are three days of fast per fortnight or six days of fast per month, the result is the same, but there is a change in the calculation.

Chātuddasī pañcadasi yāva pakkassa aṭṭhami pāṭihāriyapakkhaṇ ca aṭṭhaṅgasusamāgatam upossatham upavaseyya yo passa mMadiso naro ti.

With the exception of the last line, it also occurs in Saṃyutta, I, p.208; Suttanipāta, v. 402; Therīgāthā, v. 31, p. 126; Dhamaḍḍaṭṭha, IV, p. 21. – “He who observes the uposatha with its eight aspects, on the 14th, 15th and 16th day and during the pāṭihāriyapakkha ...” Pratīhāryapakṣa is translated into Chinese as chen pien yue (113 and 5; 149 and 16; 74) in T 99, p. 296a7; as chen tsou yue (113 and 5; 157; 74) in T 1509, p. 160a18; according to the suggested explanations of Buddhaghosa (Sāraṭha, I, p. 307), it is the additional fasts preceding (paccuggamana) and following (anugamana) the usual days of abstinence.

observing the discipline of one day that a man would definitely be like him in virtue (guṇa) and in reward for merit (puṇyavipāka)? The man who undertakes to observe this discipline will definitely (read pi, 61 and 2, instead of sin, 61) be like the Buddha: this is true (satyavāc). As for the great gods, because of the joy that they experience, they will obtain an increase of merit (puṇyavardhana).”

Furthermore, during the six days of fast, the evil demons torment people and spread trouble everywhere. But if there is some place, a hamlet, a village, a town, a district, a country or a city, where people observe the fast, observe the discipline and cultivate goodness, the evil demons are driven away and the region remains in peace (yogaḥsema). This is why, by keeping the fast and the precepts during these six days, one obtains increase in merit.

4. The origin of the six fasting days.

Question. – Why do the evil demons choose these six days to trouble people?

Answer. – The T'ien ti pen k'i king “Sūtra on Cosmogony”,²⁷⁶ says: During the first phase of the cosmic period (kalpa), there was a son of a Fan t'ien wang [160b] (Brahmādevārāja) who was father of the demons and who practiced the asceticism (duṣkaracaryā) of the brahmacārin. For twelve heavenly years, he spent the six days in carving up meat, drawing blood and offering them to the fire (agni); this is why the evil demons had a sudden renewal of power (sthāma) during these six days.

²⁷⁶ By T'ien ti pen k'i king “Sūtra on the origin of heaven and earth: the Mppś means the Buddhist Cosmogony, the original Sanskrit of which is lost, but which is known by four Chinese versions, one connected to the Tch'ang a han, under the name of Che ki king (T 1, k. 18-22, p. 114-149), the others transmitted separately under the name of Ta leou t'an king (t 23), K'i che king (T 24), K'i che yin pen king (T 25). Although the legend told here does not occur there, it concerns demons and gods (cf. T 1, k. 20, p. 135a-b).

Neither the Dīghanikāyan or the Dīrghāgama of the Sarvāstivādins contain this Cosmogony. If it did have it, the Mppś, according to its custom, would be referring to the Dīrghāgama and not, as it does here, to the Sūtra on Cosmogony, for our author prefers to give the title of the general collection (āgama) rather than that of the sūtra in which it is incorporated. Thus, quoting a passage of the Āṭṭhāṇṭikasūtra twice, it refers its reader simply to the Dīrghāgama (see Traité, I, p. 300F, 544F).

On the other hand, this Cosmogony has been incorporated into the Chinese Dīrghāgama, or Tch'ang a han (T 1), but this work is not of Sarvāstivādin provenance, and everything points to its Dharmagupta origin (see above, p. 811F, n. 1).

Question. – Why did the father of the demons busy himself during the six days with cutting up meat, drawing blood and putting them in the fire?

Answer. – Mo hi cheou lo (Maheśvara)²⁷⁷ is the foremost and greatest of the gods. Each of the gods has his share of days: i) Maheśvara, as his share, has four days per month, the 8th, the 23rd, the 14th and the 29th day; ii) the other gods have two days per month, the first day, the 16th, and the second day, the 17th; iii) the 15th and the 30th day are dedicated (apeṣante) to all the gods together. Maheśvara is the chief (pati) of the gods; since he has the largest number of days, the four days that belong to him are counted as days of fasting (upavāsadvāsa); also counted as fasting days are the two days belonging to all the gods together: [this is how there come to be six fasting days per month, the 8th, 14th, 15th, 23rd, 29th and 30th]. This is why the demons gain sudden strength during these six days.

So the demon-father was busy during these six days cutting up meat, drawing blood and offering them up in the fire. After twelve years, [Brahmā], king of the gods, came down from heaven and said to his son: “What do you want to get?” He answered: “I would like to have a son.” The king of the gods said to him: “Among recluses (ṛṣi), the rule about worship (pūjā) is to offer incense (gandha), sweet fruits and other pure things. Then why do you put meat and blood into the fire? That is a faulty practice. Because you have infringed on the holy ritual and are involved in bad practices, you will father a bad son who eats meat and drinks blood.” Hardly had he said this when eight big demons who were in the fire arose, their bodies black as ink, their hair yellow and their eyes red; they glowed brightly. All demons have come from these eight. And so, if during these six days, meat is cut up, blood is drawn and they are put in the fire, they regain strength.

In the Buddhadharma there are no good or bad days; but in order to conform (anuvartana) to what [is thought to be] bad days, it is advisable to keep the fast and to take the eight precepts [during these six days].

5. Comparison between the pañcaśīla of the upāsaka and the aṣṭāṅgaśīla of the upavāsastha.

Question. – Which is preferable, the fivefold discipline [of the upāsaka] or the [eightfold] discipline of one day [taken by the upavāsastha]?

Answer. – There are two reasons (hetupratyaya) for considering the two disciplines as equivalent.

1) Only the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla) is observed for one's entire life (yāvajjīvam), whereas the eightfold discipline (aṣṭāṅgaśīla) is observed for one day [for six days of the month.] But if the fivefold morality is great by reason of the duration of its perpetual observance, it is small by reason of the number of rules [which are only five]; on the other hand, the morality of one day lasts for a very short time but involves more rules, [eight].

²⁷⁷ On Maheśvara or Śiva, see references in Traité, I, p. 137-139F.

2) Furthermore, if one is lacking a high ideal (mahācitta), one will be able to observe the [five] precepts as long as one lives, but one will not be the equal of the person with a great ideal who observes [the eight] precepts for one day only. Thus, if the general is a feeble man, were he commander of soldiers for his entire life, his lack of skill and bravery would prevent him from earning the title entirely. On the other hand, a brave, courageous, zealous man who stands up in the midst of chaos is able to conquer the world by his deeds of a single day.

6. The four levels of the lay person's discipline.

[160c] These two kinds of disciplines, [pañcaśīla of the upāsaka and aḥṅgaśīla of the upavāsatha], make up the rules (dharma) for upāsakas living at home (grhasṭha). The morality of the householder is of four kinds: lower (avara), middling (madhya), higher (agra) or absolutely highest (atyagra):

1) The lower person observes morality in order to enjoy the present lifetime, out of fear for his reputation or his renown, by domestic discipline, to adapt himself to the opinions of another, to avoid subordinate employment, or to escape from difficulties. The lower person observes morality for all of these reasons.

2) The middling person observes morality to enjoy wealth and nobility, happiness and power among men. Or else, in the hope of future happiness (paratrasukha) he tames himself and attempts mortification to get a considerable result in a short time. In this state of mind (manasikāra), he observes discipline strictly. Just as a voyage to distant regions is worth considerable profit to a merchant, so the merit of morality assures the enjoyment of future happiness to a man.

3) The superior man observes morality in order to reach nirvāṇa, to know the universal impermanence (anityatā) of all dharmas, to escape from suffering and to enjoy the unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) eternally. Besides, the moral man has no regret; having no regret, he acquires joy (muditā); having joy, he acquires one-pointedness of mind (ekacitta); having one-pointedness of mind, he acquires true knowledge (satyajñāna); having true knowledge, he experiences revulsion (nirvedacitta) [for the world]; feeling this revulsion, he acquires renunciation (vairāgya); having renunciation, he acquires deliverance (vimokṣa); having deliverance, he reaches nirvāṇa: thus morality is the root of all good dharmas (sarvakuśāladharmamūla). Finally, morality is the gateway (āyatana) of entry into the eightfold Buddhist path (āryaṣṭāṅgamārga); by working with it, one necessarily arrives at nirvāṇa.

Question. – In [the list] of the eight branches of the Path, right speech (samyakvāk) and right action (samyakkarmānta) [which constitute morality or śīla] are placed in the middle [in 3rd and 4th place, respectively], whereas right vision (samyagdr̥ṣṭi) and right intention (samyaksamkalpa) [which constitute wisdom or prajñā] are placed first [1st and 2nd place, respectively]. Then why do you say that morality is the doorway of entry into the eightfold Buddhist Path?

Answer. – In the list [of the eight branches of the Path], the most important is put first, namely, right vision (samyagdr̥ṣṭi). Moreover, before undertaking the Path, it is first necessary to ‘see’. But in the order of things (dharmaśaṃkrama), morality comes first. It is like when a house is being built: although the ridge-pole is the most important piece, one begins by taking the ground.

4) The absolutely superior person observes morality because he wants to reach Buddhahood out of his compassion (anukampa) for beings; because, knowing all dharmas, he is seeking their true nature (satyalakṣaṇa). He does not fear the unfortunate destinies (durgatī) and does not seek happiness. The absolutely superior person practices morality for all these reasons.

In general (sāmānyataḥ), this fourfold discipline is called the morality of the upāsaka.

II. Morality of the monastic or pravrajita.

There are four kinds of disciplines (śīla) among monastics (pravrajita):

1) discipline of the śrāmaṇera (novice) and śrāmaṇerikā, 2) discipline of the śikṣamāṇā (probationer). 3) discipline of the bhikṣuṇī (nun), 4) discipline of the bhikṣu (monk).

1. Superiority of the monastic vows over the lay vows.²⁷⁸

²⁷⁸ Can the upāsaka obtain the fruits of the religious life (śrāmanyaphala), reach arhathood and obtain nirvāṇa? Or are these benefits reserved for the monastic alone, for the bhikṣu? For this question, see Oldenberg, Bouddha, p. 358-359; Rh. D., Dialogues of the Buddha, III, p. 5; Oltramare, Théosophie, II, p. 131; L. de La Vallée Poussin, in Kośa, IV, p. 69, n. 2; Demiéville, Les versions chinoises de Milindapañha, BEFEO, XXIV, 1934; N. Dutt, Place of laity in Early Buddhism, IHQ, XXI, 1945, p. 180-183.

We are asked to distinguish between the Theravādin position and that of the Sarvāstivādins, but it seems that Buddhists never differed on this question; their thesis is very simple and can be summarized in two words: Theoretically, the upāsaka can gain all the perfections of the bhikṣu, but practically, his spiritual progress will be slower and less certain.

1) In theory, the upāsaka can obtain all the fruits of the religious life:

The saṃgha of lay upāsakas is based on the view of nirvāṇa, just like that of the bhikṣus: “Just as the Ganges river bends, inclines and flows down to the sea, so Gautama’s congregation, lay as well as monastic, bends, inclines and flows toward nirvāṇa” (cf. Majjhima, I, p.493, and T 99, k. 34, p. 247a16: Seyathā pi Gaṅgā nadī samuddaninnā samuddapoṇā samuddapabbhārā ... evam evāyaṃ Gotamassa parisā sagahaṭṭhapabbajitā nibbānaninnā nibbānapoṇā nibbānapabbhārā).

It is a matter of course that the ordinary upāsaka, no different from the bhikṣu of middling virtue, will not attain nirvāṇa straight away. The majority of upāsakas, “not having broken the fetter of the lay life, will be reborn after death in the heavens” (Majjhima, I, p. 483: bhīyyo va ye gihī gihisaṃyojanamappahāya kāyassa bhedaṃ saggūpagā ti); and we have seen above (p. 822F) that celestial bliss and particularly rebirth in the paradise of the Trāyastriṃśa gods are the usual rewards for lay morality.

Nevertheless, all the canonical scriptures, Pāli as well as Sanskrit, agree in saying that there are many especially worthy upāsakas who have access to the first three fruits of the Path and who become srotaḥpanna, sakṛdāgamin and anāgamin:

a. “Many are the upāsakas, disciples of the Buddha, householders, wearing the white robe and cultivating the sense-pleasures ... who adapt their life to the teachings of the master (Majjhima, I, p. 491: bhīyyo va yeu upāsakā mama sāvakā gihī odātvasanā kāmabhogino ... satthusāsane viharanti). Such a person “breaking the three fetters (kāyadr̥ṣṭi, vicikitsā and śīlavrataparāmarga) is a stream-enterer, is not subject to rebirth in the lower destinies, is assured of deliverance) and destined to obtain supreme enlightenment” (cf. Majjhima, I, p. 467, and T 99, k. 34, p. 247a5-7: tiṇṇaṃ saṃyojanānaṃ parikkhayā sotāpanno avinipātadhammo niyato sambodhiparāyano).

b. The same canonical sources also praise the upāsaka who “by breaking the three fetters and reducing passion, aggression and ignorance has become a once-returner; after having returned to this world once, he will attain the end of suffering” Majjhima, I, p. 467, and T 99, k. 34, p. 246c29-247a1: tiṇṇaṃ saṃyojanānaṃ parikkhayā rāgadosamohānaṃtanuttā sakadāgāmi sakid eva imaṃ lokaṃ āgacvā dukkhass’ antaṃ karissati).

c. Finally, many are the upāsakas, disciples of the Buddha, householders, wearing the white robe, but observing chastity who, by breaking the five coarse fetters (kāyadr̥ṣṭi, vicikitsā, śīlavrataparāmāraśa, kāmacchanda and vyāpāda) have become beings who are reborn in the world of the gods and who attain nirvāṇa; they are not subject to returning to this world” (Majjhima, I, p. 490, and T 99, k. 34, p. 246c19-20: bhīyyo va ye upāsakā mama sāvakā gihī odātvasanā brahmacārino pañcannaṃ orambhāgiyānaṃ saṃyojanānaṃ parikkhayā opapātikā tatthapariniṇṇāyino anāvattidhammā tasmā lokā).

On the attainment of these three fruits by the upāsaka, see also Tchong a han, T 26, k. 18, p. 546b.

But can the upāsaka also obtain the fourth and last fruit of the Path, viz., arhathood and nirvāṇa? Yes, unhesitatingly say the Uttarāpathakas in the Kathāvatthu, I.p. 167: “The lay person can become arhat” (gihī ‘ssa arahā ti). But the Theravādins hesitate, quibble and disagree with a text of the Majjhima, I, p. 483, that says: “Without having broken the fetter which binds the lay person, no lay person can, after death, put an end to suffering” (N’atthi koci gihī gihisaṃyojanaṃ appahāya kāyassa bheda dukkhass’ antaṃ karoti). But that is not the question: the main thing is whether the lay person, while remaining a lay person, can break the fetter that binds and thus put an end to suffering. That it is possible if not easy is what the Theravādins themselves implicitly recognize; actually, in their Aṅguttara, II, p. 45, they list about twenty lay people, Traṇḍa and Bhallika at the head of the list, who have attained cessation (niṣṭha), immortality (amṛta), without ever having been ordained. In Saṃyutta, V, p. 410 and Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1128-1129, k. 41, p. 298c, they recognize that the reverence of honest people, the hearing of the holy Dharma, right reflection and conformity with the precepts of the Dharma – qualities that are within the reach of the upāsaka as well as of the bhikṣu – are sufficient to assure the obtaining of the four fruits of the Path including the state of arhat.

2) But if lay discipline correctly practiced leads to sainthood, what is the use of becoming a monastic? This question was asked by Menander of Āyupāla who did not know how to answer (cf. Milinda, p. 19-21); it was Nāgasena who provided the solution for this difficulty to the king: the monastic attains sainthood more quickly and more assuredly than the lay person (cf. Tsa pao tsang king, T 203, no. 111, k. 9, p. 492c; tr. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 120-123). This is the position of all the other Buddhist authors who never fail to underline the dangers of the lay life and the benefits of the monastic life. Although he is a disciple of the Buddha, the lay person is always troubled by passion, aggression and ignorance. This is because he is not yet free of depravity for, if he were free of it, he would no longer stay at home and would not eat as he pleases (Majjhima, I, p. 91). The wise man should renounce the world and leave his family: “Let him leave his son and his wife, his father and mother, wealth and harvests, friends and all objects of desire, let him wander alone like the rhinoceros. Let him say: Family life is a bond; there is little happiness there, little joy, many problems; it is fish-hook; let him wander alone like a rhinoceros” (Suttanipāta, v. 60 seq). The monastic life offers immense benefits to those who thirst for salvation; they are fully described in Question. – If the morality practiced by those who remain at home (grhasthaśīla) already allows rebirth in the heavens (svarga), of finding the Path [161a] of the bodhisattvas and of reaching nirvāṇa, why resort to the monastic discipline (pravrajitaśīla)?

Answer. – 1) Salvation is found by these two moralities, but with greater or lesser ease. Those who remain at home (grhastha) are overloaded with business during their lifetime; if they want to apply their minds to things of the Path (mārgadharmā), their domestic affairs decline; if they want to busy themselves with their domestic affairs, the Dharma things suffer from it; observing the Dharma without adding anything and without subtracting anything is difficult. But for the monastic (pravrajita) who has renounced the world and made a break with all the causes of restlessness, practicing the Path by exclusive exertion (aikāntikodyama) is easy.

2) Besides, those who remain at home are troubled with many cares and preoccupations; [these are] a cause of fetters (saṃyojana) and an occasion for faults that constitute a problem. The monastic is like a person who has withdrawn into the forest (araṇya) beyond any human habitation; he can fix his mind one-pointedly (cittaikāgratā); when he has neither thought (cintanā) nor speculation (tarka), his inner consciousness (ādhyātmikasamjñā) vanishes and outer objects (bāhyavastu) disappear. Some stanzas say:

Withdrawn into the forest,

Alone, he wipes out his faults.

In calm and rest, he attains single-mindedness (ekacitta);

His happiness is greater than divine.

People seek wealth, nobility and profit,

Fame, garments and comfortable beds,

But their happiness is not peace (yogakṣema):

The search for profit is insatiable.

detail in the Sāmaññaphalasutta (Dīgha, I, p. 47-86). Very rare are the lay people who reach sainthood while remaining in the world. Besides, if they reach this sainthood, which is the aim of monastic life, they are not strictly speaking lay people but truly monastics: the Milinda (p. 264-265) claims that at the moment when the lay person attains arhathood, he enters into an ascetic brotherhood. The Mppś, which is here examining the respective values of the two moralities, monastic and lay, is of the opinion that “one finds salvation by these two moralities, but with greater or lesser ease.” In his journey to sainthood, the lay person encounters more difficulties than the monastic: he is loaded with material responsibilities and exposed to the committing of many faults. The monastic, on the other hand, is freed of any material worries; he dwells in concentration, is subject to a more complete discipline which requires sustained effort; the faults that he may commit are somewhat neutralized by his vows that he has professed; they delay but do not prevent his spiritual progress.

He who wears the robes (pāṃśukūlika) and begs his food

Does not know restlessness; his mind is always fixed.

With the eye of wisdom (prajñācakṣus)

He contemplates the True [nature] of dharmas.

Into all kinds of sermons (dharmaparyāya)

He penetrates with the view of sameness (sampañāyānā).

Wisdom (āññāna) and peace of mind (cittaśānti)

Have no equal in the threefold world (traiḍhātuka).

From that we know that the morality observed by the monastic makes the practice of the Dharma easy.

3) Besides, the cultivation of morality by the monastic earns him an infinite discipline (apramāṇakuśalasamvara) and the fulfillment of all the equipment for salvation (sarvasaṃbhāraparipūri). This is why the lay person (avadātavāsana) likewise should leave the world (pravraj-) in order to acquire perfect morality (paripūrṇaśīla).

4) Besides, in the Buddhadharma, the monastic life (pravrajya) is extremely difficult to practice (paramaduṣkara).

Thus the brahmacārin Yen feou k'ia (Jambukhādaka) asked Śāriputra:

“What is most difficult in Buddhism?”

Śāriputra replied: “The religious life is difficult.”

Jambukhādaka continued: “But where is the difficulty?”

- “For the monastic, compliance with the Dharma (dharmābhirati) is difficult.

The cultivation of all the good dharmas (sarvakuśaladharmabhāvanā)²⁸⁰ is difficult.”

This is why the religious life should be embraced.

²⁸⁰ This reading is vouched for in the Chinese version T 99, k. 18, p. 126a11; in the Pāli version there is the variant dhammānudhammapāṭipatti, meaning “conduct in harmony with the Dharma”. Cf. Geiger, Pāli Dhamma, p. 115.

5) Moreover, when a person becomes a monastic (pravrajati), king Māra, frightened and saddened, says: “The fetters (samyojana) will diminish in this person; they will certainly attain nirvāṇa and increase the ranks of the Jewel of the saṃgha (saṃgharatna).”

6) Moreover, in Buddhism, the monastic who violates the precepts and undergoes punishment will attain deliverance once this punishment has been undergone.

When the Buddha was living in this world, this bhikṣuṇī had become an arhatī possessing the six superknowledges (ṣaḍabhiññā). She was dwelling in the house of a [161b] nobleman and endlessly praised the monastic life (pravrajyā). She said to the women of this nobleman: “Sisters, you should become nuns.”

The women said to her: “We are young and our faces are beautiful; it would be difficult for us to observe the precepts (śīla); we would violate them sometimes.”

The bhikṣuṇī answered: “Just become nuns and, as for violating the precepts, violate them!”

They said: “But if we break the precepts, we will fall into hell. Why could we violate them?” - “As for falling into hell, fall into hell!”

The nobleman’s women made fun of Uṭpalavarnā and said to her: “In hell one suffers punishment; why should we fall into hell?”

The bhikṣuṇī replied: “I remember my previous lives (pūrvamivāsānasmṛti). Once I was an actress (krīḍanikā) and I told old stories in all kinds of costumes. One day as a joke, I put on the robes of a novice nun, and because of that, at the time of the Buddha Kāśyapa, I myself became a bhikṣuṇī. Proud of my noble lineage and my beauty, I developed pride (abhimāna) and violated the precepts. As punishment for this, I fell into hell and there I suffered all kinds of punishment. Once the expiation was over, I met the Buddha Śākyamuni; I became a nun and now I possess the six superknowledges (abhiññā). Know then that by becoming a monastic and taking the precepts – even if one breaks them subsequently – one will attain arhathood thanks to them. But if one is content to commit sins without having taken the precepts, one will never attain the Path.²⁸² And so, from very early times, from one lifetime to the next, I fell into hell; when

²⁸² In order to ensure his final salvation, a criminal had better become a monastic than remain in the world. On this subject see Dhammpadapāṭha, I, p. 147:

“Having seen his [criminal] state, the Tathāgata ordained Devadatta. Actually he said to himself: If Devadatta does not leave the world and remains a layman, since he has committed such serious crimes, he will will be unable to see his future lifetimes with confidence; but if he enters into religion, no matter how grave the actions he has committed, he will be able to look upon his future lifetimes with confidence. This is why the teacher ordained

I came out of hell, I was an evil man and, when this evil man died, he fell into hell again, and all that without the least benefit. Know then that the monastic who has taken the precepts, even if he breaks them subsequently, will nevertheless obtain the fruit of the Path (mārgaphala) thanks to them.

[Ordination of an intoxicated brāhman]. - While the Buddha was at Tche houan (Jetavana), a drunk brāhman approached him and asked to become a bhikṣu. The Buddha ordered Ānanda to shave his head and give him the monk's robes. When his intoxication had worn off, the brāhman was frightened, did not want to be a bhikṣu any longer and fled. The monks asked the Buddha: "Why did you allow this drunk brāhman to become a bhikṣu?" The Buddha replied: "For numberless kalpas, this brāhman did not even have the idea of becoming a monastic. Today, as a result of his drunkenness, he made a small resolution (sūksmacittotpāda) thanks to which, later, he will leave the world and obtain the Path."

For all of these reasons, the religious life has many benefits and this is why the lay person (avadātavasana), even though he has the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla) is not like a monastic (pravrajita).

The discipline (saṃvara) of the monastic is of four kinds, namely, the discipline of the śrāmaṇera (novice) and the śrāmaṇerikā, that of the śikṣamāṇā (probationer), that of the bhikṣuṇī and, finally, that of the bhikṣu (monk).

2. Morality of the śrāmaṇera.²⁸³

How do the śāmaṇeras and śrāmaṇerikās take the precepts (śīlaṃ samādadati) when they leave the world (pravrajyā)?

The lay person who wishes to leave the world should find two masters: i) a preceptor (upādhyāya), ii) a tutor (ācārya).²⁸⁴ The upādhyāya will take the place of father for him and the ācārya, that of mother: since he is abandoning his natural parents, he must seek parents in the religious life.²⁸⁵ ²⁸⁴ The novice then becomes the sārdhavihārin of the upādhyāya and the antevasin of the ācārya, but we do not know what distinguishes these two teachers. The duties of the sārdhavihārin towards the upādhyāya (Pāli Vinaya, II, p. 222-231) are exactly the same as those of the antevasin towards the ācārya (ibid., II, p. 231). Nevertheless, the upādhyāya seems to have had more importance than his colleague: he plays the principal rôle in the ordination ceremonies (Vin., I, p. 56-57) and his responsibility therein is more binding (Vin. IV, p. 114-115). Buddhist scriptures have retained lists of upādhyāyas who followed one after another in the course of time (cf. Przyluki, Aśoka, p. 46-48), but have not transmitted the names of ācāryas to posterity. In Brāhmanism, on the other hand, the ācārya was more important than the upādhyāya (Manu, II, 145; Yājñavalkya, I, 35). – Cf. Oldenberg, Vinaya Texts, I, p. 178, n. 2).

Devadatta. Actually, after a hundred thousand kalpas, the latter will become a pratyekabuddha with the name Aṭṭhissara."

²⁸³ In its description of the ordination of the śrāmaṇera, the śikṣamāṇā, the bhikṣuṇī and the bhikṣu, the Mpp is directly inspired by the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya (T 1535) which contains an entire ordination ritual, a summary of which may be found in the Che song kie mo pi k'ieou yao yong, T 1439, p. 496 seq.

Having put on the yellow robes (kāsāyāni vatthāni acchādāpetvā) and having cut one's hair and beard (kesamassuṃ ohārāpetvā), with his two hands he should grasp [161c] the feet of his upādhyāya (upajjhāyassa pāde vandapeti).²⁸⁶ Why grasp the feet? In India, it is the custom to grasp the feet as a sign of respect and supreme veneration (paramārcanapūjā).

The ācārya should teach (śikṣate) him the ten rules (daśaśikṣāpada)²⁸⁷ according to the ordination rite (upasampadādharma).

It is the same for the śrāmaṇerikā except that [in place of a bhikṣu] she has a bhikṣuṇī as upādhyāyikā.

3. Morality of the śikṣamāṇā.²⁸⁸

The śikṣamāṇā pledges to observe the six rules (ṣaḍdharma) for two years.²⁸⁹

Question. – The śrāmaṇera, possessor of the ten precepts (daśaśikṣāpada), is able to directly take the full discipline of the bhikṣu (paripūrṇaśīla) [without passing through an intermediate stage]. Why must [the śrāmaṇerikā], in the career of the bhikṣuṇī, go through a stage of śikṣamāṇā in order to take the full discipline [of the bhikṣuṇī later]?

Answer. – When the Buddha was in this world, the wife of an eminent man (śreṣṭhidaharā), unknowingly pregnant (garbhīṇī), left the world and took on the full discipline [making her a bhikṣuṇī]. Subsequently when her pregnancy became noticeable, all the nobles blamed (jugupsā) this bhikṣuṇī. Because of that, it was established that, for two years, women should practice the discipline (śīlaṃ śikṣ-) by taking the six precepts [of the śikṣamāṇā] and only after that could they take the full discipline of the bhikṣuṇī.²⁹⁰

²⁸⁶ Ceremony of pravrajyā which, in early times was confused with that of upasampadā (cf. I, p. 22).

²⁸⁷ The ten śikṣāpada of the novice are well known in the texts: cf. Vin. I, p. 83-84). The novice must refrain from: 1) killing (pāṇāpāta); 2) theft (adinnādāna); 3) impurity (abrahmacariyā); 4) falsehood (musāvāda); 5) intoxicating liquors (surāmerayamajjamādauttāna); 6) eating outside of the proper time (vikālabhojana); 7) attending worldly entertainments (naccagītavādītavisākassana); 8) using unguents, perfumes and ornaments on the body (mālāgandhavilepanadhāraṇamaṇḍanavibhūsanatthāna), 9) sleeping on a high or wide bed (uccāsayanamahāsayana); 10) accepting gold or silver (jātarūparajatapaṭiggahana).

²⁸⁹ The six rules of the śikṣamāṇā are the same as the first six śikṣāpada of the śrāmaṇera. Thus the śikṣamāṇā vows to refrain, for two years, from killing, stealing, impurity, lying, intoxicating drinks and eating outside of the proper time. Cf. Vin. IV, p. 319.

²⁹⁰ The story of the pregnant bhikṣuṇī is told in Pāli Vin. IV, p. 317; Mahīśāsaka Vin. T 1421, k. 12, p. 92a-b; Dharmagupta Vin. T 1428, k. 27, p. 754b; Mūlasarvāstivādin Vin., T 1443, k. 18, 1005c. According to the latter text, it concerned the bhikṣuṇī Sthūlanandā, known in the Vinaya for her breaches of all kinds of disciplines. See E. Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke des Bhikṣuṇī-Pratimokṣa des Sarvāstivādins, 1926, p. 135.

Question. – But if she is blameworthy, why does not the śikṣamāṇā wipe out the blames [in the same way as the bhikṣuṇī]?

Answer. – Because the śikṣamāṇā has not taken the full discipline. She is like a child or a servant whom people do not blame even if they misbehave. In the śikṣamāṇā, this is the taking of the six rules.

There are two kinds of śikṣamāṇā: i) those who take the six rules when they are young girls of eighteen years of age (paripūrṇāṣṭadaśa kumārikā); ii) those who take the six rules when they are women having ten years of married life (grhoṣitā daśavarāṣā).²⁹¹

4. Morality of the bhikṣuṇī.²⁹²

When a woman wants to take full ordination [which will make her a bhikṣuṇī], in the presence of the two assemblies (ubhayaśaṃgha),²⁹³ she must be furnished with the fivefold robes (pañcacāvara),²⁹⁴ the begging

²⁹¹ In the Pāli Vin., the 71st and 72nd pācittiya condemn those who confer ordination on a girl less than twenty years of age (ūnavīsātivassam kumārībhūtaṃ vuṭṭhāpeyya) or who, being already twenty years old, has not followed, for two years, the six rules imposed on the śikṣamāṇā (paripunṇavīsativassam kumārībhūtaṃ dve vassāni chasu dhammesu asikkhitasikkham vuṭṭhāpeyya). Cf. Pāli Vin., IV, p. 327-328, and for the other Vinayas, Waldschmidt, Bhikṣuṇīprātimokṣa, p. 140-141.

In the same Pāli Vin., the 65th and 66th pācittiya condemn those who give ordination to a woman with less than twelve years of married life (ūnavādāsavassam gihigataṃ vuṭṭhāpeyya) or who, having been married for twelve years has not, for two years, followed the six rules imposed on the śikṣamāṇā (paripunṇavādāsavassam gihigataṃ dve vassāni chasu dhammesu asikkhitasikkham vuṭṭhāpeyya). Cf. Pāli Vin., p. 322-323.

Thus there are two kinds of śikṣamāṇā according to whether it is a matter of a girl of less than eighteen years or a married woman who has been married less than ten years. Since the śikṣamāṇā stage lasts for two years, it follows that one can become a bhikṣuṇī at twenty years old if it concerns a girl, after twelve years of married life, or if it concerns a married woman. Actually, the Sanskrit fragment of the Bhikṣuṇīvacanā published by C. M. Ridding and de La Vallée Poussin, in BSOS, I 1920, p. 133, l. 2 distinguishes two kinds of bhikṣuṇī, namely, the grhoṣitā dvādaśavarāṣā and the kumārikā paripūrṇavīmśativarāṣā.

²⁹² Cf. T 1439, p. 498; Bhikṣuṇīkarmavācanā, BSOS, I, 1920, p. 123-143; Pāli Vin. II, p. 271-274.

²⁹³ Ordination must be sought from the twofold assembly, that of the bhikṣuṇīs and that of the bhikṣus; cf. Vin., II, p. 255: ubhatośaṃghe upasampadā pariyesiṭabhā. – An ordination is not complete if it has not been conferred by the bhikṣu assembly; cf. Vin., II, p. 257: anujānāmi bhikkhave bhikkūhi bhikkhuniyo upasapādetum. – At the time of her ordination, the future nun, after having been received into the community of nuns, comes before the community of monks and says: “I, so-and-so, wishing to receive ordination from you, having already been ordained before the assembly of bhikṣuṇīs (ekatoupasampannā bhikkhunīśaṃgha) and having been declared pure of any hindrance, ask for ordination from your assembly”: cf. Vin., II, p. 273-274; Bhikṣuṇīkarmavācanā, p. 133.

²⁹⁴ The five robes of the bhikṣuṇī are: 1) the saṃghaṭī (coat), 2) the uttarāsaṅga (upper robe), 3) the antaravāsa (lower robe), 4) the saṃkakaṅkā (garment covering the sides),

5) the kusūlaka (skirt). – Cf. Vin. II, p. 272; Bhikṣuṇīkarmavācanā, p. 130, l. 9-10; Mahāvuytatti, no. 8922-8936; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 29, p. 187c19; Mo ho seng k'i liu, T 1426, k. 30, p. 472b21-22; Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 48, p. 924c13-14; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 41, p. 296a5; Yi tsiang, tr. Takakusu, p. 78-79.

bowl (pātra), a bhikṣuṇī as preceptress (upādhāyikā) and tutor (ācāriṇī), a bhikṣu as “master of discipline” (śīlācārya), etc., in accordance with the ordination ritual (upasampadādharmā).

Generally (saṃāsataḥ), the discipline of the bhikṣuṇī consists of 500 rules; in detail (vistarataḥ), of 80,000 rules.²⁹⁵

After the third official proposal (trītiyā karmavācanā)²⁹⁶ she obtains the immense discipline (apramāṇasaṃvara) that makes her a bhikṣuṇī.

²⁹⁵ Generally, it is accepted that the discipline of the bhikṣu involves 250 rules, that of the bhikṣuṇī 500 rules (see also P'i ni mou king, T 1463, k. 8, p. 850c15-16; Wei Annals, ch. 114); but these round numbers are not exact. According to Waldschmidt, Bhikṣuṇīprātimokṣa, the exact number of rules in the Prātimokṣa of the various schools is as follows:

Chinese Sarvāstivādin: 257 (bhikṣu); 365 (bhikṣuṇī)

Sanskrit Sarvāstivādin: 263; --

Chinese Mūlasarvāstivādin: 245; 354

Tibetan “ : 262; 371

Mahāvuytatti “ : 255; --

Mahīśāsaka: 251; 380

Mahāśaṃghika: 218; 290

Pāli: 227; 311

²⁹⁶296/296/296 The bhikṣu and bhikṣuṇī receive ordination by means of the jñāpticaturthakakarman, “the ecclesiastical act where the motion (jñāpti) is fourth (caturtha)”, which means: the (threefold) act which, with the motion, makes four. The act of ordination consists of a motion (jñāpti) followed by three proposals (karmavācana) related to the acceptance of the motion by the community:

a. The motion. – The community is requested by a learned and capable monk who says: “Let the community listen: So-and-so, present here, who is a student of the venerable so-and-so, wishes to receive ordination. If the community is willing, let it confer the ordination: this is the motion.”

b. The three proposals. – The monk continues: “Let the community listen: So-and-so, present here, who is a student of the venerable so-and-so, wishes to receive ordination. The community confers ordination to so-and-so with so-and-so as preceptor. Whoever is in agreement that ordination be conferred..., let him be silent. Whoever disagrees, let him speak.” This proposal (karmavācana) is repeated three times. After the third proposal (trītiyā karmavācana), if the community is silent, the ordination is acquired and the monk says: “So-and-so has received ordination from the community with so-and-so as preceptor. The community is agreed; that is why they are silent: thus do I understand.”

On these ceremonies, cf. Vinaya, I, p. 56. 95 (for the bhikṣu); II, p. 274 (for the bhikṣuṇī); J.Filliozat, Frag. du Vin. des Mūlasarv., JA, 1938, p. 50: Oldenberg, Bouddha, p. 390.

In acts of lesser importance, the motion may be followed by a single proposal instead of three; this is called jñāptidvītiyakarman, “the ecclesiastical act where the motion is second”, i.e., the (simple) act which, with the motion, makes two. Cf. Oldenberg, Vinaya Texts, I, p. 169, n. 2.

5. Morality of the bhikṣu.²⁹⁷

As for the bhikṣu, he [must] have the three robes (tricivara), the begging bowl (pātra),²⁹⁸ three masters and a chapter of ten monks (daśavarga)²⁹⁹ conforming to the ordination ritual (upasampadādharmā).

On the whole, the discipline of the bhikṣu involves 250 rules; in detail, 80,000 rules.³⁰⁰

After the third proposal (ṭṭiyā karmavācana),³⁰¹ he obtains the immense discipline [that makes him a bhikṣu].

In general, that is what is called morality or śīla.

²⁹⁸ The tradition of the begging bowl and the three robes is part of the ritual; cf. Vin., I, p. 94: paṭhamam upajjham gāhāpetabbo, upajjham gāhāpetvā pattacivaram acikkhitabbam, ayan te patto, ayaṃ saṃghāti, ayaṃ uttarāsaṅgo, ayaṃ antaravāsako, gaccha amumhi akāse tīṭhahīti.

²⁹⁹ The Chinese character seng (9 and 13) is the usual equivalent of the Sanskrit saṃgha, but when preceded by a number, it renders the Sanskrit daśavarga “chapter of ten monks.” Cf. J. Filliozat, Fragments du Vin. des Sarv., JA, 1938, p. 50, n. 4.

According to the Vinaya, the chapter must consist of ten monks to confer ordination (Vin., I, p. 319); however, in central India (majjhima janapada) where there are fewer monks, a chapter of five monks can validly confer ordination (Vin., I, p. 197, 319).

CHAPTER XXIII: THE VIRTUE OF MORALITY (p. 853F)

[162a] Question. – Now that we know the characteristics of morality (śīlalakṣaṇa), what is the virtue of morality (śīlapāramitā)?

Answer. – 1) Some say that the virtue of morality is the morality of the bodhisattva who prefers to lose his life rather than break the smallest precept. As was said above in the Sou t'o sou mo wang king (Sutasomārājasūtra)³⁰², the bodhisattva sacrifices his life to keep the precepts.

[Jātaka of the flayed Nāga].³⁰³ – In a previous lifetime, the Bodhisattva was a very powerful poisonous dragon (viṣanāga). All beings perished before him, the weak merely at the sight of him, the strong, at his breath.

Having undertaken the discipline of one day (rātridivasaśīla), this nāga started to look for a retreat and entered the forest. Having remained in meditation (manasikāra) for a long time, he tired himself out and fell asleep. Now it is the rule among the nāgas, when they sleep, to take the form (saṃsthāna) of a snake. The body of he nāga bore an inscription in which the seven jewels (saptaratna) mingled their brilliance. Some hunters (vyādha, lubdhaka), seeing him, were astonished and said: “Such a skin (tvac-) is extraordinary (adbhuta) and rare (durlabha); should we not offer it to the king as an adornment?”

³⁰³ This jātaka shows some resemblance to the Campeyya (no. 506) and especially to the Bhūridattajātaka (no. 543): there too the nāgas are practicing the uposathakamma and offer to those who want them their skin, their muscles, their bones and their blood (cf. Pāli Jātaka, VI, p. 169); their deeds are presented as illustrations of śīlapāramitā (cf. Cariyāpīṭaka, p. 85-86; tr. Law, p. 108-109). However, the present tale seems to evoke a famous site near Bāmyān, well-known from descriptions given by Foucher, Notes sur l’itinéraire de Hiuan tsang en Afghanistan, Études Asiatiques, I, p. 261-262: La vieille route de l’Inde de Bactres à Taxila, I, 1942, p. 130-132, pl. 28. To the west of the city, below the confluence of two streams, there is a rocky cliff three hundred meters long and facing north-south; red lichens cover its sides; a long fissure splits the rock in two; the southern end is whitened by many deposits of coarse mineral. With the help of imagination, the Buddhists of the 1st century were able to see, in the rocky cliff, the giant snake of the present jātaka or another analogous to it; the fault in the rock evoked for them the knife that will begin his torture; the red lichens recalled “his bloody flesh scattered about on the ground”; wanting to get the mineral deposit to plunge his body into it to the quick, the snake, attacked by insects, immobilized himself so as not to crush them. – It is true that at the time of Hiuan tsang, this rocky cliff, to Buddhists, evoked rather the gigantic image of a Buddha in nirvāṇa: “Two or three li to the east (correction?, to the west) of the royal city, in a saṃghārāma, there is a recumbent statue of the Buddha in nirvāṇa, more than a thousand feet long” (Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 1, p. 873b). But the old jātaka of the flayed nāga has passed into Muslim legend as the dragon Ajdahā, a legend which archeologists have collected on the spot from the natives of Bāmyān: the rocky crest is none other than the corpse of Ajdahā, the great dragon that desolated the country and which Hazrat Ali, the cousin and son-in-law of the Prophet, had already slain.

Immediately they crushed the snake's head with a stick and cut off his skin with a knife. The nāga said to himself: "My strength is miraculous (ṛddhika); if I spread out over this land, it would be turned over like one's hand. How can these men, tiny things, engage me? But today when I am observing the discipline, I have no care for my life; I will follow the teachings of the Buddha (buddhavacana).” Thereupon, fortifying himself with patience, he closed his eyes and did not look; he held his breath and did not breathe for, out of compassion (anukampā) for these men, [he wanted to spare them]. To keep the discipline, he resolutely (ekacittena) suffered the torture of flaying, without feeling any regret. Thus he lost his skin and his bloody flesh was scattered on the ground. When the hot sun started its journey around the earth, the nāga wanted to get to a large expanse of water [to cool off]; he then saw that small insects (kṛmi) were coming to eat him; to keep the discipline, he dared not move [out of fear that he would crush them]. He said to himself: "Today I give the gift of my body to the insects; it is in order to reach buddhahood that I give my flesh and sacrifice my life; later, when I am a Buddha, I will follow this [good] resolution by practicing the generosity of the Dharma (dharmadāna).” After taking this oath (prañidhāna), his body dried up and he died. He was then reborn in the second heaven (svarga), that of the Trāyastriṃśa.

The poisonous dragon of that time was the Buddha Śākyamuni; the hunters were Devadatta and the six heretic masters; the little insects were the [162b] 80,000 devas who found the Path when the Buddha Śākyamuni turned the wheel of Dharma the first time.

In order to keep the [precepts, the bodhisattva sacrifices his life; he is steadfast (niyata) and without regret. That is why it is called the virtue of morality.

2) In order to reach buddhahood, the bodhisattva who observes morality makes the following great vow (prañidhāna): "I wish to save beings; I am not seeking the happiness of the present existence nor of future existence (ihaparatrasukha); I do not seek glory (yaśas) or fame (praśamsā). I do not seek to enter nirvāṇa later; I have in view only the beings fallen into the great stream (mahāśrotas) [of transmigration], deceived by desire (kāma) and bewildered by stupidity (moha); I wish to save them and lead them to the other shore (pāra). I will observe morality attentively (ekacittena) in order to be reborn in a good place (kuśalasthāna); being reborn in a good place, I will meet good people (satpuruṣa); meeting good people, I will give rise to wisdom (prajñā); giving rise to wisdom, I will come to practice the six virtues (ṣaṭpāramitā); practicing the six virtues, I will reach buddhahood.” Such morality is called the virtue of morality.

3) Furthermore, the mind of the bodhisattva who is observing morality is good (kuśala) and pure (pariśuddha); he is not afraid of the unfortunate destinies (durgatī) and has no wish to be reborn among the gods; he seeks only goodness and purity and perfumes (vāśayati) his mind with the aid of morality so as to make it better. That is the virtue of morality.

4) Moreover, the bodhisattva who observes morality in the spirit of great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta) reaches buddhahood, and that is what is called the virtue of morality.

5) Moreover, by observing morality, the bodhisattva gives rise to six virtues and this fact constitutes the virtue of morality.

a. Why does morality give rise to morality? On leaving the fivefold morality [of the upāsaka], one reaches the tenfold morality of the śrāmaṇera. On leaving the morality of the śrāmaṇera, one takes up the morality of discipline (saṃvaraśīla) [that characterizes the bhikṣu]. On leaving the morality of discipline, one reaches the morality resulting from dhyāna. On leaving the morality of dhyāna, one reaches pure morality (anāsravaśīla). In this way morality gives birth to morality.

b. How does morality give rise to generosity (dāna)? There are three kinds of gifts: i) the material gift (āmiśadāna), ii) the gift of the Dharma (dharmadāna), and iii) the gift of fearlessness (abhaya-dāna).

The morality that abstains from encroaching on the good of others constitutes the "material gift". – Beings who witness this value this behavior. [By means of his example], the moral person preaches the Dharma to them and opens up their intellect. He says: "By carefully observing pure morality, I will be a venerable field of merit (puṇyakṣetra) for all beings; thus all beings, [being inspired by my example], will earn immense merit (apramāṇapuṇya).” All beings fear death; morality which forbids tormenting them constitutes the "gift of fearlessness."

Moreover, the bodhisattva says: "I will observe morality and, as reward for this morality, for all beings I will be a noble cakravartin king or a king of Jambudvīpa. If I become a king of the gods (devarāja), I will load all beings with wealth and there will be no more poor people; later, seated under the Bodhi tree, I will conquer king Māra and destroy his armies; I will realize supreme buddhahood, I will preach the pure Dharma to all beings and will take

c. How does generosity give rise to patience (kṣhānti)? The moral person says to himself: "Today I am observing morality to control my mind. If this morality is without patience, I will fall into hell. Even by not violating the precepts, if I have no patience, I will not escape the evil destinies. How then can I give myself up to anger and not control my thoughts since it is only because of the mind that one enters into the three evil destinies? This is why one must love individual effort, diligence and cultivate patience. Besides, the ascetic who wishes to affirm his moral virtue must exercise patience. Why? Because patience is the great power that consolidates morality and makes it immutable.” Also he says: "Today that I have abandoned the world (pravrajita) and my appearance distinguishes me from a worldly person, how could I give myself up to my emotions like people of the world? It is necessary to try to arm one's mind with patience. By means of patience of body and speech (kāyavākṣānti), the mind acquires patience. If the mind is not patient, the body and speech are not either. This is why the ascetic must use patience of body, speech and mind to break any movement of anger (krodha). Besides, in general (samāsataḥ), this morality involves eighty-four thousand items; in detail (vistararāḥ), an immense number (aprameya) of items. What should I do in order to observe the innumerable rules of morality at once? It is only by patience that I will have command over all morality.” When a person has committed a crime against the king, the king takes the guilty person and puts him into a cart armed with swords; on the six sides of the cart there are sharp points leaving no spaces; the cart goes off at a gallop without choosing a path. If the man succeeds in staying alive without being wounded by the swords, it will be as though he had been put to death but without dying. It is the same for the moral man: his morality is the sharp sword; patience keeps him alive. If his patience is not strong, morality will wound this man. An old man or a night-walker stumbles if he has no stick; patience is the stick of morality that helps that man reach the Path; being the cause and condition of happiness, it is immutable. This is how morality gives rise to the virtue of patience.

d. How does morality give rise to exertion (vīrya)? The moral person excludes all carelessness (pramāda); by personal effort, he cultivates the peerless Dharma (anuttaradharma); he renounces worldly happiness and penetrates into the holy Dharma; he makes the resolution to seek nirvāṇa and save all beings; with this great thought, he has no more laziness, for he seeks the Buddha above all. This is how morality can give rise to exertion.

Moreover, the moral person abhors the sorrows of the world (lokaduhkha) and the sufferings of old age, sickness and death; he develops exertion to free himself and save beings.

[The exertion of the jackal]. – A jackal (sṛgāla) was living in a forest with the lions (siṃha) and tigers (vyāghra), looking for the prey left by these animals. Once when he was hungry and tired, in the middle of the night he jumped over the ramparts of the city and entered into a house. Not finding the meat he was looking for, he went to sleep in a hiding-place (rahasisthāna) and did not awaken until night had passed. Frightened and bewildered, he did not know what to do: to leave was to risk not being able to escape; to stay was to condemn [163a] himself to death. Finally he resolved to die and he lay down on the ground. Some passers-by saw him; one of them said that he needed a jackal's ear (karna) and cut off his ear; the jackal said to himself: "Cutting off an ear is painful, but I am happy to save my life." Another man said that he needed a jackal's tail (puccha), cut off his tail and went away; the jackal said to himself: "Painful as it is to have my tail cut off, that is only a small thing." Finally, a third passer-by said that he needed a jackal's tooth (danta); but the jackal said to himself: "The enthusiasts are too many; if they want to take my head, my life is over." Immediately he got up and using the power of his wisdom, he jumped across an irrigation ditch and was able to save himself.

It is the same for the ascetic who wants to escape from suffering: when old age (jarā) comes, he tries to reassure himself; he does not become saddened and applies exertion; also in the case of sickness (vyādhi), as long as there is hope, he does not worry; when death (maraṇa) comes and he knows there is no more hope, he exerts himself and, arming himself with courage and zeal, he redoubles his energy; from the sphere of death, he will finally reach nirvāṇa. The practice of morality is like drawing the bow. The archer first looks for even ground; once he is on even ground, he fixes his attention; having fixed his attention, he bends the bow fully; having bent the bow, he releases the bow-string. Here the level ground is morality; the bow is fixed attention; the bending of the bow is exertion; the arrow is wisdom; the enemy is ignorance. If one can use one's strength and exertion thus, one will certainly reach the great Path and will save beings.

Finally thanks to exertion, the moral person controls his five instincts and does not feel the five objects of desire (pañcakāmaguṇa). When his mind escapes from him, he grabs hold of it and brings it back. Morality keeps guard over the senses (indriya); guarding the senses, it gives rise to rapture (dhyāna); producing rapture, it gives birth to wisdom (prajñā); creating wisdom, it leads to Buddhahood. This is how morality gives rise to the virtue of exertion.

e. How does morality give rise to rapture (dhyāna)? There are three actions (karman) by which a person does good; if the physical action (kāyakarman) or the vocal action (vākkarman) is good, the mental action (manaskarman) tends spontaneously (svataḥ) towards the good. A twining plant (kuṭilatṛṇa) growing in the midst of hemp is stunted in its growth; thus the power of morality can destroy all the fetters (saṃyojana). How does it destroy them? When one does not observe morality, as soon as a reason for hatred (dveṣavastu) arises, a thought of killing (atipātacitta) is produced; as soon as a reason for desire arises, a thought of lust is produced. On the other hand, even if he experiences a little anger, the moral man does not conceive any thought of killing; even if he experiences sensual attraction, he feels no lust. This is how morality leads all the fetters to destruction. When the fetters are destroyed, rapture (dhyāna) and concentration (saṃādhi) are easy to obtain. Just as death takes place easily for a sick person or an old person who has lost their strength, so rapture and concentration are easy to obtain when the fetters are destroyed.

Moreover, the human mind always and incessantly seeks for pleasure and debauchery; the ascetic who observes morality renounces the worldly joys and his mind is without carelessness (apramāda); this is why he obtains rapture [163b] and concentration easily.

Moreover, the moral person obtains rebirth among humans, then among the six classes of gods of the desire realm (kāmadeva), then in the form realm (rūpadhātu); if he breaks the characteristic marks of matter (rūpanimitta), he is reborn in the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu); if his morality is pure (pariśuddha) he breaks all the fetters (saṃyojana) and attains arhathood; if he observes morality with the great mind [of Bodhi] and has compassion for all beings, he is a bodhisattva.

Moreover, morality moderates coarse (sthūla) appetites and rapture accommodates subtle (sūkṣma) appetites.

Moreover, morality governs body and speech while rapture stops distractions (vikṣiptacitta). Just as a man whose room is upstairs cannot get up to it without a staircase so, without the ladder of morality, one cannot reach rapture.

Finally, the wind of the fetters (saṃyojanavāyu) is violent and scatters the mind in the person who transgresses morality; his mind being scattered, he does not reach rapture. In the moral person, the wind of the passions (kleśavāyu) is weak and does not scatter the mind too much; rapture and concentration are easy to obtain.

For all these reasons, morality gives rise to rapture.

f. How does morality give rise to wisdom (prajñā)? The moral person sees the characteristics of morality and knows from where it derives its existence. He knows that it derives its origin from sins (āpatti) for, if there were no sins [killing, etc.], there would be no morality [abstention from killing, etc.]. Such is the nature of morality: it is the result of causes and conditions (hetupratyaya). Then why become attached (abhiniveśa) to it? It is like the lotus (utpala): it comes from the foul mud; beautiful as its colors may be, its place of origin is impure; from that we understand that one should not be attached to it. This is how morality gives rise to wisdom.

Moreover, the moral person says to himself: “We claim that morality is noble (praṇita) and that we should keep it, that immorality is vile (hīna) and that we should avoid it. Such an idea does not correspond to wisdom. According to the judgment of wisdom, the mind is not attached to morality; there is nothing there to grasp, nothing to let go of.” This is how morality gives birth to the virtue of wisdom.

Moreover, the person who does not observe morality, even though he has keen knowledge (nīkṣajñāna), seeks common occupations and keeps busy in every way finding means of livelihood; the organ of knowledge (jñānendriya) becomes dulled little by little, like a slicing blade, if used to cut clay becomes more and more chipped. The monastic who observes morality and is not occupied with the business of the world always contemplates (samanupaśyati) the absence of characteristics (animitta) which makes up the true nature of all dharmas. Even though originally he has only weak faculties (mṛdvindriya), [his knowledge] becomes sharper gradually. For all these reasons, one can say that morality gives rise to the virtue of wisdom. Thus the virtue of morality gives rise to the six virtues.

6) Furthermore, the bodhisattva who observes morality does not know fear (bhaya); he is free of confusion (moha), hesitation (kāṅkṣā) and doubt (saṃśaya); he does not aspire personally for nirvāṇa; he observes morality solely in the interests of all beings, in order to reach buddahood and acquire all the Buddha attributes. This characteristic constitutes the virtue of morality.

7) Moreover, [in the words of the sūtra, above, p. 770F], the bodhisattva “is based on the non-existence of sin and its opposite” (āpattyanāpattyanadhyāpattitām upādāya), and this constitutes the virtue of morality.

[163c] Question. – If morality consists of avoiding evil and practicing good, why speak of the non-existence of sin and its opposite?

Answer. – Speaking of their non-existence is neither wrong view (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) nor gross conception (sthūlacitta); if one penetrates deeply into the nature of dharmas and if one cultivates the meditative stabilization of emptiness (śūnyatāsamādhi), one sees by the eye of wisdom (prajñācakṣus) that sin (āpatti) does not exist. If sin does not exist, its opposite, absence of sin (anāpatti) does not exist either. Besides, if the being does not exist, the sin of killing (atipātāpatti) does not exist either; if the sin does not exist, the discipline (śīla) that forbids it does not exist either. Why? There must be a sin of killing in order that the forbidding of killing exist; but since there is no sin of killing, its forbidding does not exist.

Question. – Beings presently exist; would you say that they do not exist?

Answer. – That which is seen by the fleshly eye (māṃsacakṣus) is not right seeing (darśana); if one uses the eye of wisdom (prajñācakṣus), one will see that there are no beings. As was said above (p. 724F) in regard to generosity, there is neither donor (dāyaka) nor recipient (pratigrāhaka) nor thing given (deya); it is the same here.

Moreover, if the being (sattva) existed, it would be the same as the five aggregates (skandha) or different from them. If it were identical with the five skandhas, the skandhas being five and the sentient being being one, five would equal one and one would equal five. An exchange market where five would equal one would find no taker. Why? Because one does not make five. This is why we know that the five skandhas do not make up one single being. – Moreover, the five skandhas that arise (utpanna) and perish (niruddha) are of impermanent nature (anityalakṣaṇa), whereas the being’s nature is to pass from one existence to the next by accumulating sins (āpatti) and merits (puṇya) in the three worlds (traiḍhātuka). If the five skandhas are confused with the being, the latter would be like plants (tr̥ṇa) and trees (kāṣṭha) which, arising spontaneously and perishing spontaneously, are unaffected by the bond of sin (āpattibandhana) and by liberation (vimokṣa). Thus we know that the five skandhas are not the being.

That a being exists outside of the skandhas has already been refuted above when it was a question of the eternity and omnipresence of the ātman (cf. p. 740F). Besides, the view of self (ātmadr̥ṣṭi) does not arise outside of the five skandhas. If a being existed outside of the five skandhas, it would be eternal and, if it were eternal, it would escape birth (jāti) and death (maraṇa). Why? Because birth is to be after not having been, and death is to perish after having been born. If beings were eternal, they would fill up the five destinies (pañcagati). Being eternal from the very beginning, would they return into existence? Free of birth, they would also be free of death.

Question. – It is certain that the being exists; why do you say that it does not exist? There is a dharma, ‘being’, that has the five skandhas as causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), just as the dharma ‘hand’ exists as a result of the five fingers (aṅguli).

Answer. – This statement is false. If a dharma, ‘being’, existed as a result of the five skandhas, the existence of this dharma ‘being’ would not be conceived apart or outside of the five skandhas. The eye (cakṣus) sees color (rūpa), the ear (śrotra) hears sound (śabda), the nose (ghrāṇa) smells odor (gandha), the tongue (jihvā) tastes flavor (rasa), the body (kāya) feels touch (spraśṭavya) and the mind (manas) cognizes dharmas; but all of that is empty [164a] (śūnya) and free of substantial self (anātman). There is no being distinct from these six things. The heretics (tīrthika), who believe the reverse, claim that the being is the eye that sees colors, etc., up to... the mind that cognizes dharmas. Or else, they are of the opinion that the being is the mind that experiences suffering or pleasure. Those who share this view do not know the reality of the being.

[The trick of the self-interested disciples]. - There was a very virtuous venerable disciple. The people who claimed he was an arhat brought him masses of offerings. Later, he became sick and died. Fearing to lose the offerings [that were brought to him], his disciples took away his body during the night and arranged the coverings and pillows on his bed so that one would have said that the teacher was there lying on his bed. To those who came to ask about the condition of the sick man, the disciples said: “Don’t you see his bed-clothes and pillows on the bed?” Without looking into the matter, the foolish people thought the teacher was sick and in bed, and went away after having made their offerings. This happened several times. There was, however, an intelligent man who came to enquire about him; the disciples gave him the same answer. But this intelligent man replied: “I didn’t ask you about the bed-clothes and the pillows on the bed; I asked you about the man.” Taking away the covers, he looked for his teacher, but there was no one there. [Here too], outside of the six objects, there is no ātman. Similarly, there is no individual who cognizes (jñānin) or who sees (darhin).

Furthermore, if the being existed in the five skandhas as in its causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), the five skandhas being transitory, the being also would be transitory. Why? Because there is a similarity

Furthermore, if, as you claim, the being existed eternally from the very beginning, then the being would have to give birth to the five skandhas, whereas the five skandhas could not give birth to the being. Now as causes and conditions, the five skandhas give rise [only] to a metaphor of being (sattvanāmasaṃketa), and the fool chases after this name in search of a reality. This is why the being is really non-existent. Since the being does not exist, there is no sin in murder, and since murder does not exist, there is no discipline (śīla) to forbid it.

Furthermore, if one examines the five skandhas deeply, one will know by the analysis that they are empty (śūnya) like visions in a dream (svapnadarsana), like reflections in a mirror (ādarśanabimba). In killing a vision in a dream or reflection in a mirror, one is not committing murder. Similarly, by killing a being, i.e., the five skandhas that have emptiness as nature (śūnyatānimitta), one does not commit a fault.

Finally, the person who hates sin (āpatti) and is attached to its opposite (anāpatti), feels scorn (avamāna) and pride (abhimāna) when he sees someone transgress the precepts; he feels affection (anunaya) and respect (satkāra) when he sees an honest man observing the precepts. Such a morality is a generating cause (āpattisamutthāpakahetupratyaya) of sin. Consequently we say [with the sūtra] that it is necessary to fulfill the virtue of morality by being based on the non-existence of sin and its opposite.

CHAPTER XXIV³⁰⁴: THE VIRTUE OF PATIENCE (p. 865F)

[164b] Sūtra: It is necessary to fulfill the virtue of patience by being based on non-turbulence of the mind (kṣāntipāramitā paripūrayitavyā akṣobhaṇatām upādāya).

I. DEFINITION AND DIVISION OF PATIENCE

Śāstra. – Question. – What is kṣānti?

Answer. – In the language of Ts'ing, kṣānti means patience.

There are two kinds of patience: i) the patience toward beings (sattvaṃkṣānti); ii) the patience toward the Dharma (dharmakṣānti). The bodhisattva who practices patience toward beings acquires immense merit (apramāṇapunya); the bodhisattva who practices patience toward the Dharma acquires immense wisdom (apramāṇaprajñā). Endowed with these two benefits, merit and wisdom, he obtains the realization of all his wishes (yatheṣṭasiddhi): he is like the person who, having eyes and feet, can go wherever he wishes. The bodhisattva who encounters insult or injury, who is struck by sword or stick, knows, on thinking about it, that the cause of it is his [previous] actions, that the dharmas, both internal (adhyātmam) as well as external (bāhyam) are absolutely empty (atyantaśūnya), without substantial self (anātman), not possessed by a “me” (anātmīya). The threefold seal of the Dharma (dharmamudrā)³⁰⁵ is imprinted on all dharmas and, although they have the power to bring a painful retribution, the bodhisattva withstands them without feeling annoyance (duṣṭacitta) or speaking abusively.

At the same time, patience is called the production of a certain mental event (caitasikadharmā): when one has it, patience and knowledge become stable, like a painting owes its resistance to the glue.

³⁰⁴ The virtue of patience does not play a large rôle in the Lesser Vehicle: a short praise in Dīgha, II, p. 49: khantī paramaṃ tapo titikkhā nibbānaṃ paramaṃ vadanti Buddhā, and in Saṃyutta, I, p. 226: khantiyā bhiyyo na vijjati; a brief definition in Dhammasaṅgani, 230: Yā khantī khamanatā adhiṇvāsanaṭā acaṇḍikkam anasuropanattamanatā cittasa, ayaṃ viccati khantī. But the opposite sin, anger, hatred or aversion (krodha, dveṣa, pratigha) is often condemned.

The Greater Vehicle, on the other hand, attaches great importance to patience: it distinguishes three main kinds: parāpakāramarṣaṇakṣānti, pardoning injuries; duḥkhādhivāsanākṣānti, withstanding suffering; dharmādhivāsanākṣānti, meditating on the Dharma and adhering to it. See, among other sources, Sūtrālaṃkāra, ed. Lévi, p. 108; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 189-199; Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 179-188 (tr. Bendall-Rouse, p. 175-183); Bodhicaryāvatāra and Pañjikā, ch. VI (tr. Lav. O. 49-69); Saṃgraha, p. 191; Siddhi, p. 621; Ta fang kouang, T 279, k. 44, p. 232b sq.

³⁰⁵ The three seals of the Dharma will be defined below, k. 15, p. 170a.

Some say that there are two kinds of good minds (kuśalacitta), one coarse (sthūla), the other subtle (sūkṣma), the former being patience, the latter, rapture (dhyāna). As long as one has not acquired rapture, spiritual joy (prīti) is only able to mask (praticchādana) sins: this is called patience; when one has acquired rapture, this joy can avoid all sin: this is called rapture.

Patience is a mental event (caitasikadharma) associated with the mind (cittasamprayukta) and accompanying the mind (cittānusārin); it is not an action (karman) or the retribution of an action (karmavipāka) but a companion of action (karmānusārin).

According to some, it belongs to two realms (dhātudvayāvacara) (desire realm and form realm]. According to others, it belongs only to the desire realm (kāmadhātvavacara) or to no realm (anavacara); [it would be foreign to the form realm] for there are no external annoyances to be withstood in the form realm (rūpadhātu).

Patience is impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), for it is found among worldly people as well as in the saints (ārya).

The patience that puts an obstacle (āvṛṇoti) to the bad instincts of one's own mind or the mind of another (svaparacittākuśaladharma) is said to be good (kuśala). Since it is good, there is suppression (samuccheda) or non-suppression (asamuccheda) of thinking (manasikāra). All this is fully analyzed in the Abhidharma.

II. PATIENCE TOWARD BEINGS

Question. – What is patience toward beings (sattvaṣṭānti)?

Answer. – There are two kinds of beings for the bodhisattva: i) those who cover him with respect (satkāra) and veneration (pūjā), ii) those who hate him, insult him, strike him and torment him. The bodhisattva is able to withstand both kinds: he does not like the man who flatters him; he does not hate the man who harms him. That is patience toward beings.

1. Indifference toward sycophants.

Question. – Can there be patience in the face of respect and veneration?

Answer. – There are two kinds of fetters: i) those that depend on affection (anunayapatita); ii) those that depend on aversion (pratighapatita). Respect and veneration do not give birth to aversion but lead to affection (anunaya) and attachment (ahiniveśa); these are skillful seducers and this is why it is necessary to cultivate indifference toward them without becoming attached to them and without liking them. How does one remain insensible to them? By thinking about their impermanence (anityatā) and [by knowing] that they are a source of fetters (saṃyojanopapattisthāna). Thus the Buddha said: “Profit and honors (lābhasatkāra) are a deep wound (vraṇa). Just as a wound cuts through the skin (chavi) into the flesh (māṃsa) to the bone (asthi), breaks the bone and penetrates to the marrow (asthimīṇja), so the man attached to profit and honors cuts the skin of morality (śīlacchavi), breaks the flesh of rapture (dhyānamāṃsa), crushes the bone of wisdom (prajñāsthi) and loses the marrow of the subtle good mind (sūkṣmakuśalacittamiñjā).”³⁰⁶

[164c] [Devadatta, the victim of profit and honors]³⁰⁷

³⁰⁶ Actually, the Buddha did not compare greed and ambition to a wound but to the torture of a hair-rope (vālarajju): see the Rajjūsutta of Saṃyutta, II, p. 238, which the Mppś has cited more accurately above, Traité, p. 234F.

³⁰⁷ The story of Devadatta is of considerable interest from the point of view of the formation of Buddhist legends and scriptures; see Kern, Histoire, I, p. 186-206; Manual, p. 38-40; T. W. Rhys-Davids, Devadatta, ERE, IV, p. 676-677. Thomas, Life of Buddha, p. 131-138. Here is a brief account of the sources:

1) The Suttapiṭaka makes only brief allusions to Devadatta: the Dīgha has not a single word about him; the Majjhima and the Saṃyutta know him as a man of evil desires (Saṃ., II, p. 156), lost in greed and ambition (Maj., I, p. 192); Saṃ, II, p. 240-242), condemned to hell (Maj., I, p. 392). The Āṅguttara is better informed; but, except for a single passage (Añ., IV, p. 402 seq.), all the places dealing with Devadatta seem to be borrowed word for word from the Pāli Vinaya (Añ., II, p. 73 = Vin., II, p. 188; Añ., II, P, 123 = Vin., II, p. 185; Añ., IV, p. 160, 164 – Vin., II, p. 202) and may be considered as interpolations. Similarly, the Udāna, p. 60, is taken from Vin., II, p. 198; Itivuttaka, p. 85 is taken from Vin., II, p. 203.

The Chinese Āgamas do not seem to know the famous heretic any better, except for the Ekottara of late date and encyclopedic nature, which tells the story of Devadatta in full detail (T 125, k. 47, p. 803b-806a).

The Mahāsmṃghikas are limited to presenting Devadatta as the Buddha's cousin and rival in childhood (cf. Mahāvastu, II, p. 74; III, p. 176 seq.; Fo pen hing tsi king, T 190, k. 12, p. 705b-c), but seem to be unaware of the schism he provoked in the community; according to them, Devadatta was not part of the order because the Buddha had refused to ordain him: cf. Mahāvastu, III, p. 181, l. 3; T 190, k. 59, o. 923c (tr. Beal, Romantic Legend, p. 380). It may be that the Mahāsaṃghikas separated from the Sthaviras before the legend of Devadatta was completed.

2) The Vinayas and the sources that depend on them give us plenty of information on the collusion between Devadatta and Ajātaśatru, the schism which he caused in the community, the plots which he concocted against the Buddha, as well as his fall into hell. But here again it is necessary to distinguish between two groups of Vinaya:

a. The Pāli Vinaya (II, p. 182-203; tr. Rh. D-Oldenberg, III, p. 224-265) as well as its two tributaries, the Vin of the Mahīśāsakas (T 1421, k. 25, p. 164a-166b) and that of the Dharmaguptas (T 1428, k. 46, p. 909b-910c), know the main features of the legend only. It seems that in the Pāli language these became congealed in the Vinaya, for later sources such as the Jātaka II, p. 355-358; IV, p. 158-159; V, p. 333-337; VI, p. 129-131, and the Dhammapadāṭṭhakathā, I, p. 133-150 show no appreciable evolution.

b. On the other hand, the Sarvāstivādin sources developed the story of Devadatta considerably and inserted a number of unedited episodes. To be convinced of this, it is enough to glance at the lengthy pages which the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya and related texts have dedicated to him: Sarvāstivādin Vin, T 1435, k. 257a-271a; Mūlasarvāstivādin Vin., T 1450, k. 13-14, p. 168a-174c; k. 20, p. 203; T 1464, k. 2, p. 859a-860a (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 83-87, 92, 94, 106-107). From these developed sources, the Mppś has borrowed the complete biography of [Vocation]. – When the Buddha returned to the land of Kia p'i lo p'o (Kapilavastu) for the first time, he was accompanied by 1250 bhikṣus, all brahmacārins; since they had been worshippers of fire (agni), their appearance was miserable; since they had practiced fasting and asceticism, their bodies were emaciated. King Tsing fan (Śuddhodana) said to himself: “My son’s companions (parivāra), although animated by pure intention (cittaviśuddhi), are really not good-looking. I am going to choose among my sons and grandsons; each family will give one of their members to be a disciple of the Buddha.” Having had this thought, he published an edict in the land enjoining certain young men of the nobility of the Śākya to leave home and go forth (pravrajyā).³⁰⁸ It was then that Devadatta, son of king Hou fan (Droṇodana),³⁰⁹ left home practiced the Path and recited the 60,000 items of the Dharma (dharmaskandha)³¹⁰. For twelve years he pursued his efforts zealously.³¹¹

Devadatta of which it gives a summary here. The Memoirs of Hiuan Tsang repeat it in almost the same words: Cf. Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 5, p. 899a-900a (tr. Beal, II, p. 8-9; Watters, I, p. 390).

³⁰⁸ On the forced vocation of 500 young Śākya, see above, Traité, I, p. 176-177F and the notes. Śuddhodana’s intervention was unfortunate for , among these young men, “some of them, well disposed, tasted the joy of the path, others found no joy in it.” The Buddha did not approve of his father’s initiative; three times he advised Devadatta to remain in the world, but the latter “shaved his head and beard and put on the kāśāya of the monk”; then he studied with the bhikṣu Sieou lo t'o (Surādha) who taught him the precepts and the discipline (śīlasāṃvara) and the bases of miraculous power (ṛddhipāda): Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 47, p. 802b-c.

³⁰⁹³⁰⁹ According to the Mppś (T 1509, k. 3, p. 83c1; k. 14, p. 164c7) and Hiuan tsang (T 2087, k. 6, p. 900a2), Devadatta was the son of Droṇodana. Other sources say that his father was Suprabuddha (Mahāvamsa, II, v. 21, p. 14; Dhammapadaṭṭha, III, p. 44), Amṛtodana (K’i che king, T 24, k. 10, p. 364b5-6; K’i che yin pen king, T 25, k. 10, p. 419b7-8; Che eul yeou king, T 195, p. 146c9-10; Ken pen chouo ... p’o seng che; T 1450, k. 2, p. 105a18; Rockhill, Life, p. 13) or Śuklodana (Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 14, p. 101b17).

³¹⁰ Thus he knew three-quarters of the Dharma which consists of 80,000 items (see Kośa, I, p. 46). The Tch’ou yao king, T 212, k. 14, p. 687b11, also attributes 60,000 items to Devadatta, but Hiuan tsang (T 2087, k. 6, p. 900a3-4) says 80,000.

³¹¹ Devadatta’s efforts lasted twelve years. This detail is also found in Che song liu, T 1435, k. 36, p. 257a8, and Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 6, p. 900a2.

[Conquest of the supernatural powers].³¹² Later, coveting honor (satkāra) and gain (lābha), he went to find the Buddha to ask him to teach him the supernatural powers (abhijñā).³¹³ The Buddha said to him: “Gautama, consider the impermanence of the five aggregates (pañcaskandhānityatā): this is how you will be able to find the Path and, at the same time, obtain the supernatural powers”; however, the Buddha did not teach him the means of acquiring them. Devadatta went away and made the same request of Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana and up to five hundred arhats, but all of them were silent about the method, saying: “Consider the impermanence of the five aggregates: you will thus find the Path and at the same time acquire the supernatural powers.” Devadatta wept with vexation and, going to Ānanda, begged him to teach him the supernatural powers. At that time, Ānanda did not yet have the knowledge of another’s mind (paracittajñāna); however, out of consideration for his brother and on the advice of the Buddha, he taught Devadatta the means of acquiring the supernatural powers. Devadatta withdrew to the mountain and soon acquired the [first] five powers.

[Connection with Ajātaśatru]. – Once in possession of these five powers, he said: “Who should be my benefactor (dānapati)? Prince A chō che (Ajātaśatru) has the marks (nimitta) of a great king; I want to make him my friend.”

At once he went to the heaven [of the Trāyastriṃsas] and took the celestial food (divyāhāra);³¹⁴ on his return, he went to the Yu tan lo yue (Uttaravati) and gathered the rice [growing there] spontaneously;³¹⁵ finally he came to the Yen feou (Jambuvana) forest and there he gathered the fruit of the rose-apple (jambuphala). He gave all of these to prince Ajātaśatru as a gift.

³¹² One day when the Buddha was at Rājagṛha, a famine broke out. The bhikṣus who had magical powers went to various mythical regions, Jambudvīpa, Pūrvavideha, Aparagodāna, Uttarakuru, the Trāyastriṃśa heaven, to gather the marvelous foods and fruits which these regions produced and distributed them to the community. Envious of their powers, Devadatta asked the Buddha to teach him magic, but the Buddha advised him rather to work for his own salvation. Devadatta then addressed the great bhikṣus, Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana and up to 500 arhats, but all of them refused him. In despair, Devadatta then had recourse to his brother Ānanda who, giving in to his entreaties, gave him the secrets of magic and other miraculous powers. – Cf. Che song liu, T 1435, k. 36, p. 257a-b, which the Mppś follows almost textually here; Pi nai ye, T 1464, k. 2, p. 859b; Tch’ou yao king, T 212, k. 14, p. 687b-c. In the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vin. (T 1450, k. 13, p. 167c-168b; Rockhill, Life, p. 84-85), it is Ānanda’s teacher, Daśabala Kāśyapa, who communicates the secrets of magic to Devadatta; in Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 47, p. 802c, it is the bhikṣu Sieou lo t'o (Surādha).

This episode does not occur in the Pāli sources: the Vinaya, II, p. 183, notes only that Devadatta had acquired the ordinary magical powers (pothujjanika iddhi).

³¹⁴ Ambrosia (amṛta) or soma, according to the previously cited sources.

³¹⁵ The inhabitants of Uttarakuru had a marvelous rice, growing without the need of work or seed, without being husked, naturally perfumed and delicious in taste; To cook it, one placed it in a vessel which is set on ‘glowing stones’; these stones flame up at once and as soon as the rice is cooked, they become extinguished: cf. Dīgha, III, p. 199; Ājānātikasūtra, ed. Hoffman, p. 46-47; Divyāvādāna, p. 216; Dhammapadaṭṭha, IV, p. 209 (tr. Burlingame, Buddhist Legends, III, p. 321-322. – This marvelous rice is represented at Bharhut: cf. A. Foucher, Sur l’interprétation de quatre bas-reliefs de Bharhut, RAA, XIII, 1939, p. 1-9.

He transformed himself several times³¹⁶, changing into a marvelous elephant (hastiratna) or a marvelous horse (aśvaratna) and disturbing the prince's mind. One day he changed into a child (kumāraka) and came to sit on the prince's lap; the prince took him in his arms, kissed him and gave him some spit.³¹⁷ Each time Devadatta stated his name so that the prince recognized him.

Devadatta moved Ajātaśatru's mind by means of these transformations (pariṇāma); the prince lost his head. He built a large monastery (viḥāra) in the Ngai yuan (Ambavana);³¹⁸ nothing was missing in it, not the ³¹⁶ Among these transformations, Devadatta's metamorphosis into a child is the best known; some sources do not mention any others. Pāli Vin., II, p. 185: Having changed his own shape and taken that of a little boy, Devadatta appeared on the lap of prince Ajātaśatru adorned with a belt of snakes. Ajātaśatru was frightened, dumbfounded and terrified. Devadatta said to him: Are you afraid of me, prince? – Yes, who are you? – I am Devadatta. – Then show me your own form. – Then Devadatta put away the form of the little boy and stood up before prince Ajātaśatru, begging bowl in his hand, clothed in his monks' robes. See also Dhammapadaṭṭha, I, p. 139 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, I, p. 235); Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 47, p. 802c; Tch'ou yao king, T 212, k. 14, p. 687c; P'i p'o cha, T 1545, k. 85, p. 442a.

There were yet other metamorphoses that the Sarvāstivādin sources enumerate: they tell how Devadatta changed into an elephant, a horse, a veil, a cap, a monk, and finally a child: cf. T 1435, k. 36, p. 257c, which the Mppś follows closely: Devadatta changed into a precious elephant in prince Ajātaśatru's house: he came in by the door and left by the window ... Then he changed into a precious horse that did the same ... Then he changed into a precious veil and appeared on the prince's lap who took it and fastened it on his forehead ... Finally, he changed into a handsome little boy wearing a necklace of precious gold and appeared on the prince's lap who took him in his arms, played with him and spat into his mouth. The same story with details almost the same in Ken pen chouo... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 13, p. 168c (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 86); Pi nai ye, T 1464, k. 2, p. 859b; Pie yi tsa a han, T 100, k. 1, p. 374c.

³¹⁷ This disgusting detail, unknown to the Pāli sources is mentioned in almost all the Chinese versions. Here is the explanation which the Mppś will give later (T 1509, k. 20, p. 252b): The Buddha called Devadatta a fanatic, a corpse, a swallower of spit ... A swallower of spit because Devadatta, greedy for gain (lābha) and honors (satkāra), changed into a little boy of celestial beauty and appeared in the arms of king Ajātaśatru. The king kissed his mouth and gave him some spit to swallow. This is why Devadatta is called the man who swallows spit." The same explanation is found in Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 85, p. 442a: First, Devadatta possessed the raptures (dhyāna); thanks to his abhijñā of magical power, he changed into a little boy, clothed in a garment sewn with gold thread, his head crowned with five flowers; he sat down on prince Ajātaśatru's knee, caressed him and joked with him until the prince recognized that he was the venerable Devadatta. Then the prince took him in his arms with affection, kissed him and spat into his mouth. Very greedy for gain and honor, Devadatta swallowed this spit. This is why the Buddha reprimanded him, saying: "You are carrion, eating human spit." When Devadatta had swallowed this spit, he came out of his rapture, but quickly resumed his body of metamorphosis."

³¹⁸ Many places are known with the name of Ambavana (cf. Malalasekera, I, p.160): actually, the monastery built for Devadatta was at Gayaśīrṣa (cf. Jātaka, I, p. 185, 508; II, p. 38). All the sources enviously describe the gifts that Ajātaśatru piled on Devadatta: Saṃyutta, II, p. 242; Vinaya, II, p. 185, 187; Tsa a han, T 99, k. 38, no. 1064, k. 33, p. 276b-c; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 36, p. 257c; Ken pen chouo... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 13, p. 168c; k. 14, p. 173b (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 86).

fourfold pūjā, not the most varied furnishings. He made a gift of this monastery to Devadatta and, each day, leading his great ministers (mahāmātya), Ajātaśatru brought five hundred cauldrons of rice soup.

[First sin: the schism].³¹⁹ – Although Devadatta received so many offerings, his community was limited. He said to himself: "I have thirty marks of the Great Man (mahāpurusalakṣaṇa),³²⁰ a few less than the Buddha [who has thirty-two]; but my disciples are not numerous. If I had a large community (mahāsaṃgha) [165a] around me, in what way would I be different from the Buddha?" Having had this thought, he provoked a schism in the assembly (saṃghabheda) and won five hundred disciples to his cause.

Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana came to preach the Dharma to them and converted them; [the Buddha's] community was reformed.

³¹⁹ Here is a brief summary of this schism, told by all of the sources in a more or less concordant way: Blinded by his success, Devadatta went to Rājagṛha in the Veṇuvana where the Buddha was preaching the Dharma. Respectfully bowing to the teacher, he made the following statement: "Lord, you are already old; entrust the assembly to me: I will take care of it." The Buddha refused three times: "I would not entrust the assembly even to Śāriputra or Maudgalyāyana, still less to you who are nothing and worthless." Devadatta went away furious. – Cf. Pāli Vinaya, II, p. II, p. 188-189; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 30, p. 258b; Ken pen chouo... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 14, p. 169b (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 86); Pi nai ye, T 1464, k. 2, p. 860a; Dhammapadaṭṭha, I, p. 139-140.

It was undoubtedly after these events that Devadatta tried to foment discord in the Saṃgha. He persuaded Kokālika, Katamoraga-tiṣya, Khaṇḍradavya and Samudradatta to go with him to advise the Buddha to impose on the monks a more severe way of life. The new rule would involve the following points: i) to live as hermits in the forest; ii) to live entirely on begged food, never to accept an invitation; iii) to dress in gathered rags and tatters; iv) to spend the nights at the foot of a tree; v) to abstain from meat and fish.

The teacher refused to agree to these demands and declared that he would allow those who wished to adopt this kind of life free to do so, but that he would not make these rules obligatory for all the monks. Already expecting this refusal, Devadatta took it as a pretext to revolt against the Buddha; he won over five hundred monks to his cause. Vṛji, natives of Vaiśālī, who, since they had only recently entered into the community, were ignorant of the rules. – Cf. Vinaya, II, p. 196-198; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 25, p. 164a; Sseu fen liu, k. 46, p. 909b; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 36, p. 259a; Ken pen chouo... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 14, p. 70b seq. (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 87); Dhammapadaṭṭha, I, p. 141-142.

Surrounded by his supporters, Devadatta went back to the monastery of Gayaśīrṣa. One day when he was preaching the Dharma, he saw in the assembly Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana. Thinking that they had come to join his side, he invited Śāriputra to address the assembly and, feeling tired himself, he lay down to sleep. Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana spoke and easily persuaded the five hundred schismatic monks to return to the Buddha. Awakened from his sleep by Kokālika, when Devadatta learned what had just taken place, hot blood flowed from his mouth. – Cf. Vinaya, II, p. 199-200; Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 46, p. 909c-910a; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 37, p. 265b-c; Ken pen chouo... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 20, p. 203a-b (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 94); Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 47, p. 803a; Dhammapadaṭṭha, I, p. 143.

[Second sin: Wound inflicted on the Buddha].³²¹ – Then Devadatta conceived a dire plan (duṣṭacitta): he pushed down a rock to crush the Buddha. But Kin kang li che (Vajrapāṇi) with his thunderbolt (vajrakīla) threw the rock far away. However, a rock splinter split off which wounded the Buddha's toe.

[Third sin: Mortal wounding of an arhatī].³²² – When the bhikṣuṇī (Utpalavarṇā) reproached him, Devadatta struck her with his fist. At that moment, her eyes fell out of [their orbits] and she died.

³²¹ Actually, Devadatta made not one but three attempts against the Buddha:

i) He hired assassins to kill him; ii) he caused a rock to roll down to crush him;

iii) he loosed the mad elephant Nālāgiri against him. In the Pāli sources (Vinaya, II, p. 191-196; Dhammapadātṭha, I, p. 140-141; Jātaka, V, p. 333-3370, these attempts immediately preceded the schism instead of following later as is the case here.

³²² This last crime was invented at a late date in order to be able to attribute to Devadatta a third ānantarya sin. The Pāli sources are completely ignorant of this and the Chinese sources give at least three different versions:

a. After his conversion, Ajātaśatru forbade entry into his palace to Devadatta and his followers and reserved his gifts for the Buddha and his disciples. Seeing himself rejected, Devadatta stood behind the palace door: one day he saw the bhikṣuṇī Utpalavarṇā coming out of the palace with her bowl full of food; attributing his blighted hopes to the intrigues of this “shaved woman”, he came before her and struck her. The nun protested her innocence in vain: never had she wanted to offend Devadatta, “brother of the Buddha, member of the Śākya family and a monk”. Without listening to her protests, Devadatta struck her head with his fist and broke her skull. In a burst of energy, Utpalavarṇā succeeded in getting back to the nunnery and when her sister nuns asked about her adventure, she said: “Sisters, all that lives is transitory, all dharmas are without self, nirvāṇa is peace (śānta). Devadatta has just committed his third ānantarya. As for me, today is the very day I will enter into nirvāṇa.” Then in the presence of the community of nuns, she manifested all kinds of miraculous transformations and entered into nirupadhiṣeṣanirvāṇadhātu. – This first version is summarized in the Mūlasarvāśivādin Vinaya, Ken pen chouo... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 10, p. 147c-148a (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 106-107).

b. According to the Pi nai ye, T 1464, k. 2, p. 857c, Devadatta assaulted Utpalavarṇā at the beginning of his criminal career when, after twelve years dedicated to studying the sūtras and practicing the Path, he began to harbor bad feelings against the Buddha and to violate the precepts. This Vinaya says: “In all the rooms of the monastery, mats (niṣadana) had been laid down on the ground and the Buddha had proposed a precept forbidding entry into the monastery without having washed one's feet. One day, Devadatta entered without washing his feet. The bhikṣuṇī Utpalavarṇā said to him: “Hey, Devadatta, the Bhagavat has forbidden entering without washing your feet!” – “Wicked nun”, replied the latter, “do you know the precepts better than I do?” – And, with the colossal strength (vīrabala) of his fist, he struck the bhikṣuṇī on the head, killing her. The bhikṣus brought the matter to the Buddha who said: “Have pity on this poor nun; he committed an ānantarya sin ; as for the bhikṣuṇī, she has attained arhathood.”

c. In the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 47, p. 803, Devadatta lifted his hand, not against Utpalavarṇā, but against the nun Fa che, probably Dharmadinnā, a well-known nun, who appears in the Majjhimā, I, p. 299; Aṅguttara, I, p. 25, and Therīgāthā, v. 12. It was in vain that Devadatta, with the complicity of Ajātaśatru, loosed the mad elephant Nālāgiri against the Buddha. The plot failed miserably and Ajātaśatru was about to repent. Worried and displeased, Devadatta left Rājagṛha, Seeing him from afar, the bhikṣuṇī Dharmadinnā said to him: “What you did was very bad; the regret that you feel today is slight; tomorrow it will perhaps be heavier.” Hearing these words, Devadatta's anger increased and he answered: “Bald slave, what is this error, the regret for which, slight today, will

[Connection with the heretics]. – He joined in friendship with bad teachers, the heretic Fou lan ma (Pūrāṇa), etc.; he destroyed all the roots of good (kuśalamūla) unashamedly.

[Attempt to poison the Buddha and fall into hell].³²⁴ – Finally, Devadatta dipped his fingernails into poison (viṣa) and, under the pretext of going to bow before the Buddha, he tried to wound him. He wanted to go, increase tomorrow?” – The bhikṣuṇī answered: “By committing the sin today, you have created the roots of evil (akuśalamūla).” – Then Devadatta, inflamed with anger, struck her with his hand and killed her.

³²³ There are five ānantarya sins, so called because the person who commits them falls immediately into hell (samanantaraṃ narakeṣupapadyate): 1) māṭṛghāta, 2) pitṛghāta, 3) arhadghāta, 4) sa'gahbheda, 5) tathāgatasyāntike duṣṭacittarudhirotpādanam. The sources do not always give the same order and they are sometimes given mixed in with other sins: cf. Vinaya, II, p. 193; Aṅguttara, I, p. 27; III, p. 436; Vinaya, I, p. 168, 321; Vibhaṅga, p. 378; Mahāvvyutpatti, no. 2324-2328; Dharmasāṃgraha, LX; Kośa, IV, p. 201. – Devadatta was guilty of no. 3-5; cf. Ken pen chouo... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 10, p. 148b: “He has committed three ānantarya: i) He struck the Bhagavat from afar with a big rock and spilled the blood of the Tathāgata with a mind of hatred; ii) he broke up the community which was living in harmony; iii) he took the life of the bhikṣuṇī Utpalavarṇā.”

³²⁴ The Pāli Vinaya is silent on the death of Devadatta; the Buddha just said that he will go to hell for a kalpa. – The Milinda briefly mentions that he was swallowed up by the earth (p. 101) and that at the moment of death he took refuge in the Buddha (p. 111). – The Dhammapadātṭha, I, p. 146-147 continues this twofold tradition and develops it: Feeling sick, Devadatta wished to see the Buddha one last time and had himself brought by his disciples to Śrāvastī to the Jetavana. Forewarned of his arrival, the Buddha announced that, despite his efforts, Devadatta would not succeed in seeing him in the present lifetime. Actually, when the heresiarch got out of his litter, his feet sunk into the earth; before disappearing, he still had time to take refuge in the Buddha.

The Pāli tradition does not mention the incident of the poisoned nails. This detail appears in the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 47, p. 804a, which otherwise is quite close to the Pāli tradition. Here is an extract: Being gravely ill, Devadatta said to his disciples: “I no longer have the strength to go to the śrāmaṇa Gautama: you must help me go to him.” Then Devadatta dipped his ten fingernails in poison and said to his disciples: “Carry me to the śrāmaṇa.” His disciples brought him to the Buddha. Then Ānanda, seeing Devadatta approaching from afar, said to the Bhagavat: “Here comes Devadatta; surely he feels remorse and has come to make amends.” The Buddha said to Ānanda: “Devadatta never comes to me ...; from today, his vital organ (jīvitendriya) is ripe (i.e., has reached its end).” Then Devadatta came near the Bhagavat and said to his disciples: “It is not proper for me to stay lying down in front of the Buddha; put down my litter”, and he stepped out onto the ground. At this moment, a blazing wind arose from the center of the earth and enveloped Devadatta's body. Burned by the fire, he felt a mind of remorse toward the Tathāgata and wanted to cry out Namo buddhasya. But he did not reach the end of this invocation; hardly had he pronounced Namo than he fell into hell.

According to this text, we see that Devadatta did not have a chance to scratch the Buddha with his poisoned nails; the Mppś also seems to indicate that he did not put his hand on the Buddha: “He had hardly arrived in Rājagṛha than the earth opened up.” According to the Mūlasarvāśivādin Vinaya, T 1450, k. 10, p. 150a (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 107), things went further and Devadatta effectively tried to wound the Buddha. Here are some extracts from this Vinaya: [Having tried in vain to seduce Yaśodharā], full of shame, Devadatta left the palace. Seeing his anger and pain, the Śākyas said to him: “From today on you should go and find the Bhagavat and ask his but had not arrived at the city of Rājagṛha, when the earth opened up and a fiery chariot came to get him. Devadatta entered into hell (niraya) alive.

Although Devadatta did possess on his body thirty marks of the Great Man, he was unable to tame his mind; carried away by the lure of honors and gain, he committed the great sins and, alive, entered into hell.

This is why the sūtra says that profit and honors are a deep wound that breaks the skin and penetrates as far as the marrow. One must keep from liking toadies. In the bodhisattva, patience consists of not clinging to those who cover one with veneration (pūjā) and respect (satkāra).

Furthermore, there are three kinds of honors (pūjā): i) One is respected (satkṛta) by people as a result of merit (puṇya) acquired in the course of previous existences (pūrvajanman); ii) One is respected by people as a result of qualities (guṇa) of which one has given evidence in the present lifetime (ihajanman) in practicing morality (śīla), rapture (dhyāna) and wisdom (prajñā); iii) By falsehood (mṛṣā) and deception (vipralambha) one can have no virtue inwardly and outwardly seem quite white: one wins honors by deceiving one's contemporaries. In the face of these three kinds of honors, [the bodhisattva] has the following thoughts:

1) “Presently I am enjoying these honors as a result of the merits that I diligently cultivated in my previous existences; this is the natural result of my diligent activity. Why feel proud (darpa)? What has been planted in spring is harvested in autumn. Why be proud of what happens naturally?” Having thought thus, the bodhisattva disciplines his mind and feels neither attachment (abhiniveśa) nor pride (abhimāna).

2) If the honors that he enjoys are due to the qualities of which he has given evidence in the present lifetime, the bodhisattva has the following thoughts: “It is thanks to wisdom (prajñā) that I know the true nature (satyalakṣaṇa) of dharmas and that I have cut through the fetters (saṃyojana); it is as a result of my pardon; if he pardons you, we will proclaim you king (devaputra).” Then Devadatta filled his ten fingernails with poison and went to the Bhagavat. He thought: “I could not stand it if the śrāmaṇa Gautama gives me his pardon and congratulates me; so, in the moment of bowing to him, I will scratch his feet with my poisoned nails and wound him.” Having come to the Buddha, he bowed his head to the two feet of the teacher and speaking to the Bhagavat, he said: ‘Out of your compassion, please grant me your pardon.’ The Bhagavat looked at Devadatta, wondering with what intention he had come; divining the murderous intentions of Devadatta, he used his miraculous powers (rddhibala), transformed the bottom of his knees and changed them into rock crystal; then he remained silent. Devadatta became angry at this silence of the Buddha and, putting his evil intentions into execution, scratched the Bhagavat with his poisoned fingernails. But his ten fingers all broke off and, with a shock, the poison caused him severe pain.

This attempted poisoning is known to the Chinese pilgrims (cf. Fa hien, tr. Legge, p. 60; Hiuan tsang, tr. Watters, I, p. 390), as well as to the Tibetan tradition (cf. Schiefner, Tibetische Lebensbeschreibung, p. 278 seq.).

qualities (guṇa) that these honors come to me; I have no part in it.” Having thought thus, he disciplines his mind and feels no pride. He says: “actually, it is my qualities that people love, not me.”

[The trick of the Kāśmīrian].³²⁵ – A bhikṣu, native of Ki pin (Kāśmir), learned in the three baskets (tripiṭaka),³²⁶ who followed the rules of the forest-dwellers (araṇyadhṛma), went to the royal palace one day where a great reception was being prepared. The gate-keeper (dvārapāla), seeing the coarseness of his garments, closed the gate and refused him entry. This happened several times; as a result of the coarseness of his dress, the bhikṣu was not allowed to enter. He had recourse to a trick (upāya); he borrowed a fine robe and went back to the palace. Seeing him, the gate-keeper allowed him to enter without stopping him. The bhikṣu entered the gathering and was given all kinds of delicate food. First [165b] he made offerings to his robe and, as the guests asked him why he was doing that, he answered: “I came several times and was refused entry. Today, thanks to this robe, I am able to take part in the reception and get all these fine foods. Since it is actually to my robe that I owe them, I am giving them to my robe.”

The ascetic who obtains honors while practicing virtue (guṇa), morality (śīla) and wisdom (prajñā) likewise says to himself that he owes these honors to his qualities and not to himself. This consideration is a mental discipline called patience.

3) To obtain honors by falsehood (mṛṣā) or deception (vipralambha) is to inflict unbearable torture on oneself. One should say: “By obtaining honors by means of deception I am no different from brigands and thieves who get their food [by means of petty theft]. This is falling into the sin of deception (vipralambhāpatti).”

Not feeling any affection for the people who cover one with all kinds of honors, not exalting oneself, constitutes patience toward beings (satvakaṣānti).

2. Indifference toward benefactors.

Question. – For those who have not yet found the Path, food and clothing are necessary. By what means (upāya) can one find patience, not be attached and not love one's benefactors?

³²⁵ The Kāśmīrian bhikṣu whom the Mppś presents here is without a doubt the well-known arhat K'i ye to who, “seven hundred years after the Buddha, appeared in the kingdom of Ki piu” and was visited by emperor Kaniṣka. Three stories are dedicated to him in the Tsa pao tsang king, T 203, no. 91-93, k. 7, p. 483a-484b (tr. S. Lévi, Notes sur les Indo-Scythes, JA, 1896-97, p. 24-33). This arhat was known for his scorn for washing; warned of the visit of Kaniṣka, he refused to arrange his garments: “I have heard the words of the Buddha: the monk who has gone forth considers his appearance vulgar; virtue is his only occupation; why should I go out to meet the king with elegant garments?” Calmly and silently, he remained seated stiffly and did not go outside (c. T 203, K. 7, p. 484a20-23). – He is presented here in the same spirit in coarse garments in the king's palace.

³²⁶ A monk who knows the three baskets is called tripiṭa in Sanskrit (cf. Avadānaśātaka, I, p. 334; Divyāvadā, p. 61, 505) and more rarely, tripiṭaka (Divyāvadāna, p. 54. In Pāli, he is called tipiṭaka (Milinda, p. 18; Jātaka. IV, p. 219).

Answer. – Thanks to wisdom (prajñā): by considering the impermanent nature (anityalakṣaṇa), the painful nature (duḥkhalakṣaṇa) and the selfless nature (anātmakalakṣaṇa) of things, one will feel a perpetual disgust (udvega) for them. When a criminal is about to be executed, one may put tasty dishes in front of him, his family may come to console him, but he thinks only of death; even if he eats the tasty dishes, he does not experience their flavor. Similarly, the ascetic who constantly considers impermanence and suffering can receive honors, but he is not attached to them at all. A gazelle (mṛga), pursued relentlessly by a tiger will not care for tender grass or delicious water even if it finds some. Similarly, the ascetic, whom the tiger of impermanence (anityatāvyāghra) pursues with not a moment of respite, and who meditates on the suffering [of everything], cares not at all for the savory delicacies that he may encounter. This is why the ascetic is able to control himself before those who gratify him.

3. Indifference toward women.

Furthermore, when women want to charm and disturb the bodhisattva, the latter must tame his mind and endure it without being disturbed.

[The first attack by the daughters of Māra].³²⁷

³²⁷ The intervention of the three daughters in Māra's first attack against the Bodhisattva should be noted. These three girls were called Tanhā, Arati and Ragā (Saṃyutta, I, p. 124); Tantrī, Arati and Rati (Mahāvastu, III, p. 286); Rati, Arati and Trīṣṇā (Lalitavistara, p. 378); Arati, Priti and Trīṣ (Buddhacarita, XIII, v. 3).

Māra launched three main assaults against the Buddha: 1) Immediately before the enlightenment, when the Bodhisattva was sitting under the pipala tree of Bodhi, Māra launched his armies against him to make him leave the Bodhi seat and thus prevent him from attaining enlightenment; the Bodhisattva victoriously resisted this attack and, touching the earth with his right hand (bhūmiśparśamudrā), he took it as witness to his right to occupy the Bodhi seat. – 2) Four weeks after the enlightenment, when the Buddha was meditating under the ajapālayagrodha tree, Māra and his daughters came to tempt the Buddha and induce him to enter into nirvāṇa before having preached his doctrine.

With regard to the intervention of the daughters of Māra in these two assaults, it is convenient to distinguish three groups of sources:

1. Some sources, distinguishing carefully between the two assaults, do not have Māra's daughters appear in the first assault, but tell only of the repeated attacks of Māra's armies against the Bodhisattva: Suttanipāṭa, III, 2 (v. 425-449; Jātaka, I, p. 71-75; Mahāvastu, II, p. 404-414; Buddhacarita, ch. XIII; Fo so hing tsan, T 192, k. 3, p. 25a. There are also representations where Māra's daughters do not appear: the bas-reliefs of Gandhāra (cf. Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, I, p. 401 (fig. 201); I, p. 405 (fig. 202-204); II, p. 15 (fig. 306-307); II, p. 197 (fig. 402); II, p. 201, (fig. 403); - a stele at Sarnāth (ibid., p. 539, fig. 498); - a stele at Jagdispur, Patna district (ibid., p. 545, fig. 500); - a picture from Qyzyl in central Asia (ibid., p. 605, fig. 523); - a fresco at Yun-Kang (Chavannes, Mission, fig. 228 and p. 311). – On the other hand, the same sources or related sources attribute a major rôle to the Daughters of Māra outside of the second assault against the Buddha: Saṃyutta, I, p. 124; Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1092, k. 39, p. 286b-287c; T 100, no. 31, k. 2, p. 383a-384a; Jātaka, I, p. 78; Dhammapadam, III, p. 195-197; Mahāvastu, III, p. 281-286; Fang kouang ta tchouang yen king, T 187, k. 10, p. 601a-b.

While the Buddha was under the Bodhi tree, king Māra, out of spite (daurmanasya) sent him the three princesses, Lo kien (Ragā), Yue pei (Arati) and K'o ngai (Trīṣṇā).. They came showing off their bodies and using all sorts of charms to try to corrupt the Bodhisattva, but the latter did not let himself become disturbed and did not look at them. The three maidens said to themselves: "The hearts of men are all different and tastes vary: some like little girls (kumārīka), others women of a ripe age (madhyastrī); some like them big, others small; some like them black, others blonde; each of these types has its lovers."³²⁸ Then the three maidens each changed into five beautiful women and each of these five women underwent innumerable metamorphoses (pariṇāma).³²⁹ They came out of the forest and appeared suddenly, like lightning [165c] from a dark cloud; they raised their eyebrows, lowered their eyelashes and, watched carefully like young married women; they made music and used all the tricks. Coming close to the Bodhisattva, they pressed their splendid bodies up against his body.

Then the hero Mi tsi Kin kang (Guhyaka Vajrapāṇi), looking at them angrily, scolded them: "Who is this man you magicians dare to come and touch?" And Guhyaka reprimanded them with these stanzas:

Do you not know that the god Indra (read t'ien ti)

Loses his beauty and that his beard has faded?

The clear limpid water of the ocean

Is drying up today out of bitterness.

2. A second group of sources, unaware of or ignoring the second assault, make Māra's daughters appear in the first assault where they dance and speak: Sieou hing pen k'i king, T 184, k. 2, p. 470c; T'aitseu jouei pen k'i king, T 185, k. 1, p. 477a; P'ou yao king, T 186, k. 6, p. 519a; Kouo k'in hien tsai yin kouo king, T 189, k. 3, p. 640a; Fo pen hing king, T 190, k. 28, p. 782c-783 (tr. Beal, Romantic Legend, p. 214 seq.); Fo pen hing king, T 193, k. 3, p. 76a; Ken pen chouo... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 5, p. 123b (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 31); Also some representations of the first assault, easily identifiable thanks to the presence of the Bodhi tree where the bhūmiśparśamudrā of the Bodhisattva appear as well as the daughters of Māra; cf. Marshall-Foucher, Mon. of Sanchi, II, pl. 29 (center); Vogel, Maturā, pl. 51a (above right); three sculptures at Amarāvati (in Foucher, Art Gréco-Bouddhique, I, p. 179, fig. 68, above center; II, p. 563, fig. 506b; II, p. 565, fig. 508); two steles at Sarnāth (Foucher, ibid., I, p. 413, fig. 209b; II, p. 563, fig. 507b); Longhurst, Nāgārunakonda, pl. 22b, pl. 29a; Goloubev, Ajanā, pl. 23; a Ambodian stele (in Foucher, ibid., p. 407, fig. 205); Krom, Life of B on Barabudur, pl. 95.

3. In a few sources, Māra's daughters play an active part in the course of both assaults. This is the case for the Lalitavistara: 1st assault, p. 320-331 (tr. Foucaux, p. 273-279); 2nd assault, p. 378-379 (tr. Foucaux, p. 315-316), and for the Mppś: 1st assault (here, k. 14, p. 165b-c); 2nd assault (below, k. 17, p. 180c-181a).

³²⁸ Cf. Jātaka, I, p. 79: uccāvaca kho purisānaṃ adhippāyā, kesañcikumārīkāsu pemaṃ hoti kesañci paṭhamavaye ṭhitāsu kesañci majjhimavaye ṭhitāsu, yaṃ mayaṃ nānappakmarehi palobheyyāma. – Lalitavistara, p. 321: kāscit mumārīrūpāṇy aprasūtīrūpāṇi madhyastrīrūpāṇi copadarśayanti sma.

³²⁹ The thirty-two tricks of female magic (dvātrīṃśadākārā strīmāyā) that these maidens used are described in Lalitavistara, p. 320-321.

Do you not know that the sun is becoming dim,
 That the P'o seou (Vasudevata)³³⁰ gods are falling?
 The fire from his divine mouth
 Will devour you today!

No, you don't know that, you who dare to treat this holy man so lightly!

Then the daughters widened their circle, withdrew a little and said to the Bodhisattva: "These women are of incomparable beauty and able to please. Why do you keep this seat?" The Bodhisattva responded: "You are impure, dirty and evil-doers. Begone and do not speak any more lies!" And the Bodhisattva spoke this stanza.³³¹

This body is a swamp of excrement
 A foul mass of impurities
 How can one take any delight
 In these walking latrines?

Hearing this stanza, the daughters said to themselves: "In speaking this stanza, this man does not know our pure goddess bodies (viśuddhadevakāya).³³²" At once they transformed themselves and resumed their earlier form. Their brightness and splendor lit up the entire forest. Playing musical instruments, they said to the Bodhisattva: "These are our bodies; who can find blame in them?" –The Bodhisattva answered: "The day will come when you will understand." – "Tell us", they replied. – The Bodhisattva replied with these stanzas:

In the heavenly arbors,
 Near lotus pools made of the seven jewels
 Gods and men are happy to remain.
 Wait and you will see.

³³⁰ The Vasū are a class of gods of whom Śakra (whose surname is Vāsava) is the head: cf. Dīgha, II, p. 260.

³³¹ For the beginning of his stanza, cf. Lalitavistara, p. 328:

Paṣyāmi kāyamedhyam aśuciṃ kurimikulabharitam, jarjaramitvaram ca bhiduram asukhaparigatam.

One day you will discover impermanence
 [You will see that] divine and human pleasures are suffering,
 You will experience distaste for sensory joys
 You will delight in the right Path.

Hearing these stanzas, the daughters said to themselves: "This man has immense wisdom; he understands the malevolence of the purest celestial enjoyments and cannot abide them." At that moment they disappeared.

Thus the bodhisattva, in the presence of sexual attractions, can control his mind and endure them without being disturbed.

Moreover, the bodhisattva understands all the impurities of desire. Of all the calamities, the calamity of the woman is the most serious. One can come up to a moment of the sword (asi), fire (agni), lightning (vidyut), thunderbolt (vajra), enemy (vaira), poisonous snake (āsivīṣha); one cannot come up to the woman who is miserly, jealous, angry, flattering, tricky, dirty, aggressive, quarrelsome, lustful and envious. Why? Girls are vulgar, short-tempered and of little [166a] knowledge; they do not like what they see; they have no consideration for wealth, nobility, knowledge, virtue or renown; they follow only their own wicked tendencies. They destroy the roots of good (kuśalamūla) in men. Difficult as they are to open, still it is easy to break through fetters, manacles, the cangue, a lock, or a prison; but when the lock of a woman is fastened on a man, it holds firmly and deeply. The ignorant man who allows himself to be taken by it will find it hard to free himself. Of all illnesses, the sickness of woman is the most serious. Some stanzas say.³³²

³³² These stanzas show some connection with those of the Aṅguttara, III, p. 69, but the order is different. Here is the text and the translation, which presents some difficulties:

Sallape asihatthena [piśācena pi sallape āsīvisam pi āside yena dāṭṭho na jīvati, na tveva eko skāya mMatugāmena sallape.

*Muṭṭhassatiṃ tā bandhanti pekkhitena mhitena ca
 atho pi dunnivatthena mañjunā bhañitena ca n'eso jano svāsisaddo api ugghātito mato.*

Tesaṃ kāmoghāvūṭhānaṃ kāme aparijānataṃ kālaṃ gatiṃ bhavābhavaṃ saṃsārasmiṃ purakkhatā.

It is better to put out one's eyes
With red-hot iron
Than to become distracted
And contemplate the beauty of women.

By her smile and her looks,
Her pride and her false modesty,
Her way of turning her head or closing her eyes,
Her fine words and her fits of anger and jealousy,

The provocativeness of her walk,
Woman drives a man mad.
The net of lust is full:
All men are caught in it.

Whether she is seated, lying down, walking or standing,
A glance, a lifting of the eyebrow is enough
For the inexperienced fool
To be completely intoxicated by her.³³³

Ye ca pariññāya caranti akutobhayā te ve pāragatā loke ye pattā āsavakhayan ti.

“Speak with a man who holds a sword in hand; speak with a meat-eating demon; come near a poisonous snake whose bite is fatal! Never speak to a woman alone.

They enchain the thoughtless one with a look or a smile, or again by a disordered dress or sweet talk. Happy (?) though he may be, this man will never be looked upon as skillful.

The five sense objects appear in the female body, color, sound, taste, smell and touch: the charm the mind.

Those who are carried away by the torment of the passions and who does not know the passions will, at the proper time and because of their previous actions, take on all the forms of existence in the world of transmigration.

But those who understand the passions go forth fearless of whatever may be; they have reached the other shore of this world and have attained the destruction of the impurities.”

³³³ Cf. also Aṅguttara, III, p. 68: Ithi, bhikkhave, gacchantī [pi ...] tītā pi nisinnā pi sayānā pi hasantī pi bhñantī pi gāyantī pi rodantī pi ugghātītā pi matā pi purisassa cittaṃ pariyādāya tiṭṭhati.

A swordsman marching against the enemy
Can still be conquered;
The female enemy, tormenter of men,
Cannot be stopped.

A snake full of poison
Can still be held in the hand;
Woman, this deceiver of men
Should not be touched.

The man endowed with wisdom
Should not look at her
Or, if he is forced to see her,
He should treat her as his mother or his sister.

Looking at her objectively, he will consider woman
As a mass of impurities.
Not running away from the fire of lust
Is to [condemn oneself] to perish in its flames.

Moreover, there is in woman the peculiarity that her husband is proud when she is treated with respect, vexed when she is slighted. Thus woman brings man only afflictions (kleśa) or sadness (daurmanasya). Then why approach her? Instability in affections is the defect of woman; wicked curiosity into the business of men is her knowledge. The great fire burns men, but it is possible to approach it; the brisk wind has no material form, but it is possible to grasp it; the snake contains venom, but it is possible to touch it; the heart of a woman, nothing can gain possession of it.³³⁴ Why? Because it is a characteristic of woman that she has

³³⁴ This phrase is reminiscent of the Saundarānada of Aśvaghōṣa, VIII, v. 36:

Pradhan dahano 'pi grhyate viśarīraḥ pavano 'pi grhyate, kupito bhujago 'pi grhyate pramadānām tu mano na grhyate.

no consideration for wealth, nobility, fame, knowledge, virtue, family, ability, eloquence, stability of the household, or depth of affection: all that is of no account in her mind; she desires only what she sees. She is like a dragon that seeks only to kill men without distinguishing good from evil.

Moreover, woman cares nothing for the grief or sadness [that she provokes]; she can be loaded with gifts and attention, she will follow her fancy without letting herself be guided.

Moreover, in the midst of good people, woman is puffed up with pride; she considers the ignorant as enemies; she pursues the wealthy and the noble with her flattery; she treats the poor and the humble like dogs. She always follows her own appetites and never virtue.

In order to act in her son's favor, the mother went to the palace; she constantly brought large fish and excellent meat without asking for any payment. The king's daughter was astonished and asked her what she wanted. The mother begged her to send away her attendants and said that she would reveal her sentiments; [after this] she said: "I have an only son who loves you deeply, O princess; his passion is so strong that he has fallen sick; his fate seems to be not to live long. I would like it if you would grant him a compassionate thought and give him back his life." The king's daughter replied: "On the fifteenth day of the month, let him stand behind the statue of the god in the sanctuary of such-and-such a deity." The mother returned and announced to her son: "Your wishes are realized." Then she advised him, in accordance with what has been said above, to bathe, clothe himself in new garments and stand behind the statue of the god.

When the time had come, the princess said to the king, her father: "I am under an evil influence. I must go to the sanctuary of the god to ask for an auspicious fortune." The king agreed and she went with a suite of five hundred chariots to the temple of the god. When she arrived there, she gave this command to her followers: "Stay by the gate; I will go into the sanctuary alone."

However, the god had this thought: "This affair is not suitable; the king is my benefactor (dānapti); I cannot allow this lowly man to dishonor his daughter." At once he overwhelmed the young man with fatigue and made him fall sleep without being able to wake up. When the king's daughter had entered and saw him sleeping, she shook him several times without succeeding in bringing him back to his senses; then she left him a necklace worth a hundred thousand ounces of gold and went away. When she had gone, the young man was able to wake up and saw the necklace; he asked the people who were there and learned that the princess had come; not having been able to get the satisfaction of his desires, he fell into deep grief; the fire of his passion burst forth within him and he died.

From this example, we can know that women's hearts make no distinction between nobles and serfs and that they let themselves be guided only by their sensual desires.

Furthermore, once there was a king's daughter who pursued a caṇḍala and committed sin with him. Likewise, the daughter of ṛṣi pursued a lion. The hearts of all women are without discernment. For all these diverse reasons, [the bodhisattva] sets aside all affection and desire for women and succeeds in not loving them at all.

4. Withstanding persecutors.

How can one attain patience toward those who torment one?

It is necessary to say: "All beings commit faults that expose them to a punishment and they take vengeance one upon another. The torment that I undergo today has as its cause my previous conduct. Even though, in the course of the present lifetime (ihajanman) I have done nothing [that merits reprisals] still I am now expiating the wrong caused in my previous lifetimes (pūrvajanman). I [166c] am in the process of paying for it now; let us withstand this torment gently; what use is it to rebel? A debtor must pay his debt cheerfully at the request of his creditor and not become irritated."

Moreover, the ascetic who is always nourishing feelings of loving-kindness (maitricitta) is compelled to withstand torments that are inflicted on him patiently.

[The patience of Kṣāntirīṣi]³³⁶

The ṛṣi Tch'an t'i (Kṣāntirīṣi) was practicing patience (kṣānti) and loving-kindness (maitrī) in a great forest. One day, king Kia ki (Kali) with his courtesans (gaṇikā) went into the forest to walk about and amuse themselves. His meal being finished, the king stopped to sleep. The courtesans, who were wandering in the flowering forest, noticed the ṛṣi and went to pay their respects (vandana) to him. Then the ṛṣi praised loving-kindness and patience to them; his words were so fine that the women could not get enough of them and stayed with him for a long time. King Kali woke up and, not seeing his courtesans, seized his sword (asipattra) and follow their footprints. When he saw them standing by the ṛṣi, his jealousy broke out; with furious eyes and brandishing his sword, he asked the ṛṣi: "What are you doing here?" The ṛṣi replied: "I am here to cultivate patience and practice loving-kindness." The king said: "I will put you to the proof at once. With my sword, I will cut off your ears (karṇa), nose (nāsa), hands (hastā) and feet (pādā). If you do not get angry, I will know that you are cultivating patience.” The ṛṣi answered: “Do as you will.” Then the king took his word and cut off his ears, nose, hands and feet, asking him: “Is your mind disturbed?” The ṛṣi answered: “I am cultivating loving-kindness and patience, my mind is not disturbed.” The king said: “Your body lies there powerless; you are speaking the truth when you say that you are not disturbed, but nobody would believe you.” Then the ṛṣi made this vow: “If I am really developing loving-kindness and patience, may my blood (śonita) become milk (kṣīra).” At once his blood changed into milk; the king was astounded and went away with his courtesans. But then in the forest, a nāga took pity on the ṛṣi, made thunder and lightning and let loose his thunder-bolt; struck by its poison, the king collapsed and died before he reached his palace.

³³⁵ This little story has been translated by Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 294-296. His translation is reproduced here.

This is why we say that it is necessary to exert patience toward one’s persecutors.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva cultivates compassion (karuṇācitta). All beings are ceaselessly under the stress of all the sufferings (duḥkha): in the narrow space of the womb (kukṣi), they feel a great deal of pain; at the time of birth (jāti), they are squeezed; their bones and flesh are as if crushed; a cold wind pierces their body worse than a halberd. This is why the Buddha said: “Of all the sufferings, the suffering of birth is the worst.” And it is the same for the many distresses suffered in old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇa). Why would the ascetic further increase the suffering of beings? This would be like putting iron into the wound.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva says to himself: “I must not be like other people who are constantly carried along by the stream of transmigration (saṃsārasrotas); I must go against the current and dry up the source and enter the path to nirvāṇa. All ordinary people (prthagjña) are worried by a theft, are happy with a profit, are frightened in a sinister place. I, who am a bodhisattva, should not imitate them in any way. Although I may not yet have destroyed the [167a] fetters (saṃyojana), I must control myself and practice patience, not get irritated by persecutions, not rejoice at flattery, not fear suffering and difficulties; I must have feelings of great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta) for all beings.”

Moreover, seeing beings coming to torment him, the bodhisattva should say to himself: “This is my friend, this is my teacher; let me treat him with additional affection (anunaya) and respect (satkāra). Why? Because if he did not inflict torment on me, I would not have the chance to be patient.” This is why he says: “This is my friend, this is my teacher.”

Moreover, the knowledge of the bodhisattva conforms to this speech of the Buddha: “Beings have had no beginning (anādikā) and the universes (lokadhātu) are infinite (ananta); I have endlessly transmigrated through the five destinies (pañcagati); of all the beings [presently existing], I have formerly been their father, mother, and brother; in turn, these beings have been at some time my father, mother and brother.

And it will be the same in the future.”³³⁷ Reasoning in this way, the bodhisattva is unable to have bad feelings or give himself up to anger.

Moreover, the bodhisattva thinks: “Among all these beings, the family of the Buddhas (buddhavaṃśa)³³⁸ is widely represented. To become annoyed at them is to become annoyed with the Buddha. If I become annoyed with the Buddha, everything is finished. Thus it has been said that this pigeon (kapota) will later become a Buddha;³³⁹ at this moment, although it is but a bird, it should not be treated lightly.”

Moreover, of all the afflictions (kleśa), anger (krodha) is the most serious; of all the punishments inflicted for sin (akusalavipāka), the punishment reserved for anger is the most severe; Of all the other bonds (bandhana), there is none as serious.

[Śakra’s question].³⁴⁰

Che t’i p’o na min (Śakra devānām indra) questioned the Buddha with this stanza:

What must be killed in order to be safe?

What must be killed in order to experience no repentance?

What is the root of poison (viṣamūla)?

What destroys all good?

What must be killed in order to have praise?

What must be killed in order not to feel sadness?

The Buddha answered with this stanza:

By killing anger, one is safe.

³³⁷ Free quotation from Saṃyutta, II, p. 89-190 (Tsa a han, T 99, no. 945, k. 34, p. 241c-242a; T 100, no. 338, k. 16, p. 487a: Anamataggāyaṃ bhikkhave saṃsāro pubbakoti na paññāyati avijjānīvaraṇaṃ Manañ sattānaṃ taṇhāsaṃyojanānaṃ sandhāvatamaṃ saṃsaratamaṃ. Na do bhikkhave satto sulabharūpo yo na mātā-pitā-bhagini-putta-bhūtapubbo iminā dīghena addhunā: “The transmigration of beings, O monks, has its origin in eternity. It is not possible to find any beginning starting from which beings, plunged in ignorance, fettered by ignorance, wander by chance from birth to birth. It is not easy. O monks, to find any being who, in the course of the long path of transmigration, has not been at some time your father, your mother, your brother, your sister or your son.”

³³⁸ I.e., the family of those who one day will become Buddhas.

³⁴⁰ Chevā sutta in Saṃyutta, I, p. 237 (cf. Tsa a han, T 00, no. 1116, k. 40, p. 295b-c; T 100, no. 45, k. 3, p. 388c-389a)

By killing anger, one experiences no repentance.

Anger is the root of poison

That destroys all good.

The Buddha praises those who kill anger.

By killing anger, one feels no sadness.

The bodhisattva says to himself: “I am cultivating compassion (karuṇā); I wish that all beings find happiness; anger destroys all good and pollutes everything; why would I commit such a sin? If I feel anger (krodha) and aversion (pratigha), I lose my own benefits; how then could I lead beings to happiness? Moreover, the Buddhas and bodhisattvas consider great compassion (mahākaruṇā) as fundamental. If, for this compassion I substituted this anger that is a destructive poison, that would be especially inappropriate. If the bodhisattva loses the basis of compassion, would he deserve the name of bodhisattva? Where would his quality come from? This is why it is necessary to develop patience. If a being inflicts harm on me, I must think of this being’s qualities (guṇa), for, although at the moment this being is committing a fault, otherwise [167b] he possesses good qualities; as a result of these qualities, he should not be hated. Besides, if this man curses me or beats me, it is in order to correct me; he is like a goldsmith who cleans the gold by putting it in the fire so that only the pure gold remains. If I suffer injury, the cause of it is in my earlier lifetimes (pūrvajanman); now I must pay; I should not be annoyed but I should practice patience. Finally, the bodhisattva treats belongs with loving-kindness (maitrī), like little children. Now, in Jambudvīpa, people feel very sad (daurmanasya) and their joyful days are rare. When they come to insult me or attack me, they have so much joy! Joy is so difficult to obtain that I will allow them to insult me. Why? Because from my first resolution (prathamacittotpāda), I have decided that they should find joy.

Furthermore, in this world, beings are constantly tormented by illness (vyādhi); a cruel death (maraṇavaira) constantly awaits them like an enemy constantly spying on his opponent. How could an honest man not feel loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) for them? Furthermore, if one wanted to increase their suffering, this suffering would not affect anyone else before one experiences it oneself. By reasoning in this way, one will not become annoyed with them and one will develop patience.

Moreover, it is necessary to consider the gravity (doṣatvā) of hatred (dveṣa, pratigha); of the three poisons (triviṣa), it has no equal; of the 98 fetters (saṃyojana), it is the most solid; of all the sicknesses of the mind (cittavyādhī), it is the most difficult to cure. The hateful man does not distinguish between good (kuśala) and bad (akuśala), between sin (āpatti) and merit (punya), between profit (lābha) and loss (hāni); he does not reflect; he will fall into the unfortunate destinies (durgati) and will forget beneficent (subhāṣita) words; he neglects his reputation; he ignores the efforts of others and does not clean out his own physical and mental torments; hatred having covered over his eye of wisdom (prajñācakṣus), he devotes himself particularly to tormenting others.

This is how a ṛṣi who possessed the five supernatural powers (abhijñā) destroyed a whole country in the manner of an outcaste (caṇḍala) simply out of hatred, even though he practiced pure asceticism (viśuddhayaoga).³⁴¹

³⁴¹ Reference is made to this event in a passage in the Upālisutta of the Majjhima, I, p. 378, reproduced textually in Milinda, p. 130: “Have you heard, O householder, how the forest of Daṇḍaka, the forest of Kālīṅga, the forest of Mejjha and the forest of Mātāṅga have been deserted and emptied of inhabitants? – I have heard, O venerable one, that it was be the mental misdeed of ṛṣis.”

The Sanskrit version of this passage occurs in a fragment of the Upālisūtra found by S. Lévi in Kathmandu and published in JA 1925, p. 29-30 which has a development missing in the Pāli: “Have you heard, O householder, by whom the forests of Daṇḍaka, of Kālīṅga and Mātāṅga have been completely emptied leaving only the spaces in the forests? Thereupon Upālī, the householder, remained silent. Later, Upālī replied: “I have heard, O Gautama, that the cause was the mental anger of the ṛṣis.” – The Chinese translation of the Tchong a han, T 26, no. 133, p. 630a, closely follows this version.

Another Sanskrit version of this passage occurs in a citation from the Viṃśikā, ed. Lévi, p. 10. For the Tibetan version, see L. de La Vallée Poussin, Viṃśakākārikāprakarāṇa, Muséon, 1912, p. 64; and for the Chinese versions, T 1588, p. 69c; T 1589, p. 73b; T 1590, p. 77a.

Of the three royal kingdoms mentioned here, at least two are well known: Kālīṅga is actually Orissa; Daṇḍaka covered the entire region of the Vindhya from the Vidarbha to the Kālīṅga (cf. B. C. Law, India as described in early texts of Buddhism and Jainism, 1941, p. 106) The Majjhāraṇḍa of the Pāli version may be a faulty reading of the Sanskrit version: araṇyi śunyāni medhyībhūṭāni. It should not be forgotten that the Pāli texts have been revised according to a Sanskrit norm (cf. J. Bloch, L’Indo-Aryen, 1934, p. 8).

S. Lévi, Pour l’histoire du Rāmāyaṇa, JA, Jan-Feb. 1918, p. 97, has looked into the story of the destruction of the Daṇḍakāraṇya in the Rāmāyaṇa, VII, 81B; the ṛṣi Uśanas, furious at the violence used by the king Daṇḍa against his daughter, pronounced a curse, and the land, flourishing as it had been, was changed into a wild forest. - But the destruction of the Daṇḍaka is well known in the Buddhist tradition:

1) The Pāli texts (Jātaka, III, p. 463; V, p. 133 seq., 267; Papañca, III, p. 60-65) tells the following: Kisavaccha, disciple of Sarabhaṅga, in search of solitude, was established in King Daṇḍaki’s park, near the city of Kumbhavaṭī in Kālīṅga. One day when King Daṇḍaki was leaving to suppress a revolt, he thought he could make himself lucky by spitting on Kisavaccha and throwing his tooth-pick at him. The gods were indignant, killed the king and destroyed the whole country. Only three people escaped death: the ṛṣi Kisavaccha, the leader of the army who had become his disciple, and a certain Rāma, originally from Benares, who was spared as a result of his filial piety. The forest that grew up in that desolated land was called Daṇḍakāraṇḍa.

2) The Mahāvastu, III, p. 363, tells another version which is of some interest: A pupil of the ṛṣi Kāśyapa, called Vatsa, surrounded by five hundred disciples, lived at Anuhimavat in a hermitage on the shore of the Ganges; they all possessed the five powers, practiced the four trances, had renounced desires, and were of noble conduct and great power. Then Vatsa, suffering from a wind sickness and unable to withstand the bitter cold at Anuhimavat, went away to the Dēkhan, to the city of Govardhana. King Daṇḍaki, who reigned there, was an irreligious man and an impious king without the correct view, eager for pleasure, full of wrong ideas, ignoring his mother and father, with neither religious life nor chastity, cruel, pitiless and violent. Seeing the ṛṣi Vatsa, he buried this peaceful, harmless

Finally, the hateful man, like the tiger or wolf, is hard to withstand; like a pernicious ulcer, it pierces and easily becomes poisoned. The hateful man is like a poisonous snake that people look at without pleasure. When a man accumulates anger, his bad feelings develop and he ends up in unexpected crimes: he kills his father and rebels against the Buddha.

The bhikṣus of the kingdom of Kiu chan mi (Kauśāmbī) [were quarreling amongst themselves] for futile reasons; the feelings of anger increased and they were split into two groups. An end [to the schism] was attempted but after three months there was no success. The Buddha went to their community and, raising his right hand marked with the sign of the wheel, he [tried to] stop them, saying:³⁴³

You others, O bhikṣus,

Do not provoke quarrels (vivāda).

By continuing in bad feelings

One exposes oneself to very heavy punishment.

You are seeking nirvāṇa

You have renounced material profit, and innocent man in the earth. But the prime minister of the kingdom, named Vighusta, pulled the still living ṛṣi from under the pile of earth, prostrated before him and begged for pardon: “O venerable one, I do not approve the violence the king has done to you; I beg you to show your indulgence.” The ṛṣi said to him: “Go as far away as you can from this kingdom, O minister; in seven days I shall die and, after my death, there will be intense panic in this kingdom.” Hearing the words of the ṛṣi Vatsa, the minister with his children, his wife, his entourage and all his relatives left the kingdom of Daṇḍaki and went to another kingdom. At the end of seven days, the ṛṣi Vatsa died and immediately after his death, there was a great upheaval of all the elements so that the entire kingdom was reduced to ashes in one night.

³⁴³ These stanzas have nothing in common with those which the Vinaya, I, p. 349-350, and the Majjhima, III, p. 154, make the Buddha pronounce in this circumstance; on the other hand, they show an undeniable resemblance to the version of the Sūtrāṃkāra, tr. Huber, p. 246-247.

You are living in the holy Dharma, [167c] Why are you quarreling?

In worldly people, quarrels

May still be excused.

But among monastics

How can they quarrel?

The monastic who nourishes in his heart

The poison [of hatred] is doing harm to himself.

It is like fire, flashing forth from a cold cloud

Which burns the body.

The bhikṣus said to the Buddha: “Let the Buddha, the teacher of the Dharma (dharmasvāmin), remain humble and silent (alpotsukas tūṣṇīmbhūtas tiṣṭhatu); as for us, we cannot remain silent when we are attacked.”³⁴⁴ Persuaded that these men could not be saved, the Buddha rose up into the sky (upari vihāyasā prakrāntah) in the very midst of the assembly³⁴⁵ and went away. He entered into a forest³⁴⁶ [and there [entered into] meditative stabilization of tranquility (śamathasamādhi).

³⁴⁴ Cf. Vinaya, I, p. 349; Majjhima, III, p. 153: Aññataro bhikkhu Bhagavantam etad avoca: Āgametu, bhante, Bhagavā dhammassāmi; apposukko, bhante, Bhagavā diṭṭhadhammasukhavihāram amuyutto viharatu; mayam etena bhaṇḍanena kalahena viggahena vevādena pañnāyissāmā ti: “A certain monk said to the Bhagavat: Lord, let the Blessed One, the teacher of the Dharma, be patient! Lord, let the Blessed One remain tranquil in the Blissful Abode that he has attained in this life. As for us, we recognize ourselves to be in the middle of this altercation, this dispute, this struggle and this argument.” – Similar reply in the Gilgit MS, III, 2, p. 186: Evam ukte Kośambakā bhikṣavo Bhagavatam etadavocan: Dharmasvāmī Bhagavān dharmasvāmī Sugataḥ. Ete 'smākaṃ vakṣyanti duruktāni durbhāṣitāni, vayam eṣāṃ kimarthaṃ marṣhayāma iti: “The monks of Kauśāmbī said to the Bhagavat: “The Blessed One is the teacher of the Dharma, the Well-gone One is the teacher of the Dharma, but for us, why should we pardon those who speak insults and heresies?”

³⁴⁶ In the forest of Pārileyaka, where a lone elephant brought him food and drink; cf. Saṃyutta, III, p. 95; Udāna, p. 41-42; Vinaya, I, p. 352-353; Jātaka, p. 489; Dhammapaddaṭṭha, I, p. 58-60; Tching a han T 26, k. 17, p. 536a; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 24, p. 160a.

The sin of anger is so serious that it happens that one no longer accepts the words of the Buddha; this is why anger must be chased away and patience cultivated. Besides, by cultivating patience, one easily obtains loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā); thanks to these, one reaches Buddhahood.

Question. – Patience is a fine quality among all the qualities, but there is a case where it is impossible: when a person of little worth looks you up and down and treats you fearfully; then patience is not called for.

Answer. – When a person of little worth looks you up and down and treats you fearfully, you are tempted to not endure him. However, the sin of impatience is more serious than the insult. Why? Because the impatient person is scorned by the saints (ārya) and by honest people (sajjana), whereas the patient person is scorned only by common people. Of the two despisals, better to be despised by the ignorant than by the saints. Why? The ignorant scorns what is not despicable, [namely, patience], whereas the saint despises that which is despicable, [namely, impatience]. This is why one should practice patience.

Furthermore, even without practicing generosity (dāna) or rapture (dhyāna), the patient person always attains marvelous qualities (guṇa); he is reborn among the gods or among men and later will attain buddhahood. Why?

Because his mind is gentle (mṛdu) and tender (taruṇa).

Furthermore, the bodhisattva says to himself: “The person who is tormenting me today is concerned with destroying my patience. Not only do I have his scorn, his curses and his irons to suffer, but if I lose patience, I will also fall into the hell (niraya) of burning iron walls and earth where I will suffer immense pain; the burns that I would suffer would be indescribable.” This is why the bodhisattva is aware of his nobility, even if the ordinary man treats him scornfully; if he resisted and stood on his own dignity, [his self-love] would be satisfied but he would be base. That is why he should be patient.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva says to himself: Since the first time that I made the resolution (prathamacittotpāda), I have sworn, in the interest of others, to heal all their mental sicknesses (cittavyādhī). Today, this man is sick with anger (pratighasamyojanena vyādhita); I want to cure him. Would he be calmed if I added my own sickness to his, [in other words, if I wanted to cure his anger by means of my own anger]? The master physician (bhaiṣajyaguru) cures all illnesses; if a sick person beset by a demon draws his knife and insults him, without making a distinction between friend and enemy, the physician who understands demonic sicknesses wants only to cure him and has no hatred for him. It is the same for the bodhisattva; when a being torments or insults him, he [168a] knows that this being is sick with the passion “anger” (dveṣakleśa), and that he is led by rage; the bodhisattva cures him by skillful means (upāya), without feeling any aversion toward him.”

Moreover, the bodhisattva takes care of all beings and loves them like his children; when they bother him, the bodhisattva has compassion for them, is not cross with them and does not scold them. A loving father takes care of his sons and his grandsons; they are young and have no discretion and sometimes they insult and beat their father disrespectfully and fearlessly; but their father pardons these young fools and his love for them only increases; even though they have done wrong to him, he is not annoyed and does not hate them. The bodhisattva’s patience is like that.

Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “If beings persecute me, I must endure it. If I do not endure it, I would regret it from this life on and, later, I would fall into hell (niraya) where I will suffer greatly, If I am reborn among the animals (tiryagyoni), I will be a poisonous dragon, a perfidious serpent, a lion, tiger or wolf. If I am reborn among the pretas, fire will come out of my mouth; like a man caught in a fire, at first the burn is slight, but later it gradually increases.”

Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “As a bodhisattva, I want to do good (hita) to beings; if I am unable to endure them patiently, I am not called “bodhisattva”, I am called “wicked man”.

Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “There are two kinds of worlds (loka): the world of animate beings (sattvaloka) and the world of inanimate beings (asattvaloka). From the time of my first resolution (prathamacittotpāda), I have sworn, in the interest of beings, to withstand the torments coming from inanimate beings, stones, trees, wind, cold, heat, water and rain without impatience; today, it is this animate being that attacks me; I must endure it; why would I become irritated?”

Moreover, the bodhisattva knows the distant origin [of beings]; it is in a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī) that is metaphorically (prajñapti) given the name of ‘puḍgala’ (man, individual), but there is no true puḍgala. With whom then could he be annoyed? In this [alleged puḍgala] there is just a pile of bones (asthi), blood (śoṇita), skin (chavī) and flesh like bricks piled one upon another, coming and going like a mechanical doll. Knowing that, there is no place for irritation with him. If I am angry, I am a fool (mūḍha) and will suffer the punishment myself. This is why it is necessary to exercise patience.

Finally, the bodhisattva says to himself: “In the past, when the numberless Buddhas, as many as the grains of sand in the Ganges (gaṅgānadīvālukāsama), followed the bodhisattva path, they first practiced patience toward beings (sattvaloka) and then patience toward the Dharma (dharmaṣānti). I, who am today following the Path of the Buddha, must imitate the qualities of the Buddhas and not feel aversion (pratigha), as that is the mark of Māra (māradhātudharma). This is why I must be patient.”

He is patient for all these reasons. This is patience toward beings (sattvaṣānti).

CHAPTER XXV: PATIENCE TOWARD THE DHARMA (p. 902F)

I. GENERAL DEFINITION.

[168b] What is meant by patience toward the Dharma (dharmakṣānti)?

To endure sycophants and flatterers as well as violent and lustful people constitutes patience toward beings (satvaṁkṣānti); to endure adulation (satkāra) and flattery (pūjā) as well as violence (viheṭhana) and lust (kāma mithyācāra) constitutes patience in regard to the Dharma (dharmakṣānti).

Furthermore, dharmakṣānti consists of not feeling any of the six inner attractions (ṣaḍādhyaṁtikaruci), not seizing any of the six outer objects (ṣaḍāhyasthūla), and not making any distinction (vikalpa) between the two categories. Why? Because inner (ādhyātmikanimitta) is mixed with outer (bāhyanimitta) and outer is mixed with inner. Actually the two characteristics (nimitta) are equally nonexistent (anupalabdha), presenting a single nature (ekalakṣaṇa), resulting from the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagryapekṣa) and are really empty (śūnya). The nature of all dharmas is eternal purity (nityaviśuddhi), the true nature (tathatā), the limit of existence (bhūtakoṭi), the real nature (dharmatā). Dharmas are included in non-duality (advaya patita), but although they are without duality, they are not, however, single. Seeing all dharmas in this way, without developing them in one's mind or in one's firmly held views, is what is called dharmakṣānti. Thus, in the P'i mo lo k'i king (Vimalakīrtinirdeśasūtra), the bodhisattva Fa tchou (Dharmasthiti) said: "Arising and cessation are two; the absence of arising (anutpāda) and the absence of cessation (anirōdha) is the teaching on entering into non-duality (advaya praveśadharma paryāya)." And, finally, the bodhisattva Wen chou che li (Mañjuśrī) said: "The absence of hearing, absence of seeing, cessation of all thoughts, absence of words and absence of speech, that is the teaching on the entry into non-duality." [Questioned in turn about non-duality], Vimalakīrti remained silent and said nothing; and all the bodhisattvas congratulated him, saying: "Good, good! That is the true teaching on the entry into non-duality."³⁴⁷

³⁴⁷ Summary of the ninth chapter of the Vimalakīrtinirdeśasūtra, entitled Advayadharmaparyāyapraveśa (in Tib., Gñis su med pañi chos kyī skor hjug pa): cf. Wei mo kie king, T 474, k. 2, p. 530c; Wei mo kie so chou king, T 475, k. 2, p. 550b; Chou wou keou tch'eng king, T 476, k. 4, p. 577a. – Here are the passages of T 375 to which the Mppś is referring here: At that time, Vimalakīrti said to the bodhisattvas: "Sirs, how does the bodhisattva enter into the teaching of nonduality (advayadharmaparyāya)? Let each speak as he will." In the assembly there was a bodhisattva named Fa tseu tsai (Dharmesvara) who said: "Sirs, arising (utpāda) and cessation (nirōdha) are two. Dharmas that do not arise in the very beginning do not actually cease; subscribing to the doctrine of non-arising (anutpattikadharmakṣānti) in this way is to enter into the teaching of non-duality." (p. 550b-c). – Twenty-six other bodhisattvas then gave their opinions, and the text continues: Each having spoken in turn, all these bodhisattvas asked Mañjuśrī: "How then does the bodhisattva enter into the teaching of nonduality?" Mañjuśrī answered: "In my opinion, in regard to dharmas, there are no words or speech, no statement or awareness; they elude questions

II. ENDURING OUTER AND INNER SUFFERINGS AND THE AFFLICTIONS.

Furthermore, the dharmas altogether form two groups: i) beings (sattva), ii) things (dharma). We have already spoken about the bodhisattva's patience toward beings (chapter XXIV); here we will speak about patience toward things. There are two kinds of things: i) mental things (cittadharmā), ii) extra-mental things (acittadharmā). – Among the extra-mental things, some are inner (ādhyātmika) and others are outer (bāhya). Cold (śīta), heat (uṣṇa) wind (anila), rain (varṣa), etc., are outer; hunger (kṣudh), thirst (pipāsa), old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī), death (maraṇa), etc., are inner: all the categories of this type are extra-mental. – Among the mental things, there are two types: i) anger (krodha, vyāpāda), sadness (daurmanasya), doubt (saṁśaya), etc.; ii) lust (rāga), pride (abhimāna), etc.: these two categories are mental things. Whether it is a question of mental things or extra-mental things, the bodhisattva endures them both without flinching; this is what is called dharmakṣānti.

Question. – With regard to a being (sattva), anger or killing are sinful whereas compassion is meritorious; but cold, heat, wind, or rain derive neither benefit nor inconvenience [from our attitude toward them]. Then why endure them?

[168c] Answer. – 1) Although they derive no benefit or inconvenience [from our attitude], the very fact of experiencing annoyance or anger as a result of them is fatal to the bodhisattva's career; this is why it is necessary to endure them.

2) Moreover, in killing, the sin consists not in the very fact of killing a being but rather in the evil intention (duṣṭacitta) which is the cause of the killing. Why is that? To kill a being, provided that it is without a predetermined intention (avyākṛtacitta), does not constitute a sin, but to nourish benevolence for a being, even though this being derives no benefit from it, is very meritorious. This is why, even if cold, heat, wind or rain derive no benefit or inconvenience [from our attitude toward them], one commits a sin merely by having bad feelings toward them. Therefore they should be endured.

3) Finally, the bodhisattva knows that it is as a result of his previous faults (pūrvāpatti) that he has taken birth in this sorrowful place (duḥkhavihāra); he says to himself: "What I myself have done I must myself endure." Thanks to this reflection, he is able to endure [cold and the other outer sufferings].

(praśna) and answers (vyākaraṇa)." Then Mañjuśrī asked Vimalakīrti, saying: "We have all spoken in turn; now it is up to you to tell us how the bodhisattva enters into the teaching on nonduality." But Vimalakīrti remained silent and did not speak. Mañjuśrī congratulated him: "Good! Very good! By having neither sounds (akṣara) nor speech (abhilāpa), that is truly entering into the teaching on nonduality." (p. 551c).

[B. Enduring inner sufferings.] –

1) Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “There are two kinds of fields (kṣetra), those that are pure (viśudda), those that are impure (aviśuddha). The bodhisattva who has been born into an impure field and undergoes bitter suffering there, such as the torments of hunger or cold, makes the aspiration (praṇidhāna) [to possess] a pure field and says to himself: “When I will be Buddha, all these sufferings will not exist in my field; these sufferings, although they are impure, will be of benefit to me.”

2) Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “If the eight human situations (aṣṭau lokadharmāḥ)³⁴⁸ cannot be avoided by the saints (ārya), how then could I avoid them? Therefore I must endure them.”

3) Moreover, the bodhisattva who reflects knows that the human body is without power or weight, is prey to old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maraṇa). Even though the celestial existence [to which he could aspire] is pure, free of old age and sickness, the bodhisattva hesitates to become attached to celestial bliss. [Actually, a god (deva)] is like a drunk man, unable to cultivate the merits of the Path (mārgapūṇya), of entering the monastic life (pravraj-) or of renunciation (viraj). Therefore it is in his human body that the bodhisattva is obliged to win merit and act for the benefit of beings.

4) Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “I have taken on a body made of the four great elements (mahābhūta) and the five aggregates (skandha); thus inevitably I will experience all kinds of suffering. It is impossible that one can avoid suffering when one assumes a body; rich or poor, monastic (pravrajita) or lay (grhastā), foolish or wise, scholarly or ignorant, all cannot avoid it. The rich man experiences constant fear in guarding his wealth; he is like a fat sheep about to be led to the slaughterhouse; he is like a crow holding some meat in its beak with the other crows chasing it. The poor experience hunger and cold. The monk, despite the sufferings he undergoes in the present lifetime, will find happiness and will win the Path in the next lifetime. The lay person, despite the happiness he experiences in the present lifetime, will find suffering in the future lifetime. The fool, who is looking for happiness in the present lifetime, runs up against impermanence (anityatā) and then will find suffering. The wise person, who meditates on the sadness of impermanence, will later find happiness and will attain the Path. Thus all those who possess a body cannot avoid suffering. This is why the bodhisattva must cultivate patience.

5) Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: The entire universe is suffering; how then could I seek happiness?

6) Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: For innumerable cosmic [169a] periods (aprameyakalpa), I have ceaselessly undergone all the sufferings without getting any benefit; now that I am seeking buddhahood in the interests of beings, I should have great benefit in enduring this suffering. This is why he will patiently endure all outer and inner sufferings.

7) Finally, with a great mind, the bodhisattva has made the aspiration (praṇidhāna) to endure the sufferings of the A pi (avīci) hell and the No li (niraya) hell. How could he not endure the lesser sufferings [of the present]? If he does not withstand these petty sufferings, how will he withstand the great sufferings?

³⁴⁸ The *lokadharma*s are eight in number: gain (lābha), loss (alābha), etc.; cf. Dīgha, III, p. 260; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 156 seq.; V, p. 53.

The enduring of these many outer inconveniences is called dharmakṣānti.

[C. Enduring the afflictions.] –

Question. – How are the inner mental sufferings endured?

Answer. – 1) The bodhisattva says to himself: although I have not yet obtained the Path nor cut through the bonds (bandhana), if I do not withstand these sufferings, I am not yet a bodhisattva. He also says: If I had obtained the Path and cut through all the fetters (saṃyojana), I would have nothing else to endure. Besides, hunger, thirst, cold and heat are Māra’s outer army (mārabāhyasenā); the fetters (saṃyojana) and the afflictions (kleśa) are Māra’s inner army (mārādhyātmikasenā). I must crush these two armies in order to attain buddhahood; if I do not succeed in that, the state of buddhahood will not be realized.

It is said that when the Buddha was practicing the six years of austerity (duṣkaracaryā), king Māra came to see him and said: “Noble kṣatriya, of the thousand parts (sahasrabhāga) that are in you, only one is still alive. Get up! Return to your land; win merit by generous gifts and you will find the path of human and divine happiness in this and future lifetimes. It is impossible for you to increase this painful effort. If you do not listen to my fond advice (ślakṣṇavāc), if you persist in your mistake and do not get up, I will bring my great armies here and I will come to destroy you.”³⁵⁰

³⁴⁹ Cf. the Padhānasutta of Suttanipāta, III, 2 (v. 425-449) designated above by the Traité, I, p. 341F under the name of Tsa tsang king (Kṣudraka). See the parallel texts there of the Suttanipāta, v. 436-449 and of the Lalitavistara, p. 262-263

³⁵⁰ Cf. Suttanipāta, v. 426b-428; Lalita, p. 261.

Suttanipāta	Lalitavistara
Kiso tvam asi dubbhāṇo; santike maraṇaṃ tava.	Kṛiṣo vivarṇo dīnaṃ tvam, antilo maraṇam tava.
Sahassabhāgo maraṇassa, ekaṇso tava jīvitaṃ. Jīva bho! Jīvitaṃ seyyo; jīvaṃ puññāni kāhasi.	Sahasrabhāge maraṇam, ekabhāge cha jīvitaṃ.
Carato ca te brahmacariyaṃ agghhuttaṇ ca jāhato, pahūtaṃ cīyate puññaṃ; kiṃ padhānena kāhasi.	Dadataḥ satataṃ dānaṃ agnihotraṃ ca juhvataḥ, bhaviṣyati mahatpūṇyam; kiṃ prahāṇe karihyasi.

The Mppś comes closest to the version of the Lalita here.

The Bodhisattva answered: “Today I will destroy your inner armies that are so powerful, to say nothing of your outer armies.” - Māra asked: “What are my inner armies?” The Bodhisattva replied:

Desire (kāma) is your first army (senā)

Sadness (arati) is the second,

Hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsa) are the third army,

Greed (trṣṇā) is the fourth.

Laziness-torpor (styānamiddha) is the fifth army.

Fear (bhaya) is the sixth.

Doubt (vicikitsā) is the seventh army,

Anger (krodha) and hypocrisy (mrakṣa) are the eighth.

Cupidity (labha) and vainglory (mithyāyaśas) are the ninth,

Glorification of the self (ātmotkāra) and scorn of others (parāvajñā) are the tenth.

It is into those armies

That monastics (pravajita) are plunged.

By the power of my meditation and my wisdom

I will crush your armies.

Having attained Buddhahood

I will save all people.³⁵¹

*** **

The bodhisattva who has not yet crushed all these armies puts on the armor of patience (kṣāntivarman), grasps the sword of wisdom (prajñākhaḍga), takes the buckler of rapture (dhyānaphalaka) and arrests the arrows of the afflictions (kleśeṣu): this is called inner patience.

³⁵¹ See these stanzas above, Traité, I, p. 341-343F.

2) Moreover, the bodhisattva should exercise patience toward his own afflictions (kleśa) but he must not cut the bonds (bandhana). Why? Because if he cut these bonds, the loss would be very serious: he would fall into the arhat class [169b] and would be no different than someone who has lost their senses. This is why he stops his passions but does not completely cut them; by cultivating patience he does not follow his passions (saṃyojana).

Question. – How is he able to not follow his passions without having previously cut them?

Answer. – By correct reflection (saṃyagmanasikāra), while still having afflictions, he succeeds in not following them. By reflecting, he contemplates the empty impermanent nature of everything (śūnyānityanimitta) and, although the five desires (pañcakāma) are still subtly present in him, he no longer produces any bond (bandhana).

[The corpulent sheep without fat]. - A king had a prime minister (mahāmātya) whose faults he himself concealed so that they remained unknown. He said to him one day: “Go and find me a big sheep but that has no fat; if you don’t find one, I will inflict punishment on you.” The prime minister was learned: he chained up a big sheep, fed it with grass and grains; but three times each day, he frightened it with a wolf. Thus the sheep, in spite of all the food that it received, was big but had no fat. The minister brought the sheep and presented it to the king who commanded his people to kill it; it was big but had no fat. The king asked how that was done, and the minister gave him the reason we have just described. The bodhisattva acts in the same way: he contemplates (samanupaśyati) the wolf of impermanence (anityatā), suffering (duḥkha) and emptiness (śūnya) in such a way that the fat of the passions (saṃyojanameda) melts while the flesh of the qualities (guṇamāṃsa) becomes solid.

3) Moreover, an immense reward (apramāṇavipāka) is attached to the qualities (guṇa) and merits (punya) of the bodhisattva; this is why his mind is gentle (mṛdu) and tender (taruṇa), his fetters are slight and it is easy for him to cultivate patience. He will act in the manner of the royal lion (siṃharāja); when he roars in the forest and when people, on seeing him, prostrate with their face on the ground begging for mercy, the lion releases them and lets them go. The tiger (vyāgra) and the jackal (śārdūla), smaller animals, do not act in this way. Why? Because the royal lion, a noble animal, has the discretion of knowledge, whereas the tiger and the jackal, lowly animals, do not have it. If bad troops succeed in finding a good leader, they are safe, but if they encounter only a mediocre soldier, they are lost.

4) Moreover, by the power of his wisdom (prajñā), the bodhisattva knows that anger (krodha) has all kinds of defects and that patience has all kinds of qualities. This is why he is able to endure the fetters.

5) Moreover, by the power of knowledge, the bodhisattva knows how to cut the fetters; but in the interest of beings, he prefers to remain in the world for a long time [and retain his passions]; however, he knows that the fetters are enemies and that is why, while enduring them, he does not follow them. The bodhisattva curbs these hostile passions and, without allowing them to be unleashed, he practices virtue. When one has an enemy whom, for some reason or other, one does not want to kill, one imprisons him closely some place and one goes about one’s own business.

6) Moreover, the bodhisattva who understands well the nature of dharmas (dharmalakṣaṇa) does not consider the fetters as bad and does not consider the qualities as good; this is why he does not hate the fetters and does not love the qualities. He practices patience with the power of this knowledge. Some stanzas say:

The bodhisattva who has cut through all evil
Will arrive at absolute cessation without residue.
His qualities and merits are immense
The action that he carries out is not ill-advised.

In his great wisdom, the bodhisattva
Does not destroy all the fetters.

This is why he understands the nature of dharmas:

[169c] Transmigration and nirvāṇa are but one and not two.

For these various reasons, without yet having obtained the Path, the bodhisattva endures all his afflictions. This is what is called dharmakṣānti.

7) Moreover, the bodhisattva knows that all the dharmas are of a single nature (ekalakṣaṇa), non-dual (advaya):³⁵²

a. All dharmas are intelligible (vijñātalakṣaṇa) and consequently “one”. The eye consciousness (cakṣurvijñāna) understands color (rūpa), and so on up to the mental consciousness (manovijñāna) which understands dharmas. As a result of this characteristic of intelligibility, all dharmas are proclaimed “one”.

b. All dharmas are knowable (jñātalakṣaṇa) and consequently “one”. The duḥkhe dharmajñāna and the duḥkhe ’nvayajñāna cognize the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya); the samudaye dharmajñāna and the samudaye ’nvayajñāna cognize the truth of the origin of suffering (samudayasatya); the nirodha dharmajñāna and the nirodhe ’nvayajñāna cognize the truth of the cessation of suffering (nirodhasatya); the mārga dharmajñāna and the mārga ’nvayajñāna cognize the truth of the Path (mārgasatya).³⁵³ Finally, excellent worldly knowledge (kuhala laukikajñāna) also cognizes suffering (duḥkha), its origin (samudaya), its destruction (nirodha), the path of its cessation (mārga), space (ākāśa) and cessation not due to knowledge (apratisamkhyanirodha). As a result of this nature of cognizability, all dharmas are proclaimed “one”.

³⁵² The identical and multiple characteristics of the dharmas will be studied in detail below, k. 18, p. 194b-195c.

³⁵³ For these knowledges which precede the laukikāgradharma and whose subjects are the four noble Truths, cf. Saṃyutta, II, p. 58; Vibhaṅga, p. 293, 329; Kośa, VI, p. 179-185; Mahāvvyut., no. 1217-1232.

c. All dharmas are capable of being object (ālambhana) and consequently “one”. The visual consciousness (cakṣurvijñāna) and the things associated with it (saṃprayuktakadharmā) are concerned with color (rūpa). In the same way, the auditory consciousness (śrotrav.), olfactory (ghrāṇav.), gustatory (jihvav.) and tactile (kāyav.) consciousnesses [are concerned with sound, smell, taste and the tangible] respectively. The mental consciousness (manovijñāna) and the things associated with it are concerned with the eye (cakṣus), color (rūpa) and the visual consciousness (cakṣurvijñāna) as well as all the others, including the mind (manas), dharmas and the mental consciousness (manovijñāna). As a result of this nature of objectivity, all dharmas are declared “one”.

d. Moreover, some claim that all dharmas, taken separately, form a unity: One and one is two; three times one is three, and so on up to a thousand, ten thousand, etc. Everything reduces to unity; it is metaphorical (prajñāpti) to speak of thousands and tens of thousands.

e. Finally, in all dharmas there is a characteristic that makes them to be declared “one”; they are one by means of this same characteristic. Every object (sarvadṛavya) is called ‘dharma’; by means of this nature of ‘dharma’ it is one. [The patience consisting] of destroying any characteristic of multiplicity by means of innumerable categories of this type without, however, being attached to unity, is called dharmakṣānti.

8) Moreover, the bodhisattva sees everything as duality. What is duality? Duality is inner nature (ādhyātmikanimitta) and outer nature (bāhyanimitta). As a result of this inner nature and this outer nature, that which is inner is not outer, and that which is outer is not inner.

Moreover, all dharmas are dual by virtue of their nature of existence (bhāva) and their nature of nonexistence (abhāva). They are empty (śūnya) and non-empty (aśūnya), eternal (nitya) and transitory (anitya), personal (ātman) and non-personal (anātman), material (rūpa) and non-material (ārūpya), visible (sanidarśana) and invisible (anidarśana), resistant (sapratigha) and non-resistant (apratigha), impure (sāsrava) and pure (anāsrava), conditioned (saṃskṛta) and unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), mind (hitta) and non-mind (acittaka), of mental order (caitta) and of non-mental order (acitta), associated with mind (cittasamprayukta) and dissociated from mind (cittaviprayukta). [The patience that consists] of destroying uniqueness by means of innumerable categories of this type without, however, becoming attached to duality, is called dharmakṣānti.

9) Moreover, sometimes the bodhisattva sees all dharmas as triple. What is this triplicity? [All the dharmas] are lower (avara), middling (madhya) or higher (agra); good (kuśala), bad (akuśala) or indeterminate (avyākṛta); existent, non-existent, neither existent nor non-existent; to be abandoned by seeing the truths (darśanaheya), to be abandoned by meditation (bhāvanāheya), not to be abandoned (aheya); pertaining to the student (śaikṣa), pertaining to the teacher (aśaikṣa), pertaining to neither the student or the teacher (naīvaśaikṣanāśaikṣa); involving retribution (savipāka), not involving retribution, involving neither retribution nor the absence of retribution. [The [170a] patience consisting] of destroying unity by means of innumerable ternary categories of this type without, however, being attached to multiplicity (nānāva) is called dharmakṣānti.

III. PATIENCE IN REGARD TO THE BUDDHADHARMA.

Moreover, although the bodhisattva has not yet obtained the pure Path (anāsravamārga) and has not cut through the fetters (saṃyojana), he is able to adhere to the pure holy Dharma (anāsravāryadharmā) as well as the three seals of the Dharma (trividhadharmamudrā). First seal: “All conditionings are transitory” (anityaḥ sarvasaṃskāraḥ); second seal: “All dharmas are devoid of substantial self” (anātmānaḥ sarvadharmāḥ); third seal: “Nirvāṇa is reality” (satyaṃ nirvāṇam).³⁵⁴ The saints (ārya) who have obtained the Path (prāptamārga) possess the knowledge of all that by themselves (svataḥ); but when the bodhisattva who has not obtained the Path believes in this teaching and adopts it, this is called dharmakṣānti.

Moreover, there are fourteen difficult questions which the Buddha did not answer (caturdasāvyākṛtavastu): is the world eternal, is it not eternal, etc. [see above, Traité, I, p. 155F, 423F]: meditating on these questions without encountering obstacles (āvaraṇa) or losing the Middle Path (madhyamā pratipad), the ability to maintain such a position constitutes dharmakṣānti.

A bhikṣu who was reflecting and meditating on these fourteen difficult questions had no success in penetrating them and became impatient. Taking his robe and his begging bowl, he went to the Buddha and said: “If the Buddha will explain these fourteen difficult questions for me and satisfy my mind, I will remain his disciple; if he does not succeed in explaining them to me, I will seek another path.” The Buddha answered this fool (mohapuruṣa): “At the beginning, did you have an agreement with me that if I explained these fourteen difficult questions, you would be my disciple?” The bhikṣu said “No.” The Buddha continued: “Fool! How can you say today that, if I do not explain that, you will not be my disciple? I preach the Dharma to save people stricken by old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇa). These fourteen difficult questions are subject for debate (vigrahassthāna); they are of no use to the Dharma and are only futile proliferation (prapañca). Why ask me these questions? If I answered, you would not understand; at the time of death, you would have understood nothing and you would not be liberated from birth, old age, sickness and death. – A man has been struck by a poisoned arrow (saviśaśalya); his relatives and his companions (jñātiparivāra) have called a physician (bhīṣaj-) to remove the arrow and apply an antidote. The wounded man says [to the physician]: “I will not let you take out the arrow until I know what is your clan (gotra), your name (nāman), your family (jāti), your village (grāma), your father and mother and your age (āyus); I want to know from which mountain the arrow came from, what kind of wood (kāṇḍa) and feathers, who made the arrow-head and what kind of iron; then I want to know if the bow (dhanus) is of mountain wood or animal horn; finally, I want to know where the antidote comes from and what is its name. After I have learned all these things, I will let you take out the arrow and apply the antidote.” – The Buddha then asked the bhikṣu: “Will this man be able to know all these things and only after that let the arrow be removed?” – The bhikṣu answered: “The man will not succeed in knowing all that for, if he waited to know it all, he would be dead [before the operation].” The Buddha continued: “You are like him: the arrow of wrong views (mithyadrṣṭiśālya) dipped in the poison of thirst (tṛṣṇāviṣa) has pierced your mind; I want to remove this arrow from you, my disciple; but you are unwilling to let me take it out, and you want to know if the world is eternal or non-eternal, finite or infinite, etc. You will not find what you are looking for, but you will lose the life of wisdom (prajñājīvita); you will die like an animal and fall into the shadows.” Gradually the bhikṣu

Furthermore, the bodhisattva who wants to become omniscient (sarvajñā) should discuss about all the dharmas and understand their true nature; he will find no obstacle or impediment in the fourteen difficult questions; he knows that they are serious mental illnesses; to be able to get out of them, to be able to endure them constitutes dharmakṣānti.

Furthermore, the Buddhadharma is very profound (gambhīra), pure (viśuddha) and subtle (sūkṣma); it is expressed in innumerable sermons of all kinds. To adhere to it wholeheartedly without hesitation (saṃśaya) or regret (vipratīśāra) constitutes dharmakṣānti. As the Buddha said, dharmas, although empty (śūnya), are neither cut (samucchinna) nor destroyed (niruddha). Arising from a series of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamūhāna), they are not eternal (nitya). Although the dharmas are impersonal (anātman), one does not escape from sin (āpatti) or merit (puṇya). The mind lasts for only an instant (ekakṣaṇika); material dharmas (rūpidharma), the senses (indriya), the intellect, perish ceaselessly; without lasting until the next moment (prṣṭhakṣaṇa), they arise and perish ever anew; nevertheless, one does not escape from the actions (karman) that are causes and conditions for innumerable lifetimes. Although the aggregates (skandha), the elements (dhātu) and the bases of consciousness (āyatana) [that make up beings] are empty (śūnya) and without self (anātman), beings wander in the five destinies (pañcagati) and undergo transmigration. Such is the Buddhadharma, multiple (nānāvidha), profound (gambhīra) and subtle (sūkṣma); even though he has not yet attained buddhahood, [the bodhisattva] believes in it and adheres to it without hesitation or regret; that is what dharmakṣānti consists of.

Furthermore, whereas arhats and pratyekabuddhas, fearing transmigration, seek to enter nirvāṇa as soon as possible, the bodhisattva, not being a Buddha, seeks omniscience (sarvajñāna); out of compassion (karuṇā) for beings, he wants to understand, analyze, know the true nature of dharmas. The patience that he manifests to that end constitutes dharmakṣānti.

Question. – How does he see the true nature of dharmas?

³⁵⁵ Cf. Cūḷamālūkiyasutta in Majjhima, I, p. 426-432 (tr. Chalmers, I, p. 304-307; Oldenberg, Bouddha, p. 311-312; Tchong a han, T 26, no. 221, k. 60, p. 804a-805c; Tsien yu king, T 94, p. 917b-918b.

As in Milinda, p. 144-145, the Buddha responded to Mālunkyāputta by not answering him at all (sthāpamīya vyākaraṇam).

Answer. – He sees that all the dharmas are without defects (akhila), indestructible (abhedyā) and unchangeable (avikāra) and that that is their true nature.

Question. – Every argument (vāda) may be turned around, refuted and confounded. Why do you say that indestructibility is the true nature of dharmas?

Answer. – Because the dharmas are indestructible. In the Buddhadharma, every path of speech is surpassed, the functioning of the mind (cittapravṛtti) is stopped; eternally unborn (anutpanna) and unceasing (aniruddha), dharmas are like nirvāṇa. Why? If dharmas existed in their true nature, they could not be non-existing; if they did not exist after having been, they would be destroyed.

Furthermore, dharmas cannot be eternal (nitya). Why? If they were eternal, there would no longer be sin (āpatti) or merit (punya), killing (vadha) or giving of life, asceticism (yoga) or kind deeds (hita), bondage (bandhana) or freedom (vimokṣa): the world would be nirvāṇa. For all these reasons, dharmas cannot be eternal.

If dharmas were transitory (anitya), they would be annihilated (ucchinna) and there would be no sin or merit, no increase or decrease; virtues (guṇa), actions (karman), causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), results (phala) and retribution (vipāka) would disappear. For all these reasons, dharmas cannot be transitory.

Question. – You say that, according to the Buddhadharma, eternity (śāśvata) and impermanence (uhcheda) are equally unreal; but that is wrong.

[170c] Why? In the Buddhadharma, eternity is real and impermanence is also real. Cessation due to knowledge (pratisaṃkhyānirodha), cessation not due to knowledge (apratipsaṃkhyānirodha) and space (ākāśa) are eternal.³⁵⁶ they are eternal because they are not born, they do not perish and they do not perish. The five aggregates (skandha) are impermanent: they impermanent because they are born (utpāda), they endure (sthiti) and they perish (nirodha). Then why do you say that eternity and impermanence are equally unreal?

Answer. – The saint (ārya) has two types of language (abhilāpa): i) an artificial language (upāyābhilāpa), ii) a true language (samyagabhilāpa). In the artificial language, he will speak of the eternal [principle] or the transitory [principle] according to whether the listener holds the individual (pudgala) to be a simple assemblage of causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) or a true being (sattva).

See what has been said with regard to “therapeutic viewpoint” (prātipākṣika siddhānta) [Cf. Traité, I, p. 27F seq., and especially p. 32F]. When the saint speaks of impermanence, he wants to uproot attachment to the pleasures of the threefold world: the Buddha wonders how to lead these beings to acquire renunciation of desire (vairāgya); this is why he speaks of impermanent dharmas. A stanza says:

By seeing the unborn dharma, one escapes from dharmas that are born;

³⁵⁶ These are the three asaṃskṛitas; cf. Kośa, I, p. 8.

By seeing the unconditioned dharma, one escapes from conditioned dharmas.

Why is rebirth (punarbhāva) called the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī)? Non-eternal (anitya), non-independent (asvatantra), coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyayāpekṣa), it possesses a nature of old age, sickness and death (jarāvyādhimaraṇalakṣaṇa), a nature of deception (vipralambhanalakṣaṇa) and a nature of destruction (avadāraṇalakṣaṇa). This is called rebirth; it is a conditioned dharma (saṃskṛtadhṛma). As was said in regard to the ‘therapeutic point of view’ [Traité, I, p. 36-38], eternity and impermanence are not real characteristics, for they are both defects.

To say that dharmas are both eternal and transitory is a foolish argument. Why? It is both denying the denial of non-existence and denying the existence of that which is not denied. If one denies both of these, what is the dharma of which one will still be able to say anything?

Question. – In the Buddhadharma, characterized by eternal emptiness (śūnya), there is neither existence (bhāva) nor non-existence (abhāva). Emptiness (śūnya) excludes existence, and the emptiness of emptiness (śūnyaśūnyatā) prevents non-existence; this adds up to the fact that there is neither existence nor non-existence. Why accuse that of being a foolish argument?

Answer. – The Buddhadharma in its true nature transcends every belief (grāha) and every opinion (abhiniveśa). By believing in dharmas that are neither existent nor non-existent, you are holding a foolish argument. To affirm both non-existence and not non-existence is a debatable and refutable thesis; it is a theoretical position (cittotpādasthiti) and an occasion for dispute (vivādasthāna). The Buddhadharma is not like that. Even though there are reasons for affirming non-existence and not non-existence, the Buddhadharma does not express an opinion (abhiniveśa) on this subject; as it does not express an opinion, it cannot be refuted or confounded. The Buddhist position is the same [for the other difficult questions: [See Traité, I, p. 155F, 423F]: are dharmas finite, infinite, both finite and infinite, neither finite nor infinite? Does the Tathāgata exist after death, does he not exist after death, does he exist and not exist after death, is it false that he exists and does not exist after death? Is the vital principle (jīva) the same thing as the body (śarīra), is the vital principle different from the body? – All of that is futile. [The bodhisattva] also considers as wrong all the theories relating to the sixty-two views (dṛṣṭigata).³⁵⁷ He avoids them all; he believes in the pure unalterable nature (viśuddhāvīkāralakṣaṇa) of the Buddhadharma; his mind is free of regret and functioning. This is what is called dharmakṣānti.

[171a] Furthermore, existence (bhāva) and non-existence (abhāva) are two extremes (anta). If one considers dharmas at the time of their arising (utpāda) and of their duration (sthiti), one has the view of existence (bhāvadṛṣṭi); if one considers dharmas at the time of their aging (jarā) and their cessation (vibhaṅga), one has the view of non-existence (abhāvadṛṣṭi). Beings of the threefold world (traiḍhātukasattva) are often attached (abhinivīśante) to these two views, but these two concepts are wrong and unreal. If existence really existed, there would be no non-existence. Why? To no longer be after having been (bhūtvā abhāva) is to undergo destruction (ucchedapātana; such a destruction is impossible (ayukta).

Furthermore, all dharmas are said to exist by reason of the complex of names and conventions (nāmasaṃketasāmagrī). This is why dharmas coming from the complex of names and conventions do not exist (nopalabhyante).

Question. – Although dharmas coming from names and conventions do not exist, the complex of names and conventions itself does exist!

Answer. – If there were no dharmas, for what would names and conventions be united? There are no names or conventions either.

Furthermore, if dharmas really existed, there would be no need for a mind (citta) or a consciousness (vijñāna) to cognize their existence. If a mind and a consciousness are needed to cognize their existence, they do not exist. Thus, the solidity (khakkhaṭatva) of earth (pīthivī)³⁵⁸ is cognized by the body organ (kāyendriya) and the body consciousness (kāyavijñāna); but if there were no body organ or body consciousness to cognize it, there would be no solidity.

Question. – Whether the body organ and the body consciousness cognize it or not, the earth is always characterized by solidity.

Answer. – One cognizes the existence of this solidity if one has already recognized its existence or has heard someone else speak about it; but if one did not know it beforehand or if one has not heard speak of it, there would be no solidity.

Furthermore, if the earth were always solid, it would never lose this characteristic. But, like solidified butter, wax or vegetable gum, earth can become liquid and lose its characteristic of solidity. It is the same for gold, silver, copper, iron, etc. The characteristic of water (āpas) is liquidity (dravatva) but, by the action of cold, it solidifies. Many things lose their characteristics in this manner.

Furthermore, the teachers of the Dharma (upadeśācārya) can transform existence into nothingness and nothingness into existence. [p. 920F, l. 10-11]. Saints (ārya) and great meditators (dyāyin) can change earth (prthivī) into water (āpas) and water into earth.³⁵⁹ All these dharmas are transformable as has been said in regard to the ten views as totality (kṛtsnāyatana).³⁶⁰

Furthermore, this view of existence (bhāvadṛṣṭi) arises from desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa), delusion (moha), the bonds (bandhana) or disputes (vivāda). Now any position (sthāna) that gives rise to desire, hatred, etc., is foreign to the Buddhadharma. Why? Because the Buddhadharma, by its very nature, is good (kuśala) and pure (śuddha). Therefore [this view of existence] is false.

³⁵⁸ For the nature of the four great elements, earth, water, fire and wind, see Kośa, I, p. 22-23. The discussion started here will be resumed below, k. 18, p. 194c.

³⁵⁹ For this power of transformation, see above, Traité, I, p. 383F, n. 1 and below, p. 731F.

Furthermore, all dharmas are grouped into two categories: i) material dharmas (rūpidharma), and ii) non-material dharmas (arūpidharma). Material dharmas can be divided down to the subtle atom (paramāṇu) and endless dispersion, as we have seen in regard to the refutation of the gift given (dehadrvaya) in the chapter on Danāpāramitā [see above, p. 729F]. Non-material dharmas are not cognized by the five faculties. Therefore it is by means of considering the moment of birth-duration-destruction of the mind (manasutpādasthitibhaṅgaparīkṣā) that we know that the mind (citta) is composed of parts (sabhāga). Since it consists of parts, it is transitory (anitya); being transitory, it is empty (śūnya); being empty, it is nonexistent (asat). In the time of a finger-snap (acchaṭāmātreṇa), there are sixty moments (kṣaṇa),³⁶¹ in each kṣaṇa, the mind is born (utpāda) and ceases (bhaṅga); but as it arises in a series (prabandhenotpādat), we know that this is a mind of desire (rāgacitta), that, a mind of anger (dveṣacitta), or a mind of delusion (mohacitta), [171b] a mind of faith (prasādacitta), or a pure mind (viśuddhacitta) of wisdom (prajñā) or rapture (dhyāna). The ascetic considers the arising and cessation of the mind to be like a water torrent (aghavāri) or the flame of a lamp (dīpajvālā): this is called crossing the threshold of knowledge of emptiness (śūnyatājñānavārapraveśa). Why? If the mind arises in one moment (ekakṣaṇa) and perishes in another moment (anyakṣaṇa), this mind would be eternal (anitya). Why is that? Because it would be escaping from destruction during a short instant. Now, if it escaped destruction even for a moment, it would be free of destruction forever. Besides, the Buddha said that the conditioned has three characteristics, birth, duration and destruction. If its arising lasted for one brief instant, it would be free of destruction and would not be a conditioned dharma (saṃskṛtadharma). If the arising, duration and cessation of the mind occupied ³⁶¹ The kṣaṇa, moment, is the shortest time. Buddhists of the Lesser Vehicle agree in saying that dharmas are kṣaṇika, momentary, but disagree on the meaning of this epithet. Pāli scholars and the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikas, who accept the existence of the past and the future and who recognize in the kṣaṇika dharma two, three or four characteristics of the conditioned dharma (saṃskṛtadharmalakṣaṇa), see above, Traité, I, p. 36F, n. 2), are of the opinion that the dharma arises, perdures and perishes in the space of one kṣaṇa (cf. Visuddhimagga, p. 431, 473; Abhidhammatthasāṅgha, tr. Aung, , Compendium, p. 25; P'i p'o cha, T 1545k. 39, p. 201b-c; Kośa, II, p. 222-226; Saṃghabhadra, T 1562, k. 13, p. 409b-c). – The Sautrāntikas who deny the past and the future and reject the characteristics of the conditioned dharma, birth, etc., (cf. Kośa, II, p. 226-230), see, in the kṣaṇa, “the nature of the thing which is to perish immediately [and spontaneously] after it has been born” (cf. Kośa, IV, p. 4; Tattvasaṃgraha, p. 142). – Following them, the Mādhyamikas and the Vijñānavādins reject the characteristics of the conditioned dharma; cf. Madh, vṛtti, p. 145-179; 545-547; Mppś, k. 1, p. 60b (Traité, I, p. 37F); Siddhi, p. 64-68. – See the Sarvāstivādin-Sautrāntika argument in L. de La Vallée-Poussin, Note sur le “moment” des bouddhistes, RO, VIII, 1931, p. 1-13; Sarvāstivāda, MCB, V, 1937, p. 151-158.

Scholars have tried to establish the relative duration of the kṣaṇa relative to the tatkṣaṇa, lava, muhūrta, etc. Cf. Divyāvadāna, p. 645; P'i p'o cha, T 1545, k. 136, p. 701b; Kośa, III, p. 179. “In the time that a strong man snaps his fingers” (acchaṭāmātra or acchaṭāsaṃghātāmātra), the Mppś counts 60 kṣaṇas here; the Vibhaṣhā (T 1545, k. 136, p. 701b14) counts 64; the Kośa (III, p. 178), Saṃghabhadra (T 1562, k. 32, p. 521c13-14) and the Madh. vṛtti (p. 547) count 65.

– The original phrase is known in the Madh vṛtti, p. 547: balavatpuruṣacchaṭāmātreṇa pañcaśaṣṭhiḥ kṣaṇā atīkrāmanti. The expression acchaṭā or acchaṭāsaṃghāta (in Pāli, accharā, accharāsaṃghāta) indicates the gesture of snapping the fingers; it is found, e.g., in Anguttara, I, p. 10, 34, 38; Milinda, p. 102; Divya, p. 142, 555; Mahāvvyut., np. 2802, 826.

[altogether] only a single moment, why does arising of necessity precede cessation? Could it not just as well follow it? Moreover, if the mind at first existed and then had birth, it would not depend on birth [to exist]. Why? Because the mind would be existent in advance. If birth existed before [the mind], this would be a birth where nothing was being born. Finally, birth and cessation are opposed to each other (anyonayaviruddha) by nature; if there is birth, there cannot be cessation; at the moment of cessation there cannot be arising; consequently, they do not exist at the same moment, or at different moments. Therefore there is no arising; if there is no arising, there is no duration or cessation; if there is no duration or cessation, there is no mental dharma (caitasikadharma); if there is no mental dharma, there is no dharma dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayukta); since conditioned dharmas (saṃskāra), namely, material dharmas (rūpidharma) and non-material dharmas (arūpidharma) do not exist, unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛta) do not exist either. Why? Because it is due to conditioned dharmas that there are unconditioned dharmas; if there are no conditioned dharmas, there cannot be any unconditioned dharmas.

Furthermore, by considering the impermanence of karman, we understand the eternity of akarma. If this is so, we now see that karman is existence (bhāva) that akarma is non-existence (abhāva). Consequently an eternal dharma does not exist (nopalabhyate).

Furthermore, among the eternal dharmas of which the heretics (tīrthika) and the disciples of the Buddha speak, some are the same whereas others are different. The ones that are the same are space (ākāśa) and nirvāṇa. The heretics accept a soul (ātman), time (kāla), direction (diś), the subtle atom (paramāṇu), darkness (tamas) and other categories of the same type, different [from those of the Buddhists].³⁶² Moreover, the disciples of the Buddha say that cessation not due to knowledge (apratisaṃkhyānirodha) is eternal; they also say that uncaused dharmas (apratītyasamutpanna) are eternal, whereas dharmas resulting from causes and conditions (pratītyasamutpanna) are transitory. In the Mahāyāna, permanence (nityatā), the nature of things (dharmaatā), the true nature (tathatā), the summit of existence (bhūtakoti) and other [synonyms] of this type are called eternal dharmas, space (ākāśa) and nirvāṇa, as was said before in the chapter dedicated to the praise of the Bodhisattva (cf. Traité, I, p. 38F, 39F n. 1, 45F). In regard to the soul, time, direction and the subtle atom [of the heretics], see also what has been said above (above, p. 725F seq.). This is why we cannot speak of the existence of dharmas.

If dharmas are non-existent, they are of two categories: i) permanently non-existent, ii) non-existent following a cessation (vibhaṅga):

a. If, having previously existed they no longer exist now or, if presently existing, they will not exist later, there is cessation. If that is so, then there is no [171c] longer cause (hetu) or condition (pratyaya). If there is no longer any cause or condition, then anything can come from anything, or also, nothing comes from anything. And it is the same in the future. But if causes and conditions for sins (āpatti) and merits (puṇya) being suppressed, and if there is no longer any difference between the poor (daridra) and the rich (dhanya), between the noble (prañña) and the humble (hīna), then one ends up in the unfortunate destinies (durgati) and in the animal (tiryagyonī) realms.

b. If one claims [that the dharmas are] permanently non-existent, one misunderstands [the four noble Truths] of suffering (duḥkha), its origin (samudaya), its cessation (nirodha) and the path to its cessation (mārga). If one suppresses the four Truths (satya), the Jewel of the Dharma (dharmaratna) no longer exists. If the Jewel of the Dharma no longer exists, the eightfold noble Path (aṣṭāṅgāryamārga) disappears. If the Jewel of the Dharma (dharmaratna) and the Jewel of the Saṃgha (saṃgharatna) disappear, there is no longer the Jewel of the Buddha (buddharatna). If that is so, the Three Jewels are destroyed. Besides, if all dharmas are really empty (śūnya), there would be no sin (āpatti) or merit (puṇya), no father or mother, no world or rituals, no good or evil; good and evil would be confounded with a multiple succession [of consequences]; everything would vanish, like visions in a dream (svapnadarśana). These are the faults to which one is exposed if one claims that [dharmas] are really non-existent. Who would believe that statement? If one claims that one sees [dharmas] to exist because of a mistake (viparyāsa), then, when one sees one person, perhaps one is seeing two or three persons? For, if dharmas are truly non-existent, by seeing them, one is committing a mistake. By not falling into views of existence and non-existence (bhāvābhābadṛṣṭi), one gains the middle Path (madhyamā pratipad), the true nature [of things].

How can one know the truth?

By complying with what has been identified (jñāta) and said (ukta) by the Buddhas and bodhisattvas of the past (ātīta) numerous as the sands of the Ganges (gaṅgānādīvālūkāsama), with what will be identified and said by the Buddhas and bodhisattvas of the future (anāgata) numerous as the sands of the Ganges, with what is identified and said by the Buddhas and bodhisattvas of the present (pratyutpanna) numerous as the sands of the Ganges. If the mind of faith (prasādacitta) is great, one escapes from doubt (saṃśaya) and regret (vipratīṣāra); if the power of the faith (prasādabala) is great, one can grasp and adopt the Dharma: that is called dharmakṣānti.

Furthermore, by the power of rapture (dhyānabala) one hears speak of the true nature of the dharmas with a gentle (mṛdu), tender (taruṇa) and pure (viśuddha) mind, and one incorporates the Dharma into one's mind. By the adhesion of faith (prasādhābhīniveśa), the mind penetrates deeply in the absence of doubt and regret. Why is that? Doubt and regret are the bonds of the desire realm (kāmadhātubandhana); if they are heavy (sthūla) there is no access to this gentleness and tenderness of the mind (mṛdutaruṇacittatā) which is called dharmakṣānti.

Finally, by the power of wisdom (prajñācitta), one discovers in many ways that, in the face of all the dharmas, there is no dharma that can exist. Being able to endure and adopt this doctrine with no hesitation or regret constitutes dharmakṣānti.

The bodhisattva also says to himself: Under the virulent action of ignorance (avidyaviṣa), worldly people (prthagjana) attribute a contrary characteristic (lakṣaṇa, nimitta) to all the dharmas in particular: they take what is impermanent (anitya) to be permanent (nitya); that which is painful (duḥkha) to be happy (sukha); that which is not a self (anātman) to be a self (ātman); that which is empty (śūnya) to be real (satya); that which is non-existent (asat) to be existent (sat); that which is existent to be non-existent.³⁶³ In this way, they attribute contrary characteristics to all kinds of dharmas. To obtain the noble true wisdom (āryabhūtaprajñā), to destroy the poison of ignorance (avidyāviṣa), to understand the true nature of dharmas (dharmasatyasatyalakṣaṇa), to acquire the wisdom of impermanence (anitya), suffering, emptiness (śūnya) and the non-self (anātman), [then] to reject it without being attached to it (abhiniveśa), and finally being able to endure such a doctrine, this is what is called dharmakṣānti. Finally, the bodhisattva considers all dharmas as eternally empty (śūnya) from the very beginning (āditah) and also actually empty. To believe and accept this doctrine is dharmakṣānti.

Question. – [Believing] in original and eternal emptiness as well as actual emptiness is a wrong view (mityādṛṣṭi)! Why do you call that dharmakṣānti?

Answer. – If the bodhisattva had in mind the absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnyatā) of dharmas, by grasping at the nature (nimittodgahaṇa) and [172a] adhering to it in his mind (chttābhiniveśa), that would be a wrong view; but if he considers emptiness without subscribing to it or producing wrong view, that is dharmakṣānti.³⁶⁴ A stanza says:

By nature, dharmas are eternally empty,
But the mind does not become attached to emptiness.
To support such a doctrine
Is the major characteristic of the Buddhist Path.

The bodhisattva crosses over the threshold of wisdom (prajñādvāra) in many ways. He considers the true nature of the dharmas; his mind experiences no pulling back or regret; he does not [blindly] follow the considerations [he has made] and they cause him no grief; he assures his own benefit (svārtha) and that of others (parārtha): this is what is called dharmakṣānti.

This dharmakṣānti is of three kinds. When he practices it in its pure form, the bodhisattva does not see the properties of patience, does not see himself, does not see those who are insulting him, does not play with the dharmas. Then this is pure dharmakṣānti. For this reason, the sūtra says (below, p. 865F) that “the bodhisattva who dwells in the virtue of wisdom must fulfill the virtue of patience by not swaying in the wind and not withdrawing” (bodhisattvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ sthitvā kusāntipāramitā paripūrayitavyā akṣobhaṇatāmupādāya). What is this immobility (akṣobhaṇatā) and this absence of withdrawing (avivartana)? Not feeling hatred (dveṣa, pratigha), not speaking wicked words; physically, not doing evil; mentally, not having doubt. The bodhisattva who understands the true nature of the virtue of wisdom does not see dharmas, for his mind is without opinions (abhiniveśa) about them. When a man comes to insult him, torment him, poison him or strike him, he can endure it all. This is why he is said to dwell in the virtue of wisdom; he can fulfill the virtue of patience.

³⁶⁴ For the correct way of taking emptiness, by using it without adhering to it, see below, k. 18, p. 193c.

CHAPTER XXVI: EXERTION (p. 927F)

Sūtra: The bodhisattva must fulfill the virtue of exertion³⁶⁵ by means of non-slackening of bodily and mental exertion (vīryaparamitā paripūrayitavyā kāyikacaitasikavīryāsraṃsanatām upādāya).

Śhāstra: P'i li ye (vīrya), in the language of the Ts'in: exertion.

I. EXERTION, FOURTH VIRTUE.

Question. – Exertion is the root (mūla) of all good dharmas (kuśaladharmas): it should be first; why is it here placed in fourth place?

Answer. – 1) Generosity (dāna), morality (śīla) and patience (kṣānti) always exist in the world (loka).

The householder, as a guiding principle, gratifies his guests (atithi) and examples of generosity are found even among animals. People give for various reasons: they give in view of the present lifetime (ihajanman), or in view of the future lifetime (aparamajanman), or in view of the Path (mārga). There is no need for exertion [to practice generosity].

Similarly in regard to morality. Seeing malefactors punished by the king or by laws, people themselves feel frightened and do not dare to violate [the rules of morality]. Also there are naturally good people (prakṛtikuśala) who do not commit sins. Some people, learning that the evil committed in the present lifetime finds its punishment in the future lifetime, feel fear and observe morality. Others, learning that it is possible by means of morality to escape from birth (jāti), old age (jāra), sickness (vyādhi) and death ³⁶⁵ The Lesser Vehicle heaps endless praises on the vigorous man, defined in these words: sthāmavān vīryavān utsāhī dṛiudhaparākramo snikshipadhuṛaḥ kuśaleṣhu dharmēṣhu: cf. Dīgha, III, p. 237, 268, 285; Majjhima, I, p. 356; II, p. 95, 128; Saṃyutta, V, p. 197, 225; Aṅguttara, I, p. 117, 244-246; II, p. 250; III, p. 2, 11, 65, 152, 155; IV, p. 3, 110, 153, 234, 352-353, 357; V, p. 15. 24, 27-28, 90-91; Udāna, p. 36; Sūtrālaṃkāra, ed. Lévi, p. 15. The faculty of exertion (vīryendriya) is mentioned or defined in Dīgha, III, p. 239, 278; Saṃyutta, V, p.196 seq.; Dhammasaṅgaṇi, p. 11 (tr. Rh. D., p. 13); Vibhaṅga, p. 123; Nettipakaraṇa, P. 7, 15, 19. The opposite vice, laziness (kausīdya, Pāli: kosajja), is actively combatted: cf. Saṃyutta, V, p. 277-280; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 195; V, p.146 seq; Milinda, p. 351; Visuddhimagga, p. 132.

The Greater Vehicle distinguishes three types of exertion: saṃnāhvīrya, exertion to arm oneself; prayogavīrya, exertion to endeavor; alīnam akṣobhyam asaṃtuṣṭivīrya, exertion without timidity, withdrawal or satiation; or else, saṃnahavīrya, exertions in producing the great vow; kuśaladharmaśaṃgrāhakavīrya, exertion to acquire spiritual benefits; sattvārthakṛtāyai vīrya, exertion for the service of beings: cf. Dharmasaṃgraha, ch. CVIII; Sūtrālaṃkāra, ed. Lévi, p. 108, 114; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 200-201; Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 51; Bodhicaryāvatāra and Pañjikā, chap. VII (tr. Lav., p. 70-83); Saṃgraha, p. 191-192; Siddhi, p. 622.

Is exertion needed to observe this morality?

[172b] Similarly with patience. Whether someone insults them, beats them or kills them, some people do not respond because they are afraid; others are quiet and do not respond because they are too weak, because they fear a punishment, because they follow the rules of honest people (satpuruṣadharmas) or because they seek the path. There is no need for the virtue of exertion in order to endure all that.

But here, the bodhisattva who wishes to know the true nature of dharmas and to practice the virtue of wisdom must practice rapture (dhyāna), the rapture that is the gateway to true wisdom, Now, in order to practice rapture, diligence (ūṛjā), exertion (vīrya) and one-pointedness (ekacitta) are necessary.

2) Furthermore, by means of generosity, morality and patience, great merit (mahāpuṇya), great peace (yogaḥṣema) and great joy (prīti) are obtained; great renown and the fulfillment of all one's wishes are obtained. Having appreciated the flavor of these benefits, the bodhisattva now wishes to progress and obtain rapture and wisdom. Thus, when digging a well and finding dampness and mud, one increases one's efforts with the firm hope of finding water. Or, while trying to produce fire by friction, when smoke appears, one increases the friction in the firm hope of having fire.

Commonly there are two gateways (dvāra) for arriving at buddhahood, namely, merit (puṇya) and wisdom (prajñā). The practice of generosity, morality and patience is the puṇyadvāra; the understanding of the true nature of dharmas, or the great virtue of wisdom, is the prajñādvāra. The bodhisattva who enters by the puṇyadvāra and avoids all the sins (āpatti) realizes all his aspirations (prañidhāna). If he does not realize his aspirations because his faults (āpatti) and defilements (mala) counteract them, he enters into the prajñādvāra; then he has no distaste (nirveda) for saṃsāra or attraction (rati) for nirvāṇa, for both are but one thing. Now he wants to produce the great virtue of wisdom which depends on rapture (dhyāna); dhyāna [in turn] requires great exertion of effort (mahāvīryabala). Why? Because, if the mind is distracted (vikṣipta), it cannot see the true nature of dharmas. Thus, a lamp burning in the full wind cannot light up anything; but if the lamp is placed in a closed room, it will give off plenty of light. Rapture (dhyāna) and wisdom (prajñā) cannot be carried on by meritorious actions (puṇya), and cannot be obtained by means of gross considerations (sthūladarśana). In order to attain them, bodily and mental effort (kāyikacaitasikābhoga) and unrelaxing eagerness (asraṃsama) are needed. Thus the Buddha said: “May my blood, flesh, fat and marrow dry up, may I be reduced to skin, bone and tendons, but never will I abandon exertion.”³⁶⁶ This is how one acquires rapture and wisdom; when one has these two, one possesses all. That is why exertion is in the fourth place; it is the root of rapture and true wisdom. In the first three virtues [generosity, morality and patience], there is indeed some exertion, but so little that we do not speak of it.

Question. – Some say that only by practicing generosity, morality and patience can one acquire great merit (mahāpuṇya), and that one's aspirations (praṇidhāna) are realized by the power of these merits; as for rapture and wisdom, they will come by themselves (svataḥ) [without the help of exertion]. Then what use is the virtue of exertion?

Answer. – Buddhahood is profound (gambhīra) and difficult (durlabha) to [172c] attain. Even if one has generosity, morality and wisdom, it is still necessary to have profound rapture, true wisdom, as well as the innumerable attributes of the Buddhas (apramāṇabuddhadharma). If one does not practice exertion, one does not produce rapture; if rapture is not produced, it is not possible to be reborn in the Brahmādevaṛāja heaven and, a fortiori, to aspire to Buddhahood.

Thus,³⁶⁷ the vaiśya Min ta (Meṇḍaka) who wanted to get innumerable precious substances (ratnadavya) obtained everything at will.³⁶⁸ King Ting cheng (Mūrdhaja) reigned over the four continents (cāturdvīpaka); the heavens rained down [on him] the seven jewels (saptaratna) and the things he needed; Śakra devānām indra shared his seat with him and made him sit [beside him]; nevertheless, despite all his wealth, he was unable to obtain the Path.³⁶⁹ The bhikṣu Lo p'in tcheou (Losaka-tiṣya), although he was an

A similar sermon was given by Śākyamuni immediately before the enlightenment, as soon as he took his seat of Bodhi. See above, Traité, I, p. 228F, n. 1.

³⁶⁷ The examples that follow lead to two theses: Thanks to merits, one can attain the realization of all one's wishes; but if exertion is lacking, one does not attain the Path: this was the case for Meṇḍaka and king Mūrdhaja. On the other hand, one could have the fruits of the path and even arhathood while being seen to refuse the most legitimate desires: his was the case for Losaka-tiṣya.

³⁶⁸ Meṇḍaka was a rich householder, native of the city of Bhadaṃkara (Pāli, Bhaddiyanagara) in Bengal. When the Buddha visited the city, Meṇḍaka gave him and the saṅgha shelter and, having heard his sermons, he obtained the fruit of srotaāpanna. The story of this conversion is told in detail in the Vinayas: Pāli Vinaya, I, p. 240-245 (tr. Rh. D.-Oldenberg, II, p. 121-129); Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 22, p. 150b; Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 42, p. 872b; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 26, p. 191a seq.; Divyāvadāna, p. 123-130. As a result of the merits of their previous lives, Meṇḍaka, his wife Candapadumā, his son Dhanañjaya, his grand-daughter Sumandevī and his slave Puṇṇaka possessed great miraculous powers which are described in the previously cited sources and in yet other texts: Vinaya, I, p. 240: - "When he had bathed his head and swept out his granary, he was able to sit outside and refill the granary by making showers of grain fall from the sky." - Dhammapadaṭṭha, III, p. 372: "One day this merchant wanted to prove the power of his merit; he had his twelve hundred and fifty granaries cleaned, bathed his head, sat at the door of each of the granaries and looked up into the sky; at once these granaries were filled with red rice of the type described above." - Visuddhimagga, p. 383: "When the merchant had washed his head, he looked up into the sky and his twelve thousand five hundred granaries became full of red rice coming from above." - Divyāvadāna, p. 123: "When he looked at his treasures and his empty granaries, they became filled in the wink of an eye."

³⁶⁹ Māndhātara, surnamed Mūrdhaja because he was born from a bump on his father's head, reigned in the western kingdom and successively conquered those of the south, the east and the north. He possessed the seven jewels of a cakravartin king and, when he closed his left hand and touched it with his right hand, the sky rained down a shower

arhat, begged for his food for seven days without receiving anything and returned with empty bowl (dhautapātreṇa); then he burned his own body in the fire of rapture (dhyānatejas) and attained parinirvāṇa.³⁷⁰ of the seven kinds of jewels, which accumulated up to the height of his knees. He went to visit the world of the gods and reigned first over the heaven of the CaturmahārāĀikas. From there, he went to the heaven of the Trāyastriṃśa gods: Śakra took him by the hand and made him sit beside him. Māndhātara then sought to take over Śakra's throne, but he was sent back at once to earth where he died of sickness.

³⁷⁰ The Mpps will return to this individual later (k. 30, p. 278c): The bhikṣu Lo p'in tcheou (Losaka-tiṣya), a disciple of Śāriputra, observed morality, and exertion, and begged for his food. For six days, he was unable to get anything. On the seventh day, he had not much longer to live. One of his colleagues begged for food for him and gave it to him, but a bird stole it immediately. Then Śāriputra said to Maudgalyāyana: "You have great miraculous power; watch over his food so that he can get it." Maudgalyāyana took some food and went to offer it to Losaka-tiṣya; but as soon as the latter wanted to put it into his mouth, it changed into mud. In turn, Śāriputra begged food for him; but when he gave it to him, Losaka-tiṣya's mouth closed up by itself. Finally, the Buddha came, took the food and offered it to him; this time, thanks to the immensity of the Buddha's merits, Losaka-tiṣya was able to take the food. When he had eaten it, he experienced great joy and redoubled his faith and reverence. Then the Buddha said to him: "All conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma) are suffering", and preached the four truths to him. Immediately the bhikṣu's impurities were destroyed (kṣiṇāsrava) and his mind was liberated (svimuktacitta): he obtained arhathood.

The story of Losaka is unknown to other sources, but, with some modifications, it has passed into the Pāli Jātaka, no. 41, I, p. 234-236: After an unhappy childhood, at the age of seven, Losaka was ordained by Śāriputra. But his alms-tours were not fruitful and he received hardly enough to sustain him. When he became an arhat and his life was almost at an end, Śāriputra wanted to give him a proper meal; he went to Śrāvastī to beg, but nobody paid any attention to him. Śāriputra took Losaka to the monastery, begged food for him and sent it to him by way of messengers, but the latter ate the food themselves. Śāriputra then went himself to the king's palace, received a bowl filled with the four sweets (pattapūra catumadhura) and brought it himself to Losaka. He asked Losaka to eat this food at once, saying: "Venerable Tissa, I will stay by you and hold this bowl in my hand; you must sit down and eat,

This is how we know that only by the power of merits (punyabala) does one realize the Path and that, if one wishes to attain buddhahood, it is necessary to show great exertion.

II. THE BENEFITS OF EXERTION.

Question. – What are the benefits (anuśaṃsa) of exertion, benefits that the bodhisattva will investigate diligently and without slackening?

Answer. – All the virtues and all the benefits of the Path, in the present lifetime and in future lifetimes, come from exertion.

Moreover, if a person who wants to save himself already gives evidence of his eagerness and exertion, what can be said about the bodhisattva who has taken the vow to save all beings? The stanzas of praise dedicated to exertion (vīryastutigāthā) say:

The person who does not spare their life,
Whose wisdom and mind are firm (niyata),
Who practices exertion according to the Dharma,
Will easily find what he is looking for.

The workman who expends his efforts
Gathers an abundant harvest,
The traveler on a long journey who takes care
Necessarily reaches his goal.

Whether one obtains rebirth among the gods
Or whether one reaches nirvāṇa,
The cause of all that
Is the power of exertion.

It is not due to a deity (deva) or to luck (ahetuka) for if I don't hold the bowl, I am afraid that something will happen." Losaka then ate a substantial meal, but he died the same day and entered parinirvāṇa.

But to individual action that these benefits are due.

What man is there who, knowing this

Would not make personal efforts?

The threefold world is on fire and is burning

Like a great flame.³⁷¹

The wise and decisive man

Can manage to escape from it.

This is why the Buddha taught Right exertion to Ānanda.

Thus, avoiding laziness (kausīdya)

One arrives directly at Buddhahood.

By digging the earth with persistent effort

One reaches the spring;

It is the same with exertion:

If one does not seek, one does not find.

The person who practices the Dharma of the Path

With relentless exertion

[173a]Will inevitably attain immense fruit;

His reward will not be lacking.

³⁷¹ Cf. Saṃyutta, I, p. 133:

Sabbo ādipito loko, sabbo loko pahhūpito, sabbo pajjalito loko, sabbo loko pakampito.

The same stanza in hybrid Sanskrit, occurs in Mahāvastu, I, p. 33:

Sarvaṃ ādīnavaṃ lokaṃ, sarvaṃ lokaṃ ādīpitaṃ, sarvaṃ prajvalitaṃ lokaṃ, sarvalokaṃ prakampitaṃ.

For the idea of the world on fire, see also Pāli Vinaya, I, p. 34; Buddhavaṃsa, II, 12, p. 7.

Moreover, exertion is the root (mūla) of all the good dharmas (kuśaladharma); it can give rise to all the good dharmas, including supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarasamyaksaṃbodhi), not to speak of the lesser benefits. In the Abhidharma, it is said that all the good dharmas, including supreme perfect enlightenment, come from exertion and conscientiousness (apramāda).

Moreover, exertion calls forth the blessings (puṇya) of the present lifetime in the way the rain (varṣa) which, moistening the seeds (bīja), causes them to germinate. Even though one has the previous causes and conditions for [present] blessings, they will not be realized if exertion is absent; if in this way one obtains no benefits (artha) in the present lifetime, how would one attain buddhahood?

Moreover, the great bodhisattvas who commit themselves to beings undergo all the sufferings, including those of the Avīci hell (niraya). Their minds know no laziness, and that is exertion.

Moreover, no business can be realized if exertion is absent. Just as, in order to swallow some medicine, it is essential to take Pa teou (Croton tiglium) because without this Pa teou, one does not have the strength to swallow the medicine, so the foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), the bases of miraculous powers (ṛddhipāda), the faculties (indriya), the powers (bala), the factors of enlightenment (bodhyaṅga) and the Path (mārga) depend necessarily on exertion³⁷² and, if the latter is absent, all matters are unworkable. Morality (śīla) occurs only in the eightfold Path (aṣṭāṅgamārga) and not elsewhere; faith (prasāda, śraddhā) occurs only in the faculties (indriya) and the powers (bala) and not elsewhere; but exertion is not absent anywhere. Although it adds up all the dharmas [of the Path], it also makes up a separate category; it is like the “residue” of ignorance (avidyānuśaya) that occurs in all the latent defilements (anuśaya), but which separately forms independent ignorance (āveṇikī avidyā).³⁷³

III. PROGRESS IN EXERTION.

Question. – The bodhisattva wishes to acquire all the attributes of the Buddha, save all beings, destroy the afflictions (kleśa); he obtains everything he wishes. Then why increase his exertion in order to become Buddha; for if a small fire cannot burn a large forest, the fire, the power of which is increased, is able to burn everything.

³⁷³ Āveṇikī avidyā is the independent ignorance that does not accompany the other anuśayas, rāga, etc.: cf. Kośa, III, p. 84; V, p. 31; Saṃgraha, p. 17, 21; Siddhi, p. 276-277.

Answer. – From the time of his first resolution (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisattva has made the vow (praṇidhāna) to lead all beings to bliss (ānanda); he sacrifices his life ceaselessly for the entire world, since those who spare their lives cannot realize the good dharmas. This is why he increases his exertion.

Moreover, for many reasons, the bodhisattva criticizes laziness (kausīdya) and is joyfully attached to exertion. Laziness is a black cloud that hides clear wisdom; it engulfs the qualities (guṇa) and cultivates evil (akuśala). The lazy person at first feels a little joy, but later suffers greatly. Laziness is like poisoned food (viṣāhāra) which at the beginning gives off a pleasant perfume but kills the person in the long run. Laziness burns all the qualities like a great fire that ravages the entire jungle. The lazy person loses all their qualities; it is as if he underwent looting and had nothing left. Some stanzas say:

[173b] He does not get what he should get,

He loses what he has gotten.

He despises himself

And beings do not esteem him.

Always plunged in darkness (tamas),

He has no importance (anubhāva) at all.

Honor, nobility, knowledge and wisdom:

All of that is lost.

Hearing about the excellent dharmas of the Path,

He cannot profit from them himself.

All these faults

Come from laziness (kausīdya).

Although he hears speak of progress (vardhana)

He does not succeed in rousing himself.

All these faults

Come from laziness.

He does not put any order into his actions

And does not enter into the Dharma of the Path:

All these faults

Come from laziness.

Rejected by people of great learning,

Kept out of the way by people of middle rank,

Submerged among the humble and the foolish,

He is like a pig that is pleased with the mud.

If [the lazy person] is a man of the world,

He loses the threefold advantage (trivarga) of the lay life:

Sense pleasures (kāma), wealth (artha)

And virtue (guṇa) disappear at the same time.

If he has gone forth (pravrajita) as a monk.

He does not realize the twofold advantage of the religious life:

Rebirth among the gods and nirvāṇa.

For both,³⁷⁴ renown is lost.

If one wishes to know the cause

Of all this ruin,

[One should know] that, among all the enemies,

None is greater than laziness;

For all the punishments [that it brings along],

Laziness should be avoided.

The two bhikṣus Ma (Aśvaka) and Tsing (Punarvasuka)³⁷⁵, Fell into the evil destinies because of their laziness.

Although they had seen the Buddha and heard his Dharma

They could not escape [from punishment].

It is by considering the punishments reserved for laziness thus in many ways that exertion progresses.

The benefits of exertion must also be considered. In this life as in the next, the benefits of the Buddhist Path (buddhamārga) and nirvāṇa all result from exertion.

Moreover, knowing that all dharmas are empty (śūnya) and nonexistent (asat), the bodhisattva refrains from attaining (sakṣātḥ) nirvāṇa but collects all the good dharmas (kuśaladharma) for compassion (karuṇā) for beings: this is the power of the virtue of exertion.

Moreover, being unique and peerless, the bodhisattva, thanks to his exertion and his merits, is able to destroy Māra's army (mārasenā) and thus reach buddhahood. Once having become Buddha, he knows that all the dharmas are of a single characteristic (ekalakṣaṇa), free of marks (animitta) and truly empty (śūnya); he teaches these dharmas to beings by all kinds of speech (nānāvidhanāmasaṃketa) and all kinds of skilful means (nānāvidhopāya); he saves [173c] beings from the sufferings of birth (jāti), old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇa). When he is on the point of entering nirvāṇa, he entrusts the "body of the dharma" (dharmakāya) to the bodhisattva-mahāsattva Mi lō (Maitreya), to Kia chō (Kāśyapa), to A nan ³⁷⁵ The character tsing (7 and 2), signifying a well, serves also to designate the constellation of Punarvasu; cf. Rosenberg, Vocabulary, p. 18c; Mahāvīyutpatti, no. 3101; Traité, I, p. 476F. Ma Tsing here signifies two bhikṣus, known in Sanskrit, by the name of Aśvapunarvasukau (Pāli, Assajipunabbasukā). They had five hundred disciples and were part of the much-disparaged group of Śaḍvargiyas (Samanatapāsādikā, p. 579, 614; Papañca, III, p. 186). They lived at Kīṭāgiri, a village situated on the road from Benares to Śrāvastī. They indulged in various condemnable practices: they grew flowers, made bouquets and garlands of them and sent them to women and girls in the neighborhood to enter into relationships with them; they violated the precept forbidding meals at improper times; they used perfumes, were present at and participated in spectacles. – See:

³⁷⁴ I.e., for the lay person as well as for the monastic.

(Ānanda). etc.,³⁷⁶ then he enters into the diamond concentration (vajropamasamādhī) and breaks the bones of his body into pieces the size of mustard seed (sarṣapa). Thus, he never abandons the power of exertion in order to save beings.

³⁷⁶ By “body of the Dharma”, here we should understand the body of the scriptures. The Mppś seems to accept a twofold compilation of the Buddhist scriptures immediately after the Buddha’s death: the Hīnayāna texts were recited by the śrāvakas at the council of Rājagṛha presided over by Mahākāśyapa (cf. Traité, I, p. 88-106F); the Mahāyāna sūtras were compiled by an assembly of bodhisattvas assisted by Ānanda. Is it to be concluded that these bodhisattvas actually existed and that Maitreya especially was an historic individual? This is the opinion of certain historians such as H. Ui, Maitreya as an Historical Personage, Mélanges Lanman, 1928, p. 95-102; ZII, 1928, p. 215; G. Tucci, Some aspects of the doctrines of Maitreya[nātha] and Āsaṅga, 1930. Actually, the compiling of the Mahāyānasūtras seems to be pure fiction invented entirely with a sectarian goal by adepts of the Mahāyāna.

When the Mahāyānasūtras began to spread in the Buddhist communities at the beginning of our era, some śrāvakas rejected them as apocryphal. Then, to establish their authenticity, the Mahāyānists had recourse to all kinds of arguments.

Some are of purely speculative and subjective order. Even more than those of the Hīnayānists, the Mahāyāna doctrines are in harmony with the dharmatā, constituting the true path of salvation and the only vehicle of nirvāṇa; they are thus the authentic words of the Buddha (for this line of reasoning, see Traité, I, p. 80-82F, note). – Besides, continue the Mahāyānists, the main doctrines of the Mahāyāna are contained as a seed in the Hīnayāna sūtras and schools: the dharmānairātmya is already taught in the Saṃyuttanikāya, II, p. 17, III, p. 142 (Madh. avatāra, p. 22); the doctrine of the multiple teaching of the master, in conformity with current ideas (lokānuvartana) is already proposed by the Pūrvaśaila Hīnayānists (Madh. avatāra, p. 134); the Pūrvaśilas had the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra written in Prakrit, and the Mahāvastu, of Hīnayāna origin, already taught the stages in the career of the bodhisattva and the practice of the pāramitās (Grub mthaḥ of Mañjuśhoṣa in Wassilieff, Buddhismus, p. 264): the theory of the Ālayavijñāna, the central piece of the Idealist school, was already proposed in the Ekottarāgama, the āgamas of the Mahāsāṃghika and the Mahīśāsaka, and in the sūtras of the Ceylon school of the Tāmaparāṇīya (Samgraha, p. 26-28; Karmasiddhiprakaraṇa, p. 106; Siddhi, p. 178-182). It may be assumed further that all the doctrines of the Greater Vehicle were explained in the innumerable sūtras, which have now disappeared, of the Lesser Vehicle (Karmasiddhiprakaraṇa, p. 108).

As these subjective arguments seemed too weak, the Mahāyānists had recourse to historical fictions in order to establish their scriptures.

a. The Mahāyāna sūtras, they said, are as old as those of the Hīnayāna for the two vehicles co-exist: samapṛavṛttih (Sūtrālamkāra, I, 7, ed. Lévi, p. 3; Siddhi, p. 177). Immediately after his enlightenment, the Buddha preached the Greater Vehicle to the deities of the Trāyastriṃśa heaven and to the bodhisattvas (Foucher, Iconographie bouddhique, I, p. 86). The Buddha turned the wheel of Dharma three times: in the sermon at Benares on the four noble truths. He taught the reality of the elements of existence; in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra, he spoke implicitly of the non-reality of the elements of existence (lakṣaṇaniḥsvabhāvatā); finally, in other sūtras such as the Saṃdhinirmocana, he clearly and explicitly taught the non-reality of the elements from the absolute point of view (paramārthanirṇāṇasvabhāvatā): cf. Saṃdhinirmocana, VII, § 30, p. 206; Obermiller, Doctrine of P.P., p. 93, seq.

b. As we have seen at the beginning of this note, some Mahāyānists claim that the sūtras of the Greater Vehicle were compiled immediately after the death of the Buddha by an assembly of bodhisattvas. This council, a doublet of that of Rājagṛha, was held on the mythical mountain, unknown to geography, of Vimalasvabhāva, south of Rājgir; the compiling of the scriptures is attributed sometimes to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, sometimes to Maitreya, assisted by Ānanda.

Mppś, k. 100, p. 756b: “Some say that Mahākāśyapa, at the head of the bhikṣus, compiled the Tripiṭaka on Mount Grdhrakūṭa and that after the Buddha’s death, the great bodhisattvas Mañjuśrī and Maitreya, bringing in Ānanda, compiled the Greater Vehicle. Ānanda understood deeply the aspirations and behavior of beings; this is why he did not preach the Mahāyāna to the śrāvakas [of weak faculties].”

Tarkajvāla, Mdo XIX, 180a2-4: “The scriptures of the Mahāyāna are the words of the Buddha. The main compilers were Samanatabhādra, Mañjuśrī, Guhyakādhipati [or Vajrapāṇi], Maitreya and others. The śrāvakas were not the principal compilers of our (Mahāyānist) canon since the latter is not accessible to them.”

The same fiction has been repeated by the Tibetan historians Bu ston, II, p. 101, and Tāranātha, p. 62: Traditions says that, on the mountain called Vimalasvabhāva, south of Rājagṛha, in an assembly of a million bodhisattvas, Mañjuśrī repeated the Abhidharma; Maitreya, the Vinaya; and Vajrapāṇi the sūtras” (Bu ston). – “At the time [of Kāṇiśka], in different areas there appeared an innumerable crowd of holy individuals who taught the Mahāyāna; they had all heard the teaching from Āryāvalokiteśvara, Guhyādhipati, Mañjuśrī, Maitreya, etc.” (Tāranātha).

It is not hard to guess how this tradition was formed. In several sūtras of the Greater Vehicle, the Buddha entrusts his doctrine to one or another bodhisattva or to Ānanda. When the Mahāyānists wanted to hold their council, just like the śrāvakas, they called upon these sūtras in order to attribute to a given bodhisattva the compilation of their scriptures and the chairmanship of the alleged council. In this regard, a passage of Haribhadra in his Āloka, ed. Wogihara, p. 5, is especially instructive. Here is the text and the translation:

Tathāgataguhyaniṛdeśādhikāreṇa sarvathā bhādrakalpikasarvatathāgānām rūpakāyasaddharmakāyarakṣāyām kṛtādhikāratvād, Vajrapāṇyabhiṣekādau pratyarpitāsāsanatvāc, cānyeṣāṃ viśeṣavacanābhāvād, Aḍakavatīnīvāsī daśabhūmīśvaro Mahāvajradharaḥ sarvalokānugrahāya Prajñāpāramitāsūtrasaṃgītiṃ pratyadhiṣṭavanatam āryaMāitreyādīmahābodhisattvagaṇam “evam” ityādy āheti Pūrvacāryāḥ. Anye tv atraiva parīdanāparivarte “yatheyam Jambudvīpe Prajñāpāramitā pracariṣyati” tyādinā pratyarpitaprajñāpārā, itarvād āryānandāḥ saṃgītikāra iti manyante: “In a chapter of the Tathāgataguhyaniṛdeśa (T 312), responsibility is given [to Vajrapāṇi] to protect in every way the doctrinal Body [revealed by] the material body of all the Tathāgatas of the Blessed Era; at the beginning of the Vajrapāṇyabhiṣeka, the preaching [of this doctrine] was entrusted to him; finally, among the others adequate eloquence was absent; this is why the Elder masters say that it is [Vajrapāṇi], the great thunderbolt-bearer living in Aḍakavatī and master of the ten levels, recited, for the benefit of the entire world, beginning with the word evam [mayā śrutam], the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras to the group of great bodhisattvas, Maitreya, etc., who requested him. However, others think that the noble Ānanda compiled [these sūtras] for, in the same text, in the chapter of dedication, the Prajñāpāramitā is entrusted to him by these words: “Cause this Prajñāpāramitā to spread in Jambudvīpa.”

We may add, in order not to be incomplete, that according to a Japanese tradition of no historical value, Mañjuśrī and Maitreya released the Mahāyāna 116 years after the parinirvāṇa, and about 200 years after the parinirvāṇa, the edition of the Avatamsaka had completed this revelation. All these events would have been prior to Nāgārjuna (cf. R. Fujishima, Le Bouddhisme japonais 1888, p. 54).

c. When the great Mahāyāna scholars brought out their treatises, they resorted to various subterfuges to give more weight to their teachings. Nāgārjuna passed as, or was considered to be, a reincarnation of Ānanda (Laṅkāvatāra, ed. Nanjio, p. 286, and his Chinese translations T 671, k. 9, p. 569a; T 672, k. 6, p. 627c; Mahāmeghasūtra, T 387, k. 5, p. 1099-1100, studied by P. Demiéville in BEFEO, XXIV, 1924, p. 227-228, and [Sekhasutta].³⁷⁷ - Moreover, when Ānanda was preaching the seven minds of awakening (saṃbodhyaṅga) to the bhikkhus and had come to the mind of awakening called exertion (vīrya), the Buddha said to Ānanda: “Are you talking about the mind of awakening called exertion?” Ānanda replied “Yes, I am speaking about the mind of awakening called exertion.” Three times [the Buddha asked] the same question and [Ānanda made] the same reply. Then rising from his seat, the Buddha said to Ānanda: “People who know, love and practice exertion, there is nothing that they cannot obtain; they will infallibly succeed in reaching buddhahood.” It is thus by considering the benefits of exertion in many ways that one succeeds in increasing this energy.

Sometimes the Buddha speaks about zeal (chanda), sometimes of exertion (vīrya) and sometimes of conscientiousness (apramāda).³⁷⁸ Zeal is compared to a man who, on the point of making a journey, first decides to go. Exertion is compared to a man who, once on his journey, decides not to stop.

reproduced with variants in Madh. avatāra, p. 76, and Bu ston, II, p. 120); he received the Prajñās or the Avataṃsaka from the Nāgas whom he visited in their subterranean palace (Harṣacarita, p. 250; Long chou p’ou sa tchouan, T 2047, p. 184c, tr. M. Wallese, The Life of Nāgārjuna, Asia Major, Introd. Vol., p. 336-447).

According to Tāranātha, p. 58, the bodhisattva Mañjuśrī took the form of a bhikṣu and went to the palace of the king Candragupta in the land of Oudīśa; there he left a book thought to be the Aṣṭasāhasrikā or the Tattvasaṃgraha.

More widespread is the opinion according to which the great Mahāyāna teachers wrote under the inspiration of bodhisattvas. Asaṅga used the supernatural powers of the Lesser Vehicle to go to Tuṣita heaven where the bodhisattva Maitreya was dwelling; he questioned him and received from him the teaching on emptiness according to the Greater Vehicle (Paramātha, Vie de Vasubandhu, T 2049, p. 188c); Asaṅga taught in a monastery in the neighborhood of Ayodhyā during the night, he went to the palace of the Tuṣita gods and received from Maitreya the holy texts, notably the Yogacaryābhūmi, the Mahāyanasūtrālamkāra and the Madhyāntavibhaṅga (Hiuan tsang, Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 5, p. 896b; tr. Beal, I, p. 226; Watters, I, p. 355-356). The Tibetans, who have kept and developed this tradition (cf. Bu ston, II, p. 137-139; Taranātha, p. 110-112) consider Maitreya to be the real author of the works composed by Asaṅga (Bu ston, I, p. 53).

But the bodhisattvas who inspire the Mahāyāna scholars are nowhere presented as being historical individuals who actually existed. They do not leave the bhūmis where they dwell and are content to send, on some occasions, emanated bodies to teach their disciples. Here too, Haribhadra puts things very precisely in his Āloka, ed. Wogihāra, p. 75: “This is the interpretation given by masters, Asaṅga, etc.; it is authoritative. According to tradition, although he knew the meaning of all of scripture and had obtained experience of it, Asaṅga was unable to understand the meaning of the Prajñāpāramitā due to the large number of repetitions and, there where there are no repetitions, because he did not see how to separate the various members [of the compounds]. He was very sad about it. Then the bhagavat Maitreya commented on the Prajñāpāramitā for him and gave him the treatise called Abhisamayālamkāra. Having understood this treatise, ārya Asaṅga, master Vasubandhu, etc., made a commentary on it. But enough tedious passages!”

³⁷⁸ Vīrya is often combined with other good qualities: chanda, virīya, citta, vīmaṃsā (Dīgha, III, p. 77); kusalānaṃ, dhammānaṃ, uppādāya chandaṃ janati vīryamati virīyaṃ ārabhati, etc. (Dīgha, III, p. 221; Aṅguttara, II, p. 15; IV, p. 462).

Conscientiousness is compared to a man who is careful that his journey does not slow down. From this we know that zeal gives rise to exertion, that exertion in turn gives rise to conscientiousness and that conscientiousness in turn produces all the good dharma including arriving at the state of buddhahood.

Moreover, the bodhisattva who wants to escape from birth, old age, sickness and death and who also wants to save beings always needs exertion (vīrya), one-pointedness (ekacitta) and conscientiousness (apramāda). When a person holding a pot of oil (tailapātra) is able to pass through a large crowd [without spilling any oil], his attentiveness and his carefulness are worthy of praise and profit (ślokalābha). When a man arrives safe and sound across difficult passages, on a sloping bridge or on a mountain path, with the help of a suspended rope or riding on a goat, during the present lifetime he gets praise and profit thanks to this attentiveness and his carefulness. It is the same for the person who seeks the Path with exertion; by means of his attentiveness and his carefulness, he gets whatever he wishes for.

Moreover, a stream of water is able to open up a passage through the middle of a rock, and it is the same for the conscientious mind; by particularly cultivating skilful means (upāya), by always practicing non-slackening, it is able to destroy the mountain of afflictions (kleśa) and fetters (saṃyojana).

Moreover, the bodhisattva has the following three thoughts (manasikāra): If I myself do not act, I will not obtain the reward (vipākaphala); that which I myself will not have done will not come to me from others; that which I will have done myself will never be lost. Thanks to these reflections, he will inevitably be energetic; to attain Buddhahood, he will be diligent, active and conscientious.

[The lazy bhikṣu admonished by a demon].³⁷⁹ – A young forest monk (āraṇyaka), alone in the forest, was lazy in practicing dhyāna. In this forest there was a deva, a disciple of the Buddha; he entered into the body of a corpse, approached the young monk singing and dancing, with this stanza:

[174a] In the forest, little bhikṣu,

Why are you lazy?

If you do not fear me when I come during the day

I will return again during the night.

The frightened bhikṣu arose from his seat and reflected on himself. During the night, he fell asleep again. The deva came to him [in the form of a monster] with ten heads, spitting fire from the mouths, fangs and claws like swords, eyes red as fire. Looking at the bhikṣu, he said that he would chase and grab him [and added]: “In this place, it is not allowed to be lazy. What are you doing there?” Very scared, the bhikṣu began to reflect: he meditated on the Dharma with special vigor and obtained arhathood. Thus, by means of effort on oneself, exertion, conscientiousness, one can attain the fruit of the path.

*** **

Moreover, by means of exertion, while sacrificing his life, the bodhisattva earns a reward (vipākaphala); in the four postures (īryāpatha) – sitting (niṣadana), lying down (śayyā), walking (gamana) or standing (sthāna) – he always demonstrates exertion. He prefers to lose his life rather than abandon practice of the Path. It is like in the case of a fire where one throws both pitcher and water into the fire: preoccupied only with extinguishing the fire, one does not spare the pitcher. A hermit (rṣi), taught this stanza to his disciples:

By means of decisiveness (niścaya) and spiritual joy

One is assured of a great reward.

When you will obtain that which you wish for,

You will understand their value.

For all of these reasons, consideration of the benefits which exertion presents can make the exertion increase.

Finally, the bodhisattva cultivates ascetic practices (duṣkaracaryā) and, when a person comes to ask him for his head, his eyes, his marrow or his skull (cf. Traité, I, p. 143F, n. 1), he gives them saying: “Even for me, who possess patience (kṣānti), exertion (vīrya), wisdom (prajñā) and the power of skilful means (upāyabala), it is suffering to undergo [torments]; how much more painful for those stupid people (mūḍha) who live in the three places of suffering (vinipāta)? In the interest of these beings, I must then make energetic efforts to attain the state of Buddhahood as soon as possible and then I will save them.”

CHAPTER XXVII: THE VIRTUE OF EXERTION (p. 946F)

I. THE NATURE OF EXERTION.

Question. – What are the characteristics of exertion (vīryalakṣaṇa)?

[174b] Answer. – Dynamism in activity, ease in enterprises, firmness of will, ardor of spirit, perseverance in action: these five things constitute the characteristics of exertion.

Moreover, according to the words of the Buddha, the characteristic of exertion is bodily and mental non-withdrawal (kāyikacaitasikāśramsanatā).

[Pañcāvudhajātaka].³⁸⁰ – In a former lifetime, the Buddha Śākyamuni was once a merchant chief; at the head of some merchants, he went into a mountainous and difficult region where a rākṣasa demon stopped

³⁸⁰ In its version of the Pañcāvudhajātaka, the Mppś follows closely the version of Tsa pao tsang king, T 203 (no. 97), k. 8, p. 487b-c (tr. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 98-99): “Once there was a vast desert region between the kingdom of Kia che (Kāśi) and the kingdom of Pi t’i hi (Videha) where there lived a wicked demon called Cha tch’a lou (85 and 4; 30 and 2; 108 and 11 = Śleṣaloma, and not Ṣaḍaru as Chavannes suggests), who blocked the road so that nobody could pass. There was a merchant named Che tseu (Siṃha) who, leading five hundred merchants, wanted to go on this road.” Then follows the story of the struggle between the demon and Siṃha: Siṃha shot his bow and arrows and his sword, which all pierced the demon’s belly; then he advanced to fight with his fists, but his hands, his feet and his head got stuck. To the demon’s jibes, Siṃha replied with the gāthās: “ There remains only my exertion for what is good which will not stick to you; as long as this exertion does not leave me, the fight that I will put up will not end.” The demon then let him go and set the five hundred merchants free. At that time Siṃha was the Buddha, and Cha tch’a lou was the demon of that desert region.

A more developed version, but without indication of place or of individuals, occurs in the Kieou tsa p’i yu king, T 206 (no. 1), k. 1, p. 510b-511a (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 347-351): the two enemies exchange a dialogue in verse, the yakṣa is converted and receives the five precepts. The version of the Mppś has passed into the King kiu yi siang, T 2121, k. 43, p. 225b, word for word.

Finally, the legend has been incorporated into the Pāli jātaka, Pañcāvudhajātaka (no. 55), I, p. 272-275, of which here is a brief summary: The bodhisattva was the son of king Brahmadatta; he was called Pañcavudha ‘Five-weapons’ because on the day of his birth, eight brāhmanas had predicted that he would owe his fame to his feats of arms. He studied at Takṣaśilā, in the kingdom of Gandhāra and, at the end of his studies, he took up a series of five weapons. Returning home, half-way between Takṣaśilā and Benares, in the middle of the jungle, he met the yakṣa Silesaloma ‘Sticky Hairs’. He fought with him and in succession launched his arrows (sara), his sword (khagga), his lance (kaṇaya) and his club (muggara); but all his weapons remained stuck in the yakṣa’s hair (lomesu allīyimsu). Pañcavudha then engaged him body to body; stuck to the yakṣa by his five weapons, the prince refused to surrender, and the yakṣa, marveling at the prince’s exertion, was converted and received the five precepts.

The bodhisattva, called Pañcavudha here, is called Siṃha, ‘Lion’, in the Tsa pao tsang king. Actually, Siṃha is the surname given to the bodhisattva by the yakṣa who, in congratulating him, compared him to a man-lion: Mānava, purisasīho tvaṃ!

him, saying: “Stop! Do not move; I do not allow you to go on.” The chief of the merchants struck him with his right fist, but his fist remained glued to the demon and could not be detached; then he struck him with his left fist but it, too, could not be disengaged; next, he kicked him with his right foot, but the foot remained stuck; he kicked him with his left foot, but the same thing happened; he butted him with his head, but his head was stuck also. The demon asked him: “Now what are you going to do? Will you give in finally?” The bodhisattva answered: “Although the five parts [of my body] are fettered, never will my mind give in to you. I will fight you by the power of my exertion and never surrender to you.” The demon, amused, said to himself: “This man’s courage is very great”, and speaking to the merchant, said: “The power of your exertion is great; you definitely will not give in; I will let you go.”

The ascetic acts in the same way [in order to conquer] the good dharmas (kuśaladharmā). During the first, second and fourth quarters of the night, he recites the sūtras, practices meditation and seeks the true nature of dharmas. Not obstructed by fetters (saṃyojana), his body and mind are free of withdrawing: this is the nature of exertion.

Exertion is a mental event characterized by diligent and unceasing action. It follows the mind (cittānusārin) and arises with it (cittasahaja). Sometimes it includes investigation and analysis (savitarkasavicāra); sometimes it does not involve investigation, but only analysis (avitarka savicāramātra); sometimes it involves neither investigation nor analysis (avitarkāvicāra). As is said fully in the Abhidharma, diligent and relentless cultivation of all the good dharmas is called exertion. Among the five faculties (indriya), it is called the faculty of exertion (vīryendriya); the progression of the faculties (indriyavardhana) is called power of exertion (vīryabala); inasmuch as it opens the mind, it is called enlightenment of exertion (vīryasaṃbodhi); inasmuch as it comes to buddhahood and nirvāṇa, it is called right effort (samyagvyāyama); inasmuch as it diligently fixes the mind on the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), it is called the factor of exertion (vīryāṅga); among the four infallible knowledges (pratisaṃvid), it is the gateway of energy (vīryadvāra); among the four bases of miraculous power (rddhipāda), exertion is zeal (chanda); among the six virtues, it is the virtue of exertion (vīryapāramitā).³⁸¹

Question. – Earlier you praised exertion and here you are speaking of the characteristics of exertion, but what exertion is it?

Answer. – It is the exertion that is applied to [reuniting] all the good dharmas.

II. THE VIRTUE OF EXERTION.

Question. – But here in a treatise dedicated to the virtue of exertion, it is necessary to speak of the virtue of exertion; why do you speak about exertion being applied to all good dharmas?

Answer. – From the time of his first resolve (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisattva applies himself with exertion to all the good dharmas; then little by little he acquires the virtue of exertion.

[174c] Question. – This too much about exertion in regard to all good dharmas; talk about the virtue of exertion now, for we already know exertion in regard to all good dharmas.

Answer. – Exertion that aims at obtaining the state of buddhahood is called virtue; exertion that has all the other good dharmas in view is called just exertion and not virtue.

Question. – Why is diligent application to all good dharmas not called virtue of exertion and why it is only the exertion of the bodhisattva that is called virtue?

Answer. – Virtue (pāramitā) indicates arrival at the other shore (pāram ita). Now people of the world (loka), śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas cannot practice the virtues completely. Therefore there is no virtue of exertion in them.

Moreover, these people do not have great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) or great compassion (mahākaruṇā); they abandon beings and do not seek the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), the eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā), omniscience (sarvajñāna), the infallible knowledges (pratisaṃvid), the liberations (vimokṣa), the immense body (apramāṇakāya), the immense rays (apramāṇarāśmi), the immense sounds (apramāṇasvara), the immense morality, concentrations and wisdom (apramāṇaśīlasamādhiprajñā). This is why exertion among men is not described as virtue.

Moreover, with unceasing exertion the bodhisattva one-pointedly (ekacittena) seeks buddhahood; such effort merits the name of virtue of patience. Thus the bodhisattva Hao che (Mahātyāgavat)³⁸² seeking the philosopher’s stone (cintamani), filtered the water of the ocean using his nerves and his bones, and did not stop working before having found this philosopher’s stone; he gave it to beings to ease their sufferings. The bodhisattva thus accomplishes difficult things; this is his virtue of exertion.

Moreover, when the bodhisattva who considers exertion as fundamental (pradhāna) also practices the other five virtues, his is truly practicing the virtue of exertion of the bodhisattva. Just as a whole collection of medicines (sarvabhaiṣajyasāmagrī) is needed to cure a serious illness, so exertion alone [is not enough] for the bodhisattva. If he uses his exertion alone without practicing the other five virtues, he would not be exercising “the virtue of exertion” [which characterizes] the bodhisattva.

Moreover, by practicing exertion, the bodhisattva does not lean on material benefits (āmiṣārtha), wealth, nobility or power (sthāma); he does not pursue his own personal interest, or rebirth among the gods, cakravartin kings, as Brahmā or as Śakra devendra; he does not seek nirvāṇa for himself; he wants only to reach the state of buddhahood and do good for beings. This is the nature [of disinterestedness] that constitutes the virtue of exertion in the bodhisattva.

Moreover, the exertion of the bodhisattva is applied in the practice of all good dharmas and mainly in great compassion (mahākaruṇā). The good father loves his son; if he has only one son and the latter contracts a serious illness, he one-pointedly (ekacittena) seeks a remedy to cure his sickness; thus the energetic bodhisattva in whom loving-kindness predominates will not cease until he has saved all beings.

³⁸² For Hao che or Ta che (Mahātyāgavat), see references above, Traité, I, p. 265F, n. 1.

Finally, in the energy that characterizes the bodhisattva, knowledge of the true nature of things (satyalakṣaṇajñāna) is a major element. Practicing the six virtues [in these conditions] constitutes the virtue of exertion belonging to the bodhisattva.

Question. – The true nature of dharmas is unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) and [175a] non-fabricated (anabhisamskṛta). Now exertion is conditioned and ‘fabricated’. Why would the true nature be the main element?

Answer. – Although he knows that the true nature is unconditioned and unfabricated, by virtue of his original vow (maulapraṇidhāna) and his great compassion (mahākaruṇā), the bodhisattva wishes to save beings. This is why, in the unfabricated, he uses the power of his exertion to save and liberate all beings.

Moreover, the true nature of all dharmas is unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), non-manufactured (anabhisamskṛta), like nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasama), without one-ness (aneka) or duality (advaya). Why then do you claim that this true nature is different from the nature of exertion? Actually, you do not understand the nature of things.

[THE WORLD OF TRANSMIGRATION].³⁸³

Moreover, the bodhisattva sees that the beings of the threefold world (traiḍhātuka) and the five destinies (pañcagati) are, each of them, deprived of happiness.

God realm. – The gods of the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu), who enjoy the absorptions (samāpatti) and are attached to them, do not understand that when their life is over they will fall back into the desire realm and will take on the form of a bird or animal. In the same way, the gods of the form realm (rūpadhātu), having fallen from the pure abodes (śuddhāvāsa), will again conceive sensual desire and will abide in the impure spheres. Finally, the six classes of gods of the desire realm (kāmadhātu), attached to the five desirable objects, will fall into the hells (niraya) and be subjected to all the sufferings.

Human realm. – In the human destiny (manuṣyagati), the bodhisattva sees beings who, by practicing the ten meritorious actions, have obtained a human body. The human life involves many sufferings and but little joy; when their life is over, people often fall into the unfortunate destinies (durgati).

Animal realm. – The bodhisattva sees the animals (tiryak) undergoing all the torments: they are made to gallop by blows of the whip or stick; they are made to make long journeys carrying burdens; their harness is damaged; they are branded with hot iron. People who, in their former lives, have trussed them up, whipped them or been guilty of crimes of this kind, assume the animal form of an elephant (haja), a horse (aśva), a cow (go), a sheep (eḍaka) or a deer (mrga). – If sensual desires (kāmarāga), passion and ignorance (avidyā) were predominant in them, they are reborn as goose (haṃsa), a duck (kāraṇḍava), a peacock (barhin, matūra), a cakra bird (cakravāka), a pigeon (kapota), a cock (kukkuta), a parrot (śuka) or a blackbird; thus they become one of the hundred thousand kinds of birds. If they are guilty of lust, their body becomes covered with hairs and feathers; their plumage is fine and smooth; their beak, big and wide; thus they cannot distinguish touch (sparśa) and taste (rasa). – If hatred (dveṣa, pratigha) is predominant, they take the form of a poisonous snake (āsiviṣa), a scorpion (vr̥ścika), a spider (lūtā), a bee (madhukara), a myriapod (śatapadī) or a poisonous insect. – If delusion (moha) is abundant, they are reborn as a kind of worm (kīla), a butterfly, a dung-beetle, an ant (pipīlika), an owl (ulūka), among the insects and stupid birds. – If pride (abhimāna) and anger abound, they take the form of a savage beast: lion (simha), tiger (vyāghra) or leopard (dvīpin). – As a result of stupid conceit (mithyāmāna), they re reborn as an ass (gardabha), a pig (sūkara) or a camel (uṣṭra). – As a result of greed (mātsarya), envy (īrṣyā), impulsiveness and haste, they take the form of an ape (markaṭa), a long-tailed monkey (vānara) or a bear (rikṣa). – Guilty of evil desires (mithyārāga), hatred and jealousy (īrṣyā), they take the form of a cat (mārjāra), fox or field-tiger. – As a result of shamelessness (anapatrāpya), lack of self-respect (āhrīkya) and gluttony (grddhitva), they take the form of a bird such as a crow (kāka), a magpie, an owl or a vulture (grdhra). – If they have deceived honest people (sajjanāvamāna), they take the body of a rooster (kukkuṭa), a dog (kukkura), a jackal (śhrigāla), etc. – Very generous (mahādātṛi) but short-tempered (krodhana) and crafty (kuṭilacitta), they take the form of a nāga. – Very generous (mahātyāgin), if they have tormented beings by their arrogance (cittonnati) and their tyranny (darpa), they take the form of a golden-winged bird (garuḍa). – As a result of all these passions [175b] (saṃyojana) and all these actions (karman), they undergo the sufferings reserved for animals (tiryak), birds (paśin) or quadrupeds (paśu).

Courses through the five destinies. – The bodhisattva who possesses the divine eye (divyacakṣus) sees beings wander through the five destinies and whirl about in them. They die among the gods and are reborn among men; they die among men and are reborn among the gods; they die among the gods and are reborn in hell; they die in hell and are reborn among the gods; they die among the gods and are reborn among the pretas; they die among the pretas and are again reborn among the gods; they die among the gods and are reborn among the animals; they die among the animals and are reborn among the gods; they die among the gods and again are reborn among the gods. And it is the same for those in hells (nāraka), the pretas and the animals.

Courses through the three realms. – They die in kāmadhātu and are reborn in rūpadhātu; they die in rūpadhātu and reborn in kāmadhātu; they die in kāmadhātu and are reborn in ārūpydhātu; they die in ārūpydhātu and are reborn in kāmadhātu; they die in kāmadhātu and are reborn in kāmadhātu. It is the same for rūpadhātu and ārūpydhātu.

Courses through the hells. – They die in Saṃjīva hell and are reborn in Kālasūtra hell; they die in Kālasūtra hell and are reborn in Saṃjīva hell; they die in Saṃjīva hell and are again reborn in Saṃjīva hell. And it is the same for the other hells from Saṃghāta up to Avīchi.

They die in the hell of blazing coals (kukūla) and are reborn in the hell of excrement (kuṇapa); they die in the hell of excrement and are reborn in the hell of blazing coals; they die in the hell of blazing coals and are again reborn in the hell of blazing coals. And it is the same for the other hells, from the hell of the blazing forest (madīptavana) up to the Mahāpadma.

Courses through the five wombs. – In the course of their successive rebirths, they die among the aṇḍaja (beings born from eggs) and are reborn among the jarāyuja (beings born from the chorion); they die among the jarāyuja and are reborn among the aṇḍaja; they die among the aṇḍaja and are again reborn among the aṇḍaja. And it is the same for the jarāyuja, the Sṃsvedaja (beings born from moisture) and the upapāduka (apparitional beings).

Courses through the four continents. – They die in Jambudvīpa and are reborn in Pūrvavideha; they die in Pūrvavideha and are reborn in Jambudvīpa; they die in Jambudvīpa and are again reborn in Jambudvīpa. And it is the same for Aparagodānīya and Uttarakuru.

Courses through the classes of gods. – They die among the Cāturmahārājikas and are reborn among the Trāyastriṃśas; they die among the Trāyastriṃśas and are reborn among the Cāturmahārājikas; they die among the Cāturmahārājikas and are again reborn among the Cāturmahārājikas. And it is the same [for the other gods of kāmadhātu], from the Trāyastriṃśas to the Paranirmitavaśavartins.

They die among the Brahmakāyikas and are reborn among the Brahmāpurohitas; they die among the Brahmāpurohitas and are reborn among the Brahmakāyikas; they die among the Brahmakāyikas and are again reborn among the Brahmakāyikas. And it is the same for the Brahmāpurohita, [Mahābrahman]; Parīttabha, Apramāṇabha, Ābhāsvara; Parīttasubha, Apramāṇasubha, Śubhaktāna; Anabhakra, Puṇyaprasava, Brhatphala; [gods belonging] to the place of infinite space (ākāśānantyāyatana), to the place of infinite consciousness (viññāṇānantyāyatana), to the place of nothing at all (ākīṃcanyāyatana) and to the place of the neither with perception nor without perception (naīvasaṃjñāṇasaṃjñāyatana) gods. They die among the neither with perception nor without perception gods and are reborn in Avīci hell. Thus they are reborn in the five destinies successively.

Having seen that, the bodhisattva produces a mind of great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta): “I am of no use to these beings; even if I gave them [all] the [175c] happiness in the world, this happiness would end up in sorrow. It is only by means of the eternal happiness of the state of buddhahood and nirvāṇa that I can benefit everyone. How can I benefit them? I will use great exertion until I have obtained true wisdom; when I have attained true wisdom I will understand the true nature of dharma and, with the help of the other virtues, I will do good for beings.” This is the virtue of exertion belonging to the bodhisattva.

*Preta destiny.*³⁸⁴ – Then the bodhisattva considers the pretas. As a result of the hunger (kṣudh-) and thirst (pipāsā) that torment them, their two eyes are sunken, their hair is long. They run about from east to west [to find drink], but when they approach some water, the demon guardians of the water chase them away with blows from iron rods or, if there are no guardians,³⁸⁵ the water dries up by itself; when it rains, the rain changes into coals. – There are pretas who always suffer from fire like at the end of the kalpa, when fire comes out of the mountains. – There are emaciated pretas who run around like madmen; their bodies are covered with long disheveled hair. – There are pretas who feed endlessly on excrement (gūṭha), spit (niṣṭhīvana), vomit (vānta) or the left-over water from laundry; sometimes they go to latrines and stand on guard there waiting for impure (asūci) liquid. – There are pretas who are always looking for the blood of a woman in child-birth and who drink it; their aspect is like a flaming tree; their throat is like a needle (sūcicchidra); if they are given water, a thousand years would not be enough for them [to swallow it]. – There are pretas who break their own head, take the brains and lick it. – For some pretas, it is as if they had the iron chains of the black mountain (kālagiri) around their neck; hitting their head on the ground, they ask for pity and take refuge near their guardians (bandhanapālaka). – There are pretas who, in their previous existences, spoke harmful words (pāruṣyavāda) and made coarse comments to people; beings hate them and look upon them as enemies. For all these faults they fall into the preta destiny and suffer all kinds of punishments there.

³⁸⁴ For the torments of the pretas, see Saṃyutta, II, p. 255 (tr. Woodward, Kindred Sayings, II, p. 270). The Milinda, p. 294, distinguishes four kinds of pretas: 1) those who eat vomit (vantāsikā); 2) those who are hungry and thirsty (khuppiṇā);

3) those who are consumed by thirst (nijjhāmatāṇhikā); 4) those who live on alms (paradatt’ āpajīvino).

*The eight great hells.*³⁸⁶ – The bodhisattva sees the eight great hells and the ten thousand types of torments [encountered there].

³⁸⁵ The existence of the demon guardians is the subject of debate; see Kośa, III, p. 152-153.

³⁸⁶ Buddhist concepts of the hells vary over time:

A. The early and canonical sources of the Theravādins, such as the Bālaṇḍita and the Devadūtasutta, accept the following:

1) There are seven great hells, the names of which are not given except for the Avīci: Majjhima, III, p. 166-167; 182-183; Aṅguttara, I, p. 141.

2) The great hell (mahāniraya) has four gates each opening onto four secondary hells: Gūṭhaniraya, Kukkukāniraya, Sīmbalivana, Asipattavana: they are all surrounded by the river Khārodakā: Majjhima, III, p. 184-186.

[For the corresponding Chinese sources, some of which show an evolution in the ideas, see Tchong a han, T 26, no. 199, k. 53, p. 760a-761a; ibid., no. 64, k. 12, p. 504c-505a; T’ie tch’eng ni li king, T 42, p. 827c-828b; Ni li king, T 86, p. 907-908b; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 24, p. 675b-676b].

3) Finally there are ten cold hells, the names of which are known and cited in the following order: Abbuda, Nirabbuda, Ababa, Aṭaṭa, Ahaha, Kumuda, Sogandhika, Uppala, Puṇḍarika, Paduma: cf. Saṃyutta, I, p. 152; Aṅguttara, V, p. 173; Suttanipāta, III, 10, p. 126. – This list of ten cold hells is repeated by the Cosmography annexed to the Chinese Dīrghāgama (T 1, k. 30, p. 125c) and related texts (T 23, k. 2, p. 286c; T 24, k. 4, p. 329a). This is not surprising; actually, the Chinese Dīrghāgama is a text of the Dharmagupta school (cf. Watanabe, in Hoernle, Remains, I, p. 18; Bagchi, Canon bouddhique, I, p. 202-203; Przyluski, Concile, p. 354; F. Weller, Der Ueberlieferung des älteren buddhistischen Schrifttums, Asia Major, V, 1928, p. 180). On the other hand, the Dharmagupta school descends in a direct line, by the intermediary of the Mahīśāsakas, from the old sthāvira Buddhism, the Pāli scriptures of which are regarded as representing the authentic traditions (cf. Dīpavamsa, V, v. 45, 47; Mahāvamsa, V, v. 6, 8; Paramārtha, in P. Demiéville, L’origine des Sectes, MCB, I, 1931, p. 23, 59-62; Bhavaya in Walleser, Sekten, p. 81; Yi tsiang, tr. Takakusu, p. 20). It is, therefore, quite natural that a text of the Dharmagupta school would have adopted the list proposed by the Theravādins.

B. An evolution in the ideas on hell is marked by the more recent sources, notably the Sanskrit sources derived from the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika school:

1) There are eight great hells (instead of seven), each having a name and a given type of punishment; these are, in descending order, Saṃjīva, Kālasūtra, Saṃghāta, Raurava, Mahāraurava, Tapana, Prāṭāpana and Avīcī: cf. Divyāvadāna, p. 67; Avadānaśataka, I, p. 4; Dharmasamuccaya, chap. 121; Mahāvvyutpatti, no. 4920-4927; Kośa, III, p. 149. - This list of the eight great hells was adopted by the Cosmography of the Dīrghāgama and related texts (T 1, k. 19, p. 121c5-8; T 23, k. 2, p. 283b16-19; T 24, k. 2, p. 320c3-5). - It has also passed into the Ceylonese sources, but with several variants in the order and nomenclature; cf. Pāli Jātaka, V, p. 266, 271: Sañjīva, Kālasutta, Saṃghāta, Jālaroruva, Dhūmaroruva, Mahāvīci, Tapana, Patāpana.

2) Each of these eight great hells opens into sixteen secondary hells, called utsada (thus there are 8 x 16 = 128 utsadas). But the distribution of these sixteen utsadas differs according to the source:

a. At the four cardinal points of each hell there are four utsadas: i) the kukūla, blazing coals; ii) the kuṇapa, mire of excrement; iii) three places of suffering forming a single utsada: kṣuramāra, path of knives; asipattravana, forest the leaves of which are swords; ayaḥśalmalivāna, forest of spines; iv) the river Vaitaraṇī of boiling water. Cf. Mahāvvyutpatti, no. 4937-4942; P'i p'o cha, T 1545, k. 172, p. 855a; Kośa, III, p. 150-151; Li che a p'i t'an louen, T 1644, k. 8, p. 211c.

b. Each great hell is completed by sixteen small utsada hells, each having a different name: Black sand; Boiling excrement; Five hundred nails; Hunger; Thirst; Copper pot; Many copper pots; Iron millstone; Pus and blood; Proofing fire; River of ashes; Ball of iron (ayoguḍa); Beheading axe; Wolf; Forest of swords; Cold water. Cf. Cosmography of the Chinese Dīrghāgama and related texts: T 1, k. 19, p. 121c8; T 23, k. 2, p. 283c; T 24, k. 2, p. 320c6.

3) Finally, the Sanskrit texts list eight cold hells (instead of ten) and the sūtra texts have consequently been modified. These śātaniraya are called: Arbuda, Nirarbuda, Aṭaṭa, Hahava, Huhuva, Utpala, Padma and Mahāpadma. Cf. Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1278. k. 48, p. 351c; Pie tsa a han, T 100, no. 276, k. 14, p. 470b (which corresponds to Suttanipāta, III,10; p. 126); Divyāvadāna, p. 67; Avadānaśataka, I, p. 4; Mahāvvyutpatti, no. 4920-4936; Dharmasamuccaya, chap. 122; Kośa, III, p. 154; Mppś, T 1509, k. 13, p. 158b; k. 16, p. 176c-177a; P'i p'o cha, T 1545, k. 172, p. 866a. In the present passage, the Mppś seems to be derivative from Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika sources listed above under B, but does not follow them slavishly. Like the Mahāvastu, I, p. 244, l. 19, it accepts eight great hells and sixteen utsada or small hells. The eight great hells are the Saṃvida, etc.; the sixteen small hells are made up of the traditional eight cold hells, Arbuda, etc., and the eight hot hells, the names of which may be restored as: Kukūla, blazing coals; Kuṇapa, excrement; Ādīptavana, burning forest; Asipattravana, forest of swords; Kṣuramārga, path of knives; Ayaḥśalmalivāna, forest of iron spines; Khārodakanadī, salty river; Tāmrastambha, copper stake.

Other sources not listed here also show a certain interest in the study of the Buddhist hells; not to forget the Śaḍgatikmarikā, st. 1-37, ed. Mus, p. 216-243, we also mention Divyāvadāna, p. 375-376; Mahāvastu, I, p. 4-27 (Maudgalyāyana's visit to the hells); Kāraṇḍavyūha, ed. S. B. Samasrami, 1873 (Maitreya's visit to the hells); a passage from the Saddharmasmṛtyupasthāna cited in Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 69-76; Nāgārjuna's Suhrlekha, T 1674, p. 753a (tr. H. Wenzel, Friendly Epistle, JPTS, 1886, p. 21-24; S. Beal, The Suhrlekha or Friendly Letter, 1892, p. 29-31).

Among the works: L. Feer, L'Enfer indien. JA, 1892-93; B. C. Law, Heaven and Hell in Buddhist Perspective, 1925; Kirfel, Kosmographie, p. 198-206; Przyluski, Aśoka, p. 120-160.

1) In the great Saṃjīva hell, the damned fight one another; aggressive and pugnacious, they wield sharp knives and slash one another; they are pierced with lances and skewered with iron forks; they are struck with iron bars; they are struck with iron rods; they are thrashed by iron shovels and slashed with sharp knives; they are torn apart with iron claws; they are all covered in blood.³⁸⁷ Broken by these torments, they lose consciousness but, as a result of their previous actions, cold wind blows on them and, when the guards call them, they come back to life: this is why this hell is called Saṃjīva. When they revive (prakṛtistha) they again undergo the [same] torments. Beings who, in their previous existences, liked to kill living beings, cows, sheep, birds, or other animals, or who killed one another for a field, a house, a slave, a woman or child, a kingdom or money, are found there; as punishment for all the killings they have done, they suffer thus.

2) The bodhisattva sees the damned in the great Kālasūtra hell. Wicked rākṣasas, guardians of the hell (nirayapāla) and worker-demons ceaselessly [176a] measure the damned with a black cord (kālasūtra); with an iron axe (kuṭhāra) they put them to death and cut them to pieces; they shorten what is long (dīrgha), they lengthen what is short (hrasva); they round off what is square (varga), they square off what is round (vr̥tta); they cut their arms and legs, tear out their ears and noses and cut off their hands and feet with a great iron saw (krakaca); they amputate them and cut them up. They cut their flesh into pieces and weigh the quarters of meat. In the course of their earlier lives, these unfortunate people used to slander honest people and cause innocent people to die by means of lies (mṛṣāvāda), harmful words (pāruṣyavāda), malicious gossip (paiśūnyavāda) and idle comments (saṃbhinnapālāpa). Or else, as perverted officials, they were cruel, violent, dishonest and harmful. It is as a result of their wrong-doings and calumnies that they undergo these punishments.

3) The bodhisattva sees the great Saṃghāta hell³⁸⁸ where wicked rākṣasas, guardians of hell (nirayapāla), take on all kinds of shapes: they become oxen (go), horses (aśva), pigs (sūkara), sheep (edaka), deer (mṛga), dogs (kukkura), foxes (lomaśin?), tigers (vyāghra), wolves (vr̥ka), lions (siṃha), donkeys, big birds, eagles (garutmat), and vultures (grdhra). Having thus taken on the heads of birds and animals, they come to devour, gnaw at and tear up the damned. - Two mountains come together and a great hot iron wheel rolls in a groove on top of the damned who are broken into pieces. - Then, in a hot iron mortar they are beaten and crushed like grapes (draṅṣā) or peaches that are squeezed or like pressed oil (taila). Their torn flesh is gathered into piles as on a threshing-floor; torrents of blood flow out; the eagles, vultures, tigers and wolves begin to fight over it. In their previous lives, these unfortunates had frequently killed oxen, horses, pigs, sheep, deer, does, rabbits, tigers, wolves, lions, donkeys and big birds, and so all these animals that harbor resentment against them take on their bird or animal forms and come to torment these damned. - Those who have exploited their power to oppress the weak suffer the punishment of the coming together of the two mountains. Those who, out of greed (rāga), hatred (dveṣa), stupidity (moha) or fear (bhaya), have not followed rules of good conduct or even those who have destroyed the proper way and perverted the Holy Dharma suffer the punishment of being crushed in the groove of the hot iron wheel and ground up in the hot iron mortar.

³⁸⁷ Here the Mppś does not mention the torture of the five bonds (pañcavidhabandhana) that characterizes the first hell according to Majjhima, III, p. 166; Divyāvadāna, p. 376; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 53, p. 760b.

³⁸⁸ Saṃghāta means "accumulation, assemblage, squeezing". That is why three punishments are imagined in this hell: the damned are assembled in a mass (saṃghāta) and massacred (cf. Śaḍgatikārikā, no. 10); they are crushed between two mountains which come together (saṃghan); they are pounded in an iron mortar (these last two torments in Suhrlekha, tr. Wenzel, p. 22).

4-5) The fourth and fifth [great hells] are Raurava and Mahārauva. The damned who are in these great hells have as guardians rākṣasas with heads yellow (pīṭa) like gold; their eyes shoot out fire and they are clothed in red cloaks (lohitavastra); their flesh is solid; their gait is as swift as the wind; their hands and feet are long; their mouth utters evil sounds; they hold tridents (triśūla) and forked arrows with which they stab and hurl at the damned like rain. Carried away by their fear, the damned strike their heads on the ground and beg for pity: “Leave us be for a while; have pity for a while!” Then the demons throw them into the burning iron hell, one hundred yojanas in extent, and make them gallop there with whip lashes: their feet are completely burned, their fat and marrow run in rivulets like pressed oil. The demons break open their heads with iron bars and the brains run out of their smashed skulls like cream from a broken pot. The demons slash them and cut them up; when their bodies are completely burned, they put them in an iron room where thick smoke suffocates them. These unfortunates push and rush against one another and wonder why [176b] they are being pushed around; but, just as they are about to find the exit, the door closes. Then they utter an unending great cry (raurava). - In their previous lives, these unfortunate ones had traded with false weights and measures and given unjust sentences; they had not returned the supplies entrusted to them and had robbed their inferiors; they had tormented the poor (daridra), making them cry and weep; they had destroyed cities and neighborhoods, ravaged villages, killed and looted; in their perverse hatred against [certain clans], they had called to them from near the ramparts and then, by means of their tricks and deceitfulness, they had brought the people together and then massacred them. It is for all these crimes that they suffer all these punishments.

In the Mahāraurava hell, the damned are put into gas chambers: they are shut in prisons or in dark smokey holes and gassed. Or else they are thrown into wells. It is for having stolen others’ goods or for similar reasons that they suffer the torments of the Mahāraurava hell.

6-7) The sixth and seventh [great hells] are the Tapanā and Pratāpanā. There are two great copper cauldrons there; the first is called Nan t’o (Nanda) and the second Po nan t’o (Upananda); in the language of Ts’in, “Joy” and “Great Joy”; they are filled with boiling brine. The rākṣasa demons, guardians of hell, throw the damned into them, like head chefs cooking meat. The people in these cauldrons have their feet up and their heads down; they are boiled like beans; their bones and joints become detached; their skin and flesh dissolve. When they are completely cooked, the demons fish them out with a fork. According to the law of karma, a cold wind blows that brings the damned back to life. Then they are thrown into the glowing coals (kukūla) or into the excrement (kuṇapa), like fish pulled out of the water and thrown onto the hot sand. There they are cooked in pus (read nong, 130 and 13) and blood. Then they are taken out of the glowing coals and thrown onto a bed of flames where they are forced to sit; their eyes, ears, nose and mouth, up to the pores of their skin, emit flames. In their previous lives, these unfortunates had tormented their parents, their teacher, śrāmaṇas and brāhmaṇas; they had tormented honest people and fields of merit (puṇyākṣetra) to the point of arousing their anger; for these reasons they suffer the torments of the Tapanā hell. Or else, in their previous lives, they had roasted live cocoons, roasted live pigs and sheep, spit-roasted living human beings. Or else they had set fire to the jungle, burned villages, stūpas, monasteries (viḥāra), temples (devacaitya), etc., or else they had thrown beings into pits of fire. It is for all these reasons that they are reborn in this hell.

8) The bodhisattva sees the Avīci hell, four thousand li in size, surrounded by iron walls and situated even deeper than the seven hells.³⁸⁹ The rākṣasa guardians hammer the damned with great iron hammers like blacksmiths hammering out iron. They crush them from head to foot. They pin out and stretch their bodies with five hundred nails, like an ox-hide is stretched. The damned drag themselves along and tear themselves apart with their hands. A fiery iron chariot rolls over their bodies.

*Various utsada annexed to the Avīci.*³⁹⁰ – 1) They are forcibly pushed into the glowing coals (kukūla)³⁹¹ and made to carry the glowing coals.

2) They come out by the river of excrement (kuṇapa) which they are made [176c] to enter. There poisonous iron-beaked insects enter their body through their nose and leave through the soles of their feet; entering by the soles of their feet, they leave through their mouths.

3) There arises before them the path of knives (kṣuramārga or kṣuradhāramārga)³⁹² and they are made to gallop there by whip-lashes. The soles of their feet are cut into pieces like meat minced for cooking; knives, swords and sharp blades fly through their bodies. Just as leaves falling from a frozen tree are scattered at the mercy of the wind, so the sliced-off hands, feet, noses and limbs of these damned cover the ground and torrents of blood flow.

Two evil dogs, Che mo (Śyāma) and Che p’o lo (Śabala),³⁹³ fierce beasts with iron gullets, tear at the sinews and bones of these damned. These dogs are as strong as tigers and as fierce as lions.

Then there is the forest [of iron] spines (ayaḥśalmalivāna)³⁹⁴ where the damned are pushed and forced to climb the trees. When the damned climb up, the spines turn downward; when they come down, the spines turn upward. Huge poisonous snakes (āśviṣa), scorpions (vṛścika) and poisonous insects come to chew on the damned; big long-beaked birds break their heads and feast on their brains.

³⁸⁹ For this hell, see Kośa, III, p. 148-149; Hobogirin, Abi, p. 6.

³⁹⁰ Here the Mppś continues its description of the Avīci by describing its utsadas.

³⁹¹ This brazier of glowing coals is the kukkula of the Pāli sources and the Mahāvastu, I, p. 11., the kukūla of the Kośa, III, p. 151. The damned are pushed into it up to their knees: their feet decompose when pushed into the glowing coals, revive as soon as they leave it.

³⁹² The path of knives is the kṣuramārga of the Kāraṇḍavyūha, 38, and the khuradhāra of the Pāli Jātaka, V, p. 269.

³⁹³ In Kośa, III, p. 151, these dogs are located in the asipattravana.

³⁹⁴ The forest of iron spines corresponds to the simbalivana of Majjhima, III, p. 185 and the ayaśalmalivāna of the Kośa, III, p. 151.

4) The damned enter the salt river [Khārodakā nadī or Vaitarṇī],³⁹⁵ which they enter and are swept downstream. When they emerge, they tread on a ground of burning iron (ayomayā lhūmy ādīptā). Walking on iron spines (ayaḥkhaṇṭaka) and sitting on iron spikes (ayaḥstambha)³⁹⁶ that enter them from behind. The guardians open their mouths with pliers (viṣkambhenena mukhadvāram viṣkambhya) and pour in molten copper (kvathitam tāmramāsyē prakṣipanti); they make them swallow flaming balls of iron (ayuguḍān ādīptān āsyēprakṣipanti);³⁹⁷ these balls enter and burn their mouth (mukha), penetrate into and burn the throat (kaṇṭha); they penetrate into and burn the belly; the five viscera (read tsang, 130 and 18) having been burned, they fall to the ground (adhaḥ pragharanti).

The damned, who see only ugly colors, breathe only fetid air, touch only rough things and undergo all the suffering, are bowed down with sorrow. Sometimes they act like savages, sometimes they run and hide, sometimes they trip and fall.

In previous lives, these unfortunates had committed many great wrongs and perpetrated the five grave sins of immediate retribution (pañcānatarya); they destroyed the roots of good (kuśalamūla); they called the Dharma ‘adharma’ and ‘adharma’ they called ‘Dharma’; they denied cause (hetu) and effect (phala), despised and envied honest people. For all these sins they enter into this hell and undergo such hard punishments.

The sixteen utsadas annexed to the eight great hells. – Outside the boundary of these eight great hells there are also sixteen hells that form annexes (utsada): eight hells of cold water and eight hells of fire and flame. The punishments there are of rare unprecedented (adṛṣṭāśruta) severity.

The eight hells of fire and flame are: the blazing coals (kukūla); excrement (kuṇapa); the blazing forest (ādīptavana); the forest of swords (asipattravana); the path of knives (kṣuramārga or kṣuradhāramārga), the forest of iron spines (ayaḥśālmavāna); the salt river (Khārodaka nadī or Vaitaraṇī); the copper stake (tāmraṣṭambha).

The eight hells of cold water are: Ngo feou t’o (Arbuda) ‘having many holes’; Ni lo feou t’o (Nirarbuda), ‘not having holes’; A lo lo (Aṭṭa), groan [177a] [uttered by the damned] under the biting cold; A p’o p’o (Hahava), another groan caused by the cold; Heou heou (Huhuva), another groan caused by the cold; Ngeou po lo (Uṭpala), because the outer walls of this hell are like blue lotus (nīlotpala); Po t’eu mo (Padma), punishment that makes the damned look like red lotuses; Mo ho po t’eu mo (Mahāpadma).

The eight hot hells: i) People have violated the pure precepts (viśuddhaśīla) and the monastic code (pravrajitadharma); they have induced laypeople (avādāvasana) to distrust the Buddhist path; they have thrown people into a ditch filled with fire; they have roasted beings while they were still alive. For all these reasons, they fall into the hell of blazing coals (kukūla): hot blazing coals burn these damned up to their knees.

³⁹⁵ This river is the khārodakā nadī of the Majjhima, III, p. 185. the kṣāranaādi of the Saddharmasmṛtyupasthāna, cited in Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 75; the vaitaraṇī, “fordless river” of the Kośa, p. 151 and the Suhrillekha, v. 73, 79.

³⁹⁶ The punishment of the iron or copper spikes is listed in Suhrillekha, v. 79.

³⁹⁷ On the punishment of molten copper and iron balls, see, among other sources, the detailed descriptions on Mahājima, III, p. 186; Divyāvadāna, p. 375; Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 73.

ii) Some people have touched food meant for the śrāvakas, brāhmanas, or ‘fields of merit’ (puṇyakṣetra) with their impure hands; they have eaten before them or introduced filth into their food; they have emptied hot excrement over their bodies; they have abandoned the means of pure existence (parisuddhājīva) and derived their subsistence from evil ways of living (mithyājīva). For all these reasons, they fall into the hell of excrement (kuṇapa): this sewer is as deep and vast as the ocean; there are iron-beaked insects that crush the heads of the damned and eat their brains, that crush their bones and eat their marrow.

iii) Some people, setting fire to grass and wood, have destroyed insects; by chasing them away, they have burned the forest to complete the carnage. For all these reasons, they fall into the hell of the burning forest (ādīptavana?) where the damned are burned in the fire of grass and wood.

iv) Some people, sword in hand, have gone into battle, wounded and killed; they have cut down a tree under which they have crushed their enemy in order to avenge some old grievance; they have betrayed the secret confided to them in good faith by a friend. For all these reasons, they fall into the hell of the forest of swords (asipattravana). When the damned enter into this hell, the wind blows over the sword-shaped leaves that then cut off the hands, feet, ears and noses of the damned. In this forest there are ravens (kāka), vultures (grāha) and evil dogs (śvan-) that come to eat the flesh of the damned.

v) Some men have stabbed their enemy with sharp knives; they have wounded their enemy with a stake or a lance; they have ruined a path, taken away a bridge; they have destroyed the path of the Holy Dharma (saddharmamārga) by substituting the path of adharma for it; they fall into the hell of the path of knives (kṣuramārga); in this hell, on a path closed off between two barriers, sharp knives have been fixed in such a way that the damned must pass under them.

vi) Some men have given themselves up to lust and have taken over other men’s wives; they have lusted after and engaged in sex (sukhaparśana). For all these reasons, they fall into the forest of iron spines (ayaḥśālmavāna). At the top of spiny trees, one yojana in height, are huge poisonous snakes (āsīviṣa) transformed into beautiful women; they invite the damned to climb up and take their pleasure with them; besides, the guardians of hell (nirayapāla) force the damned to climb the trees. Immediately the spines turn downwards and transfix the damned who endure the spines piercing through their bones into their marrow. When they come to the top of the trees, the magical women change back into snakes which break the heads of the damned, penetrate into their bellies and pierce holes in many places until they are completely torn apart. [177b] Finally, when they are brought back to life and in their normal state, the magical women, now standing at the bottom of the trees, call them again; the guardians of hell shoot arrows at them and make them descend; the spines reverse their direction and when they reach the ground, the magical women change back into poisonous snakes which tear up the bodies of the damned.³⁹⁸ vii) After a long time, when the damned come out of the forest of burning iron spines, they see in the distance a river (Khārodakā nadī or Vaitaraṇī) of fresh delicious water; they go towards it but, when they get into it, it becomes boiling salt water. The damned are in it hardly a moment when their skin and flesh decompose and their bones fall into the water. The rākṣasas, guardians of hell, pull them out with a forked hook and set them down on the river-bank. In their previous lives, these unfortunates had wounded and killed water animals, fish or turtles; they had pushed people to fall into the water; they had thrown them into boiling water or into ice-water. They suffer this punishment for all these evil acts.

³⁹⁸ The Saddharmasmṛtyupasthāna, cited in Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 71-72, also mentions the presence in the hells of these magical women, but they do not change into snakes, they have a body of red-hot iron.

viii) In the hell of the copper cauldron (tāmrastambha), the rākṣasas, guardians of hell, ask the damned where they are going, and the latter answer: “We are unfortunate and we do not know where we are going; we are hungry (kṣudh) and thirsty (pipāsā) ” When they say they are thirsty, the guardians chase the damned with whip-lashes and make them sit on a red-hot copper stake (tāmrastambha); they open their mouths with pliers (viṣkambhena mukhadvārṇi viṣkambhya) and pour in molten copper (kvathitaṃ tāmram āsye prakṣipanti). If they say they are hungry, the guardians make them sit on a copper stake and make them swallow iron balls (ayoguda) which enter and burn the mouth, penetrate and burn the throat (kaṇṭha), penetrate and burn the stomach (antra); having burned the five internal organs (read Tsang, 130 and 18), they fall down onto the ground (adhaḥ pragharanti).³⁹⁹ In their previous lives, these unfortunates had stolen other peoples’ goods to have enough to eat; as monks, they sometimes pretended to be sick to get melted butter (ghṛta) or honey (madhu); without discipline (śīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā), they had accepted many gifts and hurt people with slander (pāruṣyavāda). For all of these previous wrongdoings, they fall into the hell of the copper stake.

The eight cold hells. – i) In the Arbuda hell, people are plunged into a body of water where a pernicious wind blows so that their skin is torn off, their hair falls out, their tendons broken, the flesh torn, the bones broken and the marrow runs out. When they recover their wholeness, the damned undergo the same punishment again from the beginning. In their previous lives, these unfortunates had stripped human beings during the winter months, or stolen fuel and fire from people in the grip of the cold; or else they had been wicked nāgas, angry and full of hate, who had caused a rain of hail and ice to fall to annoy humans ; or else they had scorned and slandered the Buddha, his disciples or people who were observing morality; or else they had committed grave sins by their four actions of speech. For all these reasons they fall into the Arbuda hell.

ii) It is the same in the Nirarbuda hell. But whereas the Arbuda hell has several “holes” (arbuda)⁴⁰⁰ by which one can sometimes leave or enter, the Nirarbuda hell has no holes, and there is no means by which one can leave or enter.

iii-v) In the three hells, Aṭata, Hahava and Huhuva, the damned shiver in the biting cold wind, unable to open their mouths, and these hells are named after the groans which are heard there.

³⁹⁹ Cf. Majjhima, III, p. 186.; Dīvyāvadāna, p. 375; Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 74.

⁴⁰⁰ Other etymologies are found in the texts. This hell is called arbuda because those who are there are like bubbles (arbuda) or like thick clouds (ambuda), or because the cold wind produces blisters on their bodies. Cf. Hobogirin, Abuda, p. 8.

[177c] vi) In the Utpala hell, the ice and mud are like a blue lotus (nīlotpala).

vii) The shape of the Padma hell is like a red lotus.⁴⁰¹ viii) The Mahāpadma hell is the dwelling-place of Kiu kia li (Kokalīka).⁴⁰²

The sage (jñānin) who hears [about these hells] cries out in fear: “Alas! It is because of ignorance (avidyā), hatred (pratigha) and attachment (anunaya) that one comes to undergo these sufferings; one comes out of them only to re-enter them again infinitely.” Seeing these hells, the bodhisattva says to himself: “These sufferings are the acts for causes and conditions; they all result from ignorance (avidyā) and the afflictions (kleśa). I will apply myself energetically to the six virtues (pāramitā) and accumulate the qualities (guṇa) in order to relieve beings of the sufferings of the five destinies.” Thus the bodhisattva stimulates his compassion and increases his exertion. If one saw one’s father and mother shut up in prison, beaten and afflicted in ten thousand ways, one would look for any way (upāya) to save them and one’s mind would not rest for one moment.

Thus the bodhisattva, who sees beings undergo the sufferings of the five destinies, thinks of them ceaselessly as his parents.

III. EXERTION AND THE OTHER VIRTUES.

1. Moreover, the exertion of the bodhisattva is practiced diligently from lifetime to lifetime: the mind of the bodhisattva never draws back from seeking wealth and treasures to give to beings; if he himself possesses goods, he never ceases to give them all away.

2. Moreover, the bodhisattva observes the precepts (śīla) energetically; whether they are great (mahat) or lesser (kṣudra), he takes them all, he keeps them all without transgressing or violating them. If he happens to miss a precept, be it small as a hair, he confesses at once and hides nothing.

3. Moreover, the bodhisattva diligently cultivates patience (kṣānti). Whether one strikes him with a knife or a stick, whether one harms him or insults him, whether he is covered with veneration (satkāra) or worship (pūjā), he endures all of it and remains indifferent and detached. In the face of the profound Dharma (gambhīradharma)⁴⁰³ that his mind is unable to probe, he ignores doubt and hesitation.

4. Furthermore, the bodhisattva cultivates the four trances (dhyāna) with exertion and special attention. He can dwell there, keep them and thus obtain the five superknowledges (abhijñā), the four boundless ones (read sseu wou liang sin: paramāṇa citta), the [eight] liberations (vimokṣa), the spheres of mastery ⁴⁰¹ According to the Kośa, III, p. 154, Utpala and Padma indicate the shape taken by the damned: they are like a blue or red lotus. According to the Chinese sources studied by Beal, Catena, p. 63, the inmates of Utpala and Padma are covered with spots resembling blue and red lotuses respectively.

(abhibhāvāyātana) [p. 969F, l. 6] and the ten spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana). Provided with these qualities (guṇa), he obtains the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛitypasthāna) and all the samādhis of the bodhisattva, such as the vision of the Buddhas, etc.

5. Finally the bodhisattva's exertion is without drawing back in seeking the Dharma (dharmaparyeṣaṇā); he uses body and mind to pay homage to Dharma teachers (dharmācārya); he increases offerings, alms and gifts without fail or relapse. He dedicates his life to study and discussion of the Dharma. During the first, second and last watch of the night, he contemplates (manasikāroti), meditates (cintayati), calculates (pramāṇayati) and speculates (vikalpayati); he looks for causes and conditions (hetupratyaya); he distinguishes between identity and difference (sāmānyaviśeṣa); he seeks to understand the true nature (satyalakṣaṇa) and to establish, for all dharmas, their specific nature (svalakṣaṇa), their general nature (anyalakṣaṇa), the general characteristic (sāmānyalakṣaṇa), the specific characteristic (bhinnalakṣaṇa), the unique characteristic (ekalakṣaṇa), the nature of existence (bhāvalakṣaṇa), the nature of non-existence (abhāvalakṣaṇa) and the essential nature (tathatālakṣaṇa). The absence of decrease (asamlayana) or of relapse (avivaraṇa) of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas constitutes the exertion of the bodhisattva. For all these reasons, he can produce and realize the many good dharmas and this is the "virtue of exertion". For the meaning of the word virtue (pāramitā), see what has been said above. In addition, the exertion of the bodhisattva is the only one to be called [178a] virtue of exertion (vīryapāramitā); the exertion of other people does not merit the name of virtue.

Question. – What is meant by perfection of exertion (vīryaparipūri)?

Answer. – When the bodhisattva, in his body of birth (janmakāya) and his essential body (dharmadhātukāya),⁴⁰⁴ unites all the qualities (guṇa), there is the perfection of the virtue of exertion (vīryapāramitāparipūri). For the meaning of paripūri, see what has been said above: "In bodily and vocal exertion, the bodhisattva does not draw back." (p. 927F)

IV. BODILY AND MENTAL EXERTION.

Question. – Exertion is a mental event (caitasikadharmā). Does the sūtra speak of bodily exertion (kāyikavīrya)?

Answer. – Although exertion is a mental event, it is called bodily exertion when it makes use of physical strength. It is like sensation (vedanā); although it is a mental event, it is called 'bodily sensation' (kāyikavedanā) when it is associated with the [first] five consciousnesses (pañcavijñānasamprayogāt), 'mental sensation' (caitasikavedanā) when it is associated with the mental consciousness (manovijñānasamprayogāt).⁴⁰⁵ It is the same for exertion: when one expends physical force either by giving with the hand or vocally reciting religious texts and preaching the Dharma, it is a question of bodily or vocal exertion (kāyikavācīkavīrya).

Moreover, exertion is bodily when it is practicing generosity (dāna) or morality (śīla); it is mental when it is practicing patience (kṣānti), meditation (dhyāna) and wisdom (prajñā).

Moreover, exertion is bodily when it is practiced on outer things (bāhyavastu); it is mental when there is effort special to oneself (ādhyātmikaprayoga).

Finally, gross exertion (sthūlavīrya) is bodily; subtle exertion (sūkṣmavīrya) is mental; exertion that has merit in mind is bodily; exertion that has wisdom (prajñā) in mind is mental. In the bodhisattva, there is bodily exertion during the time from the first cittotpāda (resolution) until the attainment of anutpattikakṣānti (acceptance of non-production) for, until then, he has not yet given up his body of birth (janmakāya). [Starting from the moment when], obtaining the anutpattikadharmā, he rejects his body of flesh (māṃsakāya) and attains the essential body (dharmadhātukāya) up until the moment he becomes Buddha, it is a matter of mental exertion.⁴⁰⁶

When the bodhisattva is in his first resolution (prathamacittotpāda), his qualities (guṇa) are not complete; he is then planting the causes and conditions of the threefold merit (tripuṇyahetupratyaya). When his generosity (dāna), morality (śīla) and good intention (kusālacitta) have finally been rewarded, he uses the latter to give gifts to beings. But as beings are not satisfied, he cultivates merit on a grander scale and makes a resolution for great compassion (mahākaruṇā utpādayati): He says: "Beings have insufficient wealth and many are bad. I am incapable of satisfying their desires with my small wealth. If their desires are not satisfied, they will not willingly accept my teaching; if they do not accept my teaching, they will not be liberated from birth (jāti), old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (maraṇā). Therefore I will use great skillful means (mahopāya) to load them with riches until they are satisfied." Then the bodhisattva goes to the great sea to look for various treasures; he climbs mountains and faces dangers in the search for marvelous medicines; he penetrates into deep caves in search of various objects, stalactites or precious gems (maṇiratna) and he gives them to beings. Or else, he becomes the leader of a caravan (sārthavāha) and he daringly crosses mountain trails, facing robbers, lions, tigers, wolves and madmen. In order to make gifts to beings, he carefully seeks the most precious materials, and he considers nothing too difficult. With medicinal herbs (oṣadhi) and magical spells (mantra), he can transform copper into gold; by means of these many transformations (pariṇāma), he produces all kinds of precious substances; and when he is successful [in fabricating] things that are not native in the four directions, he gives them to beings. That is bodily exertion. But, when he has acquired the five [178b] superknowledges (abhijñā), he can transform himself and create exquisite tastes; or else he goes to the heavens (svarga) to gather the food [that grows] there spontaneously. That is mental exertion.

⁴⁰⁶ In other words, it is in the eighth bhūmi (acalā bhūmi) that the bodhisattva attains anutpattikadharmakṣānti (patience that consists of accepting and understanding that dharmas do not arise), the nyāma (predestination for Bodhi), the avivartana (assurance of not regressing); then he exchanges his body of birth (janmakāya) or body of flesh (māṃsakāya) for the body of the Dharma (dharmakāya), and his exertion, bodily (kāyika) as it was before, becomes mental (caitasika). See above, p. 711F, n. 1.

⁴⁰⁵ See in Milinda, p. 253, the distinction between kāyika and cetasikavedanā.

When the bodhisattva collects riches and gives them away, this is bodily exertion; when he uses his qualities of donor to reach buddhahood, this is mental exertion. When the bodhisattva of birth body (janmakāya) practices the six virtues, this is bodily exertion; when he bodhisattva of essential body (dharmadhātukāya) practices the six virtues, this is mental energy. [Note by Kumārajīva: when one has not acquired the Dharma-body, the mind follows the body; but when one has acquired the dharmakāya, the mind does not follow the body and the body does not hinder the mind.]

Furthermore, not to spare one's life in order to realize the qualities is bodily energy; never to relax (asraṃsanatā) in seeking dhyāna and wisdom (prajñā) is mental exertion.

Finally, bodily exertion consists of not drawing back in the difficult efforts that one undertakes.

It is told that, in the kingdom of Po lo nai (Vārāṇasī), the king Fan mo ta (Brahmadatta), while hunting in the jungle (araṇya), saw two herds of deer (mṛgayūtha): each herd had its leader; the one had five hundred deer and his body was the color of the seven jewels (saptaratna): this was the Bodhisattva Śākyamuni; the other leader was Devadatta.

The Bodhisattva, king of the deer, on seeing king Brahmadatta killing his herd, felt great compassion (mahākaruṇacitta) and went to Brahmadatta. The king's people drew their bows and let fly a rain of arrows. But Brahmadatta, seeing this deer approaching him, commanded his retinue to put away their bows and arrows so he could learn the motive for the deer's coming. Approaching the human king, the deer-king knelt and said: "Sire, it is for a useless motive, namely, the pleasures of an outing and diversion that our deer are suffering all the pains of death. If you wish, we will furnish you with food; we will establish a sequence and send you every day one deer for the royal kitchen." The king approved this proposition and gave in to the deer-king's wish. Then the two herd leaders, in a great meeting, set up a sequence; and each in turn, sent the deer from his herd whose turn it was [to be killed].

One day, a pregnant doe in Devadatta's herd said to him: "Today is my day to go to my death; but I am pregnant and it is not my baby's turn. Therefore I beg you to condescend to an agreement so that I, who must die, will undergo my lot, but that my baby should not suffer it." The deer king, Devadatta, became angry with her and said: "Who is there who would not take care for his life? The deer go [to their death] when their turn comes; why would they accept your terms?" The mother deer then said: "My king is inhumane and has no pity; he has not considered my proposition and has become angry without valid reason. There is no way to talk to him." Then she went to the bodhisattva-king and told her story. The bodhisattva-king asked the doe: "What did your leader say?" – She replied: "My leader is inhumane; he did not come to an arrangement but got angry. Great king! Your humanity extends to all; that is why I come to you for refuge. As vast as the world is, today for me there is no place to appeal to a higher court." The Bodhisattva thought: "This doe is very sad. If I do not intervene, her baby will be savagely killed; it is not the baby's turn. But how can I send in her place [a deer] whose turn has not yet come? Only I myself can replace her." Having thought thus, he made his decision: he delegated himself and sent away the mother doe: "I will replace you today, do not worry", he said.

Then the deer-king went to the palace of king Brahmadatta; the servants were astonished to see him come and reported the thing to the king. The king also was astounded and, having him brought before him, he asked: "Is your herd exhausted? Why have you come?" The deer-king replied: "Great king, since your protection extends to the deer, nobody hurts us and we have increased; why would the herd come to an end? But, in my neighbor's herd, there is a pregnant doe ready to give birth; she is to be killed and butchered and her baby put to death. She came to me and I had pity on her. It is impossible to replace her by someone who is not involved in this business. If I send her away and do not save her, I am no different than a piece of wood or a stone. My body will not last long; it will surely not escape death. To save the unfortunate compassionately is of immense merit. Those who have no loving-kindness (maitrī) are like tigers and wolves." Hearing these words, the king rose from his seat and spoke these stanzas:

Truly I am an animal

A 'beast in human form',

You, despite your body of an animal

Are a 'man in the form of a beast.'

It is correct to say

That external form does not make a man.

Although he is an animal, whoever knows how to express loving-kindness

Is a man.

In the Mahāvastu and the Pāli Jātaka, the two deer-kings are called Nyagrodha (Nigrodha) and Viśākha (Sākha). In the samodhāna pf the Pāli jātika, the Bodhisattva is identified with Nigrodha, Devadatta with Sākha, Kunāra Kassapa with the little deer, his mother with the doe, and Ānanda with king Brahmadatta.

For my own part, starting from today,
I will not eat any meat whatsoever.
I make you the gift of absence of fear (abhayadāna),
You may reassure your mind.

The deer rejoiced in peace and the king found loving-kindness and faith.

[Dharmarakta sacrifices himself for a stanza].⁴⁰⁸

The brahmacārin Ngai fa (Dharmarakta) traveled about in Jambudvīpa for twelve years in search of the holy Dharma (āryadharmā), but was unable to find it. At that time there was no Buddha and the Buddhadharma also had disappeared. There was a brāhmin⁴⁰⁹ who said to him: “I possess a stanza of the holy Dharma; if you truly love the Dharma, I will give it to you.” Dharmarakta answered: “I do love the Dharma truly.” The brāhmin replied: “If you truly love the Dharma, you will take your skin as paper, one of your bones as pen and you will write the stanza with your blood; then I will give it to you.” Dharmarakta agreed to these orders: he broke a bone, flayed his skin and wrote the following stanza with his blood:

Practice the Dharma,

⁴⁰⁸ This story is told in several sources, but the texts do not agree in the name of the bodhisattva:

In the P’ou sa pen hing king, T 155, k. 2, p. 119b, the king Yeou to li (9 and 15; 36 and 3; 75 and 7), in order to obtain a stanza, flays his skin to use as paper, breaks a bone to use as a pen, and uses his blood as ink.- In the Hien yu king (Chinese version, T 202, k. 1, p. 351b; Tibetan version edited by Foucaux, Grammaire ds la langue tibétain, 1858, p. 195-197), the r̥ṣi Yu to lo (75 and 22; 36 and 3; 122 and 14), i.e., Utpala, “flays his skin for paper, breaks a bone for a pen and uses his blood as ink.” – The Mppś attributes the same deed here to a brahmacārin Ngai fa (61 and 9; 85 and 5 = Dharmarakta) and later, at k. 49, p. 412a, to the bodhisattva Lo fa (75 and 11, 85 and 5 = Dharmarata) who has already been discussed, P. 690 as note.

In none of these stories is there a question of marrow, whereas marrow plays an important part in the version told by the Chinese pilgrims Song Yun, T 2092, k. 5, p. 1020b11-14 (tr. Chavannes, BEFEO, III, p. 412) and Hiuan tsang, T 2087, k. 3, p. 883a12-13 (tr. Beal, I, p. 124; Watters, I, p. 233-234). Both locate the scene in the ‘monastery of the lentils’ (Masūrasamghārāma) at Gumbatai, near Tursak, in Bunl̥r. According to Song Yun, where the bone was broken, the marrow that ran out fell onto the rock; the color of the fat is as creamy as if it were quite fresh. Hiuan tsang also saw this rock; he says it is yellowish-white and always covered with a rich moistness.

The present jātakā should not be confused with that of prince Candraprabha (alias Utpala) who broke one of his bones and used the marrow to cure a sick man; this other deed has been told above, p. 715F.

For the value attached to the stanzas, see above, p. 689, note.

⁴⁰⁹ According to the Mppś, k. 49, p. 412a, this was king Māra, disguised as a brāhmin.

Do not adopt adharmā!

In this world and in the other

The Dharmacārin dwells in peace.⁴¹⁰

[The pheasant extinguishing a jungle fire].⁴¹¹

There was once a jungle fire consuming the forest in which there lived a [179a] pheasant (kapiñjala) who used his strength to fly to some water, moisten his down and his feathers and return to extinguish the fire. The blaze was violent and the water [that he poured over it] was small in amount; but the pheasant did not find discouraging the fatigue of flying there and back. Then the god Ti che (Śakra) came and asked the pheasant: “What are you doing there?” The pheasant answered: “I want to save this forest, for I have pity for living beings. This forest is shady, vast in extent, fresh and pleasant. The animals of my kind, my relatives and all the living beings are fond of it. I have the strength; why would I be lazy (kusīda) in saving it?” The king of the gods asked him: “How long will you continue your effort?” The pheasant answered: “I will continue until death.” The king of the gods continued: “Who knows with certainty that that is indeed your intention?” Then the pheasant made the following vow (prañidhāna): “If my heart is sincere and my faith true, may this fire be extinguished.” At once, a god of the pure abodes (śuddhāvāsadeva) heard the ardent vow of the bodhisattva and extinguished the fire. From early times until today, it is the only forest that is always flowering and is spared by fires.

⁴¹⁰ This is verse no. 169 in the Dhammapada:

Dhammaṃ care sucaritaṃ na saṃ duccharitaṃ care, dhammacārī sukhaṃ seti asmiṃ loke paramhi ca.

The Sanskrit recension occurs in the Avadānaśataka, I, p. 220:

Dharmaṃ caret sucaritaṃ nainaṃ duṣcaritaṃ caret, dharmacārī sukhaṃ śete asmimī loke paratra ca.

The two stanzas given by the Hien yu king, T 202, p. 351b-c, are different; they recommend avoiding the ten evil actions.

⁴¹¹ The bird’s actions are told, with some variants, in Seng k’ie lo tch’a so tsi king, T 194, k. 1, p. 120a-b; Tsa pao tsang king, T 203, k. 2, p. 455a-b; Kieou tsa p’i yu king, T 206, k. 1, p. 515a (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 385-386); Hiuan tsang, Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 6, p. 903b-c (tr. Beal, II, p. 33-34; Watters, II, p. 29); King liu yi siang, T 2121, K. 11, p. 60b-c. – Iconography: Ecker-Demiéville, Twin Pagodas, p. 61 and pl. 40, 3.

In the Mppś and the Si yu ki, the bird is a pheasant (kapiñjala); elsewhere it is a parrot (śuka). According to T 203, the fire broke out because two bamboos, shaken by the wind, caught on fire by friction; the parrot was called Houan hi cheou (76 and 18; 30 and 9; 185) which may be restored in the Sanskrit as Nandikaśrīṣha. According to Hiuan tsang, it was not a Śuddhāvāsadeva who extinguished the fire, but Śakra himself; he took a little water in the hollow of his hand and poured it onto the fire; the stūpa commemorating the action of the bird was in the neighborhood of Kuśinagara, close to the place where the Buddha entered into nirvāṇa.

These are the various exploits that the Bodhisattva accomplished in his previous lives: he carried out what was hard to do; he sacrificed his life, his kingdom, his wealth, his wife, his children, his elephants and horses, his seven pearls, his head, his eyes, his bones and his marrow; he gave everything eagerly and without regret. It is said that, for beings, in the space of a single day, the Bodhisattva would undergo a thousand deaths and a thousand births. Such are the exploits that he accomplishes in his virtue of generosity, morality, patience, trance and wisdom. All the nidānas told in the Jātakasūtras are derived from bodily exertion.

Cultivation of the good dharmas (kuśaladharmabhāvana), confident faith ignoring doubt (niḥsamśāyaprasāda), absence of laziness (akauṣīdya), insatiability in searching for the Dharma (dharmaparyeṣanasaṃtuṣṭi) conducted among the saints and up to worldly people – insatiability like that of the ocean that engulfs the waves – that is what characterizes the mental exertion of the bodhisattva.

Question. – The mention of insatiability (saṃtuṣṭi) is not correct. Why? When one has found what one has been looking for, one should be satisfied; but when something cannot be pursued or arranged, one ought to give it up. Why this perpetual dissatisfaction? When someone is digging a well looking for a spring and has worked hard, if there is no water, he should stop. It is the same for the practice of the Path: having reached a certain point, it is not necessary to practice further. Why this perpetual dissatisfaction?

Answer. – The exertion of the bodhisattva cannot be the object of an ordinary comparison (laukikapamāna). If the person digging the well does not succeed in finding water, this is as a result of his small efforts and not because there is no water. If there is no water in that place, there is some elsewhere, to be sure, and he should go where it is. The bodhisattva must go to buddhahood, go there insatiably, and teach people relentlessly [to go there]. This is why we spoke of insatiability (asaṃtuṣṭi).

Furthermore, the exertion and the aspirations (praṇidhāna) of the bodhisattva are vast; he has sworn to save all beings. Now beings are inexhaustible in number.⁴¹² This is why his exertion also must be inexhaustible. You said that once something has been arranged, one should stop, but that is not correct. Although the bodhisattva may have come to buddhahood, beings have not all arrived there; therefore he cannot stop. Just as the nature of fire, even though it is not extinct, is to combat cold, so the exertion of the bodhisattva, even though he has not entered into nirvāṇa, never stops. This is why, of the eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmas), zealotry (chanda) and exertion (vīrya) are two things to be practiced unceasingly.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva abides in the virtue of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā) by the method of non-abiding (asthānayaogena):⁴¹³ he never abandons exertion. The exertion of the bodhisattva is not that of the Buddha.

Furthermore, as long as the bodhisattva has not attained the state of Bodhisattva, his body of birth and death (cyutupapattikāya, saṃskārakāya) fills living beings with wonderful things. In turn, beings respond to praises (varṇana) with malicious gossip (paiśunya), to signs of respect (satkāra, arcanā) with scorn ⁴¹² According to an early theory, the number of beings is infinite; cf. Siddhi, Appendix, p. 807-808.

⁴¹³ This method has been defined above, p. 656F.

(avamāna), to friendly feelings (maitrīcitta) with looking for faults; they even plan to wound him. Deprived of power (sthāma), these beings come to torment the bodhisattva, who makes vast aspirations (praṇidhāna) for these beings: “When I have attained buddhahood, I will save these beings, even the most wicked.” His mind unrelentingly feels great compassion (mahākaruṇā) for these evil beings. Like a loving mother who laments the sickness of her son, he does not cease to worry about them. These are the characteristics of the exertion of the bodhisattva.

Furthermore, when the bodhisattva practices the virtue of generosity, all kinds of beggars come from the ten directions to ask him for things they should not be asking for, things to which the bodhisattva is attached and which are hard for him to give; they say to the bodhisattva: “Give me your two eyes; give me your head, your brain, your bones, your marrow, your wife and your dear children, your pearls and priceless jewels.” These things that are difficult to give, the beggars insistently demand them; but the bodhisattva’s mind is not moved; he feels neither miserliness (mātsarya) nor anger (krodha). Without hesitation, wholeheartedly (ekacittena), he gives [what they ask for] in order to realize the state of buddhahood. He is like mount Meru which is not shaken by the winds of the four directions. These are the characteristics of the virtue of exertion.

Finally, the bodhisattva’s exertion is the virtue of exertion when it practices the [other] five virtues on all occasions (sarvatra).

Question. – If the bodhisattva practices the virtue of discipline (śīlapāramitā) and somebody comes to ask for his three robes (tricvara) or his bowl (pātra), he is violating a precept if he gives them, for the Buddha has forbidden [making a gift of them].⁴¹⁴ On the other hand, if he refuses, he is lacking the virtue of generosity (dānapāramitā). Therefore how can exertion practice the five virtues “on all occasions”?

Answer. – The beginning bodhisattva (ādikārmikabodhisattva) is unable to practice the five virtues everywhere at the same time.

When the Bodhisattva was practicing the virtue of generosity, he saw a starving tigress, beset by hunger, about to devour her cubs; immediately the Bodhisattva felt great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and gave her his body.⁴¹⁵ The Bodhisattva’s father and mother, grieved for their son’s death, lost their sight, and the tigress, for having killed the Bodhisattva, had to undergo punishment.⁴¹⁶ [179c] However, the bodhisattva does not take into account either his parents’ sadness or the punishment reserved for the tigress: he wants only to accomplish a gift and gain merit (puṇya).

⁴¹⁴ The three robes and the alms-bowl were ceremonially given to the bhikṣu in the ordination ritual and were an integral part of the monk’s equipment: Vinaya, I, p. 94.

⁴¹⁵ Vyāghrjātaka or the “gift of the body” to the starving tigress; see references in Traité, I, p. 143F, and above, p. 723F.

⁴¹⁶ This epilogue of the Vyāghrjātaka is missing in the recensions of the jātaka, but it is commonplace for parents to become blind as a result of mourning for their son (cf. Chavannes, Contes, IV, p. 91).

The bhikṣu who is observing the precepts conforms to the rules (niyama), small or large, and repulses those who violate the rules. The person who meets with his refusal is angry and vexed, but the bhikṣu only wants to observe the precepts and pays no heed to his anger.

Sometimes the bodhisattva practices ordinary wisdom (saṃvṛtaprajñā) and withholds his kindly and compassionate feelings (maitrīkaruṇācitta).

[The impostor brahmācārin exposed by the Bodhisattva].

In a previous lifetime, the Bodhisattva Śākyamuni was crown prince of a great kingdom. His father, the king, had as teacher (guru) a brahmācārin who did not eat the five grains [i.e., abstained from all food]. Full of respect and faith, the people considered this to be a miracle (aścarya), but the prince said to himself: “A man who has four limbs absolutely needs the five grains. If this man does not eat, it is surely to seduce men’s minds and it is not his real custom.” His father and mother said to him: “This zealous man does not touch the five grains; it is extraordinary (adbhuta). Why are you so foolish as not to respect him?” The prince answered: “Be watchful: before long, this man will betray himself.”

Then the prince looked out for the place where the brahmācārin lived, went to the forest and asked a cow-herder (gopālaka) there: “What does this man eat?” The cow-herder replied: “During the night, this man eats some butter and that permits him to stay alive.”

Having learned this, the prince returned to the palace and wanted to lead the brahmācārin to betray himself. He perfumed a blue lotus (nīlotpala) with all kinds of medicinal herbs (nānāvidhausadhi) and next morning, when the brahmācārin came to the palace and seated himself beside the king, the prince took the lotus and offered it to the brahmācārin. The brahmācārin joyfully said to himself: “The king, the queen, the greater and lesser people inside and outside all surround me with attention; only the prince shows neither respect nor trust; but today he is offering me this beautiful lotus; this is very good.” Then he took the lotus and out of respect for the prince, he brought it to his nose and smelled it. The medicinal vapors contained in the lotus penetrated into his stomach; soon the medicines began to act within his stomach and the brahmācārin wanted to withdraw. The prince said to him: “Brahmācārin, you do not eat, why do you want to go to defecate?” The brahmācārin was seized with nausea and suddenly vomited beside the king. In his vomit, the intact butter betrayed him; the king and the queen understood his deceit. The prince then said: “This man is a real brigand; to make a name for himself, he has deceived the entire kingdom.”

Thus, when he used ordinary wisdom (saṃvṛtaprajñā), the Bodhisattva was trying only to fulfill wisdom, suspend his kindness and compassion (maitrīkaruṇācitta) and does not fear people’s anger.

When the bodhisattva, on some occasions (syātkāla) practices supramundane wisdom (lokottaraprajñā), he has neither the desire (rāga) nor concern (abhiniveśa) to observe morality (śīla) or to practice generosity (dāna). Why? Because the donor (dāyaka), the recipient (pratigrāhaka) and the thing given (deya) do not exist; because sin (āpatti) and merit (anāpatti), anger (krodha) and gentleness (akrodha), exertion (vīrya) and laziness (kausīdya), concentratedness of mind (cittasaṃgraha) and distraction (cittavikṣepa) do not exist (nopalabhyante).

Moreover, when the bodhisattva practices the virtue of exertion, he is faced with unborn (anutpanna) and unceasing (aniruddha), non-eternal (anitya) and non-transitory (anānitya), non-suffering (aduhkha) and non-happy (asukha), non-empty (aśūnya) and non-real (asatya), non-ātman and non-anātman, non-unique (aneka) and non-different (ananya), non-existent (asat) and not [180a] nonexistent (anasat) dharmas. He knows perfectly well that all these dharmas [are derived] from the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī), that they are only names and conventions (nāmasaṃketa) and have no real nature (satyalakṣaṇa). The bodhisattva who has made this examination knows that everything conditioned is deceptive (mṛṣā) and his mind rests in the unconditioned (aśmṣkṛta); he wants to destroy (nirudh-) his mind and holds only nirvāṇa to be [true] salvation (yogaḥkṣema). But then he remembers his original vow (mūlapraṇidhāna) and, out of compassion (karuṇā) for beings, he returns to the practice of the dharmas of the bodhisattva and accumulates all the qualities (guṇa). He says to himself: “Although I know that all dharmas are deceptive, beings do not know this and suffer all the sufferings of the five destinies; therefore I will practice the six virtues (pāramitā) completely.” As reward, he also acquires the thirty-two marks (lakṣaṇa) and the eighty minor (anuvyañjana) marks of the Buddhist path, omniscience (sarvajñāna), great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī), great compassion (mahākaruṇā), the [four] unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid), the [eight] liberations (vimokṣa), the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), the eighteen special attributes (āveṇīkadharma), the three sciences (trividya) and the innumerable attributes of the Buddhas. As soon as he has attained these attributes, all beings find purity of faith (śraddhāviśuddhi); they can taste the practices, are pleased with the Buddhadharmas and accomplish their task. All of that is due to the virtue of exertion and constitutes the virtue of exertion.

The Buddha said: The bodhisattva’s exertion does not consider either the body or the mind, or that which is done by the body or that which is meditated on by the mind. For him, the body and mind are identical (eka), equal (sama), without any difference (nirvikalpa). He uses the state of buddhahood sought by him to save beings. He does not think of beings as ‘this shore’ (apara), or the state of buddhahood as ‘the other shore’ (pāra). He rejects everything done by body and mind; he considers it to be the fiction of a dream (svapna), as not done. That is called nirvāṇa, and all these forms of exertion are called virtues. Why? Because he knows that all exertions are false. He holds all dharmas to be deceptive and unreal, like a dream (svapna) or a magic show (māyā). The equality of all dharmas (sarvadharmasamatā) is reality; there is nothing to be sought for in equalized dharmas; this is why he knows that all exertions are deceptive. But, even though he knows that all exertions are false, he maintains them unflinchingly and that is the true exertion of the bodhisattva.

The Buddha said: For innumerable kalpas, I gave my head, my eyes, my marrow and my brain to beings to satisfy their desires. When I was observing discipline (śīla), patience (kṣānti) and meditation, I lived in the mountains and forests and my body dried up; sometimes I observed fasting (upavāna); sometimes I broke away from the tastes of pleasure; sometimes I underwent the torment of curses, dishonor, the knife and the stick; this is how my body wasted away. Always in meditation, exposed to the sun and the morning dew, I painfully sought wisdom (prajñā); I recited [the sūtras], meditated, questioned and discoursed; by my knowledge, I divided dharma into good and bad, coarse (sthūla) and subtle (sūkṣma), false and true, frequent and rare; I paid reverence (pījā) to innumerable Buddhas. With zeal and exertion, I sought the qualities [180b] (guṇa); I wanted to perfect (paripūrṇa) the five virtues. But at that time I attained nothing and I did not acquire the virtues of generosity, morality, patience, exertion, trance, and wisdom. I then met the Buddha Jan teng (Dīpaṃkara); I cast five lotuses at him and spread out my hair on top of the mud [as a carpet for him];⁴¹⁷ then I attained the patience of dharmas free of arising (anutpattikadharmakṣānti) and at once the six virtues were completed (paripūrṇa) by me; rising up into the air,⁴¹⁸ I praised the Buddha Dīpaṃkara in verse. I saw the innumerable Buddhas of the ten directions and then I obtained the real exertions; exertions being equal, I found the equality of mind (cittasamatā) and, as a result of this equality of mind, I found the equality of all dharmas (sarvadharmasamatā).

These various causes and characteristics constitute the virtue of exertion.

CHAPTER XXVIII: THE VIRTUE OF MEDITATION (DHYĀNA) (p. 984F)

Sūtra: It is necessary to fulfill the virtue of meditation by being based on the non-existence of distraction and delight (dhyānapāramitā paripūrayitavya avikṣepaṇatām anāsvādanatām upādāya).

I. NECESSITY FOR MEDITATION.

Śāstra: Question. –The rule for the bodhisattva is to save beings; why does he dwell apart in forests and swamps, solitudes and mountains, preoccupied only with himself and abandoning beings?

Answer. – Although the bodhisattva stays away from beings physically, his mind never abandons them. In solitude (śantavihāra), he seeks concentration (samādhi) and gains true wisdom (bhūtaprajñā) to save all beings. When one takes a drug (bhaṣajya) for health reasons, one temporarily interrupts family affairs; then when one's strength has been recovered, one resumes business as before. The rest that the bodhisattva takes is of that nature. He swallows the drug of wisdom (prajñā) by the power of meditation; when he has obtained the power of the superknowledges (abhijñābala), he returns to people and, amongst them, becomes a father, mother, wife or son, master, servant or school-teacher, god, human or even an animal; and he guides them with all sorts of teachings (deśana) and skillful means (upāya).

Furthermore, the bodhisattva practices generosity (dāna), morality (śīla) and patience (kṣānti), three things that are called 'gates of merit' (puṇyadvāra). For innumerable lifetimes he has been [Brahmā]devarāja, Śakra devendra, cakravartin king, king of Jambudvīpa, and ceaselessly gives beings garments made of the seven jewels (saprtaratnamaya vastra). In the present lifetime and in future existences, he abundantly enjoys the five objects of desire (pañcabhiḥ kāmagaṇaiḥ samarpito bhavati). It is said in the sūtra: "The cakravartin king⁴¹⁹ who [180c] has taught his people the ten good actions, is later reborn in heaven." From existence to existence he works for the benefit (hita) of beings and leads them to happiness (sukha). But this happiness is transitory (anitya); following it, suffering (duḥkha) is experienced. And so the bodhisattva produces a mind of great compassion (mahākaruṇācittam utpādayati), he wants to benefit beings by assuring the eternal happiness of nirvāṇa (nityasukhanivāṇa), and true wisdom comes from concentration of the mind (cittāgrya) and meditation (dhyāna). Light a lamp (dīpa); bright as it is, you cannot use it if you leave it in the full wind; put it in a sheltered place, it will be very useful to you. It is the same for wisdom in a distracted mind (vikṣiptacitta): if the shelter of dhyāna is absent, the wisdom will exist, but its usefulness will be very restricted. It is necessary to have dhyāna so that the true wisdom is produced. This is why the bodhisattva, separating himself from beings and withdrawing into solitude (śāntavihāra), seeks to obtain meditation. It is because meditation is pure that the wisdom is pure also. When the oil (taila) and the wick (varti) are clean, the light of the lamp is also clean. This is why those who want to attain pure wisdom practice meditation.

Moreover, when one is pursuing worldly business (laukikārtha) but does not apply one's whole mind to it, the business does not succeed; then how [would one reach] very profound (gambhīra) Buddhist wisdom if one neglects meditation? Meditation is the concentrating of the distracted mind (vikṣiptacittasaṃgrahaṇa). Distractions whirl about more easily than the down-feathers of the wild goose (sārasaloman); if their flying off is not restrained, their speed is greater than that of a hurricane; they are harder to contain than a monkey (markaṭa); they appear and disappear more [quickly] than lightning (vidyut). If the characteristic of the mind is at this point not fixed, those who want to control it would not succeed without dhyāna. Some stanzas say:

Dhyāna is the treasury (kośa) in which wisdom is kept.

It is the field of merit (puṇyakṣetra) of the qualities (guṇa).

Dhyāna is the pure water (viśuddhajala)

That can wash away the dust of desire (rāgarajas).

Dhyāna is the diamond armor (vajravarmāṇa)

That stops the arrows of the afflictions (kleśeṣu).

Even if one has not attained nirupadhiṣeṣanirvāṇa,

One has already partially obtained it.

When one has the diamond concentration (vajrsamādhi)⁴²⁰

One breaks the mountain of the fetters (saṃyojanagiri),

One obtains the power of the six superknowledges (abhijñā),

One is able to save innumerable beings.

A heavy rain can penetrate

⁴²⁰ This concentration is produced when the ascetic abandons the ninth and last category of the passions that attach him to the highest sphere of existence, the fourth ārupyasamāpatti, also called bhavāgāra.

The whirlwind of dust that hides the sun;

[In the same way] dhyāna can dissipate

The wind of vitarka-vicāra that distracts the mind.

Finally, dhyāna is hard to obtain (durlabha); it is by means of sustained attentiveness (ekacitta) and unrelenting special effort that the ascetic will succeed in acquiring it. If gods and sages (iṣi) do not succeed in obtaining it, what can be said of ordinary people (prthagjana) with lazy minds (kusīdacitta)?

[The second attack of Māra's daughters].⁴²¹ – When the Buddha was seated in meditation under the nyagrodha tree, the three daughters of Māra questioned him with these stanzas:

[181a] Alone, sitting under a tree

The six organs ever in repose.

Would you have lost a treasure?

Do you not feel the poison of grief and sorrow?

Your face is unequalled in the world

You remain alone, seated, your eyes closed.

Our minds are uncertain:

What are you looking for in this place?

Then the Bhagavat answered with these stanzas:

I have found the taste of nirvāṇa,

I do not like to dwell among the emotions,

I have chased away the internal and external enemies.,

Your father also I have put to flight.

I have found the taste of the Deathless (amṛitarasa),

I am seated in this forest in peace.

Beings are prey to attachments,

I feel compassion for them.

Then the girls felt ashamed and said to themselves: “This man has abandoned pleasures (vītarāga); he is unshakeable.” At once they disappeared and were not seen again.

II. MEANS OF ACQUIRING MEDITATION.⁴²²

Question. – By what means (upāya) is the virtue of meditation (dhyānapāramitā) attained?

Answer. – By eliminating five objects [namely, the five sensual desires], by avoiding five things [namely, the five obstacles] and by using five practices.

A. First Method: Eliminating the sensual desires.⁴²³

How to eliminate the five objects? The five objects of desire (pañcakāmaguṇanigarhaṇa) should be condemned by saying: Alas! Beings are always tortured by the five objects of desire and yet they seek them endlessly. Once obtained, the five objects of desire develop and progress like fever or magic. The five objects of desire are useless like the bone gnawed by a dog; they foment quarreling (vivāda) like the meat over which birds are contending; they burn a man like the torch carried in the wind; they harm a man like treading on a poisonous snake; they are futile (abhūta) like profit made in a dream; they are as short as a short-term loan.⁴²⁴ Foolish people are attached to the five objects of desire and will arrive at their death ⁴²² This section was repeated almost word for word by Tche yi (538-597), the founder of the T'ien t'ai school. In his Sieou si tche kouan tso tchan fa yao, T 1915, k. 1, p. 463b-465b (tr. Beal, Catena, p. 258-267).

⁴²⁴ To the bhikṣu Ariṭṭha, the Buddha compared the desires to a skeleton (aṭṭhikaṇkala), a piece of tainted meat (mamsapeṣi), a grass fire (tin' ukkā), a trench of glowing charcoal (aṅgārakāsu), a dream (supina), beggary (yācita), the fruit of a poisonous tree (rukkhaphala), a slaughterhouse (asisūna), a sharpened stake (sattisūla), the head of a snake (sappasira): cf. Vinaya, II, p. 25; Majjhima, I, p. 130; Aṅguttara, III, p. 97. - The Chinese sources also mention this conversation with Ariṭṭha: Tchong a han, T 26, k. 54, p. 763c; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 8, p. 56c; Mo ho without having rid themselves of them; as a result they will suffer immense sufferings. A madman who coveted a beautiful fruit climbed up a tree, ate the fruit and refused to come down; the tree was cut down, and when he fell out of it, he broke his head and died painfully. [The same fate is reserved for the one who covets the five objects of desire]. – Besides, these five objects of desire last only an instant: when the pleasure [that they bring] has disappeared, there is great suffering. These objects are like a knife coated with honey (madhvāliptaśāstra): those who lick it covet the sweetness [of the honey] and are unaware of the knife that cuts their tongue. The five objects of desire set man close to the animals; the wise man who knows them can avoid them. Here is an example:

[The upāsaka tempted by a goddess].⁴²⁵ – An upāsaka who was the head of a group of merchants earned his livelihood by making distant journeys. Once when he was traveling at night in the cold and the snow, his lost his companions and stopped in a rock cave. At that moment, the mountain goddess (giridevatā) changed into a woman and, approaching him in order to tempt him, spoke this stanza:

The white snow covers the mountain,

All the animals have gone away,

I am alone and without refuge,

I want only your sympathy.

[181b] The upāsaka covered his ears with his hands and answered with these stanzas:

Impudent and evil woman

Who speaks these impure words!

May you be carried away by water or burned by fire!

I do not want to hear your voice.

I have a wife, but I do not desire her.

How then would I commit a lustful deed [with you]?

The sense pleasures are not deep,

But the suffering and torment [that they bring] is very deep.

seng k'i liu, T 1425, k. 17, p. 367a; Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 17, p. 682a; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 15, p. 106a; Ken Pen chouo ... p'i nai ye, T 1449, k. 39, p. 840b.

⁴²⁵ Story retold in King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 37, p. 200b.

While one is enjoying pleasures, one is not satisfied;
 When one is deprived of them, one feels great sadness;
 When one does not have them, one wants to have them,
 When one has them, one is tormented by them.

The joys of pleasure are rare,
 The grief and pain they bring are abundant.
 Because of them, men lose their lives
 Like butterflies that dash into the lamp.

Hearing these stanzas, the mountain goddess released the man and led him back to his companions.

That man is wise who condemns the desires and is not attached to the five objects of desire, i.e., pleasant colors (rūpa), sounds (śabda), perfumes (gandha), tastes (rasa) and tangibles (spraṣṭavya). By seeking meditation (dhyāna), one should reject all of that.

1. Rejecting colors.

How to reject colors [taken here in the sense of female beauty]? By considering the damage (upaghāta) done by color. When a man is attached (abhiniviśate) to colors, the fire of the fetters (saṃyojana) burns him completely and consumes his body, like a fire that consumes gold and silver. Boiling broth, hot honey, have color and taste, but they burn the body and take the roof off your mouth; one must hurry to reject them: it is the same for attachment to beautiful colors and exquisite tastes.

Furthermore, the fact of loving or detesting depends on the person; color in itself is indeterminate (anīyata). How do we know that? When we see a man at a distance whom we like, we have feelings of joy and affection; when we see at a distance an enemy or adversary, we have feelings of anger and hostility; when we see a man who is indifferent to us, we have neither anger nor joy. If we want to expel this joy or this anger, it is necessary to reject bad feelings and colors, abandon them together at the same time. When molten gold burns your body and you want to get rid of it, it is not possible just to want to avoid the fire while keeping the gold; you must avoid both the gold and the fire.

[Bimbisāra at Āmrāpālī's home].⁴²⁶ – Thus king P'in p'o so lo (Bimbisāra), for the beauty of a woman, entered an enemy kingdom and stayed alone in the chamber of the courtesan (veśya) A fan p'o lo (Āmrāpālī).

⁴²⁶ A fan p'o lo is a rare and defective transcription for Āmrāpālī; see Fan fan yu, T 2130, k. 5, p. 1017c. Āmrāpālī (in Pālī, Ambapālī) was the rich courtesan of Vaiśālī who, shortly before the Buddha's death, went to visit him in great pomp, provided a princely reception for him and gave the Saṅgha the Ambapālīvana; this event is told in the sūtras (Dīgha, II, p. 95-98; Tch'ang a han, T 1, k. 2, p. 13b-14c; T 5, k. 1, p. 163b-164b; T 6, k. 1, p. 178c-179b), in the Vinaya (Pālī Vin, I, p. 231-233; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 20, p. 135b-136a; Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 40, p. 856a; Ken pen chouo ... tsa che, T 1451, k. 36, p. 385c-387c), and also elsewhere (e.g., Tchong pen k'i king T 196, k. 2, p. 161b). -Āmrāpālī was born miraculously in the flower of a mango-tree belonging to a brāhman in Vaiśālī. The brāhman adopted Āmrāpālī and made her a courtesan. Seven kings disputed over the favors of the young lady; Bimbisāra, king of Magadha, even though he was at war with the Licchavi of Vaiśālī, surreptitiously entered the city, penetrated into the tower where Āmrāpālī was shut up and amused himself with her for a week. Āmrāpālī bore him a son who later became the famous physician Jīvaka: cf. Nai niu k'i yu yin yuan king, T 553, p. 896-902 (tr. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 325-361; Nai niu k'i p'o king, T 554, p. 902-906; Wen che si yu tchong seng king, T 701, p. 802c-803c. According to the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya, the son of Bimbisāra and Āmrāpālī was called Abhaya (Gilgit Manuscripts, III, 2, p. 22), while Jīvaka was the son of Bimbisāra and the wife of a merchant whose name is not given (ibid., p. 23-25). In the Pālī sources, Vimala-Kondañña is given as the son of Bimbisāra and Āmrāpālī (Theragāthā Comm., I, p. 146): Jīvaka's father was Abhaya-Rājakumāra – one of Bimbisāra's sons – and his mother, a courtesan of Rājagṛha called Sālavatī (Manoratha, I, p. 399). The meeting between Bimbisāra and Āmrāpālī, to which the Mppś alludes here, is told at length in T 553 and 554 (l.c.): The king enters the garden by way of an aqueduct, climbs into the tower, seduces Āmrāpālī and, before leaving her, gives her his ring saying that if she has a daughter she can keep her, but if she has a son, she must bring him to the palace along with the ring as a sign of recognition.

A detailed recitation of the meeting is also given in the Cīvaravastu of the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya (cf. Dulwa in Rockhill, Life, p. 64, and Schiefner-Ralston, Tibetan Tales, p. 88-89). The original text, found at Gilgit, has been published in Gilgit Manuscripts, III, p. 19-21:

One day, the king of Magadha, Śreniya Bimbisāra, surrounded by his ministers on the palace terrace, said: "Sirs, do you know of a beautiful courtesan?" [The minister] Gopa replied: "Majesty, put aside the others. In Vaiśālī there is a courtesan named Āmrāpālī, wonderfully endowed with beauty and youth, learned in the sixty-four arts, worthy of being loved by Your Majesty alone." Bimbisāra said: "Gopa, if that is so, let us go to Vaiśālī and pay court to her." Gopa replied: "For a long time the Licchavi of Vaiśālī have been the adversaries and enemy of Your Majesty. May they do you no harm!" The king answered: "To men it is befitting to do men's deeds. Let's go!" Gopa said: "If that is Your Majesty's unshakeable wish, let's go." The king mounted his chariot and went to Vaiśālī with Gopa where they arrived at the right time. Gopa stayed in the park and Bimbisāra went into Āmrāpālī's house. Just then, a bell began to ring; the inhabitants of Vaiśālī were astonished: "What enemy has entered our city and made the bell ring?" they asked. The shouting grew louder; [hearing it], the king asked Āmrāpālī: "My dear, what is that?" – She said: "Your Majesty, they are going to search the houses." – "Why?" – "Because of Your Majesty." – "Well, should I flee?" – "Don't worry, they search my house only every seven days. During these seven days, amuse yourself here, make love, pay court; at the end of seven days I will know that the time has come [to send you away]." The king amused himself with her, made love to her and paid court to her, so much so that Āmrāpālī became [Udayana and the five hundred ṛṣis].⁴²⁷ – Out of attachment to female beauty (rūpaśaṅga), king Yeou t'ien (Udayana) cut off the hands and feet of five hundred ṛṣis.

For all these reasons, desire for colors (rūpakāmaguṇa) is condemned.

2. Rejection of pleasant sounds.

pregnant. Then she announced to Bimbisāra: “Your Majesty, I am pregnant!” Bimbisāra gave her a robe and a ring marked with his seal, saying: “If it is a girl, she will belong to you only; if it is a boy, you will clothe him in this robe, fasten this ring around his neck and send him to me.” The king went out, mounted his chariot with Gopa and returned. At once the bell was silent; the inhabitants of Vaiśālī said: “The enemy has gone. Let us chase after him!” Five hundred Licchavi armed with a strap protecting their left arm (godhā) and finger-guards (aṅgulitrāṇa) set out to chase Bimbisāra. Gopa saw them and said: “Your Majesty, the Licchavi of Vaiśālī are coming. Will Your Majesty do combat with them or drive the chariot?” The king answered: “I am a little tired, I will drive the chariot and you can fight with them.” Gopa engaged in battle with them. The Vaiśālī inhabitants recognized him and said: “That is a demon-man. Let’s go away!” They turned around, went back to Vaiśālī and made the following decision: “Sirs, we must take vengeance on these sons of Bimbisāra.”

⁴²⁷ Episode borrowed from the Vibhāṣā (cf. P’i p’o cha, T 1545, k. 61, p. 314b-c; A p’i t’an p’i p’o cha, T 1546, k. 32, p. 237b) and repeated in King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 39, p. 208b-c: Once there was a king called Wou t’o yen na (Udayana) who, at the head of his household, went to Mount Chouei tsi (85; 157 and 6, “Traces of Water”, transcribed in T 1646, p. 237b1 as Yu tou po t’o (75 and 22; 80 and 4; 85 and 5, 170 and 5), probably Udrakapada, corresponding to Udakavana in the Pāli sources: cf. Suttanipāta Comm. II, p. 514-515; Sārattha, II, p. 393]. He dismissed all the men, keeping only the women with whom he indulged in the five pleasures: he frolicked with them at will; there was fine music and the air was perfumed. The king ordered the women to dance naked. At that time, five hundred ṛṣis who had renounced the pleasures (vītarāga), riding on their abhijñā of miraculous power (ṛddhi) came by upon this scene. Some saw the beauty of the women, others heard the wonderful sounds, yet others breathed the delicious perfumes; they all lost their miraculous power and fell down on the mountain, unable to fly again, like birds with clipped wings. The king saw them and asked who they were. They answered: “We are ṛṣis.” The king asked: “Have you attained the basic absorption (maulasamāpatti) called ‘place of neither unconsciousness nor non-unconsciousness’ (naivasmjñāsamjñāātana)?” The ṛṣis replied that they had not obtained it. The king asked if they had attained the first dhyāna. They replied: “We had attained it once but now we have lost it.” The king became angry and said to them: “Men who have not renounced desire, why are you looking at the women in my palace? That is very unfitting!” Immediately he took out his sword and cut off the hands and feet of the five hundred ṛṣis.

Udayana (in Pāli Udena) was about to renew this act of cruelty in yet other circumstances: One day he discovered that his palace ladies had given Ānanda five hundred costly robes; fortunately, Ānanda was able to explain that gifts made to the community were never lost, and the king, satisfied with this explanation, in turn gave five hundred robes; cf. Pāli Vinaya, II, p. 291 (r. Rh. D.-Oldenberg, III, p. 382-384); Dhamapadaṭṭha, I, p. 218-220 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, I, p. 287-288). – Another day, walking in his park Udakavana, (cf. at the beginning of this note, the mountain Udakapda, mentioned in the Vibhāṣā), Udaka saw that his women had given their robes to the bhikṣu Bhāradvāja. He questioned the monk about the good based on their generosity, but the monk remained silent. Angry, Udayana tried to have him eaten by red ants, but Piṇḍola vanished into the sky; cf. Suttanipāta Comm., II, p. 514-515; Sārattha, II, p. 393-395; Jātaka, IV, p. 375. – Compare also Yi tsou king, & 198, k. 1, p. 175c-176b.

Why condemn sounds (śabda)? The nature of sounds is instability; once heard, they vanish. The madman (mūḍha) who does not know that sound is characterized by impermanence (anityatva), change (pariṇamatva) and disappearance (hānī), finds a futile pleasure in sounds (ghoṣa) and, when the sound has disappeared, he remembers it and is attached to it.

[The kiṇṇarī and the five hundred ṛṣis].⁴²⁸ – Thus five hundred ṛṣis lived on the mountain. A tchen t’o lo niu (kiṇṇari) was bathing in a pool in the Snow Mountains (Himavat) and when they heard her song, the ṛṣis lost their meditation (dhyāna): the rapture of their mind was so strong that they could not control it, as though a great wind were blowing in the trees in the forest.

[181c] Hearing this song of subtle beauty in sweet (mṛdu), tender (taruṇa) and pure (viśuddha) accents, they had a bad experience and were unable to control the violence of their minds. In the present lifetime, they lost their qualities (guṇa) and in the following lifetime, they fell into a bad destiny (durgati).

The sage considers that sound arises and ceases from moment to moment (kṣaṇakṣaṇam upannaniruddha), that the previous moment is not joined to the later moment and that there is no continuity (prabandha); knowing that, they do not have any attachment (abhinivesa) for sounds. If the music of the gods cannot trouble such a sage, how could the human voice succeed in doing so?

It is for all these reasons that desire for sounds (śabdakāmaguṇa) is condemned.

3. Rejection of pleasant smells.

Why condemn smells (gandha)? Some claim that being attached to smells is a slight fault; but attachment to smells opens the door to the fetters (samyojana). Even if one has maintained discipline (śīla) for a hundred years, one moment is enough to violate it.

[The śrāmaṇera who became a nāga].⁴²⁹ – Thus there was an arhat who always went to the palace of a nāga to eat. [One day], when the arhat had finished eating, he gave his bowl to a śrāmaṇera to wash it. Inside the bowl there were several grains of rice remaining; the śrāmaṇera smelled them and found them very strongly perfumed; he ate them and found their taste exquisite. He had recourse to a trick (upāya); he crept under the webbing of his teacher’s bed and when his teacher left, he entered the palace of the nāgas. The nāga said [to the teacher]: “This man has not yet obtained the Path; why have you brought him with you?” The teacher answered: “I did not notice [that he came with me].”

The śrāmaṇera received some rice and ate it; moreover, he saw a nāgī whose body was of perfect beauty and with unequalled perfume and grace; his mind became passionately attached to her and he made this vow: “May I take the place of this nāga and live in this palace.” The nāga said [to the teacher]: “In the future, don’t bring this śrāmaṇera.” When the śrāmaṇera returned, he applied himself one-pointedly (ekacittena) to practicing generosity (dāna) and observing discipline (śīla), only praying that he would become a nāga soon according to his vow. One day when he was circumambulating (pradakṣiṇā) the temple (caitya), some water appeared under his feet;⁴³⁰ then he understood that he definitely was about to become a nāga; he went to the shore of a great lake at the place where his master had previously entered [to go to the nāga]; he covered his head with his kāṣāya and entered the water; he died immediately and changed into a great nāga; because his merits were great, he killed the other nāga and the whole lake became red with blood.

A little later before this had happened, his teacher and the entire community (saṃgha) had blamed him; but the śrāmaṇera had said: “My resolve is fixed and the various marks [that I am about to have a nāga’s body] have already appeared.” His teacher and the whole community had gone to the lake to see him [throw himself in].

Such is the reason that one is attached to smells.

⁴³⁰ As Chavannes has noted, it was from the oozing of his hands that the śrāmaṇera of the Divyāvadāna, p.346, noticed that he was becoming a nāga.

[Padumapupphasutta].⁴³¹ There was a bhikṣu living in the forest. Walking along the banks of the lotus pool, he smelled the perfume (gandha) of the lotuses; his mind rejoiced and, passing by, he experienced feelings of fondness. The goddess of the pool said to him: “Why have you abandoned the foot of your tree, the place where you were sitting in meditation, and have come to steal my perfume? Because of your attachment to perfumes, the fetters (saṃyojana) that were asleep in you are awakened.” At the same time, a man came, went into the pool, gathered a mass of the lotuses and went away with his load. The goddess of the pool was silent and said not a word. The bhikṣu then said to her: “That man destroys your pool, takes your lotuses and you say nothing. I just walked along the pool and as soon as you saw me, you insulted me

⁴³¹ Padumapuppha or Puṇḍarikasutta in Samyutta, I, p. 204:

A certain bhikṣu who was living among the Kosalas was in the forest. Having returned from his alms-round after his meal, he washed in a pool and smelled a lotus. The goddess of the forest had compassion for the bhikṣu and, wanting to benefit him, came to him and, with the idea of making him feel ashamed, she said: “This water flower which was not given to you and which you are smelling, this is one of the things that can be stolen; you are a robber of perfume!”

The bhikṣu said: “I am not taking it, I am not breaking it, I am only breathing the perfume of this flower from afar. By what right am I being treated as a perfume thief? The person who tears up the roots and eats the flowers of the lotus and acts in such a disorderly way, why is he not called a thief?”

The goddess said: “The person [you are speaking of] is full of cruelty and stained like a nurse’s robe; my speech is not directed to him; however, I dare to say this: For a stainless man who always seeks purity, a sin as tiny as the tip of a hair appears to be as big as a cloud.”

The bhikṣu replied: “Truthfully, O yakṣa, you recognize me and you have compassion for me. Tell me again if you see anything like that, O yakṣa.”

She answered: “I see nothing to your detriment and you have nobody to act for you. You alone, O bhikṣu, must know how you will attain a good destiny.”

Inspired by this goddess, the bhikṣu was overcome with emotion.

The corresponding version in the Samyuktāgama is known by the Chinese tradition of the Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1338, k. 50, p. 369a-b (see also T 100, no. 358, k. 16, p. 490c). Like the Mppś, besides the bhikṣu and the goddess, it deals with a third individual who goes down into the water and “tears up the roots of the lotus and goes away heavily loaded.” It is he and not the bhikṣu who is satisfied with smelling the flowers who, it would seem, deserves the title of thief. Hence the comment of the bhikṣu: “He who tears up the roots and eats the flowers, is he not called a thief?” – The version of the Tsa a han also differs from the Pāli in the introduction and the conclusion: “One day, she said, the Buddha was dwelling in Śrāvastī in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A certain bhikṣu, living among the Kosalas and staying in the forest had sore eyes. His teacher told him to smell a lotus flower. Having received this advice, he went to the bank of a river of lotuses. He settled himself on the river-bank facing the wind, smelling the perfume brought by the wind, etc.” – The story ends as follows: “The bhikṣu, having listened to the goddess’ words, rejoiced, left his seat and went away. Retiring in solitude, he meditated zealously, cut his kleśas and became an arhat.”

The Padumapupphasutta, transformed into a jātaka by a well-known literary process (cf. Winternitz, Literature, II, p. 115, n. 2), is repeated in the Bhisapupphajātaka, Pāli Jātaka no. 392, III, p. 308-310. Like the Tsa a han and the Mppś, the Pāli jātaka introduces, besides the bodhisattva and the devatā, a third individual whom the Pāli sutta does not mention.

and blamed me for stealing your perfume!” The goddess of the pool answered: “That [182a] common evil man is always wallowing in the stench of sins and stains up to his head in impurity; I do not talk to him. But you are an honest man practicing meditation; however, by being attached to perfumes, you destroy the good that is in you; that is why I reproach you. If there is a black spot or some dirt on white immaculate cloth, everybody notices it. But this bad man is like a black spot on black cloth which nobody notices. Why question him?”

It is for all these reasons that the desire for perfumes (gandhakāmaguṇa) is condemned.

4. Rejecting pleasant tastes.

Why condemn tastes (rasa)? One must reason [and say]: Just by coveting exquisite tastes I will suffer all the sufferings; they will pour molten copper (kvathitāmra) into my mouth, I will swallow balls of burning iron (ādīptāyoguda). If I do not consider the nature of foods, feelings of gluttony will be established in me and I will fall into the level of the impure insects (aśucikṛima).

[The śrāmaṇera who loved cream].⁴³² – There was a śrāmaṇera who loved cream and was always thinking about it; each time the generous donors (dānapatī) distributed cream to the community (saṃgha), he received the remaining portion; in his mind, the love [of cream] was deeply planted and his joy never went away. At the end of his life, he was reborn [as an insect] in a cream-pitcher. The teacher of this śrāmaṇera had attained the state of arhat. One day when the community was sharing some cream, he said to [the bhikṣus]: “Gently, gently! Do not hurt the śrāmaṇera who loved cream.” The monks said to him: “That’s an insect; why are you talking to us about the śrāmaṇera who loved cream?” The teacher answered: “This insect was once my śrāmaṇera, always coveting the remainder of the cream; this is why he has taken birth in this pitcher.” The insect was in the portion of milk which the teacher had received; he showed himself and the teacher said to him: “Cream lover, why have you come?” Then he took the cream and gave it to him.

[The crown prince who was poisoned by fruit].⁴³³ – In a kingdom ruled by king Yue fen (Candrabhāga), there was a crown prince (kumāra) who loved exquisite tastes; each day the king’s gardener sent him fine fruits. There was a big tree in the garden at the top of which a bird was raising her chicks. This bird always flew full speed to the Perfumed Mountain (Gandhmādana), took a fruit of delicious flavor and [returned] to give it to her chicks who, in arguing over it, let one of the fruits fall to the ground. Next morning the gardener noticed it and, finding it strange, brought it to the king. The king admired the perfume and the extraordinary color of the fruit; the crown prince saw it and asked for it; the king, who loved his son, gave it to him as a gift. The prince ate it and appreciated its flavor so much that he wanted to have one every day.

⁴³³ Compare the Kimpakajātaka, Pāli Jātaka no. 85, I, p. 367: Certain members of a caravan, despite the warnings of the bodhisattva, ate fruit from the kimpaka tree which they mistook for mangoes; they were poisoned and died, victims of their own gluttony.

The king called the gardener and asked where the fruit came from. The gardener said: “This fruit was not planted; I found it on the ground; I don’t know where it came from.” The prince groaned, wept and refused to eat. The king reprimanded the gardener and commanded him to find another one. The gardener went to the place where he had found the fruit, noticed the bird’s nest and saw the mother arriving with a fruit [of the kind in question] in her beak. He hid in the top of the tree with the idea of taking away the fruit and, when the mother appeared, he took the fruit from her and brought it [to the king]. He did this every day. The mother bird, angry with the gardener, gathered on the Perfumed Mountain a poisonous fruit the perfume, taste and color of which were completely similar to the previous fruit. The gardener carried away this new fruit and offered it to the king; the king gave it to the crown prince but hardly had he finished eating it [182b] than the flesh of his body rotted and he died.

The taste for flavors is such that, [to satisfy it], one risks one’s life. For all these reasons, attachment to tastes is condemned.

5. Rejection of pleasant touchables.

Why condemn touch (sparśavya)? Touch is a flame that gives rise to all the fetters (saṃyojana); it is the root that binds the mind. Why? The other four instincts [the need to see, to hear, to feel and to taste] are each limited to a part [of the body], but the instinct [to touch] is spread over the entire body consciousness (kāyavijñāna); its place of arising (utpattisthāna) being vast, it produces a lot of passions (saṅga), and the attachment to which it leads is tenacious. How do we know that? If a person, attached to beauty [of the body], contemplates the body’s impurities, which are thirty-six in number, he experiences feelings of disgust (nirvedacitta); on the other hand, if he is attached to [pleasant] touch, it feels good to know impurity, he does not covet sweetness in the least: to consider the impurity of touching is of no use; this is why this instinct is so tenacious.

Furthermore, since it is so difficult to renounce it, one is always committing grave sins because of it and one will fall into the hells (niraya). There are two kinds of hell, namely, cold water and burning fire. In these two kinds of hell, one will suffer punishment as a result of bodily touch; the poison of the pain will take ten thousand forms. Touch is called the place of great darkness (mahātamasa), the most dangerous path of all.

[THE STORY OF YAŚODARĀ]⁴³⁴

⁴³⁴ The wife of the Buddha, mother of Rāhula, is called in the Pāli sources Rāhulamātā (Vin., I, p. 63), Bhaddakaccā[nā] (Buddhavaṃsa, XXVI, 15; Mahāvaṃsa, II, 24), Yasodharā (Buddhavaṃsa Comm., p. 245), Bimbādevī (Jātaka, II, p. 392; Sumaṅgala, II, p. 422) and Bimbāsundarī (Jātaka, VI, p. 478). She was born on the same day as the Buddha (Jātaka, I, p. 54) and married him at the age of sixteen (Jātaka, I, p. 58).

The different lives tell how the Buddha succeeded in winning the hand of his future wife in the course of a tournament where he showed his skill in the arts (śilpasamdarśana); in these sources, the Buddha's wife is designated sometimes by the name of Yaśodharā (Fang kouang ta tchouang yen king, T 187, k. 4, p. 561c; Yin kouo king, T 189, k. 2, p. 629b; Fo pen hingtsi king, T 190, k. 13, p. 712c; Tchong hui mo ho ti king, T 191, k. 4p. 942c; Buddhacarita, II, v. 26; Mahāvastu, II, p. 48 seq.), sometimes as Gopā or Gopī (Sieou hing pen k'i king, T 184, k. 1, p. 465b; T'ai tseu jouei ying pen k'i king, T 185, k. 1, p. 475a; P'ou yao king, T 186, k. 3, p. 500c; Yi tch'ou pen k'i king, T 188, p. 619a; Lalitavistara, p. 142 seq.). The marriage ceremony and the retinue are depicted on the Gandhāra monuments; cf. Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, I, p. 334-337.

According to the present passage of the Mppś, Śākyamuni has two wives, Yaśodhara and Gopā. – The Mulasarv. Vin. attributes three wives to him, Yaśodhara, Gopā and Mṛgajā, each surrounded by 20,000 courtesans (Ken pen chouo ... p'i nai ye, T 1442, k. 18, p. 720c12-13; P'o seng che, T 1450, k. 3, p. 114b24-26). The same Vinaya tells the circumstances in which Śākyamuni married them: 1) He himself chose Yaśodhara from all the young girls of his clan (T 1450, k. 3, p. 111c; Rockhill, Life, p. 20); 2) He stopped his chariot under Gopā's terrace; seeing this, Śuddhodana took Gopā and gave her to his son (T 1450, k. 3, p. 112c; Rockhill, Life, p. 21-22); 3) Seven days before his Great Departure, when he went to the palace, Mṛgajā (Kisāgotami in the Pāli sources, Mṛgī in the Mahāvastu): cf. Traité, I, p. 488 F as n.), spoke the famous stanza to him: Nibuttā nānasā mātā; thanking her, Śākyamuni threw her his necklace; seeing this, Śuddhodana took Mṛgajā and gave her to his son (T 1450, k. 3, p. 114b; Rockhill, Life, p. 23-24).

In regard to the conception and birth of Rāhula, at least three different traditions are distinguished:

1) According to a tradition represented by the Pāli Jātaka, I, p. 62 and the Buddhacarita, II, 46, Yaśodhara gave birth to Rāhula seven days before the Great Departure, and Śākyamuni came to kiss his son before leaving. After his six years of austerity and his enlightenment, when the Buddha returned to Kapilavastu, his son was seven years old.

2) According to a tradition attributed to the Mahāsaṃghikas by the Fo pen hing tai king, T 190, k. 55, p. 908c3, Śākyamuni had his first marital relations with Yaśodhara only seven days before the Great Departure (Ken pen chouo ... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 4, p. 115a; Rockhill, Life, p. 24, and Rāhula was conceived just before his father left (Mahāvastu, II, p. 159). Yaśodhara bore Rāhula in her womb for six years (Mahāvastu, III, p. 172; T'ai tseu jouei yin gi pen k'i king, T 185, k. 1, p. 475a20; Fo pen hing tsi king, T 190, k. 55, p. 908a14-15; Tsa pao tsang king, T 202, no. 117, k. 10, p. 496b26; Mo ho seng k'i liu, T 1425, k. 17, p. 365c12-16), and gave birth to him the very night that the Buddha reached enlightenment (Ken pen chouo ... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 5, p. 124c; Rockhill, Life, p. 32). – According to this latter tradition, the Buddha did not return to visit his family at Kapilavastu that year, but six years later; twelve years therefore had passed since his departure, namely, the six years of austerity and the six years following the enlightenment (Ken pen chouo ... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 12, p. 159a8-9). Thus Rāhula was six years old when he first saw his father and was ordained by him (Fo pen hing tsi king, T 190, k. 55, p. 906b26-28; Mppś, T 1509, k. 17, p. 182c).

3) Finally, according to another tradition, attributed to the Kāśyapīyas and to other teachers by T 190, k. 55, p. 908c3; 909c24, Rāhula was two years old when his father left home to devote himself to austerity and fifteen years old when he returned to Kapilavastu. Rāhula thus had the customary fifteen years of age when he became a śrāmaṇera.

⁴³⁵ For this episode, compare the following sources:

Mahāvastu, III, p. 142-143: Learning of Buddha's return to Kapilavastu, Yaśodharā prepared a cake (modaka) and gave it to Rāhula, telling him to offer it to his father and reclaim the paternal heritage. The Buddha told him to enter the order and then he would receive the paternal heritage. This offer and promise prove that Rāhula is truly the son of the Buddha and that Yaśodharā is without blame.

Fo pen hing tsi king, T 190, k. 55, p. 906c (tr. Beal, Romantic Legend, p. 360): When the Buddha arrived in Kapilavastu, Yaśodharā sent Rāhula to greet his father, and Śuddhodana asked the Buddha if Rāhula is truly his son. The Buddha answered: "Yaśodharā is perfectly pure and innocent: this one is indeed my son."

Tsa pao tsang king, T 203, no. 117, k. 10, p. 496b seq. Summarized in Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 136): As a result of her prolonged pregnancy, Yaśodharā was suspected of adultery by her father-in-law and the Śākyas. They dug a ditch filled with flaming wood and threw Yaśodharā into it. She called upon the Buddha, the flaming ditch was instantaneously transformed into a pool of pure water, in the middle of which Yaśodharā with Rāhula in her arms was sitting on a lotus flower. The Śākyas were convinced of her innocence and Rāhula became the favorite of his grandfather. Six years later the Buddha returned to Kapilavastu and Rāhula recognized his father unhesitatingly among the 1250 bhikṣus who resembled him perfectly. The Buddha caressed his sons' head.

Finally, here is the translation of a passage from the Mulasarv. Vin (T 1450, k. 12, p. 158c-150a): The Buddha was dwelling in Rājagṛha. At the time when the Bodhisattva left his (native) city, Yaśodharā was pregnant (garbhīṇī). When the Bodhisattva was practicing austerities (duṣkaracaryā) for six years, Yaśodharā was also practicing austerities in her palace; this is why her pregnancy escaped being noticed. Then, understanding the futility of his ascetic practices, the Bodhisattva took his ease and breathed deeply as he pleased; he took good food and regained his strength; he anointed his body with oil and bathed in warm water. Hearing that, Yaśodharā in her palace also relaxed her physical and mental efforts to conform to the conduct of the Bodhisattva; her womb and belly began to develop and enlarge under her joyfulness. Seeing this, the Śākyas jeered at her and said: "While the Bodhisattva, away from the palace, gave himself up to austerities, you in your palace were secretly meeting another man. Now you are pregnant and your belly is getting big!" Yaśodharā swore that she was not guilty. Shortly afterwards, she gave birth to a son, at the very moment when the (demon) Rāhu was eclipsing the moon. Her retinue (parivāra) gathered together to congratulate her. They were invited to give a name to the baby, and being consulted, they said: At the moment when this child was born, Rāhu was holding the moon with his hand; he must be given the name of Rāhula." The Śākyas, discussing together, claimed that this child was not the son of the Bodhisattva. Hearing that, Yaśodharā wept. Holding Rāhula in her arms, she made an oath; she took Rāhula and set him down on the "Bodhisattva", i.e., on a rock which was once in the palace and which [was consulted] to resolve enigmas. She set this "Bodhisattva" in the pool, making the following vow: "If this child is truly the son of the Bodhisattva, may he float; if he is not, may he sink to the bottom." She spoke, and Rāhula as well as the rock on which he was placed floated easily. Then Yaśodharā said: "I wish that they go from this shore to the other shore and then come back here", and it went according to her wish. Seeing that, the crowd cried out at the miracle. Taking up her son, she thought: "The Buddha Bhagavat has practiced austerities for six years; he has attained enlightenment and, since them six more years have passed. Twelve years having passed, he must return here. I will arrange it so that everyone will see the truth with their own eyes." Then the Bhagavat returned to Kapilavastu; one day he dined in the king's house; the next day he dined at the palace. Yaśodharā said to herself: Let us find a way that the Bhagavat will bend to my wishes." At that time there was in the city a heretic woman skillful at making love potions. Yaśodharā sent her five hundred pieces of gold, asking her to make a potion and bring it to her. This (Rāhulamātrijātaka): The Bodhisattva Śākyamuni had two wives: the first was called K'iu p'i ye (Gopiya or Gopā), the second Ye chou t'o lo (Yaśodharā) or Ye chou t'o lo heou lo mou (Yaśodharā Rāhulamātā). Gopā, being sterile (bandhya), had no children. Yaśodharā knew she was pregnant (garbhīnī) the same night that the Bodhisattva left home (pravrajita). After his departure, the Bodhisattva practiced asceticism (duṣkaracaryā) for six years; Yaśodharā was pregnant also for six years without giving birth. The Śākyas asked her: “The Bodhisattva has left home; whose fruit are you bearing?” Yaśodharā said: “I have not committed adultery; the son that I bear in my womb is truly the descendant of the crown prince (Śākyamuni).” The Śākyas continued: “Why are you so long in giving birth?” She answered that she did not know [the reason]. In public discussion, the Śākyas asked the king [Śuddhodana] to inflict a suitable punishment on her. Gopā said to the king: “I would like you to absolve Yaśodharā; I have always stayed with her, I am her witness (sākṣin) and I know that she has not committed any sin. Wait until her son is born and you will see whether or not he resembles his father; it will not be too late to punish her.” Then the king treated Yaśodharā with indulgence.

[In the meanwhile], the Buddha had completed his six years of austerities; the very night that he became Buddha, Yaśodharā gave birth to Rāhula. Seeing that he resembled his father, the king was overjoyed and woman made a little cake (modaka) of unique nature and brought it to the palace. Rāhula's mother took it, and before all the palace people, put it into Rāhula's hands, saying to him: “My child, take this cake and give it to your father.” The Buddha, endowed with omniscience, understood in advance: he knew that by giving birth to Rāhula, Yaśodharā had been attacked; he wanted to put a stop that very day to the slander. Knowing that, the Bhagavat produced by metamorphosis (nirmāṇa) five hundred individuals looking exactly like himself. Holding the cake in his hands, Rāhula passed by all these, not offering them anything, but he stopped in front of the (true) Buddha and gave him the cake. The Buddha accepted it, then gave it back to Rāhula who took it and swallowed it. The Buddha knew that after having eaten it, he would be under the influence of a spell. {Actually}, when the Buddha arose from his seat and went away, Rāhula went with him. The courtesans wanted to prevent him from leaving the palace, but Rāhula wept with anger; he insisted that he would go with the Buddha. On leaving, the Buddha thought: “I know that Rāhula will not take up another existence (punarbhava), that he will realize the fruits of the (Noble) Path (āryaphala) and that he will not want to live in the world.” Knowing that, the Buddha took him away with him. Thanks to his earlier vows (pūrvaprañidhāna), Rāhula had been able to recognize the Bhagavat in the midst of the five hundred buddhas; he did not want to leave him. Then king Śuddhodama, the palace people, the retinue and all the Śākyas, seeing this prodigy, were filled with respect for Yaśodharā. They understood the futility of the blame they had thrown on her previously. Free of all blame, Yaśodharā was satisfied.

The visit of the Buddha to Yaśodharā is represented on a stūpa discovered near the village of Goli, (Guntur District): cf. T. N. Ramadhandran, Buddhist Sculptures from a Stupa near the village of Goli, Bull Mus. Madras, a929, p. 5-7, pl. II(F). Rāhula, easily recognized by his head-dress, is represented three times in the same sculpture: on the right, he is respectfully receiving his mother's orders; in the center, he carefully carries in his right hand the ‘cake potion’ (modaka) that Yaśodharā intended for the Buddha; on the left, he goes to welcome the Buddha who, clothed in the Roman manner with a nimbus and exhibiting the abhayamudrā, is at the gate of the women's quarters. According to the interpretation of Ramachanran, the Rāhula of the center panel was playing ball; but the round object he holds seems rather to be the modaka that he was told to offer to his father according to the story of the Mahāvastu and the Mūlasarv. Vin. (l. c.) forgot his anger; he said to his ministers: “Although my son has gone, today he has a son completely like him.” Although Yaśodharā had avoided the shame of punishment, her bad reputation had spread in the kingdom; she sought to wash away this bad name. When Śākyamuni, having attained Buddhahood, returned to Kia p'i lo p'o (Kapilavastu) to convert the Śākyas, king Śuddhodana and Yaśodharā invited him at once to come to dine at the palace. Then Yaśodharā took a potion-cake (modaka) of a hundred flavors and gave it to Rāhula to offer to the Buddha. [182c] At the same time, by his miraculous power (iddhibala), the Buddha created five hundred arhats who completely resembled. Rāhula, then seven years old, took the potion-cake, went directly to the Buddha and respectfully offered it to the Bhagavat [thus proving that he discovered his father among the five hundred arhats completely like the Buddha]. Then the Buddha suspended his miraculous power and the five hundred [bhikṣus] resumed their initial aspect: they were seated with empty bowls (dhaupātreṇa), whereas the bowl of the Buddha was the only one that contained a potion-cake. Yaśodharā said to the king: “This proves that I have committed no sin.” Yaśodharā then asked the Buddha why she had been pregnant for six years.

[2. Jātaka explaining this prolonged pregnancy].⁴³⁶ – The Buddha said to her: In a previous lifetime, your son, Rāhula, was the king of a country. At that time, a ṛṣi possessing the five superknowledges (abhiññā) entered his kingdom and said to the king: “The king has the duty of punishing thieves; I want him to punish me.” The king asked: “What fault have you committed?” The ṛṣi replied: “I have entered your kingdom and have stolen (adattādāna): I drank water belonging to you unceremoniously and I took a willow twig belonging to you.” The king said: “But I would have given them to you; what ⁴³⁶ This well-known jātaka appears in the Mo ho seng k'i liu, T 1425, k. 17, p. 365c12-15, where the king who is accused of theft is called Li po (75 and 7; 85 and 6). It is told at length but without precise details in the Lieou tou tsi king, T 152, no. 53, k. 5, p. 30a-b (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 197-201); it is put into verse in the Fo wou po ti seu king, T 199, no. 25, p. 199a-b, and reproduced textually in the King kiu yi siang, T 2121, k. 7, p. 34a.

The most detailed version occurs in two closely related works, the Mahāvastu, III, p. 172-175, and the Fo pen hing tsi king, T 190, k. 55, p. 907a-908a (tr. Beal, Romantic Legend, p. 360-363): Sūrya and Candra were sons of a brāhman-king of Mithilā (called Jen t'ien, Maṇusyadeva (?) in T 190). The throne becoming vacant, Sūrya gave the kingdom to his brother and became a hermit. But having made the vow not to take anything, even a drop of water that was not given to him, one day he inadvertently violated his vow by drinking the water in the vase of an ascetic. Considering himself to be a thief, he demanded first from his disciples, then from his brother, the punishment he thought he deserved. Candra, in order to please him and to rid him of his scruples made him live for six days in an asoka forest where he was given the most delicate of food. At the end of six days, he proclaimed a general amnesty that freed Sūrya. Rāhula was at that time Candra, the Buddha was Sūrya (summarized by E. Senart).

To explain the six years of bearing Rāhula, the Mūlasarv. Vin. resorts to the same jātaka, but changes the names of the individuals: cf. Ken pen chouo ... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 12, p. 162b-c, summarized in Chavannes, Contes, IV, p. 120: Not far from the city of Vārāṇasī, two brothers lived as hermits in the forest; one was called Chang k'ie (Śh'āṅkha), the other Li k'i to (Likhita). The latter drank all the water from his brother's flask so that he had nothing to drink when he went out to beg. Likhita was accused before the king of having stolen the water from his brother. The king, who was leaving for the hunt, ordered him to wait without moving, then he forgot about him for six days. – For Śāṅkha and Likhita, see also a story in Ken pen chouo... yao che, T 1448, k. 16, p. 77c, which shows striking resemblance to Chavannes, Contes, no. 79, and the Mātāṅgajātaka of the Pāli Jātaka, IV, p. 376 seq.

crime have you committed? When I came to the throne, I gave this water and these willow branches to be used by everyone.” The ṛṣi answered: “Although the king made this gift, I fear that my crime has not been suppressed thereby; I would like to undergo the punishment today in order not to have to suffer it later.” The king answered: “If you absolutely insist, stay here a little and wait for me until I come back.” The king went back to his palace and stayed there for six days without coming out; the ṛṣi stayed in the king’s garden and he was hungry and thirsty for six days, while saying to himself that the king did well to punish him thus. At the end of six days, the king came out of his palace and apologized to the ṛṣi: “I forgot about you; please do not hold a grudge against me.” For this reason, the king suffered the punishment of the three evil destinies (durgati) for five hundred lifetimes and, for five hundred [other] lifetimes, he remained in his mother’s womb for six years. This is how it was proved that Yaśodharā had not committed any crime.

[3. Yaśodharā tries to win back the Buddha].⁴³⁷ – When the Bhagavat had finished eating, he left [the palace], and Yaśodharā was annoyed with him: “Such a handsome man is rare (adbhuta) in this world. I was able to meet him, but now I have lost him forever. When the Bhagavat was seated, he looked fixedly without moving his eyes; when the Bhagavat left, I followed him with my eyes, but he has gone and that is all.” Yaśodharā was very annoyed: each time the thought of him came to her, she sank to the ground, her breathing stopped, her companions sprinkled her with water and she began breathing again. Always alone, she wondered: “Who is skillful enough here in mantra to change his feelings and make him regain his original feelings so that we could be happy (together) as before?” Then she filled a golden bowl with the seven jewels (saptaratna) and precious jewels (maṇi), and offered it to anyone [who could advise her]. A brahmācārīn accepted it and said: “I can place a spell [on the Buddha] so that his feelings change. It is necessary to make a little cake of a hundred flavors (saptarasanamaya modaka), mix in medicinal herbs (oṣadhi) [183a] and ‘bind’ it with a spell (mantra); his mind will change and he will certainly come back.” Yaśodharā followed the instructions of the brahmācārīn, then sent someone to invite the Buddha: she wanted to reduce him completely under her power in front of the assembly (of monks). The Buddha entered the king’s palace, Yaśodharā offered him the cake of a hundred flavors which she put in his bowl (pātra) and the Buddha ate it. Yaśodharā hoped that, according to her desire, they would be happy as before; but the food taken by the Buddha had no effect; his mind and his eyes remained serene and calm. Yaśodharā said: “For the time, he doesn’t move; perhaps the strength of the herbs has not yet worked. But when their power will manifest, he will surely be as I wish.” The Buddha, his meal finished, chanted, got up from his seat and departed. Yaśodharā still hoped that the power of the herbs would act in the afternoon and that the Buddha would certainly come back to the palace [to find her]. However, the Buddha’s meal was like all the others; his body and mind were not changed. The next day at meal-time, the monks put on their robes, took their bowls and entered the city to beg their food. Hearing this story told, their respect [for the Buddha] increased; they said: “The Buddha’s power is immense; his mind miraculous (ṛddhicitta) is difficult to sound (durvighāhya) and inconceivable (acintya). The cake prepared by Yaśodharā had very great power; nevertheless, the Buddha ate it without his body and mind being modified.” Their meal over, the monks left the city and went to consult the Bhagavat about this affair. The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: “It is not only during the present lifetime that this Yaśodharā has tried to seduce me with a cake (modaka); in previous lifetimes, she had tempted me with a cake.” Then the Bhagavat told the bhikṣus the Jātakanidāna that follows:

[4. Isiṅga-jātaka].⁴³⁸ – In times gone by, there was a recluse (ṛṣi) in the mountains in the kingdom of P’o lo ni (Vārāṇasī); in the second month of autumn, he was urinating into his wash-basin when he saw some bucks and does mating; he became lustful and his semen dripped into the basin; a doe drank it and immediately became pregnant; at the end of her time, she bore a child that looked quite human but had a horn on his head and his feet were like those of a deer. When the doe was about to give birth, she went to the hermit’s dwelling and bore him there; seeing that her baby was human, she entrusted him to the hermit and went away. When the hermit came out, he saw the doe’s baby; he thought about the early causes for it and understood that this was his own son, and so he gathered him up in his arms and raised him. Then, when the child grew up, he set himself to teach him.

⁴³⁸ The story of the hermit unicorn, Rṣyaśṛṅga or Ekaśṛṅga, seduced by a maiden (princess Nalinī, the courtesan Śātā or the goddess Alambusā) belongs to universal and Indian folklore. The characteristic feature of the story is that of the victorious woman, perched on the back of the ascetic she has seduced. [The young man] understood the great holy books of the eighteen types; he practiced meditation (dhyāna); he practiced the four superknowledges (abhijñā). One day when he was climbing the mountain, there was a heavy rain; the muddy slippery ground was not suitable for his feet and he fell, breaking his container (read tchḥng, 167 and 9) and his foot; very annoyed, with his container full of water, he uttered a magical spell for it to stop raining; by the effects of the hermit's merits, the nāgas stopped the rain. As there was no further rain, the five grain crops and the five fruits were no longer produced; the people were at the end of their resources and had no further means of livelihood.

The king of Vārāṇasī was angry and worried; he commanded his [183b] ministers to meet and discuss the matter of the rain. In the discussion, a wise man said: "I have heard that, on the hermits' mountain, there is a recluse called Unicorn (Ekaśṛṅga): because of his clumsy feet, he fell while climbing the mountain and hurt his foot; in his anger, he uttered a magical spell commanding it to stop raining for twelve years." The king thought and said: "If it is not going to rain for twelve years, my kingdom and the people are lost." Then the king published an appeal [to his people, saying]: "I will give half of my kingdom to anyone who can make this hermit lose his five superknowledges (abhijñā) and become an ordinary subject of mine." There was, at that time in the kingdom of Vārāṇasī, a courtesan named Chan t'o (Śāntā) of unequalled beauty; she came in answer to the king's appeal. She asked people whether or not [Ekaśṛṅga] was a man; they answered that he was the son of a hermit. The courtesan said: "If he is a man, I can get rid of him." Having spoken thus, she took a golden dish which she filled with fine precious objects and said to the king: "I will sit astride this hermit's back." Then the courtesan got five hundred chariots in which she placed five hundred lovely women, and five hundred chariots drawn by deer in which she placed all kinds of magical cakes made with medicinal herbs; she painted them in different colors so that they looked like various fruits; she also brought all kinds of strong liquor which, in color and taste, were like water. [She and her companions] dressed in garments of tree bark and grass and wandered through the trees in the forest like hermits. They made themselves leafy huts (parṇaśāla) near the hermit's dwelling and stayed there.

The recluse Ekaśṛṅga, having gone for a walk, saw them; all the women came out to meet him and offered him lovely flowers and perfumes; the latter was happy with them; with sweet words and respectful expressions the women asked about the health of the hermit; they took him into a room, seated him on a fine soft bed, gave him some of the clear liquor which they called pure water and some of the cakes which they said were fruit. When the hermit had eaten and drink as much as he wanted, he said to the women: "Since I was born, I have never found fruit so good and water so excellent as this." The women said to him: "We do good with all our heart; this is why heaven grants us our wishes and we find these fruits and water." The hermit said to the women: "Why is the color of your skin so gleaming and so fresh?" They answered: "It is because we always eat these good fruits and drink this excellent water." The women said to the hermit: "Why not settle down and live here?" He answered: "Indeed, I could live here." The women invited him to bathe with them and he accepted that also. The women's hands touched him gently and his mind was moved thereby. Then he bathed in the company of these lovely women and, as lust had developed in him, he committed lustful actions with them. He immediately lost his superknowledges (abhijñā) and the heavens let fall a great rain for seven days and seven nights. [The courtesan] allowed him to give himself up to pleasure, to eat and drink, for seven days.

At the end of this time, the liquor and the provisions were entirely used up, and they substituted mountain water and the fruit of the trees for them; but the taste was not at all pleasant and [the recluse] demanded the food that he had [183c] been given previously. [The courtesan] answered: "There is no more; now we will go and gather some; not far from here there is a place where we can find some." – "As you wish", said the hermit. Then they went together. Knowing that the city was not far away, the courtesan lay down on the road, saying: "I am at the end of my strength and I cannot walk any further." The hermit said to her: "If you cannot walk, get up on my back, I will carry you."

Previously the woman had sent a letter to alert the king, saying: "O king, you will see what my wisdom can do." The king ordered his chariot, went out and saw the sight. He asked [the courtesan]: "How did you manage to do it?" She said: "I achieved this result by means of the power of my skillful means (upāya); there is nothing that I cannot do." The king commanded that the hermit remain in the city; he made him abundant offerings and treated him respectfully; he satisfied his five wishes and named him prime minister.

When the hermit had lived in the city for some days, his body became emaciated; he thought of the joys of meditation (dhyānasukha) and was weary of worldly desires. The king asked him why he was unhappy and why he was becoming thin. The hermit replied: "Although I enjoy the five objects of desire, I am always thinking of my forest retreat and the place frequented by the hermits; I cannot detach my mind from that." The king said to himself: "I am doing violence to this man; this violence makes him unhappy; his suffering is extreme and he will die. My original purpose was to put an end to the calamity of drought and now I have attained it. Why should I still do violence to him?" Then he sent him away. [The recluse] returned to his mountain and thanks to his exertion, he soon recovered his five superknowledges (abhijñā).

The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: "The hermit Ekaśṛṅga was myself; the courtesan was Yaśodharā. At that time, she led me astray with a cake (modaka) and, as I had not cut the bonds, I was seduced by her. Again today she wanted to seduce me by means of the cake with medicinal herbs, but she did not succeed."

For this reason, we know that slight attachments (sūksmamṛdusparśana) can trouble recluses and, all the more so, worldly people (prthagjāna). For these reasons, subtle desires are condemned.

B. Second method: removing the obstacles.⁴³⁹

⁴³⁹ In order to succeed in the first stage of meditation, it is not enough to keep away from desires (vivice' eva kāmehi). It is also necessary to stay away from bad dharmas (vivicca akusalehi dhammehi); the latter constitute the five obstacles to dhyāna, which are envy, malevolence, laziness-torpor, excitement and regret, doubt. Cf. Dīgha, I, p. 71, 246; II, p. 300; III, p. 234; Majjhima, I, p. 144; Saṃyutta, V, p. 60; Aṅguttara, III, p. 16: Pañca nīvaraṇāni: kāmaccandanīvaraṇaṃ, vyāpādanīvaraṇaṃ, thīnamiddhanīvaraṇaṃ, uddhaccakukkuccanīvaraṇaṃ, vicikicchānīvaraṇaṃ. – A canonical passage endlessly repeated, praises the complete freedom of mind of the ascetic who has destroyed these obstacles: cf. Dīgha, I, p. 71; Majjhima, I, p. 181, 269, 274, 347; III, p. 136; Aṅguttara, III, p. 92; IV, p. 437; V, p. 207.

Having thus condemned the five sensual desires, it is necessary to remove the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa).

1. Removing envy.

The person who is prey to envy (kāmacchanda) strays far from the Path.

Why? Because envy is the basis for all sorts of worries and chaos. If the mind is attached to envy, there is no way to approach the Path. To remove this envy, some stanzas say:

How can a monastic (mārgapraviṣṭa), modest and reserved,
Carrying the begging-bowl and benefiting beings,
Still tolerate impure envy
And be plunged into the five attachments?

The soldier clothed in armor, bearing a sword and a rod,
Who withdraws and flees from the enemy,
Is nothing but a coward,
Scorned and ridiculed by everyone.

The bhikṣu in the rôle of a mendicant
Has cut his hair and put on the kāṣaya,
But still allows himself to be led by the horses of the five attachments,
He too collects nothing but mockery.

[184a] If a famous man

Richly dressed and with body adorned
Went to beg for clothes and food,

The Mppś develops these ideas here. They will be found in Vibhāṣhā, T 1545, k. 38, p. 194c; k. 48, p. 249c; cf. Kośa, V, p. 98-100, a better explanation. For the Pāli sources, consult Dhammasaṅgahaṇī, p. 204-205; Atthasālinī, p. 380 seq.; S. Z. Aung, Compendium, p. 172.

He would be mocked by people.

If a bhikṣu who has renounced adornment,
Scorns fashion and concentrates his mind
And, nevertheless, seeks sensory pleasures,
He too would gather only mockery.

Having renounced the five sense pleasures,
Having rejected them, having refused to think about them,
Why would he follow after them again
Like a madman who returns to his own vomit?

The greedy man
Ignores his earlier vows;
He no longer distinguishes between the beautiful and the ugly;
Drunkenly he hurls himself into desire (trṣṇā).

Modesty (hrī), restraint (apatrāpya) and other respectable qualities,
All of that has disappeared all at once;
He is no longer respected by wise people
And is visited only by fools.

Desires provoke suffering when they are sought out,
Fear when they are possessed,
Resentment and grief when they are lost;
They bring not a moment of happiness.

Such are the torments of desire!

How can one escape them?

By acquiring the happiness of dhyāna and samāpatti:

Then one is no longer deceived.

Attachment to sensual pleasures is insatiable,

How can one put an end to them?

If one acquires the meditation of the repulsive (aśubhabhāvana),

These [greedy] minds disappear by themselves.

Attachment to desire is unconscious;

How can one become aware of them?

By considering old age, sickness and death;

Then one succeeds in getting out of the four bottomless pits.

It is difficult to reject desires;

How can one escape from them?

If one can be pleased with the good dharmas

These desires disappear by themselves.

Desires are difficult to undo;

How can one loosen them?

By considering the body and perceiving its true nature;

Then one is tied by nothing.

Considerations such as these

Can extinguish the fire of the desires:

The jungle fire

Cannot withstand a heavy rain.

It is for all these reasons that one removes the obstacle of greed (kāmacchandānīvaraṇa).

2. Removing malevolence.

The obstacle of malevolence (vyāpādanīvaraṇa) is the origin of the loss of all good dharmas (kuśaladharmahāni), the cause of falling into the unfortunate destinies (durgati), the enemy of all happiness (sukha), the abductor of good minds (kuśalacitta), the reservoir of all kinds of harmful speech (pāruṣyavāda).

The Buddha addressed the following stanzas to a wicked disciple:

You must think and reflect

On the obscene and vicious [character] of conception,

[184b] On the dark suffering of the stay in the womb,

On the hardships that accompany birth.

Thinking about all that, the person

Who does not pacify his wrath [toward people]

Would, by all rights, be considered

An unaware individual.

If the retribution for wrongs did not exist

And if they were free of all blame,

People would still have plenty to complain about.

How much more so if they are struck by painful punishment?

By considering old age, sickness and death

Which nobody can avoid,

It is necessary to feel loving-kindness and pity.

Why should you still afflict them with your hatred?

People who hate, rob and strike one another

Undergo the poison of suffering.

Why would an honest man

Further add to their torment?

One must always practice loving kindness and compassion,

Cultivate the good in a concentrated mind,

Not nourish bad feelings,

Not torment anyone.

If one cultivates the Path of Dharma diligently

One will commit no harm.

Good and evil are two opposing forces

That meet face to face like water and fire.

When wickedness covers the mind

One does not distinguish the beautiful from the ugly,

One does not separate good deeds from offences,

One no longer fears the bad destinies.

One does not take into account the sufferings of others,

One does not clean up physical or mental fatigue.

The suffering that one has at first suffered oneself,

One then extends that suffering to others.

The person who wants to destroy wickedness

Should meditate on thoughts of loving-kindness.

Alone, sheltered in retreat,

Stopping all activity, he destroys all the causes and conditions.

One should fear old age, sickness and death,

Exclude the nine kinds of anger.

By meditating thus on loving-kindness

One will attain the destruction of the poison of anger.

It is for all these reasons that one removes the obstacle of malevolence (vyāpādanīvaraṇa).

3. Removing laziness-torpor.

The obstacle of laziness-torpor (styānamiddha) can destroy the threefold benefit of the present world, namely, the happiness of pleasure (kāma), the happiness of wealth (artha) and merit (punya); it can destroy the definitive happiness (niṣṭhasukha) of the present and the future life; it differs from death only by the presence of breathing. Here are the stanzas addressed by the Buddha to reproach a lazy disciple:

“Get up! Don’t stay lying down, overprotecting your rotten body! It is impurities of all kinds that are called a person. If you were struck by serious illness, if an arrow was shot into your body, if all the sufferings were piled upon you, would you be able to sleep in peace?”

If the entire world were burning with the fire of death and you were trying to escape, would you be able to sleep in peace? When a man, laden with chains, is led to his death and misfortune menaces him, could he sleep in peace?

[184c] The chains, the enemies, are not destroyed; the torments have not been removed. If you were spending the night in the same room as a poisonous snake, or if you were going to engage in battle with a bladed weapon, would you then sleep in peace?

Sleep is this deep darkness where nothing is seen. Each day it comes frown [over us] and steals one’s clarity. When sleep covers the mind, nothing more is known. In the face of such a great loss, could you sleep in peace?”

It is for all these reasons that the obstacle of laziness-torpor (styānaniddhanīvaraṇa) is condemned.

4. Removing excitement (restlessness) and regret.

The obstacle of excitement (auddhatya) and regret (kaukrīya). – Excitement is a dharma that harms the mind of the monastic (pravrajyācitta): if a person with concentrated mind (saṃgrhitacitta) cannot remain faithful, then what can be said of a person with a scattered mind (vikṣiptacitta)? The excited person is as uncontrollable as a mad elephant (gandhagaja) without a hook or a camel (uṣṭra) with pierced nose. Some stanzas say:

“You have shaved your head; you have put on the kāṣāyā; holding the clay begging-bowl (pātra), you go to beg your food. Why do you still take pleasure in excitement? You will lose the profits of the religious life after having [already] renounced the joys of the world.”

The person who is prey to regret (kaukr̥tya) is like a criminal always tortured by fear (bhaya). When the arrow of regret has entered the mind, it is implanted there and cannot be torn out. Some stanzas say:

If he has done what he should not do,
If he has not done what he should have done,
He is burned by the fire of regret.
Later, he will fall into the bad destinies.

A man can regret his crime;
After having regretted it, he [should] forget it.
In this way his mind will find peace.
He should not think [of his mistakes] incessantly.

There are two kinds of regrets,
According to whether there was omission or performance.
To attach one’s mind to such remorse
Is the mark of a fool.

One must not give oneself up to regret
Because [the good] that one has omitted doing one can always do;
And the bad that one has committed,
One cannot help having already done it.

It is for all these reasons that the obstacle of excitement and of regret is condemned (auddhatyakaukr̥tyanīvaraṇa),

5. Removing doubt.

The obstacle of doubt (vicikitsānīvaraṇa). – When doubt covers the mind, one is unable to fix one’s mind on the good dharmas. Concentration (saṃāhitacitta) being absent, there is nothing to be gained from the Buddhadharma. Thus the man who goes to a mountain of jewels (ratnagiri) is unable to gather any if he has no hands. Speaking of doubt, some stanzas say:

The person at the crossroads
Who hesitates goes nowhere.
It is the same for doubt
About the true nature of dharmas.

As a result of doubt, one does not diligently seek
The true nature of dharmas.
Doubt is the outcome of ignorance (avidyā);
It is the worst of all the evils.

In regard to good and bad dharmas,
Saṃsāra and nirvāṇa,
[185a] The absolute truth (tathatā) and dharmatā.
One should not conceive any doubt.⁴⁴⁰

If you conceive doubts,
The king of death and his jailers will enchain you;
Like the gazelle taken by the lion,

⁴⁴⁰ We know that every word spoken by the Buddha is recognized by four characteristics: it is useful and not harmful, it conforms to (ethical) Law and is not contrary to the Law, it destroys the afflictions and does not increase them, it inspires love for nirvāṇa and not for saṃsāra. See the passage of the Madhyāśāyasaṃcodanasūtra cited in Traité, I, p. 82F as note. On the other hand, the speech of the Buddha does not contradict the nature of dharmas (dharmatām na vilomayati), i.e., pratītyasamutpāda (ibid. p. 81F as note). These essential truths are not to be held in doubt by Buddhists.

You will find no way to escape.

Although here below there may always be doubts,

It is important to follow the Holy Dharma.

The person who comes across a fork in the road

Should always take the good Path.

It is for all these reasons that it is necessary to remove the obstacle of doubt (vicikitsānīvaraṇa).

Removing these five obstacles is like escaping from the debt that you owe, curing a serious illness, finding an oasis in the desert, being saved from the hands of brigands and finding safety (yogaḥṣema) free of torment. Thus the ascetic who has removed the five obstacles has a pacified (ḥṣema) mind, pure (viśuddha) and joyful (sukha). The sun and moon are hidden by five things: when smoke (dhūma), cloud (abhra), dust (rajas), fog (mahikā) or the hand of the āsura Rāhu intercepts them, they cannot shine;⁴⁴¹ similarly, when a person's mind is covered by the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa), it can be of no use either to oneself or to others.

C. Third method: Practicing the five dharmas.

If he has been able to reject the five sense objects (kāmaguṇa) and remove the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa), the ascetic practices the five dharmas: 1) aspiration (chanda), 2) exertion (vīrya), 3) mindfulness (smṛti), 4) clear seeing (saṃprajñāna), 5) concentration of mind (cittaikāgratā); by practicing these five dharmas, he acquires the first dhyāna furnished with five members (pañcāṅgasamanvāgata).

1) Chanda is zeal in kāmadhātu; when it is produced, the first dhyāna is obtained.

2) Vīrya (exertion) in the observance of the precepts (śīla), in leaving family life, concentrated zeal without laziness (kausīdya) during the two watches of the night, limited food (mitabhojana) and one-pointedness of mind (cittasaṃgrahaṇa) without distraction (vikṣepa).⁴⁴² ⁴⁴¹ Cf. Upakkilesasutta (Aṅguttara, II, p. 53; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 20, p. 650a: Cattāro 'me bhikkhave candimasuriyānaṃ upakkilesā yehi upakkilesehi upakkiliṭṭhā candimasuriyā na tapanti na bhāsanti na virocanti. Katame cattāro? Abhaṃ... mahikā... dhūmarajo... Rāhu asurindo hena upakkilesena upakkiliṭṭhā sandimasuriyā na tapanti na bhāsanti na virocanti, - This sūtra appears accounts of the second council: Vinaya, II, p. 295; T 1421, k. 30, p. 192c; T 1428, k. 54, p. 969a-b; cf. Hofinger, Concile de Vaiśālī, p. 34, 36, 39.

⁴⁴² This exertion manifests in the pursuit of the four qualities that make a monk incapable of falling back (abhabbo pariṇāyā) and close to nirvāṇa (nibbāness' eva santike): observance of morality (śīlasampatti), guarding the senses (indriyeṣu guptadvārata), moderation in eating (bhojana mātrāññutā) and effort in the vigil (jāryām

3) Smṛti is mindfulness applied to the happiness of the first dhyāna. The ascetic knows that kāmadhātu is impure, deceptive, contemptible, whereas the first dhyāna is estimable and laudable.

4) Samprajñāna is a clear seeing, appreciating and considering the happiness of kāmadhātu and the happiness of the first dhyāna, their importance and their respective benefits.

6) Cittaikāgratā consists of always fixing the mind on one object (ālamabana) and preventing scattering.

Furthermore, in pursuing the first dhyāna, one rejects the sense pleasures (kāmasukha), for by incessantly trying to conquer one's enemies that one is no longer tormented by them. The Buddha said to a brahman attached to desire: "At the start, I had precise vision (samanupaśyāmi) of the desires (kāma); the desires are cause and condition (hetupratyaya) of fear (bhaya), of sadness (daurmanasya) and of suffering (duḥkha); the desires bring little pleasure (alpāsvāda), but much pain (bahuduḥkha)."⁴⁴³ Desire is Māra's net (jvāla) and fetter (kāṣa) from which it is difficult to escape; it is like a forest burning on all four sides; desire is as dreadful as falling onto a ditch full of fire or handling a venomous snake; it is like a brigand brandishing a sword, like a wicked rakṣasa, like dangerous poison poured into the mouth, like molten copper (kvathitatāmra) poured down one's throat, like a mad elephant, like falling off a cliff, like a lion barring the road, like the makara fish opening its mouth; desires are as [185b] formidable as all of those. Attachment to desire is man's misfortune. The person attached to desire is like a prisoner in his jail, a deer in a pen, a fish that has taken the bait, a snake in the presence of a wild boar, a mouse in the claws of a cat, a bird in a net, a crow in among kites, a blind man on the edge of a ditch, a fly above boiling oil, a sick man in the army, a crippled man in a fire. [Being attached to desire] is entering into a river of salt water, licking a knife coated with honey. Desire is meat sold at the crossroads, the slicing forest hidden under a thin cover, excrement covered with flowers, a poisoned jar dipped in honey, a chest full of poisonous snakes, the illusion of a dream, the loan that must be repaid, the magic show that fools little children, the flame without any solidity. [Giving oneself up to desire] is like diving into deep water, being swallowed by the makara fish's gullet. Desire is the hail that destroys the grain, the lightning that strikes men. Desires are all of that, deceptive, unreal, without consistency or vigor, they bring little pleasure but much suffering. Desire is Māra's army that destroys all good qualities. Since it torments beings unceasingly, it lends itself to many comparisons (upamāna). By rejecting the five desires, by keeping away from the five obstacles and by practicing the five Dharmas, one arrives at the first dhyāna.

anuyoga). These qualities are defined in Aṅguttara, II, p. 39-10; see also Saṃyutta, II, p. 219; Aṅguttara, I, p. 113; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 12, p. 603c; Mahānidessa, II, p. 483-484.

⁴⁴³ Cf. Cūladukkhakkhandhasutta in Majjhima, I, p. 91-92; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 25, p. 586b22: Mayhaṃ pi kho, Mahānāma, pubbe va sambodhā anabhisambuddhassa bodhistass' eva sato "appaśādākāmābahudukkhā bahupāyasa, ādīnava ettha bhiyyo" ti etaṃ yathābhūtaṃ sammappaññāyasudīṭṭhaṃ ahoṣi: "I too, Mahānāman, before my enlightenment, had indeed seen, with correct knowledge and in harmony with the truth, that the passions have little delight, many problems, much suffering and that the disadvantages therein are multiplied." The same condemnation appaśādā kāma. etc., is repeated for the bhikkhu Ariṭṭha in Vinaya, II, p. 25; Majjhima, I, p. 130; Aṅguttara, III, p. 97. – The present passage of the Mppś precedes this verdict with a statement on kāma, the cause of fear and suffering: it occurs in Aṅguttara, IV, p. 289: Bhayan ti bhikkhave kāmānaṃ etaṃ adbhavanāṃ, sukkhan ti nhikkhave kāmānaṃ etaṃ adbhavanāṃ, etc.

Question. – The absorptions and concentrations, such as the eight liberations (vimokṣa), the eight spheres of mastery (abhibhāvātana), the ten spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana) and the four immeasurables (apramāṇa) are never described as virtues (pāramitā). Why is dhyāna the only one to be described as the ‘virtue’ of dhyāna (dhyānapāramitā)?

Answer. – 1. The qualities (guṇa) of all these absorptions are of the order of reflection (cinta) and meditation (bhāvana). In the language of the Ts’in, dhyāna means reflection and meditation. In speaking of the virtue of dhyāna, all the qualities are included.

2. Moreover, dhyāna is in the most important place, like a king. Speaking of dhyāna is to include all the other absorptions; speaking of the other absorptions does not include dhyāna. Why? Because in the four dhyānas, knowledge (jñāna) and the absorptions are equal and balanced. In the anāgāmya (preliminary absorption preceding the first dhyāna), knowledge (jñāna) overcomes absorption (samāpatti) whereas, in the formless absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti following the dhyānas), absorption overcomes knowledge; these states are not balanced. When one wheel of a chariot is more solid than the other, it is not safe (kṣema); it is the same when knowledge and absorption are unequal.

Finally, in the four dhyānas there are the four equalities of mind (samacitta), the five abhijñās, the vimokṣas, the abhibhāvātanas, the kṛtsnāyatanas, the concentration hindering the arising of the passions in others (araṇāsamādhi), the knowledge resulting from vows (prañidhāna) the summit dhyāna (prāntakoṭidhyāna), the sovereign concentration (īśvarasamādhi ?), dhyāna brought to its maximum (vr̥ddhikāṣṭhāgata dhyāna), the four magically creative minds (nirmāṇacitta), the Pan tcheou pan (pratyutpannasamādhi),⁴⁴⁴ all the Bodhisattva’s samādhis, the Hero’s Walk (śūramgama), etc., which number 120, all the Buddha’s samādhis, Unmovable, etc., which number 108,⁴⁴⁵ the attainment of wisdom by the Buddhas and their renouncing of life (āyuhparityāga): all these various absorptions occur in the dhyānas; this is why dhyāna is qualified as a virtue (pāramitā), whereas the other absorptions are not.

III. DEFINITION OF THE VARIOUS DHYĀNAS AND SAMĀPATTIS.⁴⁴⁶

⁴⁴⁴ All these qualities will be defined below, p. 1041F seq. The pratyutpannasamādhi is the subject of the Bhadrāpālasūtra; cf. Traité, I, p. 430F, n. 1.

⁴⁴⁵ For these 108 samādhis, see references in Traité, I, p. 324F, n.1

[185c] Answer. – By being based on the gates of absorption such as the meditation on the disgusting (aśubhabhāvana) and mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasmṛti), etc.⁴⁴⁷

Thus, it is said in the explanatory stanzas of the Tch’an king (Dhyānasūtra):⁴⁴⁸

Avoiding desires and bad dharmas

A person enters into the first dhyāna,

Furnished with examination (saṁtarka) and judgment (saṁcāra),

Coming from detachment (viveka), which is joy (prīti) and happiness (sukha).

Avoiding the flames of lust,

He is endowed with clear cool absorption.

Happy like a person who, tormented by the heat,

Enters into a cold pool.

As in the poor man who has found a treasure,

Following is a translation of this sūtra: “Here, the monk, having avoided the desires, having avoided the bad dharmas, enters into the first dhyāna, furnished with examination, furnished with judgment, coming from detachment and which is joy and happiness. – By suppressing examination and judgment, he enters into the second dhyāna, internal peace, one-pointed mind, without examination, without judgment, arisen from concentration, which is joy and happiness. – By renouncing joy, he remains indifferent, reflective, aware; he experiences happiness in his body; he enters into the third dhyāna that the saints call ‘indifferent, reflecting, dwelling in happiness’. – By destroying happiness and by destroying pain, by the previous suppression of joy and sadness, he enters into the fourth dhyāna, free of pain and happiness, purified in renunciation and reflection. – Having surpassed any notion of matter, suppressing any notion of resistance, neglecting any notion of multiplicity, he cries out: “Infinite space” and penetrates into the sphere of infinite space. - Surpassing the sphere of infinite space. he penetrates successively the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothingness, the sphere of neither awareness nor non-awareness and finally, the absorption of cessation of awareness and sensation. “ For this technique of dhyana, see the explanation of M. Eliade, Techniques of Yoga, 1948, p. 158-164.

⁴⁴⁷ These two ‘gates’ have been studied at length in Kośa, VI, p. 148-158.

⁴⁴⁸ I [Lamotte] have not found these stanzas in the Tso ysh’an san mei king, T 614, p. 269c seq., Chinese translation of the Dhyānasūtra by Kumārajīva.

Vitarka of a great joyfulness moves his mind.

He analyzes it: this is vicāra.

This is how he enters the first dhyāna.

He knows that vitarka and vicāra disturb his mind,

Although good, he must separate himself from them,

For it is only on a calm sea

That the movement of the waves is not seen.

When a very weary man

Lies down to sleep in peace,

Any call to him

Strongly disturbs his mind.

In the same way, for the absorbed man in dhyāna,

Vitarka and vicāra are a torment.

That is why, avoiding vitarka and vicāra,

He succeeds in entering the sphere of unified consciousness

As a result of his inner purity (adhyātmasaṃprasāda),

He finds joy (prīti) and happiness (duḥkha) in absorption.

Penetrating into the second dhyāna,

His joy is lively and his mind is very happy.

An absorption where concentration is very strong

Is calm and free of smṛti (memory).

Annoyed by prīti (joy), the ascetic wants to get rid of it

In the same way that he has already eliminated vitarka and vicāra.

It is because of feeling (vedanā) that there is joy.

If joy is lost, sadness is experienced.

Renouncing pleasant bodily feeling (sukhavedanā),

The ascetic abandons memory and methods.

The saint (ārya) is able to reach this renunciation;

For other people, this renunciation is difficult.

When one knows the torments of happiness (sukha),

One sees the grand immobile peace.

When daurmanasya (sadness) and prīti (joy) are eliminated,

Duḥkha (suffering) and sukha (happiness) still remain to be cut,

Purified by equanimity and reflection (upakṣasmṛtipariśuddha),

The mind penetrates into the fourth dhyāna.

The sukha present in the third dhyāna,

Transitory (anitya) and changing, is suffering.

In kāmadhātu, the ascetic has cut the daurmanasya;

In the second dhyāna he has eliminated the prīti.

This is why the Buddha Bhagavat

Said, in the fourth dhyāna,

Having cut the daurmanasya and the prīti,

It is necessary now to cut duḥkha and sukha.

[1. Preparation for the first dhyāna]. – By means of purity of discipline (śīlaviśuddhi), solitude in retreat, guarding the senses, intensive meditation during the first and last watch of the night,⁴⁴⁹ the ascetic avoids external pleasures and takes pleasure in meditation. He avoids desires (kāma) and the bad dharmas (akuśaladharmas). Depending on the anāgāmya (the preliminary

[2. First dhyāna.] – The first dhyāna is defined in the Abhidharma: There are four types of dhyāna: i) dhyāna associated with rapture (āsvādanasamprayukta); ii) pure dhyāna (śuddhaka); iii) stainless dhyāna (anāsrava); iv) the five skandhas obtained by retribution (vipākaja) and constituting the first dhyāna.⁴⁵¹ Here the ascetic enters into the pure (śuddhaka) and the stainless (anāsrava) [dhyāna]; it is the same for the second, third and fourth dhyānas.

According to the Buddha's definition: "Having avoided desires and the bad dharmas, the bhikṣu enters into the first, furnished with examination, furnished with judgment, coming from detachment, which is joy and happiness." (Dhyānasūtra, L.c.: Viviktaṃ kāmaṃ viviktaṃ pāpakair akuśalair dharmaiḥ savicāraṃ vivekaṃ prītisukhaṃ prathamam dhymanam upasampadya viharati).

'Desires' (kāma) are the five sense objects (pañca kāmagaṇa), colors (rūpa), etc., to which one becomes attached. By means of reflection and analysis, these desires are condemned, as has been said above.

The 'wicked bad dharmas' (pāpaka, akuśaladharmas) are the five obstructions (pañca nīvaraṇa), greed (kāmacchanda), etc. By becoming detached from these two categories, of which the one is external (bāhya) and the other internal (ādhyātmika), the first dhyāna is acquired.

The [five] characteristics of the first dhyāna are: examination (vitarka), judgment (vicāra), joy (prīti), happiness (sukha) and one-pointedness of the mind (cittakāgrata).⁴⁵²

It is 'savitarka and savicāra': by acquiring the good dharmas (kuśaladharmas) and the qualities (guṇa) not previously acquired, in the first dhyāna the mind experiences great fear. When [a person] who has ceaselessly been burned by the fires of desire attains the first dhyāna, it is as if he were entering a pool of cold water. Or else he is like a poor man (daridra) who suddenly finds a treasure: the ascetic, who has meditated and analyzed the disadvantages of kāmādhātu and who sees the importance of the benefits and qualities of the first dhyāna, feels great joy (prīti): this is why it is called savitarka and savicāra.

Question. – Are vitarka and vicāra one and the same thing or are they two different things?

Answer. – They are two different things.⁴⁵³ Vitarka is the first moment of a coarse mind (sthūlaprathamakṣaṇa), vicāra is a more subtle (sūkṣma) analysis. Thus, when a bell is struck, the first sound is strong, the subsequent sound is weaker; this is vicāra.

⁴⁵⁰ For this term, see Kośa, VIII, p. 179, n. 6.

⁴⁵¹ Cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 144. – The dhyāna of rapture is soiled by desire (trṣṇā); the pure dhyāna is of mundane order and practiced by ordinary people; the anāsrava dhyāna is supramundane and practiced by the āryas; the dhyāna 'of the five skandhas' means the spheres of rūpadhātu inhabited by the seventeen classes of gods, from the Brahmakāyikas to the Akaṇiṣṭhas (see Kośa, III, p. 2): the gods of rūpadhātu are still constituted by five skandhas; those of Ārūpyadhātu have only four because rūpa is absent there.

⁴⁵² Cf. Majjhima, I, p. 294: Paṭhamam jhānam pañcaṅgikaṃ; idh' āvuso paṭhamam jhānam samāpannassa bhikkhuno vitakko ca vattati vicāro ca pīti ca sukhaṃ ca cittaggaṭṭha ca. – See also Kośa, VIII, p. 147.

⁴⁵³ On the difference between vitarka and vicāra, cf. Vasubandhu's Pañcaskandhaka, cited in Kośavyākhyā, p. 64: Vitarkaḥ katamah? Paryeṣako manojalpaḥ cetanāprajñāviṣeṣaḥ yā citasyauddhrikatā. Vicārāḥ katamah?

Question. – In the Abhidharma it is said that, from kāmādhātu until the first dhyāna, a single mind is associated with vitarka and vicāra; why do you say that vitarka is the first moment of a coarse mind whereas vicāra is a more subtle analysis?

Answer. – Although the two things reside in the same mind, their characteristics are not simultaneous: at the moment of vitarka, the vicāra is blurred (apaṭu); at the moment of vicāra, the vitarka is blurred. Thus, when the sun rises, the shadows disappear. All the minds (citta) and all the mental events (*caitasika*dharmas) receive their name prorata with time: [vitarka and vicāra are distinct names of one single mind]. Thus the Buddha said: "If you cut one single thing, I claim that you will become an anāgamin; this single thing is avarice (mātsarya)."⁴⁵⁴ Really, it should be said that the five fetters of lower rank (avarambhāgīya saṃyojana) must disappear in order that one may become anāgāmin.⁴⁵⁵ Why did he say that it is necessary to cut just one single thing? Because avarice abounded in his questioner and the other fetters came from that; therefore it sufficed for that person to destroy avarice in order to cut through the other fetters at the same time. Similarly here, vitarka and vicāra take their name prorata from time.

[3. Second dhyāna.] – The ascetic knows that, although they are good, vitarka and vicāra disturb the mind that is in absorption (samādhicitta); by mental renunciation (cittavairāgya), he condemns vitarka and vicāra and has this thought: "Vitarka and vicāra disturb the mind of dhyāna; as when pure water is disturbed by waves, nothing can be seen any more." When a tired and weary [186b] man regains his breath and wants to sleep, when his neighbor calls him, that makes him very annoyed. It is for all these reasons that he condemns vitarka and vicāra.

[According to the definition given by the Buddha, the ascetic], "by suppressing examination and judgment, enters into the second dhyāna, one-pointedness of mind, without examination, without judgment, arisen from concentration, which is joy and happiness" (Dhyānasūtra, L.c.: Vitarkavicārāṇāṃ vyupāśamād adhyātmaṃ samprasādac cetasa ekotībhāvam avitarkam avicāraṃ samādhijam prītisukhaṃ dvitīyaṃ dhyānam upasampadya viharati).

Pratyavekṣaka manojalpaḥ, tathaiṣa yā cittauddhrikatā. – Here the Mpps is accepting a specific difference (jātibheda) between vitarka and vicāra; this is the thesis of the Vaibhāṣikas; the Sautrāntikas are of the opposite opinion, cf. Kośa, II, p. 174 seq.; Kośavyākhyā, p. 139. The Pāli sources themselves have attempted definitions: cf. Dhammasaṅgani, p. 10; Atthasālinī, p. 114-115; Milinda, p. 62-63; Visuddhimagga, I, p. 142-143; S. Z. Aung, Compendium, p. 17, 40.

⁴⁵⁴ See a passage in Aṅguttara, III, p. 272, where it is said that, in order to attain the four dhyānas and realize the four fruits of the Path (srotāṅgaphala, etc.), it is enough to have cut the fivefold avarice: āvāsa-, kula-, lābha-, vaṇṇa and dhammacchariya.

⁴⁵⁵ By saying that it is enough to cut one single fetter, avarice, in order to become anāgāmin, the Buddha was simplifying things for the benefit of his questioner; in precise terms, it is "by the disappearance of the first five fetters that a person becomes an apparitional being, that he attains nirvāṇa there (in the world of the gods) and is not subject to coming back from that world:" cf. Dīgha, I, p. 156; II, p. 92; III, p. 132; Majjhima, I, p. 436: Pañcannaṃ orambhāgiyānaṃ saṃyojanānaṃ parikkhayaṃ opapātiko hoti tathapariniṇṇāyā anāvattidhammo tasmā lokā.

In possession of the second dhyāna, he obtains the prīti and sukha of the second dhyāna, incomparable joy and happiness not previously acquired until that moment. “By the suppression of examination and judgment (vitarkavicāraṇām vyupaśamāt), they have disappeared because the ascetic knows their defects. This dhyāna is ‘inner peace’ (adhyātmasaṃprasāda)⁴⁵⁶ for, by entering into this profound absorption, the ascetic has given up the vitarka and vicāra of the first dhyāna by means of faith (prasāda): the benefit is important, the loss minimal and the gain considerable. This dhyāna is called ‘inner peace’ as a result of “fixing the mind on one object” (cetasa ekotibhāva).

[4. Third dhyāna]. – The ascetic sees the defects of prīti as he has seen those of vitarka and vicāra: according to the place occupied by the object of enjoyment, sometimes it is joy (prīti), sometimes sadness (daurmansaya) that dominates. Why is that? Thus, for example, when a poor man (daridra) finds a treasure, his joy is immense; but, as soon as he loses it, his sadness is profound. The joy changes into sadness.

This is why [according to the definition of the Buddha], the ascetic: “by renouncing joy, remains in equanimity, reflecting, aware; he experiences this physical happiness which only the saints are capable of renouncing; reflecting, remaining in bliss, he enters into the third dhyāna” (free and faulty translation of the Dhyānasūtra, l.c.: Prīter virāgād upekṣako viharati smṛtimān saṃprajānan sukhaṃ ca kāyena pratisaṃvedayati yat tad āryā ācakṣate “Upekṣakaḥ smṛtimān sukhavihāriti” niṣprītikaṃ tṛtiyaṃ dhyānam upasaṃpadya viharati).

He remains ‘in equanimity’ (upekṣaḥ), for he abandons any feeling of joy (prīti) and feels no regret; he remains “reflecting” (smṛtimān) and ‘fully aware’ (saṃprajānan), for, having obtained the bliss of the third dhyāna, he prevents bliss from arousing torments; he experiences ‘physical happiness’ (sukhaṃ kāyena pratisaṃvedayati), for he experiences, with his entire body, the bliss of the third dhyāna,⁴⁵⁷ ‘this bliss which only the āryas are capable of abandoning’; this bliss being the most outstanding in the world to call forth attachment of the mind and which ordinary people (prthagjana) rarely renounce. Also the Buddha said that the practice of loving-kindness is the foremost in the pure lands.

[5. Fourth dhyāna]. – The ascetic sees the defects of sukha as he has seen those of prīti; he knows that immovability of the mind (cittāiṇīyatā) is very superior to that, for wherever there is movement, there is suffering (duḥkha). Since he is moved by the sukha of the third dhyāna, the ascetic seeks non-movement.

[According to the definition of the Buddha] “by the cessation of bliss and by the cessation of suffering, by the previous suppression of joy and sadness, the ascetic enters into the fourth dhyāna, free of suffering and bliss, purified in renunciation and reflection” (Dhyānasūtra, l.c.: Sukhasya ca prahāṇād duḥkasya ca prahāṇāt pūrvam eva saumansayadaurmansayayor astamgamādaduḥkṣāsukham upekṣhāsmṛtipariśuddhaṃ caturthaṃ dhyānam upasaṃpadya viharati).

⁴⁵⁶ For adhyātmasaṃprasāda which is faith (śraddhā), see Kośa, VIII, p. 158.

In the fourth dhyāna, there is no more suffering or happiness, but only non-moving wisdom (āniṇīyaprajñā); this is why the fourth dhyāna is called ‘purified as to renunciation and reflection’.⁴⁵⁸ By contrast, the third dhyāna, because of the movement evoked by the bliss, is called suffering. Therefore the fourth dhyāna is “free of suffering and bliss” (asuḥkhāsukha).

[6. First samāpatti]. – According to the definition of the Buddha, the ascetic “having surpassed any notion of matter, neglecting any notion of multiplicity, suppressing, any notion of resistance, enters into the sphere of infinity of space” (Dhyānasūtra, l.c.: Sa sarvaśo rūpasamjñāṃ samatikramān, nānāvasamjñāṃ amanasikārāt, pratighasaṃjñānām astamgamād “Ānantaṃ ākāśam iti” ākāśānantyāyatanam upasaṃpadya viharati).

The ascetic thinks thus: “Wherever matter is absent, there one escapes from the sufferings of hunger (kṣudh) and thirst (pipāsā), cold (śīta) and heat (uṣṇa); physical matter is coarse, bad, deceptive and unreal: it is as a result of the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī) of the former life that we inherit this body, the receptacle of all sorts of pains. How can these bodily torments be avoided? The space (ākāśa) present in the body must be considered.” Then the ascetic ceaselessly considers the space of the body like that in a cage or a pot; by endlessly thinking thus, he is freed from matter and no [186c] longer sees the body. And the same for external matter (bāhyarūpa) as for the inner bodily space. Then the ascetic can contemplate immense infinite space (apramāṇānantākāśa). When he has mastered this contemplation, he feels neither sadness nor happiness, and his mind progresses: he is like a bird closed up in a cage that finds its freedom when the cage is broken. This is the ākāśasamāpatti.

[7. Second samāpatti]. - This immense and infinite space is grasped (ālambate) by the intellect; this vast object distracts the ascetic and can even destroy his absorption. Contemplating space, the ascetic sees feelings (vedanā), notions (saṃjñā), formations (saṃskāra) and consciousnesses (viññāna)⁴⁵⁹ which seem to him to be a sickness (roga), an ulcer (ganḍa), a wound (āghāta) and an arrow (śalya), transitory (anīya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and non-self (anātman), an accumulation of deceits without true reality.⁴⁶⁰ Thinking in this way, he abandons the ākāśa object and holds only the consciousness (viññāna). Does he hold the present (pratyutpanna), the past (atīta), future (anāgata) consciousness, or the immense, infinite consciousness (apramāṇānantaviññāna)? He holds the immense and infinite consciousness.⁴⁶¹ Since this ⁴⁵⁸ It would be tempting to translate Chō nien ts'ing tsing by “purity in renunciation and reflection”; but these four characters give the Sanskrit expression upekṣāsmṛtipariśuddhi: 1) upekṣāpariśuddhi is indifference for whatever the object may be (anābhogalakṣaṇa); 2) smṛtipariśuddhi consists of not losing sight of the nimitta (the motive, the reason) for this indifference (upekṣānimittasāmpromoṣa): cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 148.

⁴⁵⁹ Whereas the dhyānas are accompanied by the five skandhas, the samāpattis consist of only four (vedanā, saṃjñā, saṃskāra and viññāna), for all rūpa is absent; cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 134.

⁴⁶¹ Cf. Vibhaṅga, p. 262: Anantaṃ viññānaṃ ti, taṃ yeva ākāśaṃ viññāṇena phutaṃ manasikaroti anantaṃ pharati tena vuccati anantaṃ viññānanti. – Commentary in Visuddhimagga, I, p. 332.

consciousness is immense and infinite like ākāśa, the absorption is called the absorption of the sphere of infinite consciousness (vijñānānantyāyatanasamāpatti).

[8. Third samāpatti]. – This immense and infinite vijñāna is perceived by the intellect; this vast object distracts the ascetic and can destroy his absorption. On contemplating this consciousness, the ascetic perceives sensations (vedanā), notions (saṃjñā), formations (saṃskāra) and consciousnesses (vijñāna) which seem to him to be a sickness (roga), ulcer (gaṇḍa), wound (āghāta) and an arrow (śalya), transitory (anitya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and non-self (anātman), an accumulation of deceit, without true reality. Thinking this way, he destroys the image of vijñāna, rejects the vijñānāyatana and praises the sphere of nothingness (ākīṃcanyāyatana). Destroying the images of the vijñāna, he fixes his mind on nothingness, and this is what is called the absorption of sphere of nothingness (ākīṃcanyāyatanasamāpatti).

[9. Fourth samāpatti]. – In this ākīṃcanyāyatana, he perceives sensations (vedanā), notions (saṃjñā), formations (saṃskāra) and consciousnesses (vijñāna) that seem to him to be a sickness (roga), an ulcer (gaṇḍa), a wound (āghāta), an arrow (śalya), transitory (anitya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and non-self (anātman), an accumulation of deceit, without true reality. While he is meditating thus, the sphere of non-consciousness (asaṃjñāyatana) seems to him to be an ulcer (gaṇḍa) and the sphere of consciousness (saṃjñāyatana) seems to him to be a sickness, an ulcer, a wound and an arrow: [for him], the sphere par excellence is the sphere of neither discernment nor non-discernment

Question. – But the naivasamjñānāśamjñāyatana involves sensations (vedanā), notions (saṃjñā), formations (saṃskāra) and consciousnesses (vijñāna): why do you call it neither discernment nor non-discernment?

Answer. – There is discrimination (saṃjñā) in this sphere, but as it is very subtle (sūkṣma) and hard to perceive (durvabodha), we speak of ‘non-discrimination’; on the other hand, since there is discrimination, we add ‘not non-discrimination’.⁴⁶² Ordinary people (prthagjana) claim to attain the true nature of dharmas in this sphere and identify it with nirvāṇa; but in the Buddhist system, although it is known that this sphere includes discrimination, the old name is retained and it is called the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination.

Question. – What is non-discrimination?

Answer. – There are three kinds of non-discrimination: i) the absorption of non-discrimination (asaṃjñīsamāpatti),⁴⁶³ ii) the absorption of the cessation of discrimination and feeling (read Mie sianna cheou ting = saṃjñāvedayitanirodhasamāpatti,⁴⁶⁴ iii) the non-discriminating gods (asaṃjñīdeva).⁴⁶⁵ The worldly person who wants to destroy his mind enters into the saṃjñāvedayitanirodhasamāpatti.

⁴⁶² On the point of knowing whether or not there is saṃjñā in the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination, cf. Āṅguttara, IV, p. 427; Kāthāvatthu, I, p. 263 (tr. Rh. D., p. 155); Kośa, VIII, p. 144.

⁴⁶³ Asaṃjñīsamāpatti, its preparation, conditions and fruit are studied in Kośa, II, p. 132, 200, 211, 310; IV, p. 200.

IV. QUESTIONS RELATING TO THE DHYĀNAS

[Pure and impure Path].⁴⁶⁶ – There are two kinds of dhyānas and samāpattis: impure (sāsrava) and pure (anāsrava). The sāsrava type is practiced by worldly people (prthagjana) as has already been said; the anāsrava type consists of the sixteen aspects of the noble truths (ṣoḍaśāryākāra).

⁴⁶⁴ For saṃjñāvedayitanirodha, which is confused in practice with nirvāṇa on earth, see Majjhima, I, p. 160, 301; III, p. 45; Samyutta, II, p. 212; Āṅguttara, I, p. 41; IV, p. 454; Kāthāvatthu, I, p. 202; Kośa, II, p. 203-214; VII, p. 96; VIII, p. 193, 207, 215. – Lav., Nirvāṇa, p. 77, 80, 157.

⁴⁶⁵ The asaṃjñīsattva, non-discriminating gods, are defined in Kośa, II, p. 199-200; VIII, p. 136.

⁴⁶⁶ The explanation that follows being somewhat abstruse, it may be of some use to recall the facts of the problem. The path of the absorptions consists of liberating oneself from the passions inherent in kāmadhātu, by the four dhyānas and the first three samāpattis as they have been defined in the preceding section. Each sphere involves nine categories of passions: strong-strong, strong-medium, strong-weak, medium-strong, etc. In order to pass from one sphere to another, it is necessary to liberate oneself from nine categories of passions. For each stage, the process involves nine mental actions by means of which one is detached from the passions, which is the ānantaryamārga, and nine mental actions by means of which one takes possession of this detachment, which is the vimuktimārga. The process thus involves eighteen mental actions for each sphere, and 144 mental actions for the entire eight spheres. To attain nirvāṇa, it is also necessary to become liberated from the inherent passions of the ninth sphere, the fourth samāpatti, also called the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination (naivasamjñānāśamjñāyatana) or the summit of existence (bhāvāgra).

The absorptions can be practiced according to the worldly path (laukikamārga) or the supramundane path (lokottaramārga).

1. The worldly path, also called impure path (sāsravamārga), is followed by ordinary people (prthagjana) who have not ‘seen’ the truths preached by the Buddha. He is liberated from the passions in a provisional manner only. Then, and this is essential, the ascetic can only be liberated from the passions of one sphere by practicing the preliminary concentrations of the immediately higher sphere.

Thus, in the impure path, the ascetic successively enters the eight preliminary (sāmantaka) absorptions which serve as passage-ways to the four dhyānas and the four samāpattis, in order to eliminate, in turn, the passions of kāmadhātu, the four dhyānas and the first three samāpattis. Since there is no preliminary concentration above the fourth samāpatti into which the ascetic can enter in order to destroy the passions of the fourth samāpatti, he is unable to liberate himself of the passions of the fourth samāpatti by means of the impure path. We may note that there are only eight preliminary concentrations: the first, serving as passage into the first dhyāna, is called anāgāmya; the other seven bear the generic name of sāmantaka. The impure (sāsrava) concentrations of the worldly path are described as pure (suddhaka) insofar as they are opposed to the concentrations associated with enjoyment (āsvābhasaṃprayukta), tainted by desire; this is a regrettable terminology liable to trouble the reader.

When one is following the sāsravamārga, one relies on the preliminary concentration (sāmantaka) of the level immediately above in order to abandon the passions of the lower level. When one is following the anāsravamārga, one abandons the passions of one's own level and those of the higher level. This is [187a] why, when the worldly person (prthagjana) is in the bhavāgra [fourth and last samāpatti], he does not succeed in freeing himself from the passions of this sphere, because [beyond it] there is no preliminary concentration (sāmantaka) leading to a higher sphere.

When the disciple of the Buddha wishes to abandon the desires (kāma) and passions (kleśa) of kāmadhātu, by means of meditation he cuts the nine categories of passions, strong (adhimātra), medium (madhya) and weak (mṛdu), namely: 1) strong-strong, 2) strong-medium, 3) strong-weak, 4) medium-strong, 5) medium-medium, 6) medium-weak, 7) weak-strong, 8) weak-medium, 9) weak-weak.

Having cut these nine categories, the disciple of the Buddha can try to obtain the first dhyāna by the sāsravamārga. In this case, in the anāgāmya (preliminary concentration preceding the first dhyāna), in the course of nine ānantaryamārgas (successive abandonments of the nine categories of passions of the lower level) and eight vimuktimārgas (taking possession of these successive abandonings), he first practices the sāsravamārga, then the sāsrava or anāsravamārga. In the course of the ninth vimuktimārga, in the anāgāmya, he first practices the sāsravamārga; then the sāsrava or anāsravamārga of the anāgāmya, and

2. The supramundane path (lokottaramārga), also called pure path (anāsaravamārga), is followed by the saints (ārya) endowed with pure wisdom, who have "seen" the four holy truths (āryasatya) and have understood the sixteen aspects (ṣoḍaśākāra) by reason of the four aspects of each truth (see above, p. 641F). This path assures the definitive liberation of the passions and, whereas in the impure path the ascetic must enter into the preliminary concentration (sāmantaka) of the immediately higher sphere in order to be liberated from the passions of his own sphere, the saint who is following the pure path cuts the passions of his level directly without resorting to any sāmantaka whatsoever. Thus, having reached the fourth and last samāpatti, the saint can eliminate the passions of this sphere by means of nine acts of detachment and nine acts of taking possession, which was impossible for the worldly person following the impure path.

3. The ascetic can combine the impure and the pure path if he so wishes. This was the case for Śākyamuni. When he arrived in Bodhgaya under the Bodhi tree, he was still a worldly person (prthagjana), a man who had not yet seen the truths. But, by means of the impure path, he had eliminated all the passions of kāmadhātu of the four dhyānas and the first three samāpattis. Only the passions of the fourth and last samāpatti remained in him, for, as we have seen, they cannot be destroyed by the impure path. When enlightenment occurred, Śākyamuni saw, in sixteen moments, the sixteen aspects (ṣoḍaśākāra) of the truths: this pure wisdom made his deliverance from the lower desires definitive. There remained in him the nine categories of passions relating to the fourth samāpatti or bhavāgra which he did by the nine mental actions of ānantaryamārga that detached him from these passions and nine mental actions of vimuktimārga that put him in possession of this detachment. Then Śākyamuni obtained the state of arhat, without any passions, in 34 moments of mind: sixteen moments for the seeing of the truths, nine for the ānantaryamārga of bhavāgra, nine for the vimuktimārga of the same bhavāgra. At the same time, he became a Buddha as a result of his meritorious works.

See a study on the path of the concentration in L. de La Vallée Poussin, Kośa, V, p. iv-xi; Morale bouddhique, p. 71-97.

the sāsrava of the sāmantaka of the first dhyāna. If he wishes to attain the first dhyāna by way of the anāsravamārga, he will do the same.

If he abandons the passions of the first dhyāna by means of the sāsravamārga, in the sāmantaka of the second dhyāna, during nine ānantaryamārgas and eight vimuktimārgas, he first practices the sāsrava of the sāmantaka of the second dhyāna, then the sāsravamārga of the sāmantaka of the second dhyāna as well as the first anāsrava dhyāna and its sequel. During the ninth vimuktimārga, in the sāmantaka of the second dhyāna, he first practices the sāsravamārga of the sāmantaka of the second dhyāna, then the sāmantaka of the second dhyāna, then the anāsrava of the first dhyāna and its sequel, the second śuddhaka or anāsrava dhyāna.

If he abandons the passions of the first dhyāna by means of the anāsravamārga, during the course of nine ānantaryamārgas and eight vimuktimārgas, he first practices the anāsravamārga of his own level, the sāsrava or anāsrava of the first dhyāna and its sequel. In the course of the ninth vimuktimārga, he first practices the anāsravamārga of his own level, then the sāsrava or anāsravamārga of the first dhyāna and its sequel.

It is the same in the practice of the other concentrations from the second śuddhaka or anāsrava dhyāna up to the abandonment that characterizes the ākīṃcanyāyatana. In the abandonment that characterizes the naīvasamjñānāsamjñāyātana, during the nine ānantaryamārgas and eight vimuktimārgas, he practices just the universal anāsravamārga. In the course of the ninth vimuktimārga, he practices the roots of good of the threefold world (traiḍhātukakuśalamūla) and the anāsravamārga; thus he drives out absorption without mind (acittakasmāpatti).

[Developent of the dhyānas]. – There are two types of development:

i) development by acquisition, ii) development by practice. Development by acquisition is to obtain now what one had not earlier obtained; later one will cultivate the thing itself and its general complement. Development by practice is to cultivate at present that which one had earlier obtained; but later one will not cultivate the complements. These are the different developments in the course of the dhyānas and the samāpattis.

*** **

[Types of concentration]. – In brief, the characteristic traits (nimitta) of the dhyānas and the samāpattis are twenty-three in number: eight concentrations of enjoyment (āsvādana), eight pure (śuddhaka) concentrations and seven anāsrava concentrations.

[Causes and conditions in the concentrations]. – There are six kinds of causes (hetu): 1) associated causes (saṃprayuktaka), 2) mutual cause (sahabhū), 3) similar cause (sabhāga), 4) universal cause (sarvatraga), 5) ripening cause (vipāka), 6) nominal cause (nāmahetu).⁴⁶⁷ Taken one by one, the seven anāsrava are similar [187b] causes; the associated and mutual causes, the previous ‘dhyāna of enjoyment’ and its causes, the subsequent ‘dhyāna of enjoyment’ and its causes go in the same level. It is the same for the śuddhaka dhyānas.

The four conditions (pratyaya) are: 1) the causal condition (hetupratyaya), 2) the antecedent equal and immediate condition (samanantarapratyaya), 3) the object condition (ālambanapratyaya). 4) the governing condition (adhipatipratyaya).⁴⁶⁸

1) The causal condition has been explained above [in the examination of the six causes].

2) [In regard to the antecedent condition, we will make the following comments]:⁴⁶⁹

The first anāsrava dhyāna can produce after itself six concentrations:

1-2) śuddhaka and anāsrava concentration of the first dhyāna; 3-6) śuddhaka and anāsrava concentration of the second and third dhyāna.

The second anāsrava dhyāna can produce after itself eight concentrations:

1-2) śuddhaka and anāsrava concentration of the same level; 3-4) śuddhaka and anāsrava concentration of the first dhyāna; 5-8) śuddhaka and anāsrava concentration of the third and fourth dhyāna.

The third anāsrava dhyāna can produce after itself ten concentrations:

1-2) two concentrations of the same level; 3-6) four concentrations of the two lower levels; 7-10) four concentrations of the two higher levels.

The fourth dhyāna and the ākāśānāntyāyatana also [can produce after themselves ten concentrations.]

The anāsrava vijñānānāntyāyatana can produce after itself nine concentrations: 1-2) two concentrations of the same level; 3-6) four concentrations of the two lower levels; 7-9) three concentrations of the two higher levels, [namely, śuddhaka and anāsrava concentration of the ākīṃcanya, śuddhaka of the naivasamjñānāśamjñāyatana].

The anāsrava ākīṃchanyāyatana can produce after itself seven concentrations: 1-2) two concentrations of the same level; 3-6) four concentrations of the two lower levels; 7) one concentration of the higher level, [namely, the śuddhaka concentrations of the naivasamjñānāśamjñāyatana].

⁴⁶⁷ The six causes in Kośa, II, p. 245 seq.

⁴⁶⁸ The four conditions in Kośa, II, p. 299 seq.

⁴⁶⁹ The successive arisings of the concentrations is treated in the same way in Kośa, VIII, p. 167-168.

The naivasamjñānāyatana can produce after itself six concentrations:

1-2) two concentrations of the same level; 3-6) four concentrations of the two lower levels.

It is the same for the śuddhaka concentrations.

Moreover, these concentrations increase all the delight (āsvādana) of their own level: immediately after the delight of the first dhyāna, there follows the delight of the second, and so on up to the naivasamjñānāśamjñāyatana.

3. [In regard to the object condition,⁴⁷⁰ we may note that] the śuddhaka and anāsrava dhyānas always have as object (ālambana) the dhyāna of delight; they are concerned with the enjoyment of their own level; they are also concerned with pure desire (viśuddhatṛṣṇā). As they do not have a stainless object, they are not concerned with the anāsrava.

The fundamental non-material concentrations (maulārūpyasamāpatti), śuddhaka and anāsrava, are not concerned with the sāsrava of the lower levels.

4. As nominal cause (nāmahetu) and governing cause (adhipatipratyaya), the dhyānas enter into:

a. the four boundless ones (apramāṇacitta),⁴⁷¹

b. the [first] three liberations (vimokṣa),⁴⁷²

c. the eight spheres of domination (abhibhāvāyatana),⁴⁷³

d. the [first] eight spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana), those that are concerned with kāmādhātu,⁴⁷⁴

e. the [first] five superknowledges (abhijñā) are concerned with kāma- and rūpadhātu.⁴⁷⁵

The other concentrations are each adapted to its own object; the saṃjñāvedayitanirodhasamāpatti has no object.

⁴⁷⁰ For the object of the dhyānas and the samāpattis, see detail in Kośa, VIII, p. 176-177.

⁴⁷¹ The four apramāṇas are the four brāhmvihāras mentioned above, Traité, I, p. 163. – Detailed study in Kośa, VIII, p. 196-203.

⁴⁷² There are eight vimokṣamukhas, described in a sūtra quoted in full in the Kośavyākhyā, p. 688; only the first three belong to the dhyānas, the other five fall within the samāpattis; cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 204-210.

⁴⁷³ All eight abhibhāvāyatanas belong to the dhyānas; cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 212-213.

⁴⁷⁴ There are ten kṛtsnāyatanas, the first eight being concerned respectively with water, fire, wind, blue, yellow, red, white, and space, belonging to the four dhyānas, bearing upon space and vi

⁴⁷⁵ There are six abhijñās; the first five, which have been described above (Traité, p. 328-333F), rely on the four dhyānas; the sixth, called knowledge of the cessation of the vices (āsravakṣayajñāna), belongs only to the arhat: cf. Kośa, VII, p. 98-115.

[Perfecting the dhyānas]. – In all four dhyānas, there is the principle of perfecting (vardhanadharmā). By perfecting the sāsrava by means of the anāsrava, mastery of the mind (cetovaśita) of the fourth dhyāna is obtained. By means of the fourth anāsrava dhyāna, the fourth sāsrava dhyāna is perfected. Similarly the third, second, and first dhyāna can perfect the sāsrava of their own level by means of the anāsrava of the same level.

Question. – What is the perfecting of the dhyāna called?

Answer. – The saints (ārya) are pleased with the anāsrava concentration and do not like the sāsrava; at the time of abandoning the passions (vairāgya), the śuddhaka and sāsrava dhyānas displease them and when they are obtained, they try to eliminate the impurities: they resort to the anāsrava to perfect them. Just as melting rids the gold ore from its dross, so the anāsrava perfects the sāsrava. From the anāsrava dhyāna, one enters into the śuddhaka dhyāna, and the repetition of this practice constitutes a kind of melting.

[Prāntakoṭika dhyāna].⁴⁷⁶ – Among the dhyānas, there is one that reaches the summit (prāntakoṭa). What is meant by summit? There are two kinds of arhat: the arhat capable of regressing (parihāṇadharmā) and the arhat incapable of regressing (aparihāṇadharmā). The arhat incapable of regressing who has attained mastery (vaśita) over all the profound dhyānas and samāpattis is able to produce the prāntakoṭidhyāna; possessing this dhyāna, he is able to transform [187c] his longevity into wealth and wealth into longevity.

[Prañidhijñāna, etc.] – Among the concentrations, there are also the knowledge resulting from resolve (prañidhijñāna), the four infallible knowledges (pratisaṃvid) and the concentration preventing anyone from harming you (araṇāsamādhi).

*Prañidhijñāna*⁴⁷⁷. – If he wishes to know the objects of the threefold world, he knows them according to his wish. The prañidhijñāna is of two levels, kāmādhātu and the fourth dhyāna.

The four pratisaṃvids.⁴⁷⁸ – The infallible knowledge of teaching (dharmaprasaṃvid) and that of the voice (nirukti-pratisaṃvid) are of two levels, kāmādhātu and the first dhyāna; the other two pratisaṃvids, [of things (artha) and of eloquence (pratibhāna)] are of nine levels: kāmādhātu, four dhyānas and four ārūpyasamāpattis.

⁴⁷⁶ The prāntakoṭika is none other than the fourth dhyāna taken to its maximum. It is defined in Kośa, VII, p. 95-96.

⁴⁷⁷ Prañidhijñāna, in Kośa, VII, p. 88-89.

⁴⁷⁸ Pratisaṃvid, in Kośa, VII, p. 89-94.

*Araṇāsamādhi*⁴⁷⁹ is a concentration preventing someone from harming you. It is of five levels, kāmādhātu and four dhyānas.

[Acquiring the dhyānas]⁴⁸⁰. – Question. – Does the acquisition of the dhyānas involve other modalities?

Answer. – The absorptions of delight (āsvādanasamāpatti) are acquired by birth (upapatti) or by regression (hāni). The pure (śuddhaka) dhyānas are acquired by birth or by abandonment (vairāgya). The anāsrava concentrations are acquired by abandonment or by regression.

The anāsrava concentrations of nine levels, namely, the four dhyānas, the [first] three ārūpyasamāpattis, the anāgamya and the dhyānānantara are able to cut the fetters (saṃyojana). Actually, the anāgamya and the dhyānānantara are associated with the sensation of equanimity (upekṣendriya).

[Creation minds].⁴⁸¹ – When a person possesses a dhyāna, he also possesses the creation minds (nirmāṇacitta) of the lower levels. In the first dhyāna he thus possesses two nirmāṇacittas, that of the first dhyāna and also that of kāmādhātu; in the second dhyāna, three; in the third, four; in the fourth, five nirmāṇacittas.

If the ascetic who is in the second, third or fourth dhyāna wishes to understand, see or touch something, he must resort to a consciousness of Brahmāloka [i.e., of the first dhyāna]; when this consciousness disappears, the perception stops.

The four apramāṇas, the five abhiññās, the eight vimokṣas, the eight abhibhāvāyatanas, the ten kṛtsnāyatanas, the nine anupūrvasamāpattis, the nine saṃjñās [of the aśubhabhāvanā]⁴⁸², the three samādhis,⁴⁸³ the three vimokṣas, the three anāsravendriyas, the thirty-seven bodhipākṣikadharmas and all the qualities of this type come from the virtue of dhyāna; here they must be explained fully.

⁴⁸⁰ The three modes of acquiring the dhyānas are: birth (upapatti) or the transfer from one level to another after death; detachment (vairāgya) which makes the passing from a lower level to a higher level; regression (hāni) which causes the passing from a higher concentration to a lower concentration of the same level. The ideas developed here occur in the Vibhāṣā (cited by the Kośavyākhyā, p. 678); Kośa, VIII, p. 164-167, summarizes them in the following kārikās: Atadvān labhate śuddhaṃ vairāgyeṇopapattitā; anāsravaṃ tu vairāgyat; kṛṣṭaṃ hānyupapattitā.

⁴⁸¹ The nirmāṇacittas have been studied above (Traité, I, p. 381-382F); see also Kośa, VIII, p. 115-116.

⁴⁸² They are listed in Mahāvīyutpatti, no. 1156-1164.

⁴⁸³ The śūnyatā, aprañihita and ānimittasamādhi defined above, Traité, I, p. 321-324F.

V. DHYĀNAPĀRAMITĀ.

Question. – You should have spoken to us about the virtue of dhyāna (dhyānapāramitā); why do you speak of dhyāna only?

Answer. – 1) Dhyāna is the source of the virtue [of dhyāna]. By possessing dhyāna, [the bodhisattva] has compassion for beings who, having at their disposal the many felicities resulting from the dhyānas and the samāpattis, do not know how to pursue them, but seek their happiness in outer things (bāhyadharmā), impure and painful. The bodhisattva feels great compassion (mahākaruṇācitta) at this sight and makes the following oath: “I will act in such a way that beings obtain all the inner bliss (adhyātmasukha) of the dhyānas and samāpattis, that they may be freed from impure bliss and that, in dependence on these dhyānas, they finally reach the bliss characteristic of Buddhahood.” It is in this way that the dhyānas and samāpattis take the name of virtue.

2) Moreover, in the dhyānas, the bodhisattva does not relish any enjoyment (āsvadana), does not seek any reward (vipāka) and does not pursue [heavenly] rebirths as reward. It is in order to tame his own mind that he enters into dhyāna. By the skillful means of his wisdom (prajñopāya), he will be reborn in kāmadhātu in order to save beings there. Dhyāna takes the name of virtue in this case.

3) Furthermore, when the Bodhisattva has entered into his profound dhyānas and samāpattis, neither gods nor men can know his mind (citta), his support (āśraya) and his object (ālambana), for this mind is not disturbed by what is seen, heard, thought or cognized (dr̥ṣṭaśrutamatavijñāta).⁴⁸⁴ Thus, in the [188a] P’i mo lo k’i king (Vimalakīrtinirdeśasūtra), Vimalakīrti explains quiescence (pratisaṃlayanasdharma) to Śāriputra: “Do not rely on the body (kāya), do not rely on the mind (citta), do not rely on the threefold world (trai dhātuka); in the threefold world, not to obtain either body or mind is quiescence.”⁴⁸⁵

4) Moreover, when a person hears it said that the bliss of the dhyānas and samāpattis surpasses divine and human bliss, he abandons the sense pleasures (kāmasukha) in order to seek the dhyānas and samāpattis. But seeking bliss and benefit for oneself is not enough; the bodhisattva does not act in this way: it is only for beings that he wants to acquire loving-kindness (maitrī), compassion (karuṇā), purity of mind (cittaviśuddhi) and the dhyānas of the bodhisattva who is not dissociated from beings; in dhyāna, he produces the feelings of great compassion. Dhyāna contains marvelous innermost bliss, but beings renounce it to seek external bliss. They are like a wealthy blind man who, not knowing and not seeing the many treasures that he possesses, goes out to beg his food; those who know have pity for a person who, having at his disposal such marvelous objects, cannot know of their existence and goes to beg from others.

⁴⁸⁵ Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, tr. by Tche k’ien, T 474, k. 1, p. 521c; tr. by Kumārajīva, T 475, k. 1, p. 539c. – On this sūtra, see above, Traité, I, p. 515F, n. 2.

In the same way, beings possess in their minds the bliss of the dhyānas and samāpattis; but unable to actualize them, they turn to seek outer bliss.

5) Moreover, the Bodhisattva understands the true nature of dharmas, and so, when he has entered into dhyāna, his mind is at peace (kṣema), and he is not attached to enjoyment (āsvadana). Heretics, even in dhyāna and samāpatti, do not have their minds at peace and, as they do not know the true nature of dharmas, they are attached to the enjoyment of the dhyāna.

Question. – However, the arhats and pratyekabuddhas are not attached to enjoyment either; why do they not possess the virtue of dhyāna [like the bodhisattva]?

Answer. – Even though they are not attached to enjoyment, the arhats and pratyekabuddhas are without great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and consequently they do not possess the virtue of dhyāna. Furthermore, they cannot practice all the dhyānas completely, whereas the bodhisattva is able to do so: whether these dhyānas are coarse (sthūla) or subtle (sūkṣma), great or small, profound or lowly, whether they concern an inner or an outer object, the bodhisattva practices them all completely. This is why the concentration of the bodhisattvas is called dhyānapāramitā whereas those of other men is just called dhyāna.

6) Moreover, the tīrthikas, śrāvakas and bodhisattvas acquire all the dhyānas and samāpattis. There are three kinds of faults in the tīrthika dhyāna: attachment to enjoyment (āsvādanābhiniveśa), wrong view (mithyadr̥ṣṭi) and pride (abhimāna). In the śrāvaka dhyāna, loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) are slight; they do not have at their disposal a knowledge in regard to the Dharma sufficiently sharp as to progressively penetrate the true nature of dharmas; being exclusively interested in their own selves, they destroy the lineage of Buddhas [within themselves]. In the bodhisattva dhyāna there are no defects; wishing to unite all the attributes of Buddha, they do not forget beings during the dhyāna and they endlessly extend their kindness even to insects.

[Kindness of Śaṅkhācārya towards animals].⁴⁸⁶ – Thus the Buddha Śākyamuni, in a previous lifetime, was a ṛṣi with a conch-shaped head-dress (śaṅkhaśikhā) named Chang chō li (Śaṅkhācārya). He was always practicing the fourth dhyāna: interrupting his respiration (ānāpāna), seated under a tree, he remained immobile. Seeing him in this posture, a bird mistook him for a piece of wood and laid her eggs (aṇḍa) in his top-knot (śikhā). When the bodhisattva awoke from his dhyāna and noticed that he had birds’ eggs on his head, he said to himself: “If I move, the mother will not come back, and if the mother does not [188b] return, the eggs will spoil.” Therefore he went back into dhyāna and came out only when the nestlings were ready to fly away.

7) Moreover, except for the bodhisattva, other people cannot be introduced into the dhyānas with a mind of kāmadhātu.⁴⁸⁷ the bodhisattva who is practicing the dhyānapāramitā is able to enter into dhyāna with a mind of kāmadhātu. Why? Because from lifetime to lifetime, the bodhisattva has cultivated the qualities (guṇa) and thus his fetters (saṃyojana) are slight and his mind soft and tender (mṛdutaruṇa).

⁴⁸⁷ Before entering into the first dhyāna, it is necessary to enter into the anāgāmya and abandon the passions of kāmadhātu.

8) Moreover, other people eliminate the passions (vairāgya) by means of a knowledge concerned with the general characters of things (sāmānyalakṣaṇa), such as seeing the transitory (anitya), painful (duḥkha) impure (aśubha) nature. The bodhisattva, by contrast, has eliminated the passions by analysis of the specific characteristics (bhinnalakṣaṇa).

[The Kiṃnarī and the five hundred ṛṣis].⁴⁸⁸ – Thus, five hundred ṛṣis who, while flying about, heard the song of a Tchen t'o lo niu (Kiṃnarī); their minds became enraptured; they lost the bases of all their miraculous powers (rddhipāda) and fell to earth all at once.

[Druma's action on the śrāvakas].⁴⁸⁹ – Some śrāvakas heard T'ouen louen mo (Druma), king of the Kin t'o lo (Kiṃnara) playing the lute, singing and praising the Buddha according to the true nature of dharmas. Then Mount Sumeru and all the trees shook; the great disciples of the Buddha, Mahākāśyapa, etc., were unable to sit still on their seats. The bodhisattva T'ien siu asked Mahākāśyapa: “You are very old and the foremost among those who observe the dhutas; why cannot you control your mind and keep still?” Mahākāśyapa answered: “My mind would never be disturbed by pleasures divine or human; but here there are marvelous sounds, the reward for immense merits of this bodhisattva; when he produces these sounds by metamorphosis (nirmāṇa), there is no means to resist. When the winds of the eight directions arise, they are unable to shake Mount Meru; but when the P'i lan wind (Vairambhavāyu)⁴⁹⁰ comes at the end of the kalpa, it blows away Mount Meru like straw. “

This is why we know that the bodhisattva succeeds in eliminating his passions by the vision of the specific characteristics of all dharmas. All other people obtain only the dhyānas themselves, but do not obtain the dhyānapāramitā.

9) Moreover, other people know the mind of entry into concentration (dhyānapravesacitta) of a bodhisattva and the mind of leaving the concentration (dhyānavyutthānacitta), but cannot cognize the mind of the bodhisattva in the course of the concentration (dhyānasthiticitta): they are ignorant of its object (ālambana), its extent and depth of the dharmas that it cognizes. If the arhats and pratyekabuddhas are unable to know this mind, what can be said of other men? It is like the elephant (gajarāja) that crosses the river: its footprints are visible when it enters the water and when it comes out, but when it is in the water, nothing can be seen. When someone has obtained the first dhyāna, those who already possess the first dhyāna know it, but they do not know [the mind] of the bodhisattva entered into the first dhyāna. Those who possess the second dhyāna know even more clearly the mind of the person who has obtained the first dhyāna, but they do not know the mind of the bodhisattva who has entered into the first dhyāna. It is the same up to the naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana.

⁴⁹⁰ For this wind, see above, Traité, I, p. 559F, n. 1.

10) Furthermore, in the course of the concentration of the leap (vyutkrāntakasamādhi),⁴⁹¹ the ascetic jumps from the first dhyāna to the third, from the third dhyāna to ākāśāntyāyatana, from ākāśāntyāyatana to ākīṃcanyāyatana. In the Vehicles of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddha, one can leap thus over one level but not over two. But the bodhisattva who has mastery over leaping is able, on leaving the first dhyāna, to jump to the third dhyāna, – which is normal, – but he may also leap directly to either the fourth or to one of the four samāpattis: ākāśa, viññāna, ākīṃcanya or naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana, or into the samjñāvedayitanirodhasamāpatti. On leaving the samjñāvedayitanirodhasamāpatti, the bodhisattva enters into either the ākīṃcanyāyatana, or the viññāna, or the ākāśāyatana, or finally into dhyānas 4 to 1; sometimes he leaps over one level, sometimes over two and sometimes even over nine. On the other hand, the śrāvaka cannot leap over more than one level. Why? Because his wisdom (prajñā), his qualities (guṇa), the power of his concentration are slight. The śrāvaka and the bodhisattva are like two kinds of lions (siṃha), the yellow lion and the white-maned lion: although the yellow lion can jump, he cannot jump as well as the royal white-maned lion. It is for all these reasons that we distinguish a dhyānapāramitā.

11) Furthermore, at the time that the bodhisattva, always steady in dhyāna, concentrates his mind, is not moved, he produces neither examination (vitarka) nor judgment (vihāra), yet he still addresses himself to all the beings in the ten directions, preaches the Dharma to them in immense sounds (paramāṇasvara) and converts them. This is called dhyānapāramitā.

Question. – However, a sūtra says: “Having first examined and judged, then one is able to preach the Dharma.”⁴⁹² But having entered into dhyāna, one is without vitarka and vicāra [which necessarily precedes speech]; therefore one can no longer preach the Dharma. Why do you say that the bodhisattva, constantly resting in dhyāna, no longer producing examination or judgment, preached the Dharma to beings?

Answer. – The person in saṃsāra, having entered into dhyāna, must at first resort to vitarka and vicāra of speech in order to be able later to preach the Dharma. But the dharmakāya Bodhisattva, who has stripped off the body of transmigration (saṃsārakāya), cognizes all dharmas, is always in accord with the images of concentration (dhyānasamāpattinimitta) and perceives no contradiction; this dharmakāya Bodhisattva, transforming his immense body, preaches the Dharma to beings, although his mind remains without concept (nirvikalpa).

⁴⁹¹ According to the Atthasālinī, p. 187 (tr. Tin, Expositor, I, p. 251), commented on by Visuddhimagga, II, p. 374, there are four ways of traveling through the successive concentrations (four dhyānas, four ārūpyasamāpattis, and nirodhasamāpatti); in ascending order (jhānānulomato), in descending order (jhānapaṭilomato), in ascending then descending order (jhānānulomapaṭilomato), or leaping over a level (jhānukkato). The last method is described in Sanskrit as the concentration of the leap (vyutkrāntakasamāpatti): see Kośa, II, p. 210; VIII, p. 173; Mahāvīyut., no. 1496.

Thus, the lute of the asuras constantly produces sounds and plays at will without anyone plucking it. This lute has neither a distracted mind (vikṣiptacitta) nor a concentrated mind (saṃgrhitacitta), for it constitutes a reward for the asuras' merits (asurapūṇyavipākaja); it produces its sounds according to people's wish. It is the same for the dharmakāya Bodhisattva: he is without concept (vikalpa), free from distractions (vikṣiptacitta), without [vitarka and vicāra, the] factors of preaching (dharmadeśanānimitta); but as a result of his immense merits (apramāṇacitta), his concentration and his wisdom, he produces the many sounds of the Dharma (nānāvidhadharmasvara) in conformity with the needs of people (yathāyogam). The miserly man (matsarin) hears a sermon on generosity (dāna); the lustful, the angry, the lazy, the distracted and the foolish hear, respectively, a sermon on morality (śīla), patience (kṣānti), exertion (vīrya), dhyāna, and wisdom (prajñā). Having heard this sermon, each goes back home and gradually finds deliverance by means of the three Vehicles (yānatraya).

12) Furthermore, the bodhisattva knows that all dharmas, distraction (vikṣepa) as well as concentration (saṃpatti) are free of duality (advaya). Other men chase away distraction in order to seek concentration. How? They become impatient with distraction and develop attachment to concentration.

[189a] [Udraka, or immoderate attachment to concentration].⁴⁹³ – Thus, the ṛṣi Yu t'o lo k'ie (Udraka) who ⁴⁹³ This Udraka is certainly the Udraka Rāmaputra who taught Gautama the path of naivasamjñānāśamjñāyatana; finding this teaching inadequate, the future Buddha abandoned it (cf. Majjhima, I, p. 165 seq.; 240 seq.; Jātaka, I, p. 66; Dhammapadaṭṭha, I, p. 85; Mahāvastu, II, p. 119, 200; Divyāvdāna, p. 392; Lalitavistara, p. 243-245.). However, when the Buddha attained enlightenment and decided to preach the Dharma, he first thought of teaching his former master whom he judged capable of understanding it; but a god informed him that Udraka was dead and had taken birth in the naivasamjñānāśamjñāyatana (Vinaya, I, p. 7; Jātaka, I, p. 81; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 14, p. 618b; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 15, p. 104a; Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 32, p. 787b; Mahāvastu, III, p. 322; Lalitavistara, p. 403).

The story that the Mppś devotes to Udraka tells us that this ascetic took rebirth in the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination before falling into hell. The text of the Mppś is reproduced without any changes in the King liu yi sinag, T 2121, k. 39, p. 208b. A more detailed version of the same story occurs in the Vibhāṣā in 60 scrolls, T 1546, k. 32, p. 237b (reproduced in T 2121, k. 39, p. 208c-209a) and in the Vibhāṣā in 200 scrolls, T 1545, k. 61, p. 314c-315a. Here is the translation of the latter source, by which the Mppś was probably inspired:

Once there was a ṛṣi named Mong Hi tseu (cf. Rosenberg, Vocabulary, p. 319: Udraka Rāmaputra); he was invited at meal-time by king Cheng kiun (Prasenajit) and, mounted on his power of abhijñā, he flew like a royal swan (rājahamsa) to the palace. The king himself received him, placed him on a golden bed, burned incense, threw flowers, served him with delicious foods with many courtesies. The meal finished, the ṛṣi put away his bowl, made his ablutions and, having blessed the king, returned flying through space. One day the king wished to go abroad for state reasons; he thought: “When I am gone, who will welcome the ṛṣi in my place? Having a violent nature, the ṛṣi will curse me (kāpayati) and make me lose my throne; or else he will take my life; or else again, he will kill my subjects.” The king then spoke to his young wife: “When I am gone, would you be able to entertain the ṛṣi in place of me?” His wife replied that she could. The king insistently recommended his wife to honor the ṛṣi according to the usual rules and then went away to take care of the business of the kingdom.

The next day when meal-time approached, the ṛṣi, flying through the air, came to the palace; the king's wife received him and placed him on the golden bed. The ṛṣi's renunciation (vairāgya) was incomplete, and when he felt the woman's gentle touch, he lost his abhijñās. He took his meal as usual, went on to perform his ablutions and pronounced the blessing; but when he tried to rise up into the air, he noticed that he could no longer fly.

The ṛṣi withdrew into the king's garden trying to regain his former powers; but as he heard all kinds of noises, cries of elephants, horses, etc., he reached no success. The ṛṣi knew that at Śrāvastī the people thought that, if a great ṛṣi trod on the ground, all should pay homage (pūjā) to him by taking hold of his feet (pādābhivandana). Pretending to false claim, the ṛṣi said to the queen: “Announce in the city that today a ṛṣi will go out of this city treading on the ground, and that everything necessary should be done.” The queen obeyed this order and at this news all the citizens cleaned the city of fragments of tiles and refuse, sprinkled and cleaned the city, hung rows of banners, burned incense, decorated it with flowers and played music: the setting and wealth equaled that of a city of the gods. Then the ṛṣi left the city on foot and, not far away, entered into a forest. He wanted to regain his powers, but when he heard the cries of the birds, he was distracted and did not succeed. Then he left the forest and came to the edge of a river; there too he heard the nāga fish jumping about, and his mind, being disturbed by all these sounds, he could not practice. Then he climbed a mountain, saying to himself: “If I have fallen from my good qualities, it is as a result of beings; since I have otherwise observed the precepts (śīla) and asceticism (duṣkaracaryā), I would like to become a winged fox: everything that goes in the water, on earth or in the air will not escape me.” After he had made this vow (praṇidhāna), his wrath (viṣacitta) weakened a bit and, soon afterwards, he was able to eliminate the passions of the [possessed the five superknowledges (abhijñā), each day flew to the palace of the king where he took his meal. The king and queen, according to the custom of the land, greeted him by [placiating their head at his feet (pāḍau śirasābhivandana). The queen having touched him with her hand, the ṛṣi lost his abhijñās. [Unable to fly,] he asked the king for a chariot and drove away. Returning home, he went into a forest and tried to retrieve his five abhijñās. The concentration returned, but as he was about to regain the abhijñās, a bird perched on a tree suddenly began to sing and distracted him. Udraka then left the forest and went to the shore of a lake is search of concentration; there too he heard some fish that were fighting and disturbing the water. Not finding the concentration that he wanted, the ṛṣi became angry and said: “I would like to kill every last fish and every last bird.” Long afterwards, by the power of meditation, he regained saṃāpatti and [after his death] he was reborn in the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination (naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana). When his life was over, he was reborn as a flying fox and he killed all the fish and birds that he encountered. Having committed innumerable crimes, he fell into the three unfortunate destinies (durgati). This [sad fate] was caused by his attachment to the dhyānas and saṃāpattis. It will be the same for heretics [immoderately attached to the dhyānas].

[Punishment of a bhikṣu who confused dhyāna and fruits of the Path].⁴⁹⁴ – Among the disciples of the Buddha, there was a bhikṣu who, possessing the four dhyānas, conceived great pride (abhimāna) therefrom: he claimed from that very fact to have obtained the four [fruits of the] Path. He said: “By the first dhyāna, srotaāpanna is obtained; by the second, sakṛdāgamin; by the third, anāgamin; and by the fourth, arhat.” Based thereon, he stopped and made no further progress on the Path. About to die, he saw the [five] aggregates (skandha) present in the four dhyānas;⁴⁹⁵ he produced a wrong view (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) and claimed that nirvāṇa does not exist and that the Buddha was mistaken; by this error, he lost the aggregates of the four dhyānas. Then he saw the aggregates related to Avicī hell and, his life being over, he was reborn in Avicī hell.

[first] eight levels; as a result he was reborn in the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination (naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana) which is the absorption of the summit of existence (bhavāgṛa) and the door to the immortal (amṛtadvāra). For 80,000 kalpas he enjoyed the bliss of retreat; but when the retribution of his actions and his life-span (āyus) were exhausted, he was reborn here below in a hermitage (tapovana); he had the body of a fox and his two wings were each fifty yojanas wide; with this huge body, he tormented all classes of beings and nothing that moved in the air, in the water or on earth could escape him. When his life was over, he fell into Avicī hell where he suffered all these torments that are so difficult to escape.

⁴⁹⁴ I [Lamotte] am unaware of the source of this sūtra. We may only note that the Brahmajālasutta (Dīgha, I, p. 37) condemns as heretics those who claim that it is enough to enter into the dhyānas to obtain “supreme nirvāṇa in this visible world” (paramaṇiṭṭhadhammanibbāna). – A young man, native of Mathurā and disciple of Upagupta, committed the same harmful error of identifying the four dhyānas with the four fruits of the Path, *srotaāpatti*phala, etc.; in the course of a series of events evoked by his teacher, he had to account for the fact that the practice of the dhyānas did not assure him any fruit of the Path: cf. A yu wang tchouan, T 2042, k. 6, p. 125c-126a (tr. Przyluski, Aśoka, p. 390); Ayu wang king, T 2043, k. 10, p. 167c.

⁴⁹⁵ Actually, the five skandhas are present in the dhyānas and, after death, go on to new existences; in the āṛūpyasamāpatti, four skandhas are present, for rūpa is lacking. Nirvāṇa alone entails the disappearance of all the skandhas of existence; cf. Saṃyutta, I, p. 136; sabbasankhārasamatho nibbānaṃ.

The bhikṣus questioned the Buddha: “Where did this forest-dwelling bhikṣu take rebirth when his life was over?” The Buddha told them: “This man has taken rebirth in Avicī hell.” Frightened and astounded, the bhikṣus continued: “This man was practicing the dhyānas and observed the discipline (śīla); what is the cause of it?” The Buddha answered: “This bhikṣu was very proud; as he possessed the four dhyānas, he claimed to have obtained the four [fruits] of the Path. When he came to the end of his life and saw the skandhas of the four dhyānas, he fell into wrong view and claimed that nirvāṇa does not exist. ‘How is it’, he said, ‘that I am an arhat and here I am returning to new existences (punarbhava); the Buddha is an impostor!’. It was then that he saw the skandhas relating to Avicī hell and, his life being over, he took rebirth in Avicī hell.” Then the Buddha pronounced this stanza:

By knowledge, morality and dhyāna

One does not obtain the stainless (anāsṛava) Element.

Even if one possesses these qualities,

The result, however, is not assured.

The bhikṣu therefore underwent the suffering of the unfortunate destinies. This is why we know that by grasping the characteristic marks of distraction (vikṣepanimittoḍghaṇa), the affliction of anger, etc., (dveṣāsikleṣa), can be produced, and that by grasping the characteristic marks of concentration, attachment (abhiniveśa) is experienced. The bodhisattva does not perceive either the characteristic marks of distraction or of concentration, for distraction and concentration have only one and the same characteristic (ekanimitta): this is what [189b] is called dhyānapāramitā.

In the first dhyāna, desires (kāma) are expelled, the obstacles (nīvaraṇa) are chased away and the mind is fixed one-pointedly. But because of his keen senses (tīkṣhendriya), wisdom (prajñā) and insight (samanuṣāyanā), the bodhisattva does not have to detach himself from the five obstacles nor grasp the images of the dhyānas and saṃāpattis, since all dharmas are empty by nature (lakṣaṇaśūnya). Why does he not have to detach himself from the five obstacles?

The first of these obstacles, envy (kāmacchanda), is neither internal (ādhyātmika) nor external (bahirdhā) nor both.⁴⁹⁶ If it were internal, it would not depend on an external object to arise. If it were external, it would not trouble the Self. If it were both, it would be nowhere. – Neither can it come from the preceding lifetime (pūrvajanman), for all dharmas are without origin; a baby has no envy; if it had envy in the previous lifetime, it would still have a little; therefore we know that envy does not come from the previous lifetime. – It does not go on to the next lifetime (aparajanman); it does not come from the directions (diś-); it does not exist by itself eternally; it does not occur either in a part of the body or in the whole body or in both places at once; it does not come from the five sense objects (rajas) and does not go to the five emotions; there is no place that it arises and no place that it perishes. – It is wrong that envy has a previous, later or simultaneous birth. Why? If birth existed before and envy later, there would be no arising of envy since envy did not exist. If the arising existed later and the envy before, the arising would have no substrate. If the two were simultaneous, there would be neither something that arose nor place of birth, for between the thing that is born and the place of birth, any difference would have been suppressed. – Finally, there is neither identity nor difference between envy and the envier. Why? Because the envier does not exist apart from the envy, and the envy does not exist outside of the envier. Therefore envy arises only from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī). Now, dharmas arise from such a complex are empty of self nature (svabhāvaśūnya). Therefore there is neither identity nor difference between envy and envier. For all these reasons, the arising of envy is impossible. Dharmas that are without birth (anutpanna) are also without cessation (aniruddha). As they are without birth or cessation, concentration and distraction do not exist. Thus we see that the obstacle of envy (kāmacchandanivaraṇa) is one with the dhyāna, and that it is the same for the other obstacles. In possession of the true nature of dharmas, we hold the five obstacles to be non-existent; we know then that the true nature of the obstacles is mingled with the true nature of the dhyānas and that the true nature of dhyāna is the five desires (kāma), the five obstacles (nivaraṇa). The bodhisattva knows that the five desires, the five obstacles, the dhyānas and the samāpattis have all the same nature (ekalakṣaṇa) and are without support (anāśraya): to enter concentration in this way is dhyānapāramitā.

13) Furthermore, by practicing the dhyānapāramitā, the bodhisattva lends his support to the other five pāramitās: this is dhyānapāramitā.

[189c] 14) Furthermore, the bodhisattva who, thanks to dhyānapāramitā has mastered the superknowledges (abhijñā), in one moment of thought and without going into absorption, is able to pay homage (pūja) to the Buddhas of the ten directions with flowers (puṣpa), incense (gandha), jewels (maṇi) and all kinds of offerings.

15) Moreover, the Bodhisattva, by the power of his dhyānapāramitā, transforms his body in innumerable ways, enters into the five destinies and converts beings there by means of the Dharma of the three Vehicles (yānatraya).

16) Furthermore, entering into the dhyānapāramitā, the bodhisattva expels the bad [desires] and bad dharmas and enters [into the nine concentrations], from the first dhyāna up to naivasaṃjñānāśaṃjñāyatana. His mind, disciplined and supple, practices great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā) in each of these concentrations; as a result of this loving-kindness and compassion, he eradicates the errors committed during innumerable kalpas; as he has obtained the knowledge of the true nature of dharmas, he is commemorated by the Buddhas and the great bodhisattvas.

17) Furthermore, entering into dhyānapāramitā, the bodhisattva, by means of his divine eye (divyachakṣus) contemplates beings plunged into the five destinies of the ten directions; he sees those who have taken birth in rūpadhātu taste the enjoyments (āsvādana) of the dhyānas and then return into an animal destiny (tiryagoni) and undergo all kinds of sufferings; he sees the gods of kāmadhātu in the rivers of seven jewels taking their pleasure among flowers and perfumes and they fall into the hell of excrement (kūṣāniraya);

he sees wise men (bahuśruta) and men learned in the worldly sciences (laukikajñāna) who are incapable of finding the Path fall into the rank of pigs or sheep, without discernment. These various beings thus exchange great happiness for great suffering, great benefit for great ruin, a noble state for a lowly state. The bodhisattva experiences feelings of compassion for these beings which increase little by little until he realizes great compassion (mahākaruṇā); he does not spare even his life and, in the interest of beings, he practices exertion (vīrya) diligently and seeks Buddhahood.

18) Finally, the absence of distraction and enjoyment is called dhyānapāramitā. Thus the Buddha said to Śāriputra: “The bodhisattva dwelling in the virtue of wisdom must fulfill the virtue of dhyāna by being based on the non-existence of distraction and enjoyment.” (P.P. sūtra, above, p. 984F; bodhisattvena mahāsatvena prajñāpāramitāyāṃ sthītvā dhyānapāramitā paripūrayitavyā avikṣepanatām anāsvādanatām upādāya).

Question. – What is distraction (vikṣepa)?

Answer. – There are two kinds of distraction, subtle (sūkṣma) and coarse (sthūla).

Subtle distraction is of three types according to whether it abounds in attachment (āsaṅgabahula), pride (abhimānabahula) or wrong view (drṣṭibahula). What is abounding in attachment? Having obtained the bliss of concentration, the ascetic’s mind becomes attached to it and he enjoys the taste (āsvādana). – What is abounding in pride? Having obtained the concentration, the ascetic tells himself that he has attained a very difficult thing and praises himself (ātmānam utkarṣayati). – What is abounding in wrong view? This is to enter into concentration with the wrong view of the self (ātmadrṣṭi), etc.; to make distinctions (pravibhāga) and grasp at characteristics (nimittodgrahaṇa) saying: “This is true, the rest is false” (idaṃ evasaccaṃ mogham aññan ti). These three distractions are subtle distractions. Because of that, one falls out of the concentrations and produces the threefold poison (rāga, dveṣa and moha) that constitutes the coarse distraction (sthūlavikṣhepa).

Enjoyment (āsvādana) consists of becoming passionately attached with one’s whole mind (ekacitta) to the concentration once one obtains it.

Question. – All the afflictions (kleśa) are adherence (abhiniveśa): why do you reserve the name of attachment (āsaṅga) for enjoyment?

Answer. – Because attachment (āsaṅga) and dhyāna resemble each other. How is that? Dhyāna is the fixing of a concentrated mind (saṃgrhītacittaprasthāpana), and attachment also is an exclusive adherence, difficult to eliminate (abhiniveśa). As soon as one seeks dhyāna, one wishes to [190a] obtain it absolutely; becoming attached to it is as natural as pursuing the objects of desire (kāmaguṇaparyeṣaṇā). [From this point of view], there is no opposition (virodha) between desire (kāma) and concentration; the ascetic in possession of an absorption is deeply attached to it, does not let go of it, and thus taints his absorption. Just as there is no merit in giving something when one is certain of a reward, so the absorption [is of no value] when one is enjoying its taste and is passionately attached to it. This is why we reserve the name of attachment for enjoyment without resorting to other passions in order to describe it.

CHAPTER XXIX: THE VIRTUE OF WISDOM (p. 1058F)

Sūtra: The Bodhisattva must fulfill the virtue of wisdom by not adhering to any system (*prajñāpāramitā paripūrṇayitavyā sarvadharmābhiniveśam*⁴⁹⁷ upādāya).

Śāstra. – Question. – What is prajñāpāramitā?

Answer. – From the first production of the mind of Bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisattvas seek the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñāna), in the course of which they understand the true nature of dharmas: this wisdom is the prajñāpāramitā.

Question. – If that is so, this wisdom should not be called virtue (pāramitā). Why? Because it does not reach the end (na pāram ita)⁴⁹⁸ of wisdom.

Answer. – Only the wisdom obtained by the Buddha is the true wisdom; but, as a result of this virtue, the efforts of the bodhisattva are also called virtue, for the effect (kārya) is included in the cause (kāraṇā). Inasmuch as this virtue resides in the mind of the Buddha, it changes its name and is called the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñāna);⁴⁹⁹ but when the bodhisattva, practicing this wisdom, seeks to attain the other shore (pāra), it is called virtue (pāramitā). As the Bodhisattva has already attained the other shore, his wisdom is called knowledge of all the aspects.

Question. – The Buddha, who has destroyed all the passions (kleśa) and impregnations (vāsanā) and whose eye of wisdom (prajñācakṣus) is pure, can truly understand the true nature of dharmas and this true nature is prajñāpāramitā; but the bodhisattva has not destroyed the impurities (akṣiṇāśrava) and his eye of wisdom is impure; how can he understand the true nature of dharmas?

Answer. – This will be fully explained in the following chapters; here a summary (saṃkṣepokti) must be sufficient. Suppose [two] men walk into the sea; the first just begins to go in whereas the second already touches the bottom. Despite the difference of depth, both are said to have ‘gone into the sea’. It is [190b] the same for the Buddha and the bodhisattva: the Buddha has attained the depth [of wisdom]; the bodhisattva, who has not destroyed the impregnations of passions (kleśavāsanā) and whose power is weak, cannot penetrate [into wisdom] deeply. We will see this in the following chapters.

When a person lights a lamp in a dark room, it lights up the objects that all become visible. If a big lamp is also brought, the illumination is increased and it is noticed that the darkness dissipated by this new big lamp still remained with the first lamp. The first lamp, which co-existed with a certain amount of darkness, illumined the objects, however, [up to a certain point] because, if this first lamp had chased away all the darkness, the second lamp would be useless.⁵⁰⁰ It is the same for the wisdom of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas. The wisdom of the bodhisattva which co-exists with the impregnations of passions is, however, able to understand the true nature of dharmas: it is like the first lamp that lights up the objects [slightly]. The wisdom of the Buddhas that has eliminated the impregnations of the passions also understands the true nature of dharmas: it is like the second lamp that illuminates twofold.

Question. – What is the true nature of dharmas?

Answer. – Each being defines this true nature of dharmas and considers their own definition to be true. But here the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) is indestructible (avikāra), eternally subsisting, unchangeable and without creator. In a following chapter, the Buddha says to Subhūti: “The bodhisattva sees all dharmas a being neither eternal nor transitory, neither painful nor happy, neither with self nor without self, neither existent nor non-existent, etc.”⁵⁰¹ abstaining from these views is the bodhisattva’s prajñāpāramitā. This subject avoids all views, destroys all speech (abhiḷāpa), expels all functioning of the mind (hittapravṛtti). From the very beginning, dharmas are unborn (anutpanna), unceasing (aniruddha), like nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasama) and all their natures are of the same type: this is the true nature of dharmas. The stanzas of the Tsan pan jo po lo mi (Prajñāpāramitāstotra)⁵⁰² say:

⁵⁰⁰ On this argument, see also Mjīb., III, p. 147 (cf. Tchong a han, T 26, k. 19, p. 550b12): Seyyathāpi puriso sambahulānītelappadīpāni ekaṃ gharaṃ paveseyya, tesam gharaṃ pavesesitānaṃ accinānattam hi kho paññāyetha, no ca ābhānānattam: “It is like when a man brings several oil lamps into a house; a difference is recognized in the flame of these lamps brought into the house, but not a difference in the brightness.”

⁵⁰² The Prajñāpāramitāstotra serves as preface to several Prajñās: Pañcaviṃśatī, ed. N. Dutt, p. 1-3; Aṣṭasāhasrikā, ed. R. Mitra, Bibl. Ind., p. 1-3 (see also R. Mitra, Sanskrit Buddhist Lit. of Nepal, p. 190-192); Suvikrāntavikrāmi, ed. T. Matsumoto, Die P.P. Literatur, Stuttgart, 1932, appendix, p. 1-4. But it is found only in the Sanskrit manuscripts of these Prajñās and not in the Chinese versions or the corresponding Tibetan versions.

This stotra, consisting of about twenty ślokas, is the work of Rāhulabhadra. Actually, Haraprasād Śāstrī in 1907 found a Nepali manuscript of the stotra bearing the comment: kṛtir iyaṃ Rāhulabhadrasya (cf. J. Proc. Asiatic Soc. Bengal. VI, no. 8, 1910, p. 425 seq.). On the other hand, in his Tchong kouan louen chou (T 1824, k. 10, p. 168c4-5), says: “The stanzas of the Prajñāpāramitāstotra found in the 18th scroll of Nāgārjuna’s Ta tche tou louen are the work of the dharmacārya Lo ho (Rāhula)”; cf. H. Ui, Indo-Tetsugaku-Kenkiu, I, 1934, p. 431 seq.; Matsumoto, Die P.P. Literatur, p. 54.

Rāhulabhadra, alias Saraha, appears in the lists of magicians (siddha); for the Tibetan tradition, he was the teacher of Nāgārjuna; for the Chinese sources, he was his disciple: cf. G. Tucci, Animadversiones indicæ, J. Proc. Asiatic Soc. Bengal. XXVI, 1930, p. 141.

The Sanskrit text of the stotra corresponding to the stanzas of the Mppp are found in the notes that follow.

⁴⁹⁷ In place of sarvadharmābhiniveśam there is, in the Pañcaviṃśatī, p. 18: prajñādauprajñānupalabdhitām; in the Satasāhasrikā, p. 56: sarvadharmānupalabdhitām.

⁴⁹⁸ Pāramitā, derived from the adjective parama, simply means superiority. The etymology pāram ita “that which goes to the other shore” or pāra-mita “that which attains the other shore” is purely fantasy. For the etymology of the word, see Kośa, IV, p. 231; Madh. avatāra, p. 30 (tr. Muséon, 1907, p. 277); Saṃdhinirmocana, IX, par. 13; Sūtrālaṃkāra, XVI, p. 101; Saṃgraha, p. 186; Siddhi, p. 628; T 1606, k. 11, p. 747c21. – F. W. Thomas, JRAS, 1904, p. 547.

⁴⁹⁹ For sarvākārajñāna, see above, p. 640F.

The Prajñāpāramitā,
The true Dharma, free of error (aviparita).
Mind, concept, view are expelled,
The elements of speech have been destroyed.

Immeasurable, free of any defect,
Mind pure, always unified:
This is how the venerable one Sees Prajñā.⁵⁰³

Immaculate like space,
Free of speech and designation:
To see Prajñā in this way
Is also to see the Buddha.⁵⁰⁴

Seeing the Buddha, the Prajñā and nirvāṇa
According to the rules,
These three things are identical;
There is no difference among these realities.⁵⁰⁵

⁵⁰³ *Nirvikalpa namas tubhyam prajñāpāramite 'mīte, yā tvam sarvānavadyāṅgi
nirvadayair nirīkṣyaso.*

“Homage to thee, O inconceivable, immense Prajñāpāramitā! With irreproachable members, you are contemplated by the irreproachable ones.”

⁵⁰⁴ *Ākāśam iva nirlepāṃ niṣprapañcam nirakṣarām, yas tvam paśyati bhāvena
sa paśyati tathāgatam.*

“Immaculate like space, free of speech and designation; he who sees you in truth sees the Tathāgata.”

⁵⁰⁵ *Tava cāruaguṇādhyāya
buddhasya ca jagadguroḥ,*

Of Buddhas and bodhisattvas
Who carry out the benefit of all beings,
Prajñā is the mother:
She gives birth to them and nourishes them.⁵⁰⁶

[190c] The Buddha is the father of beings
Prajñā is the mother of the Buddha.
Thus, the Prajñā is the grandmother
Of all beings.⁵⁰⁷

The Prajñā is a unique dharma
To which the Buddha applies all kinds of names;
According to the capacities of beings
He applies different sounds.⁵⁰⁸

na paśyanty antaram santaś canracadatikayor iva.

“Between you who are so rich in holy qualities and the Buddha, the teacher of the world, honest people see no more difference than between the moon and the light of the moon.”

⁵⁰⁶ Sarveśām api vīrāṇām parārthe niyatātmanām, poṣikā janayitrī cha mātā tvam asi vatsalā.

“Of all the heroes who have dedicated themselves to the good of others, you are the nourisher, the generator and the tender mother.”

⁵⁰⁷ *Yad buddhā lokaguravaḥ putrās tava kṛpālavaḥ, tena tvam asi kalyāṇi
sarvassattvapitāmahi.*

“Since the Buddhas, the compassionate teachers of the world, are your own sons, you are, thus, O virtuous one, the grandmother of all beings.”

⁵⁰⁸ Vineyam janam āśāsyā tatra tatra tathāgataiḥ, bahurūpā tvam evaikā sānāmmamabhir īdyase.

For the person who has grasped the Prajñā
Speech and thoughts vanish,
Like the morning dew evaporates
All at once at day break.⁵⁰⁹

The Prajñā has this wonderful power
Of stimulating two types of people,
The ignorant by means of fear,
The wise by means of joy.⁵¹⁰

The person who possesses the Prajñā
Is the king of Prajñā.
He is not attached to Prajñā
And even less to the other dharmas.⁵¹¹

“Singular although multiform, you are invoked everywhere under various names by the Tathāgatas, in the presence of beings to be converted.”

⁵⁰⁹ Prabhāṃ prāpyeva dīptāṃśor avaśyāyobindavaḥ, tvāṃ prāpya pralayaṃ yānti doṣa vādāḥ ca vādinām.

“Like dew-drops in contact (with starlight) at the blazing rays, the faults and opinions of the theoreticians dissolve at your touch.”

⁵¹⁰ *Tvam eva trāsajanantī bālānāṃ bhīmadarśanā, āśvāsajanantī cāsi
viduṣāṃ saumyadarśanā.*

“In your terrifying aspect, you give rise to fear among fools; in your friendly aspect, you give rise to faith in the wise.”

⁵¹¹ *Yasya tvayy apy abhiṣvaṅgas tvannāthasya na vidyate, tasyāmba katham anyatra
rāga dveṣau bhaviṣyataḥ.*

“If he who is clasped to you is not recognized as your husband, how, O mother, would he experience love or hate for another object?”

Prajñā comes from nowhere
Prajñā goes nowhere.
The sage looks for it everywhere
But does not find it.⁵¹²

The person who sees Prajñā
Finds deliverance.
The person who does not see Prajñā
Also finds deliverance.⁵¹³

The Prajñā is astounding,
Very profound and glorious.
Like a magical object,
It is seen without being visible.⁵¹⁴

⁵¹² Nāgacchasi kutaścit tvam na ca kvacana gacchasi, sthāneṣu api ca sarveṣu vidvadbhir nopalabhyase.

“You do not come from anywhere and you do not go anywhere; in whatever place there may be, you are not seen by the wise.”

⁵¹³ Tvam eva badhyate paśyann apaśyann api badhyate, tvām eva mucyate paśyann apaśyann api mudhyate.

“The person who sees you is fettered, the person who does not see you is also fettered; the person who sees you is liberated, the person who does not see you is also liberated.”

⁵¹⁴ *Aho vismayanīyāsi gambhīrāsi yaśasvinī, sudurbodhāsi māyeva
dṛśyase na ca dṛśyase.*

“Oh! You are astounding, you are profound and glorious; you are very difficult to cognize; like a magic show, you are seen and you are not seen.”

The Buddhas, the bodhisattvas
The śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas
All derive from the Prajñā
Their liberation and their nirvāṇa.⁵¹⁵

Their language is conventional:
Having pity for all beings,
They speak of dharmas in metaphors;
Speaking [about the Prajñā], they say nothing.⁵¹⁶

The Prajñāpāramitā
Is like the flame of a great fire:
Ungraspable from any direction,
Without holding or not holding.

Escaping from any grasp,
It is called ungraspable.
The taking of it when it is ungraspable
Is what the grasping of it consists of.

The Prajñā is unchangeable

⁵¹⁵ *Buddhaiḥ pratyekabuddhaiśca śrāvakasiś ca niṣevitā, mārgas tvam eko mokṣasya
nāsty anya iti niścayaḥ.*

“You are cultivated by the Buddhas, pratyekabuddhas and śrāvakas. You are the single path to salvation; there is no other: it is certain.”

⁵¹⁶ Vyavahāraṃ puraskṛtya prajñāpyasthaṃ śarīrīṇām, kṛpayā lokanāthais tvam ucyuase ca na cocyase.

“Having recourse to ordinary language to make (embodied) beings understand, the Teachers of the world, out of compassion, speak about you and say nothing.”

And surpasses any speech.
It occurs unceasingly.
Who can praise its qualities?⁵¹⁷

Although the Prajñā cannot be praised
I can praise it now.
Even without having escaped from this land of death,
I have already found the way out (niḥsaraṇa).⁵¹⁸

⁵¹⁷ *Śaktas kas tvām iha statum nirmittāṃ nirañjanām, sarvavāgviśayātītā yā
tvam kvacid anihśrtā.*

“Who here is able to praise you, you who are without characteristic or nature? You surpass all praise, you who have no support anywhere.”

⁵¹⁸ Saty evam api saṃcṛtyā vākpathair vāyam īdṛśaiḥ, tvām astutyām api atutvā tuṣṭūśantaḥ sunirvṛtāḥ.

“But, since there is conventional language, we are pleased and reassured to have praised you verbally, you who surpass all praise.”

CHAPTER XXX: THE CHARACTERISTICS OF PRAJÑĀ (p. 1066F)

I. ‘GREAT’ PRAJÑĀ

Question. – Why is the Prajñāpāramitā the only one to be called ‘mahā’, while the other pāramitās are not?

Answer. – Mahā, in the language of the Ts’in. means great; Prajñā means wisdom; Pāramitā means coming to the other shore (pāram ita). It is called pāramitā because it reaches the other shore (pāra) of the ocean of wisdom, because it reaches the end (anta) of all the wisdoms (prajñā) and attains their summit (niṣṭāgata).⁵¹⁹ In all the universes (lokadhātu), the Buddhas of the ten directions (daśadiś-) and the three times (tryadhvan) are the greatest, then come the bodhisattvas, the pratyekabuddhas and the śrāvakas; these four kinds of great individuals are born from Prajñāpāramitā; this is why it is called great.

Furthermore, the Prajñāpāramitā is worth a great fruit of retribution (mahāvīpākaphala) to beings, an immense (apramāṇa), indestructible (akṣaya), eternal (nitya) and unchangeable (avikāra) fruit, namely, nirvāṇa. The other five pāramitās do not have such power for, without the Prajñāpāramitā, the virtues of generosity (dāna), etc., can give only fruits of worldly retribution (laukavīpākaphala): this is why they are not called great.

II. PRAJÑĀ AND THE PRAJÑĀS

Question. – What is the Prajñā?

Answer. – The Prajñāpāramitā encompasses (saṃgrhṇāti) all the wisdoms (prajñā). Why? The bodhisattva who seeks Buddhahood must practice (śikṣ-) all the dharmas and acquire all the prajñās, i.e., the prajñās of the śrāvakas, the pratyekabuddhas and the Buddhas.

1. Prajñā of the śrāvakas.

These prajñās are of three kinds according to whether they belong to the śaikṣa (the saint who is not an arhat), the aśaikṣa (the saint who is an arhat) or someone who is neither śaikṣa nor aśaikṣa (naivaśaikṣanāśaikṣa).⁵²⁰

1) The knowledges of those who are neither śaikṣa nor aśaikṣa are, e.g., in the levels of unproductive wisdom, the meditation on the disgusting (aśubhabhāvanā), attention to the breath (ānāpānasmṛti), the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) of the world of desire (kāmadhātuvavacara), and the [four nirvedhabhāgīyas]: heat (uṣmagata) summits (mūrdhan), patience (kṣānti) and the supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgradharma).

2) The knowledges of the śaikṣa go from the duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti up to the prajñā of the diamond concentration (vajropamasamādhī) which the future arhat obtains during the ninth ānantaryamārga [of the bhavāgra].

3) The knowledges of the aśaikṣa are the prajñā that marks the ninth vimuktimārga of the arhat and all the aśaikṣa prajñās that follow, e.g., the knowledge of cessation (kṣayañāna), the knowledge of the non-production of defilements (anutpādajñāna), etc.

These are the knowledges of the aśaikṣa, but it is the same for the prajñās of those who seek the state of pratyekabuddhahood.

⁵²⁰ Here the Mpp lists the various prajñās characterizing the Path of the śrāvakas in its various phases:

1) the saṃbhāramārga, “path of accumulation of merit” and the prayogamārga, “preparatory path”, are characterized by the naivaśaikṣanāśaikṣa, such as: acquisition of the roots of good (kuśalamūla), acquisition of noble lineages (āryavaṃśa), meditation on the disgusting (aśubhabhāvanā) and mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasmṛti), foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), and finally, acquisition of the four roots of good leading to penetration (nirvedhabhāgīya). These last constitute the preparatory path par excellence; they are studied in Kośa, VI, p. 163 seq.

2) The darśanamārga ‘path of seeing the truths’ and the bhāvanamārga ‘path of meditation’ are characterized by the śaikṣa knowledges.

a. The darśanamārga consists of eight moments of patience (kṣānti) and eight moments of knowledge (jñāna) in order to arrive at full understanding (abhisamaya) of the four noble truths (by reason of four moments for each truth).

b. The bhāvanamārga has as result the destruction of the nine categories of passions of each of the nine levels: kāmadhātu, four dhyānas and four āryasamāpattis. The destruction of each category of passions involving two moments – a moment of abandoning (prahāṇa or ānantaryamārga) and a moment of deliverance (vimuktimārga) – the ascetic destroys the totality of the passions at the end of 144 moments. The 143rd moment, by means of which the ascetic abandons the ninth category of the passions of the ninth level (called naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana or bhavāgra), bears the name of vajropamasamādhī (cf. Kośa, VI, p. 228). The 144th moment is a vimuktimārga that makes the ascetic an arhat or aśaikṣa.

3) The niṣṭhāmārga “final path”, attained by the arhat, is characterized by the aśaikṣa knowledges, the main ones of which being the knowledge of the destruction of the defilements (āsravakṣayañāna) and the knowledge of the non-production of defilements (āsravānutpādajñāna): they are defined in Kośa, VI, p. 230 seq.

For more details on the śrāvaka path, see Kośa, V, p. IV-XI; Obermiller, Doctrine of P.P., p. 18-26.

⁵¹⁹ For the etymology of pāramitā, see above, p. 1058F, n. 2.

2. Prajñā of the pratyekabuddhas.

Question. – If it is the same for the state of pratyekabuddha, why do you make a distinction between śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha?

Answer. – Although the final state may be of the same type, the knowledges used are different. At the stage where the Buddhas do not appear and the Buddhadharma has disappeared, the pratyekabuddhas, by reason of previous causes (pūrvajanmahetupratyaya), alone produce wisdom without having heard it from others; it is by means of their own wisdom that they obtain the Path.

Thus the king of a country had gone for a walk in his garden. In the cool morning, he saw how the flowers and fruits of the forest trees were beautiful and desirable. He ate some and fell asleep. His wives and courtesans, walking together to gather flowers, wrecked the forest trees. The king woke up, saw the [191b] destruction and said to himself: “The entire world is transitory (anitya) and perishable like this forest.” As soon as he had this thought, the mind of the pure path (anāsravamārga) arose in him; he cut all the fetters (saṃyojana) and attained the state of pratyekabuddhahood. Endowed with the six superknowledges (abhijñā) he went flying to a solitary forest. – There are other stories of this kind. The merits (punya) and vows (prañidhāna) of previous lifetimes activate a fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) and, in the present lifetime, it is enough for a pratyekabuddha to see a very minor event in order to realize the state of pratyekabuddha. This is what he difference consists of.

Furthermore, there are two kinds of pratyekabuddhas:⁵²¹ the one who is enlightened by himself and the one who is enlightened as the result of an event (nidāna). We will give an example of the pratyekabuddha enlightened following an event. The one who is enlightened by himself is he who attains wisdom by himself during the present lifetime without learning from another; this is the pratyekabuddha enlightened by himself.

There are two kinds of self-enlightened pratyekabuddhas: i) First he was a śaikṣa, born among humans; at a time when the Buddha and his Dharma had not yet disappeared, he was a srotaāpanna; since then, at the end of seven lifetimes without an eighth, he himself attains Bodhi. This person is not called Buddha, is not ⁵²¹ The text distinguishes two kinds of pratyekabuddhas, namely, those who live in a group (vargacārīn) and those who live alone, like a rhinoceros (khagaviṣāṇakalpa).

The vargacārīns are former śrāvakas who have attained the fruits of srotaāpanna or sakṛdāgamin under the reign of a Buddha at a time when the holy Dharma still existed. Later, at a time when the Buddha and the holy Dharma have disappeared, they realize the quality of arhat by themselves. Cf. Mahāvūyutpatti, no. 1007; Kośa, III, p. 195.

The khadgaviṣanakaḥ has practiced the preparatory practices of Bodhi for one hundred kalpas. He attains enlightenment alone, without help from any teaching. He works for his own salvation without converting others. Cf. Suttanipāṭa, v. 35-75 (Khaggaviṣāṇasutta); Visuddhimagga, I, p. 234; Mahāvastu, I, p. 357; Divyāvdāna, p. 294, 582; Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 194; Mahāvūyutpatti, no. 1006; Kośa, III, p. 195; VI, p. 176-177.

called arhat; he is a minor pratyekabuddha no different from the arhats. – ii) There are also pratyekabuddhas who are not like Śāriputra or the other great arhats; these great pratyekabuddhas, during one hundred great kalpas, have practiced the qualities and increased (vardhana) their wisdom; they have some of the thirty-two marks [of the Great Man]: thirty-one, thirty, twenty-nine or even one single mark; in their wisdom they prevail over the nine kinds of arhats; they are able to penetrate the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and the specific characteristics (bhinnalakṣaṇa) inherent in the profound dharmas (gambhīradharma); they cultivate (bhāvayanti) the absorptions (saṃāpatti) for a long time and are always pleased with solitude. They are called great pratyekabuddhas for all these characteristics. This constitutes the difference.

3. Prajñā of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas.

[The bodhisattvas] who seek buddhahood make the following vow (prañidhāna) as soon as the first production of the mind [of Bodhi] (prathamachittotpāda): “I wish to become Buddha, to save all beings, to attain the attributes of the Buddhas, to practice the six pāramitās, to destroy Māra’s army and the kleśas, to obtain omniscience (sarvajñāna) and to realize the state of Buddha.” Until they enter into nirvāṇa without residue (nirupadhiśeṣanirvāṇa), they observe their initial vow. From that moment on, all their wisdoms (prajñā) and all their knowledges (jñāna) of general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and specific characteristics (bhinnalakṣaṇa) are called Prajñā of the Buddhas.

[The Prajñāpāramitā] which cognizes deeply the three kinds of prajñā [prajñā of the śrāvakas, of the pratyekabuddhas and of the Buddhas] is properly called Prajñā that goes to the end (pāram itā) of all the wisdoms.

4. Prajñā of the heretics.

Question. – As you say, Prajñāpāramitā must penetrate deeply all the wisdoms, mundane (laukika) as well as supramundane (lokottara). Among all the wisdoms that it fully exhausts, why do you mention only the wisdoms of the three Vehicles (wisdoms of the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddha and Buddhas) and say nothing of other wisdoms?

Answer. – In the three Vehicles, it is a matter of true wisdoms. Elsewhere, it is false wisdom. Even though the bodhisattva has cognizance of the latter, he does not particularly cultivate them. Just as sandalwood (candana) is found only on Mount Mo li (Malaya), so every good expression (subhāṣita) that is found elsewhere than [in the three Vehicles] all come from the Buddhadharma,⁵²² but they are not the Buddhadharma. When first heard, they seem excellent, but long [191c] afterwards they are revealed as harmful. It is like the milk of the cow (gokṣīra) and that of the ass (aśvatarikṣīra): they both have the same color, but the cow’s milk when churned gives butter (sarpis) whereas the ass’s milk when churned gives urine (mūtra). It is the same for the words of the Buddha and the words of the heretics (tīrthika): insofar as they teach non-killing, non-stealing, having loving-kindness and compassion for beings, concentrating the mind (cittasamgrahaṇa), renouncing desires (vairāgya) and contemplating emptiness (śūnyasamanuṣṣāyānā), they are similar; but the heretics' words, seemingly excellent at the beginning, reveal themselves at the end to be completely false.

[1. Falsity of heretical morality.] – All the heretical systems are attached (śakta) to the view of self (ātmaḍṛṣṭi). If the ātman really existed, one would come up with the following alternatives: it should be either destructible or indestructible. If it were destructible, it would be like ox-hide (gocarman); if it were indestructible, it would be like space (ākāśa); in both cases, there would be no fault in killing it and no merit in sparing it.

a. If it were [indestructible] like space, rain and dew would not wet it, wind and heat would not dry it out; it would be eternal (nitya). If it were eternal, suffering (duḥkha) would not torment it and happiness (sukha) would not delight it. The ātman being insensitive to suffering and happiness, one would neither avoid suffering nor procure happiness.

b. If it were destructible like ox-hide, it would be destroyed by wind and rain; destructible, it would be transitory (anitya); transitory, it would escape from sin (āpatti) and merit (puṇya).

The teaching of the heretics being like that, what merit would there be in non-killing? What fault would be committed by killing living beings?

[2. Falsity of the heretics' concentrations.] – So be it! The moral prescriptions of the heretics show the defects that you say. But what about their dhyānas and their wisdom (prajñā)?

Answer. – The heretics who pursue dhyāna with the notion of self (ātmacitta) and who are full of desire (tṛṣṇā), wrong views and pride (abhimāna), do not reject all the dharmas; consequently they do not have true wisdom.

Question. – You said that heretics contemplate emptiness. In contemplating emptiness, they do reject all dharmas; why do you say then that they do not reject all dharmas and consequently do not have true wisdom?

Answer. – In contemplating emptiness, heretics grasp at the characteristic of emptiness (dharmasūnyatā); they do not accept the emptiness of self (ātmasūnyatā) for they are attached to the wisdom contemplating emptiness.

Question. – The heretics (like the Buddhists) possess the absorption of non-discrimination (asaṃjñīsamāpatti) where mind (citta) and mental events (caitta) are destroyed. By reason of this destruction, they can no longer commit the fault of grasping at characteristics (nimittoḍgrahaṇa) or being attached to wisdom (prajñāsaṅga).

Answer. – The absorption of non-discrimination has enough power to destroy the mind, but it does not have the power of true wisdom. Moreover, the heretics identify this absorption of non-discrimination with nirvāṇa and do not know that it is a composite state: this is why they fall into error (viparyāsa). In this absorption, even though the mind is temporarily destroyed, it reappears when it encounters (favorable) causes and conditions. Thus, when a person is in deep dreamless sleep, his mind and his awareness (saṃjñā) are not functioning, but they reappear after sleep.

Question. – We accept that the absorption of non-discrimination [as the heretics conceive it] presents the defects that you say. Nevertheless, they still possess the absorption of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination (naivasamjñānāsamjñāsamāpatti) in which there is no longer any false notion allowing, as did the preceding absorption, the confusion between non-discrimination and nirvāṇa, for, in this case every concept (saṃjñā) has disappeared by the power of wisdom.

Answer. – No! In this absorption there is still concept;⁵²³ but, as it is subtle (sūkṣma), it is not considered. If there is no more concept, why do the Buddha's disciples still seek the true wisdom [instead of this absorption]? In the Buddha's system, the consciousness that subsists during the absorption of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination rests on the four aggregates [inherent in every ārūpyasamāpatti].⁵²⁴ These four skandhas, which depend on causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), are transitory (anitya); being transitory, they are painful (duḥkha); being transitory and painful, they are empty (śūnya); being empty, they are without self (anātmaka); being empty and selfless, they should be rejected (heya). By becoming attached to this wisdom, you will not obtain nirvāṇa.

The caterpillar (trīṇajalāyukā) puts out its front foot before pulling back its hind foot; when it comes to the edge of the leaf on which it is creeping and there is no further place it can go on to, it moves back.⁵²⁵ In the same way, these heretics, depending on the first dhyāna, reject the desires of the lower level (the desires of kāmadhātu) and so on; finally, depending on the naivasamjñānāsamjñāsamāpatti, they reject the ākimcanyāyatana; but, as there is nothing above the naivasamjñānāsamjñāmapatti, no level on which they can depend, they are unable to leave the naivasamjñānāsamāpatti for, having no further support (āśraya), they are afraid of being lost or falling into nothingness.⁵²⁶

Furthermore, there are sūtras of the heretics that allow killing (prāṇātipāta), theft (adattādana), sexual misconduct (kāma mithyācāra), lying (mṛṣāvāda) and the use of wine. They say: 1) In sacrifices to the gods (devayajña), killing is not wrong because it is the practice of religion; if one is in difficulties, it is not wrong to kill an ordinary person to save one's life, for in difficulties, it is to follow the right path. – 2) Except for gold, it is permitted to steal in order to save one's life. Later, the heretics will suppress this residue of fault. – 3) Except for the consort of one's teacher (guru), the wife of the king, the wife or daughter of a spiritual friend (kalyāṇamitra), it is permitted to violate other women and to have sex with them. – 4) It is permitted to lie in the interest of one's teacher, one's parents, one's own life, one's cattle, or

⁵²⁵ Cf. Brihadār, Up. IV, 3: Tad yathā trīṇajalāyukā trīṇasyāntaṃ gatvā, anyam ākramam ākrāmya, ātmānam upasaṃharati: "Just as a caterpillar coming to the end of a blade of grass, draws back for a new advance..." (noted by P. Demiéville).

⁵²⁶ The mundane or impure path (sāsravamārga), followed by the heretics, does not let them go beyond the naivasamjñānāsamjñāsamāpatti to attain the saṃjñāvedayitanirodhasamāpatti and nirvāṇa. See above, p. 1036F.

in the rôle of a middleman. – 5) When it is cold, it is permitted to drink liquor made from crystallized honey and, in the sacrifices to the gods, it is permitted to take one or two drops of wine. – In the Buddha's Dharma, this is not permitted. 1) Out of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta) and equanimity (samācitta) towards all beings, it is forbidden to take the life of even an ant, the more so a man. – 2) It is forbidden to take a needle (sūci) and thread (tantu), even more so, a valuable object. – 3) It is forbidden to touch a courtesan (veśyā), the more so another man's wife (parakalatra). – 4) It is forbidden to lie as a jest, the more so to make a (real) lie. – 5) It is forbidden to drink any wine at any time, the more so when it is cold and during sacrifices to the gods. The distance between the heretics and the Buddha's Dharma is like the distance between heaven and earth. The law of the heretics is a generating source for passions (kleśamāuthāpaka); the Buddha's Dharma is the place of destruction of all the passions: this is the great difference.

III. THE PRAJÑĀ AND THE TEACHING OF THE DHARMA.

The Dharma of the Buddhas is immense, like an ocean. According to the dispositions of beings, it is preached in various ways:⁵²⁷ sometimes it speaks of existence and sometimes of non-existence, of eternity or of impermanence, of suffering or of bliss, of self or non-self; sometimes it teaches the diligent practice of the threefold activity [of body, speech and mind] that embraces all the good dharmas (sarvakuśaladharmaṣaṃgrāhaka), sometimes it teaches that all dharmas are inactive by essence. Such are the multiple and various teachings: the ignorant who hear them take them to be a perverse error, but the wise man who enters into the threefold teaching of the Dharma (trividha dharmaparyāya) knows that all the Buddha's words (buddhavacana) are the true Dharma (saddharma) and do not contradict one another.

[192b] What are these three teachings (paryāya)? – 1. The teaching of the Piṭaka; 2. the teaching of the Abhidharma; 3. the teaching of emptiness (śūnya).

1. The teaching of the Piṭaka.

What is the teaching of the Piṭaka, etc.? – The Piṭaka contains 3,200,000 words; when the Buddha was still in the world, it was composed by Ta Kia tchan yen (Mahākātyāyana);⁵²⁸ after the Buddha's parinirvāṇa, the length of man's life diminished, the strength of his intellect decreased and people were unable to recite the Piṭaka fully; then the individuals who had attained the Path composed a summary in 384,000 words.

For the person who enters into the Piṭaka teaching, there are endless discussions (vivāda) for all kinds of different teachings (nānāvidhaparyāya), such as teaching by implication (anuvartana), teaching by opposition (pratipakṣa), etc.

⁵²⁷ This subject has been treated above: Traité, I, p. 32F, n. 2.

⁵²⁸ This is Mahākātyāyana, author of the Petakoṣa and not Kātyāyana, author of the Jñānaprasthāna. See above, Traité, I, p. 109, n. 2; p. 113.

1) Teaching by implication (anuvartanaparyāya). – The Buddha in a stanza said:

Avoid all sin, practice the good,

Purify one's mind: this is the teaching of the Buddhas.⁵²⁹

In this stanza, the Buddha should have said: “[Purify the mind] and the mental events (caitasikadharma)”, but he just said: “Purify one's mind”: this is because we know that the mental events have already been treated by him. How is that? By having the same characteristic (lakṣaṇa) and the same object (ālambana) [as the mind].

When the Buddha speaks about the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), he does not mean to separate them from four right efforts (samyakpradhāna), the four bases of miraculous power (rddhipāda), the five senses (indriya) and the five powers (bala). How is that? In the four foundations of mindfulness, the four kinds of energies are the four right efforts; the four kinds of concentrations (samādhi) are the four bases of miraculous power; the five kinds of good dharmas (kuśaladharma) are the five senses and the five strengths. Although the Buddha does not mention these associated subjects and only speaks of the four foundations of mindfulness, we should know that he has already dealt with these other subjects.

It also happens that, of the four noble Truths (āryastaya), the Buddha deals with only one, two or three. Thus the stanza addressed by the bhikṣu Ma sing (Aśvajit) to Śāriputra:

My teacher, the noble king, has told

The cause of all dharmas arisen from a cause.

And he has also revealed

Their suppression.⁵³⁰

⁵²⁹ Frequently cited stanza: cf. Dīgha, II, p. 49; Dhammapāda, v. 183; Nettipakaraṇa, p. 43, 81, 171, 186:

*Sabbapāpassa akaraṇaṃ kuśalassa upasampadā sacittapariyodapanam
etaṃ buddhāna sāsaṇam..*

The Sanskrit version in Mahāvastu, III, p. 420:

*Sarvapāpasāyākaraṇam
kuśalasyopasampadā svacittaparyādmapanam
etaṃ buddhānūsaṇam.*

⁵³⁰ This is the Buddhist “credo”: “Ye dhammā hetupphavā” already cited above, p. 631F.

In this stanza it is a question only of three truths [truth of suffering, its origin and its destruction], but it should be known that the [fourth truth], the Truth of the Path (mārgasatyā) is [implicitly] contained therein, for it is not in contradiction (virodha) with the preceding ones.

In the same way, when a man violates a rule, [it is understood] that his entire family will undergo the punishment. These are similar things that are called ‘teaching by implication’.

2) Teaching by contrast (pratipakṣaparyāya). – Sometimes the Buddha speaks only of the four errors (viparyāsa): taking as permanent (nitya) that which is impermanent, taking as happy (sukha) that which is painful, taking as self (ātman) that which is not the self, taking as pure (śuci) that which is impure.⁵³¹ Although on this occasion the Buddha says nothing about the four foundations of mindfulness [which are antidotes to the four mistakes], it is necessary to know of what these four foundations of mindfulness consist. If somebody tells you about a remedy (bhaiṣajya), it is that you already know the sickness (vyādhi) or, if somebody speaks to you about sickness, it is that you already know the remedy. – If the Buddha speaks of the four foundations of mindfulness, know that he has already spoken of the four mistakes, and that the four mistakes are errors (mithyālakṣaṇa); if he speaks of the four errors, know that he has already spoken about the fetters (saṃyojana). Why? Speaking about the root (mūla) is to already know the branches that come from it. – The Buddha also said that the whole world is infected by the three poisons (triviṣa); when he speaks of the three poisons [rāga, dveṣa and moha], we should know that he has already spoken [192c] about the eightfold Path and its three parts [śīla, samādhi and prajñā]; when he speaks of the three poisons, we should know that he has already treated the poisons of all the passions (sarvakleśaviṣa), namely, the five kinds of thirst (tṛṣṇā) that constitute the poison of rāga, the five kinds of anger (krodha) that constitute the poison of dveṣa, and the five kinds of ignorance (avidyā) that constitute the poison of moha. Wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi), pride (abhimāna) and doubt (vicikitsā) depend on ignorance (avidyā), and all these fetters (saṃyojana) are part of the threefold poison. How are they to be destroyed? By means of the eightfold Path with its three parts [śīla, samādhi and prajñā]. When the Buddha speaks of the eightfold Path, we should understand that he has already spoken of the thirty-seven wings of enlightenment (bodhipākṣikadharmā). All these subjects treated in this way are called ‘teaching by contrast’.

The teachings of this type are called Teaching of the Piṭaka.

2. The Teaching of the Abhidharma.

What does the teaching of the Abhidharma mean? Sometimes the Buddha himself defined the meaning of the dharmas [that he was teaching], sometimes he was content to give their names (nāman) and his disciples explained the meaning by all kinds of descriptions. Thus, the Buddha said: “If a bhikṣu is unable to correctly understand conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadhammā) and if he wants to obtain the supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgradharma), that will be impossible for him. If he has not obtained the supreme worldly dharmas and he wants to enter into the perfect state (samyaktva), that will be impossible for him. If he has not entered into the perfect state and he wants to become a srotaāpanna, a sakrāgamin, an anāgamin or an arhat, that will be impossible for him. On the other hand, if a bhikṣu understands correctly conditioned dharmas, he will have the possibility of obtaining the supreme worldly dharmas; if he has obtained the supreme worldly dharmas, he will enter into the perfect state; if he enters into the perfect state, he will certainly have the possibility of becoming srotaāpanna, sakrāgamin, anāgamin, or arhat.”⁵³² This is the direct statement of the Buddha; but he did not define the characteristics (lakṣaṇa) and the meaning (artha) of these supreme worldly dharmas. To say what world (dhātu) they belong to, what is their cause (hetu), their object (ālambana) and their fruit of retribution (vipākaphala); to make known, apart from these supreme worldly dharmas, the various practices (carita) of the śrāvaka up to his reaching nirvāṇa without residue (nirupādhiśeṣanirvāṇa); to analyze one by one the characteristics and meaning of the dharmas is what is called the Teaching of the Abhidharma.

3. The teaching of emptiness.

The teaching of emptiness is the emptiness of beings (pudgalaśūnyatā) and the emptiness of dharmas (dharmasūnyatā).⁵³³

⁵³² In the Prajñā system, the higher (adhimātra) laukikāgradharmas consist of the absence of concept during the concentration, all dharmas having ceased to exist for the bodhisattva (sarvadharmāvidyamānatvena samādhāvikaḥpanam): cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 145; Obermiller, Doctrine of P.P., p. 36; Analysis, I, p. 75. In possession of the laukikāgradharma, the ascetic enters into the Path of seeing (darśanamārga); he exchanges his quality of worldly person for that of śaikṣa; he enters into the samyaktvaniyama, the state of complete predestination (niyama) for nirvāṇa (samyaktva = nirvāṇa): cf. Kośa, VI, p. 180-182. The theory of the laukikāgradharmas has not been formulated clearly in the canonical scriptures; however, the scriptural text cited here by the Mppś, contains a rough outline. This text may be compared with a passage of Saṃyutta, III, p. 225, which says: Yo bhikkhaveime dhamme evaṃ saddahati adhimuccati... okkanto sammattaniyāmaṃ sappurisabhūmiṃ okkanto vūṭivatto puthujjanabhūmiṃ. abhabbo taṃ kammaṃ kātuṇyaṃ kammaṃ katvā nirayaṃ vā tiracchManayinim vā pettivisayaṃ vā uppajjeyya. abhabbo ca tāva kālaṃ kmatuṃ yāva na sotāpattiphalam sacchikaroti: “He who believes and accepts these doctrines [according to which all dharmas are transitory (anicca), changing (vipariṇāmin) and perishable (aññathābhāvin)] has entered into predestination for nirvāṇa, has entered into the level of good people and has escaped from the level of worldly people. He is incapable of committing a deed that would cause him to be reborn in hell or among animals or among pretas. He cannot die without realizing the fruit of entering into the stream.”

The theory of the nirvedhabhāgiyas and the laukikāgradharmas was first formulated in clear terms in the Abhidharma. The Jñānaprasthāna of Kātyāyana begins with a study of the laukikāgradharmas: cf. T 1544, k. 1, p. 918 (tr. L. de La Vallée Poussin, Pārāyana cited in Jñānaprasthāna, Mélanges Linossier, II, p. 323-327). The theory has already been taken studied in the treatises of the Sarvāstivādin-Vaiṣaṣikas, as well as in all the works of the Greater Vehicle: see the bibliography on the nirvedhabhāgiyas in Saṃgraha, p. 34.

⁵³³ We may recall that the emptinesses or śūnyatā both refer to dharmas: 1) no dharma is in any way pudgala or ātman, none belongs to an ātman = pudgalaśūnyatā; 2) no dharma is absolutely a dharma = dharmasūnyatā. Both Vehicles agree on the pudgalaśūnyatā, but the Greater Vehicle alone formulates the dharmasūnyatā clearly.

[1. Emptiness of beings in the Lesser Vehicle]. – Thus, in the P'in p'o so lo wang ying king (Bimbasārārājapratyudgamanasūtra),⁵³⁴ the Buddha said to the great king: “When matter (rūpa) arises, it arises from emptiness (śūnya) alone; when matter perishes, it perishes into emptiness alone. When the formations (saṃskāra) arise, they arise from emptiness alone; when the formations perish, they perish into emptiness alone. There is no soul (ātman) there, no individual (pudgala), no spirit (jīva). There is no individual who goes from the present existence (ihajanman) to the future existence (aparajanman); there is only a nominal and conventional being (nāmasaṃketasattva) resulting from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī). Worldly people (prthagjana) and fools (mohapuruṣa) pursue a name (nāman) in the search for reality.”⁵³⁵ The Buddha proclaimed the emptiness of beings in sūtras of this type.

[2. Emptiness of dharmas in the Lesser Vehicle]. – Let us move on to the emptiness of dharmas:

However, the Mādhyamikas are of the opinion that the dharmaśūnyatā is already taught in the sūtras of the Lesser Vehicle; cf. Madh. avatāra, p. 19 (tr. Lav., Muséon, 1907, p. 268; Madh. vṛtti, p. 41; Bodhicaryāvarāra, IX, 49; Pañjikā, p. 442; Traité, I, p. 370-371F. The Vijñānavādins, on the other hand, think that the saints of the Lesser Vehicle did not rise up to the level of knowing the emptiness of dharmas: cf. Siddhi, p. 590.

⁵³⁴ The Bimbasārārājapratyudgamanasūtra was spoken on the occasion of the second meeting between the Buddha and the king of Magadha. To the references given above (Traité, I, p. 30F) add Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 26, p. 694a-696a; P'in p'i so lo wang ti fo kongyang king, T 133, p. 855c-857a.

⁵³⁵ Cf. T'chong a han, T 26, no. 62, k. 11, p. 498b: “The bālaprthagjanas who have understood nothing take the Self for their self and become attached to the self. But there is no Self (ātman) and there is no ‘mine’ (ātmīya). The Self is empty and ‘mine’ is empty. Dharmas arise as soon as they arise, perish as soon as they perish, all as a result of causes (hetupratyaya). Union produces suffering. If there were no causes, all suffering would cease. All arising depends on causes. When they enter into contact with one another, dharmas arise from the union.” – For other versions, see Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke, p. 126-128.

a. In the Ta k'ong king (Mahāśūnyatāsūtra),⁵³⁶ the Buddha said: “The twelve causes (dvādaśa nidāna) go from ignorance (avidyā) to old age and death (jarāmaraṇa). The person who asks what is old age and death or to whom does old age and death belong has erroneous view (mithyādrṣṭi). And it is the same [for the other causes, namely]: birth (jāti), the act of becoming (bhava), attachment (upādāna), thirst (trṣṇā), sensation (vedanā), contact (sparśa), the six internal bases of consciousness (ṣaḍāyatana), name and form (nāmarūpa), consciousness (viññāna), the formations (saṃskāra) and ignorance (avidyā). If someone thinks that the vital principle is the same thing as the body (sa jīvas tac [193a] charīram) or if someone thinks that the vital principle is different from the body (anyo jīvo 'nyac charīram), the two opinions, although different, are both wrong view. The Buddha said: “That the vital principle is the same as the body, that is wrong view, unworthy of my disciples; that the vital principle is different from the body, that also is wrong view, unworthy of my disciples.” In this sūtra, the Buddha proclaims the emptiness of dharmas (dharmaśūnyatā). If someone asks “To whom does old age and death belong?”, they should know that this question is wrong (mithyā) and that there is ‘emptiness of beings’ (pudgalaśūnyatā). If someone asks “What is old age and death?”, they should know that this question is wrong and that there is ‘emptiness of dharmas’ (dharmaśūnyatā). And it is the same for the other [members of the causal chain] up to and including ignorance (avidyā).

⁵³⁶ Under the title of Ta k'ong king, the Mppś refers here to the Avijjāpaccayāsutta in the Samyutta, II, p. 60-63 (cf. Tsa a han, T 99, no. 357, k. 14, p. 99-100). Having formulated the doctrine of the twelve causes, the sūtra continues: Katamaṃ nu kho bhante jarāmaṇaṃ , kassa ca panidaṃ jarāmaraṇanti. – no kallo pañhoti, Bhagavā avoca: Katamaṃ jarāmaṇaṃ kassa ca panidaṃ jarāmaraṇanti iti vā bhikkhu yo veadyya, aññaṃ jarāmaṇaṃ aññassa capanidaṃ jarāmaraṇanti iti vā bhikkhu yo vadeyya, ubhayaṃ etaṃ ekattaṃ vyañjanaṃ eva nānaṃ. Taṃ jīvaṃ taṃ sañranti vā bhikkhu diṭṭiyā sati beahmacariyavāso na hoti, aññaṃ sañranti vā bhikkhu diṭṭhiyāsati brahmācariyavāso na hoti. Ete te bhikkhu ubho ante anupagamma majjhena Tathāgato dhammaṃ deseti: Jātipaccayā jarāmaraṇanti: “[Someone asks the Buddha]: What then, O Venerable One, is old age and death and to whom does old age and death belong? – This question is not correct, answered the Bhagavat. If, O monk, someone asks: “What is old age and death and to whom does old age and death belong?” or if someone says: “Old age and death is one thing and the person to whom old age and death belong is another thing”, these two phrases have the same meaning but with different sounds. If, O monk, someone thinks that the vital principle is the same as the body, the religious life is not possible; but if someone thinks that the vital principle is different from the body, the religious life is not possible either. Avoiding these two extremes, O monk, the Tathāgata teaches a true Path by way of a middle way, [by simply saying] that old age and death have birth as cause.” – Next, the sūtra critiques the other members of the causal chain in the same words.

In this sūtra the Mppś sees the affirmation of the twofold emptiness: the emptiness of dharmas, because it is wrong to ask to whom does old age and death belong. However, the dharmaśūnyatā is more clearly taught in other sūtras of the Lesser Vehicle: the Nalakalāpiya (Samyutta, II, p. 112) teaches that old age and death, as the other members of pañcāyasaṃutpāda, is not produced by oneself (sayamkatamā), produced by oneself and another (sayamkatañca paramkatañca) nor produced spontaneously without action by oneself or by another (asayamkāram aparamkāraṃ adhicca samuppannaṃ). – The Phēnasutta of the Samyutta (cf. Traité, I, p. 358F, 370F) proclaims the emptiness of the five skandhas in a very vivid way. – Finally, the Kolopamasūtra (cf. Traité, I, p. 64F, n. 1) enjoins the rejection of dharmas

b. Furthermore, in the Fan wang king (Brahmajālasūtra),⁵³⁷ the Buddha defined the sixty-two wrong views (dr̥ṣṭigata): “To say that the self and the world are eternal (śāśvato lokaś cātma ca) is wrong view; to say that the self and the world are non-eternal (aśāśvato lokaś cātma ca) is wrong view; to say that the self and the world are both eternal and non-eternal (śāśvataś cāśāśvataś ca lokaś chātmā ca) or that the self and the world are neither eternal nor non-eternal (naiva śāśvato nāśāśvataś ca lokaś cātmā ca), all of that is wrong view.” This is why we know that all dharmas are empty and that this is the truth.

Question. – To affirm the eternity of the self is wrong view. Why? Because the self does not exist in its own nature (svabhāva). – To affirm the eternity of the world is also wrong view. Why? Because the world is certainly non-eternal and it is erroneously (viparyāsa) claimed to be eternal. – To affirm the non-eternity of the self is also wrong view. Why? As the self does not exist in self-nature, it cannot be proclaimed to be non-eternal. – [On the other hand], to affirm the non-eternity of the world is not a wrong view. Why? Because all conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmā) are non-eternal in their true nature.

Answer. – If all dharmas are truly non-eternal, why does the Buddha say that the non-eternity of the world is wrong? By that, we can understand that the world is not non-eternal.

Question. – However, the Buddha said, in several places,⁵³⁸ that the contemplation (samanuṣāyanā) of the non-eternal (anitya), painful (duḥkha) empty (śūnya) and non-self (anātman) nature of conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛta) allows a person to obtain the Path. Why do you claim that the non-eternity [of the world] is to be ranged among the wrong views?

Answer. – If the Buddha spoke of the non-eternity in several places, he also spoke elsewhere about the indestructibility (anirodha).

[Mahānāmasutta].⁵³⁹ - Thus, Mo ho nan (Mahānāman), king of the Śākya, went to find the Buddha one day and said to him: “The population of Kapilavastu is great. Sometimes it happens, when I meet a ⁵³⁹ Mahānāmasutta, the various recensions of which show interesting variations: cf. Saṃyutta, V, p. 269-271 (tr. Woodward, Kindred Sayings, V, p. 320-321); Kośa, III, p. 95, and Kośavyākhyā, p. 303, l. 32: Mṛtasya khalu kālaṃ gatasya, etc.; Tsa a han, T 99, no. 930, k. 33, p. 237b-c; T 100, no. 155, k. 8, p. 432b; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 35, p. 744a-c.

In the Pāli sutta and the Tseng yi a han (T 125, p. 744a18), the Buddha backs up his sermon with the example of a pot of butter (sappikumbha) or a pot of oil (telakumbha), broken at the bottom of a pool, the contents of which float necessarily to the surface: a classic example frequently used (cf. also Saṃyutta, IV, p. 313). The Chinese versions of the Saṃyuktāgama (T 99, p. 237b29; T 100, p. 432b23), faithfully followed here by the Mppś, prefers the example of the tree that always falls to the direction in which it was leaning. This comparison is not unknown to the Pāli sources which resort to it in the Rukkhassutta of the Saṃyutta, V, p. 47-48: Seyyathāpi bhikkhave rukkho pācīnaninno pācīnapoṇo pācīnapabbhāro, so mūle chinno katamena papātena papateyyā ti. – Yena bhante ninno yena poṇo yena pabbhāro ti.

runaway chariot, an excited horse, a mad elephant, or people who are quarreling, that I no longer think about the Buddha. Then I say to myself: “If I were to die at this moment, where would I be reborn?” The Buddha said to Mahānāman: “Don’t be afraid, fear not; you are not going to be reborn in the unfortunate destinies (durgati), but you will certainly be reborn in the blissful abodes (sukhavihāra). Just as a tree that has always leaned to the east will, when it is cut down, necessarily fall in the eastern direction so, on the dissolution of the body after death, the honest man whose mind (citta), spirit (manas) and consciousnesses (vijñāna) have for a long time been perfumed (paribhāvita) by faith (śraddhā), morality (śīla), learning (śruta), generosity (tyāga) and wisdom (prajñā), will certainly find his benefit (viśeṣagāmin) and will be reborn above (ūrdhvagāmin) in the heavens.”

If, [as you say], all dharmas, arising and perishing from moment to moment (kṣaṇakṣaṇoṭpannaniruddha), are non-eternal, why does the Buddha say that by perfuming the mind with all the virtues (guṇa), one will certainly obtain high rebirths? This is why we know that [dharmas or the world] are not non-eternal in nature (aśāśvatasvabhāva).

[193b] Question. – If non-eternity does not exist, why did the Buddha speak about it?

Answer. - The Buddha preached the Dharma according to the needs of beings;⁵⁴⁰ In order to destroy the error that assumes an eternal principle (nityaviparyāsa), he preached non-eternity. [On the other hand], to people who do not know or who do not accept rebirth (punarbhava), he taught that: “The mind goes to new existences and is reborn above in the heavens”⁵⁴¹ or that: “Guilty or meritorious, actions do not perish even after millions of cosmic periods.”⁵⁴² The true nature of dharmas is neither eternal nor non-eternal, and in many places, the Buddha has spoken of the emptiness of dharmas (dharmaśūnyatā). In the emptiness of dharmas, there is no non-eternity; this is why affirming the non-eternity of the world is wrong view. Therefore there is ‘emptiness of dharmas’.

⁵⁴⁰ On this subject, cf. Traité, I, p. 32F, n. 3: above, p. 1074F.

⁵⁴² This is the stanza: Na praṇaśyanti karmāṇi kalpakoṭīṣatair api. endlessly repeated in the texts: ten times in the Dīvyāvādāna, more than fifty times in the Avadānaśataka. See also Traité, I, p. 347F.

c. [Parīrasutta].⁵⁴³ – Moreover, in P'i ye li (Vaiśālī) there was a brahmacārīn named Louen li (Vivādabala?). The Li tch'ang (Licchavi) granted him a large sum of money to go to debate with the Buddha. Having accepted the engagement, he prepared five hundred arguments during the night and the next day, accompanied by the Licchavis, he went to the Buddha. He asked the Buddha: “Is there one definitive Path (ātyantikamārga) or are there many?” The Buddha replied: “There is but one definitive Path and not many.” The brahmacārīn continued: “The Buddha speaks of only one single Path and yet the heretical teachers (tīrthika) each have their own definitive path; therefore there are many paths and not just one.” The Buddha answered: “Even though the heretics have many paths, not one of them is the true Path. Why? Because all these paths that are attached to wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭyabhiniviṣṭa) do not merit the name of definitive path.” Again the Buddha asked the brahmacārīn: “[According to you,] did the brahmacārīn Lou t'sou (Mrgaśiras)⁵⁴⁴ find the (true) Path?” Vivādabala replied: “Mrgaśiras is the foremost ⁵⁴³ The individual here called Vivādabala “Power of argument” is none other than the parivrājaka Pasūra of the Pāli sources (cf. Suttanipāṭa, v. 824-834; Suttanipāṭa Comm., II, p. 538 seq).

According to the Suttanipāṭa Comm., he was a great debater who went from place to place, holding a jambu branch in his hand. He would set it down in the place he stopped and those who wanted to engage in debate with him were invited to pick it up. One day, at Śrāvastī, Śāriputra took up the challenge and picked up the branch. Accompanied by a great crowd, Pasūra went to him and the debate began: the parivrājaka was shamefully beaten. Later Pasūra entered the order under the direction of Lāludāyī. Having vanquished his teacher in a discussion, he returned to the heretics still keeping his monastic robes. In this outfit he went to debate with the Buddha himself. As soon as he arrived, the goddess who was protector of the garden, made him mute and it was impossible for him to reply to the Buddha's questions. On this occasion the Teacher preached the Pasūrasutta, the stanzas of which are reproduced in the Suttanipāṭa in the Aṭṭhaka chapter.

The Yi tsou king, Chinese translation of the Arthavarga, introduces these stanzas by the following story (T 198, k. 1, p. 179c): The Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī towards the end of the retreat season, in the Jetavana, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, in the land of To cha (Vaiśālī), the sons of the gr̥hapatis all praised a brahmacārīn named Yong ts'e (Prasūra). They sent him to put objections to the Buddha and bring back victory; [to this end] they gave him five hundred kāṛṣāpaṇas. The brahmacārīn studied five hundred objections, some of which were new, for three months and he claimed that nobody could beat him. At the end of the retreat season, the Buddha wished to go to the land of Vaiśālī with his bhikṣus. Traveling through all the villages and preaching the Dharma, he finally arrived at Vaiśālī at the shore of the Monkey Pool (markaṭahradatīṭa) in the hall of the belvedere (kūṭāgāraśālā). Learning that the Buddha and his bhikṣus had come to their land, five hundred sons of the gr̥hapatis came together. The brahmacārīn declared: “The Buddha has come to our land; we must go to put our objections to him.” So the brahmacārīn at the head of the sons of the gr̥hapatis went to the Buddha and, having exchanged greetings with him, sat down at one side. Some among the sons of the gr̥hapatis paid homage to the Buddha with joined palms and silently approached his seat. Having carefully gazed at the Buddha's majesty and magnitude, the brahmacārīn did not dare to address him; inwardly seized with fear, he was unable to respond. Knowing which arguments the brahmacārīn and the sons of the gr̥hapatis set store by, the Buddha preached this sūtra of the Arthavarga, etc.

⁵⁴⁴ Mrgaśiras, in Chinese Lou t'eu or Mi li ngo che lo, seems to be unknown to the old canonical tradition and appears only in relatively late texts; however his reputation is well established: among the Buddha's disciples, he excelled in analysis of knowledge and the accuracy of his memory (Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 3, p.558c13); he skillfully explained the omens in human relationships (A lo han kiu tō king, T 126, p. 832b7). – His story is fully described in Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 20, p. 650c-652b, and in the Cīvaravastu of the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vin (Gilgit Man., III, 2, p. 79-83); from there it undoubtedly passed, with some variations, into the Theragāthā Comm., I, p. 305 seq (tr. Rh. D., Brethren, p. 138-139). Here is a translation of the text of the Gilgit Man.:

The Buddha Bhagavat was swelling at Rājagrha in the Bamboo Park at Kalandakanivāpa. At that time there was a hermitage belonging to a hermit endowed with the five superknowledges. The latter, walking near the hermitage, urinated on the muddy ground. A thirsty doe happened to come to that place; tormented by thirst, she drank the hermit's urine and then sniffed at her own vulva. The retribution for the actions of beings is inconceivable! The doe became pregnant and later came to the same place to give birth, giving birth to a male child. The doe sniffed him and since he was not of her own species, she left him on the ground and went away. However, the recluse, while walking around his hermitage, saw the baby and took it upon himself to find out whose son this was. Finally he recognized himself to have been the father and so he took the baby in, gave it food and drink and raised it. As the child's head was like a deer, he was named Mrgaśiras or ‘Deer's Head’. The hermit later died; Mrgaśiras learned the divination that consists of striking the cranium with one's finger; by doing this, he discovered everything. If the cranium gives out a rough sound, [its owner] is destined to a higher sphere and a rebirth among the gods; if the cranium gives off a somewhat [rough] sound, its owner is destined to a high sphere and rebirth among humans: this is the mark of a fortunate destiny. Now here is the mark of an unfortunate destiny: if the cranium emits a hesitant sound, [its owner] is destined to a lower sphere and a rebirth in hell; if the sound is middling, he is destined to a lower sphere and an animal rebirth; if the sound is weak, he is destined to a lower sphere and a rebirth among the pretas.

However, the Buddha, judging the time had come to convert Mrgaśiras, said to venerable Ānanda: “Go to him, Ānanda, with four crania belonging (respectively) to a srotaāpanna, a sakṛdāgamin, an anāgamin and an arhat.” – “Certainly, Lord”, answered Ānanda and he obeyed. Taking four skulls, he went to the recluse and asked him to explain them. Striking the srotaāpanna's skull, Mrgaśiras announced that he had taken rebirth among the gods; he did the same with the sakṛdāgamin and the anāgamin. But striking the cranium of the arhat, he perceived nothing. He thought: “What's this? Am I frustrated by my own knowledge? Was I not born into a noble family; or else, the characteristics (of this skull) are such that I cannot perceive their manifestation?” Ānanda said to him: “You are not so adept in all the sciences that you are unaware of a manifestation of this kind; then learn the whole science and then you will teach it to people.” Mrgaśiras asked: “Is there someone learned in all the sciences that you know of?” Ānanda replied: “There is; it is the Tathāgata, saint, the completely enlightened one who has attained the other shore of all the sciences. Then Mrgaśiras went to the Bhagavat and said to him: “I know the destiny of a man among the animals, pretas, humans, gods and the hells; but by lack of science, I do not understand the ultimate destiny of beings. Tell me, O Lord, about the shore stretching (beyond) the great ocean of the threefold world. O conqueror of all arguments, is this ultimate destiny unknown?”

The Bhagavat answered: “Even by striking it with an iron hammer, we do not know where the brilliant flame goes when it gradually is extinguished. In the same way we have no idea of the fate that falls to those who are completely liberated and who, going beyond the muddy torrent of the desires, have attained endless rest.”

At these words, Mrgaśiras said to the Bhagavat: “Lord, I would like to take ordination and become a monk in the well-preached religious discipline; I would like to practice celibacy in the presence of the Bhagavat.” The Bhagavat then conferred ordination on him. Having done that, the Bhagavat remained in Rājagrha as he wished and then left to travel to Śrāvastī; wandering by stages, he reached Śrāvastī. There he stayed in the Eastern Park, in the palace of Mrgāramātā. Walking about outside, he saw that the stars were mixed up and he asked the venerable of all those who have found the Path.” Now at that time, the venerable Mrgaśiras, who had become a bhikṣu, was standing behind the Buddha and was fanning him. Then the Buddha asked Vivādabala: “Do you not recognize this bhikṣu?” The brahmacārin recognized [his friend] and, learning that he had become converted, bowed his head in shame. Then the Buddha spoke these stanzas of the Yi p’iṇ (Arthavarga):⁵⁴⁵

Each person speaks of an Absolute
And is passionately attached to it.
Each one accepts this and not that;
But none of that is the Absolute.⁵⁴⁶

These people enter into debate.
Discussing their reasons

Mrgaśēras: “See for how long a time it will rain.” – Mrgaśiras answered: “The world, O Lord, is lost, it is ruined: the way the stars are arranged, it will rain for twelve years.” The Bhagavat then directed his magical influence on all the stars and then asked him to examine them again, and Mrgaśiras saw that it would rain for only six years. Again pressed by the Buddha, he allowed that it would rain for five years, and so on down to only seven days. Then the Bhagavat spoke to the monks: “Stay under shelter, O monks; this very day it will rain hordes of grasshoppers; but those who bathe will not have blisters (piṭaka) caused by the insects (read utpādaka, insects in place of utpāda). And so, O Mrgaśiras, the stars are moveable and unstable; life, too, is moveable and unstable.” Thus addressed, Mrgaśiras was favorably disposed towards the Bhagavat, thus disposed, he realized arhathood. Then experiencing the joy and happiness of deliverance, he spoke this stanza:

“The refuge of the gazelles is sloping land (pavana, a Prakrit word for pravāṇa); the refuge of the birds is space; the refuge of the unperturbed is the Dharma; the refuge of the arhats is nirvāṇa.”

[For this stanza that has many variations, cf. Parivāra, VIII, 2, 55; Tibetan Udānavarga, XXVI, 10 (ed. Beckh, p. 87); Chinese Dharmapada (T 210, k. 2, p. 573b3-4; T 212, k. 23, p. 733b14-15; T 213, k. 3, p. 790c9-10); Mahāvastu, II, p. 212; III, p. 156; P’i p’o cha, T 1545, k. 75, p. 388c1 (tr. L. de La Vallée Poussin, Documents d’Abhidharma, BEFEO, XXX, 1930, p. 31)].

⁵⁴⁵ On the identification Yi p’iṇ = Arthavarga, see above, Traité, I, p. 40F as note. The Mppś has twice already quoted this old text, the first time under the title of Tchong yi king (Traité, I, p. 39F) and the second time under that of A t’a p’o k’i kin (Traité, I, p. 65F). The five stanzas cited here largely correspond to the ten stanzas of the Pūrasutta of the Pāli Aṭṭhakavagga (Suttanipāta), v. 824-834).

⁵⁴⁶ Cf. Suttanipāta, v. 824:

“Idh’ eva suddhi’ ti vādiyanti,
nāñhesu dhammesu visuddhim āhu;
yam nissitā, tattha subham vadānā paccekasaccehu puthā nivṛṭṭhā.

“They say: ‘Here alone is purity’; and they recognize no purity in other systems. The system to which they adhere, strongly attached to specific truths, they declaim to be good.”

They show their agreement and disagreement in turn Vanquisher or vanquished, they feel sadness of joy.⁵⁴⁷

Conqueror, they fall into the pit of pride,
Conquered, they fall into the prison of sadness.
This is why those who are wise people
Do not follow these antagonisms.⁵⁴⁸

Vivādabala, you should know
That, for me and my disciples,
There is no mistake and no truth.
What are you searching for here?⁵⁴⁹

⁵⁴⁷ Ibid., v. 825:

Te vādakāmā parisam vīgayaḥ bākaḥ dahanti mithu aññamaññaḥ; vadanti te aññasitā kathojjaḥ pasamskamamā kusalā cadānā.

“Desirous of dispute, having forced a gathering, they accuse one another of being fools; attacking others, they engage in quarreling, desirous of praise and affirming themselves (alone) as capable.”

⁵⁴⁸ Ibid., v. 827a, c; 829a, c; 830 c, d:

Yam assa vādaḥ parihīnam āhu paridevatī socati hīnavādo, Pasamsito vā pana tattha hoti so hassati uṇṇamaticca tena.
Etam pi disvā na vivādayrtha, na hi tena suddhiḥ kusalā vadanti.

“The person whose thesis is declared inferior is distressed and grieves at having lost. On the other hand, the person who was victorious in (the gathering) laughs and is proud. Having seen that, do not debate because the experts declare that purity does not come from that.”

⁵⁴⁹

Visentikatvā pana ye caranti diṭṭhiḥ diṭṭhiḥ avirujjhamānā, tesu tvaṃ kiṃ labhetho, Pasūra, yes’ idha n’atthi param uggahītaṃ.

“But there are those who walk apart, without opposing their views to the views (of others). What benefit would you get from them, O Pasūra? For them, nothing in the world is taken as Absolute.”

Do you want to confuse my teaching?

In the end, you will not have the possibility to do so.

The Omniscient One is difficult to conquer

[To attack him] is to go down to your own defeat.

[193c] Thus, in many places, in the sūtras of the śrāvakas, the Buddha taught the emptiness of dharmas.

3. *The teaching of emptiness according to the Mahāyāna.*⁵⁵⁰ – By nature and eternally, all dharmas are empty in self nature (svabhāvasūnya); it is not by virtue of an artificial philosophical point of view (prajñopāyadarśana) that they are empty. Thus the Buddha, speaking to Subhūti about form, said: “Form (rūpa) is empty in self nature; feeling (vedanā), perception (saṃjñā), formations (saṃskāra) and consciousnesses (viññāna) are empty by self nature. The twelve doors of consciousness (āyatana), the eighteen elements (dhātu), the twelve causes (nidāna) the thirty-seven wings of enlightenment (bodhipakṣika), the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), the eighteen special qualities (āveṇikadharmā), great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī), great compassion (mahākaraṇā), omniscience (sarvajñāna) and even supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarasamyaksambodhi), all are empty in self nature.”⁵⁵¹

⁵⁵⁰ This paragraph takes us right to the very heart of the Mādhyamika philosophy: the way of conceiving emptiness. The modern exegetists have brooded over the problem: see especially L. de La Vallée Poussin, Madhyamaka, ERE, VIII, p. 235-237; Dogme et Philosophie, p. 113-118; Madhyamaka, MCB, II, 1932-33., p. 1-59; Buddhica, HJAS, III, 1938, p. 146-158; R. Grousset, Les Philosophies indiennes, I, p. 236-238; T. Stcherbatsky, Conception of Buddhist Nirvāṇa, p. 35-39; Die drei Richtungen in der Philosophie der Buddhismus, Rocznik Orientalistyczny, X, 1934, p. 1-37; Madhyanta-Vibhaṅga, p. vi-viii.

⁵⁵¹ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 138: Rūpaṃ śūnyaṃ rūpasvabhāvena, tasya nāpi jātir nāpi niryāṇam upalabhyate, and the same for saṃjñā, saṃskārāḥ, viññānam. evaṃ vistareṇavyastasamasteṣu skandhadhātāvātanapratītyasamutpādeṣu kartavyaṃ yāvad bhūtakopīḥ bhūtakopīsvabhāvena, tasyā nāpi jātir nāpi niryāṇam upalabhyate. The author wants to show that the Śūnyavādin does not fall into the wrong views (dṛṣṭi) of eternalism (śāśvatavāda) or nihilism (ucchedavāda) condemned by the Buddha. By denying these things, he avoids the view of existence (bhāva) and escapes any blame of eternalism. On the other hand, by denying things inasmuch as he does not perceive them, he denies nothing as it is; he has nothing in common with the nihilist whose negation pertains to things previously perceived; thus he escapes any blame of nihilism. Emptiness is equidistant from these two extremes.

This is all explained in technical terms in Madh. vṛtti, p. 272-273: “To talk about existence is to accept eternalism; to talk about non-existence is to accept nihilism; this is why the sage does not adhere to either existence or non-existence. Actually, that which exists in itself (asti yad svabhāvena) cannot not exist, and from that, one must conclude that it is eternal (śāśvata); if something no longer exists now but did exist previously (nāstidānīm abhūt pūrvaṃ), from that one must conclude that it has been annihilated (uccheda). But the person who considers existence-in-itself as impossible will never fall into the views of eternalism or nihilism since existence-in-itself exists only as a way of speaking (yasya tu bhāvasvabhāvānupalambhāt).”

Question. – [To claim] that all dharmas by nature are eternally empty of self nature, empty of reality, non-existent (anupalabdha), is that not falling into wrong view (mithyādr̥ṣṭi)? Wrong view is denying sin (āpatti), denying merit (punya), denying the present life (ihajanman) and the future life (aparajanman). Your position is no different than these [heresies].

Answer. – The person who denies sin and denies merit does not deny the present lifetime but only the future lifetime. [According to him], man is born and disappears in the same way that plants and trees grow spontaneously and perish spontaneously; everything is limited to the present (pratyutpanna) and there is no rebirth (punarbhava). However, [this nihilist philosopher] does not know and does not see that everything that exists within him and outside him is empty of self-nature (svlakṣaṇa). He is different from us in that respect.

Furthermore, the person of wrong view commits many sins and omits all good actions; on the other hand, the supporter of emptiness, even if he does not wish to do good, wishes still less to commit evil.

Question. – There are two kinds of wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi):

i) Denying cause (hetu) and denying result (phala); ii) Denying result without denying cause. – [The nihilist philosopher] of whom you have just spoken denied the result, [namely, the retribution of actions], but did not deny the cause, [namely, meritorious and demeritorious actions]. There are philosophers who deny result and deny cause: on the one hand, they claim that there is neither cause (hetu) nor condition (pratyaya), neither sin (āpatti) nor merit (punya); that is denying cause; on the other hand, they claim that there is neither present existence (ihajanman) nor future existence (aparajanman) where sins and merits will be retributed: that is denying result. How are you different from these philosophers, you who are a supporter of emptiness, you who posits universal emptiness and for whom sin and merit, cause and effect do not exist?

Answer. – The person with wrong view ends up in emptiness by suppressing all dharmas, whereas I, a practitioner of the Mahāyāna, hold dharmas as empty of any reality, indestructible (apraheya) and unchangeable (avikāra).

Question. – There are three kinds of wrong view: i) Denying the retribution of sins and merits without denying sin and merit, denying the fruit of retribution of causes and conditions without denying causes and conditions, denying the future existence without denying the present existence; ii) Denying the retribution of sins and merits and also sin and merit, denying the fruit of retribution of causes and conditions and also denying the causes and conditions, denying the future lifetime and also denying the present lifetime;

However, the author keeps from hypostatizing emptiness, from assuming a śūnyatā in itself by virtue of which there are empty things. Cf. Madh. kārikā, p. 245: If something of non-emptiness existed, there would indeed be an emptiness (by virtue of the law of interdependence of opposites); but since there is nothing that is non-empty, how could emptiness exist? Śūnyatā thus does not exist: it is valid only as a method of argumentation and not as a philosophical principle: cf. Mad. kārikā, p. 247: “The Buddhas have said that śūnyatā is the exit (niḥsaraṇa) of all views, but those who believe in śūnyatā are incurable (asādhya).”

Before Nāgārjuna, the literature of the Prajñā and the Ratnakūṭa (Kāśyapaparivarta) had already refused to make an absolute out of śūnyatā. See references gathered by Lav., Madhyamaka, p. 32.

avoiding, however, the denial of all dharmas; iii) Denying all dharmas to the extent of rendering them non-existent (asat). [You], supporter of emptiness, who proclaim [all dharmas] to be empty of reality and non-existence, how are you different from this third wrong view?

Answer. – 1) The person of wrong view ends up at emptiness by suppressing all dharmas, whereas the supporter of emptiness considers dharmas as empty of any reality, indestructible and unchangeable.

2) The person of wrong view declares all dharmas to be empty and non-existent, but grasps the empty nature of these dharmas (dharmāṇaṃ śūnyalakṣaṇam udgrhṇāti) and talks about it. The supporter of emptiness knows the emptiness of dharmas but does not grasp the characteristic and does not talk [194a] about it.⁵⁵²

3) Furthermore, the person of wrong view, although he verbally professes universal emptiness, loves when he has the occasion to love, is angry when he has the occasion to be angry, is proud when he has the occasion to be proud, makes a mistake when he has the occasion to make a mistake; thus he is lying to himself. For the disciple of the Buddha, who truly knows emptiness, the mind is unshakeable (āniñjya, akṣobhya), the fetters (saṃyojana) do not arise where normally they would arise. In the same way that space (ākāśa) cannot be tarnished by fire nor soaked by a shower, so no kinds of passions (kleśa) can become attached to the mind of the supporter of emptiness.

4) Furthermore, the person of wrong view talks about the non-existence [of dharmas], but the latter does not originate so much from desire (trṣṇā) as from cause and condition (hetupratyaya); on the other hand, true emptiness comes from desire, and that is a difference. If the four boundless ones (apramāṇacitta) and pure dharmas (viśuddhadharma), because their object (ālambana) is unreal, are thus unable to produce the true knowledge of emptiness, what can be said then of wrong view?

5) Furthermore, these (imperfect) views are called wrong views (mithyādiṣṭi); the correct seeing of emptiness is called right view (saṃyagdrṣṭi). The person who practices wrong views, in the present lifetime, passes as an evil person; later he will fall into the hells. The person who practices the true knowledge of emptiness acquires fame in the present lifetime, later he will become a Buddha. These two people differ from one another like water and fire, ambrosia (amṛta) and a poisonous drug (viṣauśadhi), nectar (sudhā), the food of the gods, and rotten garbage.

6) Furthermore, in true emptiness there is the concentration of the emptiness of emptiness (śūnyatāśūnyatāsamādhi).⁵⁵³ In emptiness wrongly perceived, there is indeed emptiness but not the concentration of the emptiness of emptiness.

7) Furthermore, the person who contemplates true emptiness possesses, from the beginning, immense [qualities] by way of generosity (dāna), morality (śīla), and dhyāna; his mind is soft and gentle (mṛdutarauṇacitta) and his fetters (saṃyojana) are light; later he will obtain true emptiness. These ⁵⁵² The grasping of characteristics (nimittodgrahaṇa) is the attribute of perception (by trying to imagine emptiness, the nihilist hypostatizes it. The Śūnyavādin knows emptiness but does not imagine it.

⁵⁵³ Śūnyatāśūnyatāsamādhi is the absorption by means of which one is protected from the dangers of the absorption that has emptiness as object: cf. Kośa, p. 184, 188.

advantages are absent in [the person] of wrong view: he wants to grasp (grahaṇa) emptiness only by means of speculation, analysis and wrong concepts.

[The fool who swallowed pure salt].⁵⁵⁴ – A peasant was unfamiliar with salt. Seeing a nobleman put salt on his meat and vegetables before eating them, he asked why he did so. The nobleman replied that salt gave a good taste to food. The peasant thought that if salt gave a flavor to food, by itself it should be even better. So he took some pure salt, put it in his mouth and ate it. But a nasty pain hurt his mouth and he asked the nobleman: “ Why did you say that salt has a good flavor?” The nobleman replied: “Fool! You have to measure out the amount of salt and mix it with the food to give it a good taste. Why did you eat pure salt?”

In the same way, the ignorant person who hears speak of the door of liberation called emptiness (śūnyatāvimokṣasamukha) does not develop the qualities (guṇa) but wants only to obtain emptiness: that is a wrong view that destroys all the roots of good (kuśalamūla). This is what should be understood by the ‘teaching on emptiness’.

The person who enters into the three teaching [of the Pīṭaka, the Abhidharma and Emptiness] knows that the teachings of the Buddha do not contradict one another. Understanding that is the power of the Prajñāpāramitā which encounters no obstacles (āvaraṇa) to any of the Buddha’s teachings. Whoever has not understood the Prajñāpāramitā [will come up against innumerable contradictions in interpreting the Dharma]: if he approaches the Abhidharma teaching, he falls into realism. If he approaches the teaching on emptiness, he falls into nihilism; if he approaches the Pīṭaka teaching, [194b] [sometimes] he falls into realism and [sometimes] into nihilism.

IV. UNDERSTANDING IDENTICAL AND MULTIPLE NATURES.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva practicing the prajñāpāramitā, while discovering the identical characteristics (ekalakṣaṇa) in dharmas, also cognizes their multiples characteristics (nānāvidhalakṣaṇa); while cognizing the multiple characteristics of dharmas, he also cognizes their identical characteristics. This wisdom belonging to the bodhisattva is called Prajñāpāramitā.

Question. – How does the bodhisattva-mahāsattva cognize the multiple characteristics of all dharmas and their identical characteristics?

Answer. –

1. Identical characteristics in every dharma.

⁵⁵⁴ This apologue occurs in Po yu king, T 209, k. 1, p. 543a (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 153).

[1. Existence.] – The bodhisattva finds in every dharma an identical (read: yi siang) characteristic, namely, the characteristic of existence (bhāvalakṣaṇa). As a result of this existence, a concept arises in regard to each dharma. It is the same for everything that exists.

Question. – Then how does a concept in regard to a non-existent dharma arise?

Answer. – If it is declared to be non-existent, it is because the thing exists in some manner.

[2. Non-existence.] – Furthermore, the bodhisattva sees an identical characteristic in every dharma, namely, a characteristic of non-existence (abhāvalakṣaṇa). Thus, the nature of sheep does not exist in the ox and the nature of ox does not exist in the sheep. This is so in every dharma: each one is without the nature of its neighbor. As we have said above, it is because of existence that there is the arising of a concept. The quality [of deprivation, of which we are speaking here], is different from existence; insofar as it is different, it is non-existent. If existence were mixed up with the fact of being ox, the sheep also would be an ox. Why? Because existence would not differ from the fact of being an ox. Since there is a difference, there is non-existence. And so, in this way, all dharmas are non-existent [from a certain point of view].

[3. Unity.] – Furthermore, the bodhisattva sees a unity (ekatva) in each dharma. Because of this uniqueness, the idea of unity arises in respect to all dharmas, and each dharma in particular has this characteristic of unity. The coming together of unities gives the number two or the number three. Unity alone is real; the numbers two, three, etc., are false.

[4. The fact of being caused or non-caused.] – Furthermore, the bodhisattva sees that dharmas exist insofar as they have a cause (saṁtuka). They are impermanent (anitya) like the human body. How is that? By virtue of the characteristics of birth (utpāda) and destruction (bhaṅga). All dharmas exist inasmuch as they have a cause. – Furthermore, all dharmas exist without cause (ahetuka). They are impermanent like the human body by reason of birth and destruction. Because of this birth and destruction, we know they are impermanent. The cause, in turn, must have a cause, and so on to infinity. If there is regressus ad infinitum, there is no cause. Whether they are caused or non-caused, dharmas are impermanent, and the cause is not just one. Thus all dharmas are non-caused.

[5. The fact of being endowed with a specific characteristic.] – Furthermore, the bodhisattva who sees that all dharmas are endowed with a nature (salakṣaṇa), for there is no dharma without nature. Thus earth (prthivī) has solidity (khakkhaṭṭva) and heaviness (gurutva) as nature; water (ap-) has coldness (śīta) and wetness (dravatva) as nature; fire (tejas) has heat (uṣṇatva) and light (avabhāsa) as nature; wind (vāyu) has lightness (laghutva) and movement (samudhiraṇatva) as nature;⁵⁵⁵ space (ākāśa) has the fact of not impeding (anāvṛti) as nature;⁵⁵⁶ consciousness (viññāna) has the imprint relating to each object (prativijñapti) as nature;⁵⁵⁷ direction has [the difference] between here and there as nature; time (kāla) has as nature [the difference] between now and previously;⁵⁵⁸ sin (āpatti) has a stupid and evil disposition toward beings as nature; merit (puṇya) has a pure and good disposition in favor of beings as nature; bondage (bandhana) has attachment to dharmas (dharmābhiniveśa) as nature; liberation (vimokṣa) has detachment from [194c] dharmas as nature; the Buddha has as nature the actual unimpeded knowledge of all dharmas. Thus all dharmas each has its own nature.

[6. The fact of being without a specific nature.] – Furthermore, the bodhisattva sees that all dharmas are without nature (alakṣaṇa). Actually, all the characteristics are coming from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī) and, as they have no self nature (svabhāva), they do not exist. Thus, although there is earth (prthivī), the coming together is needed of four dharmas, color (rūpa), smell (gandha), taste (rasa) and touchable (spraṣṭavya);⁵⁵⁹ it is not solely due to odor or taste or touchable that there is earth. Why? If color alone constituted the earth, the other three dharmas would not be the earth and the earth would be without smell, taste and touchable, and it is the same for smell, taste or touchable [if each of them were enough to constitute earth].

Furthermore, how could the other four dharmas [color, smell, taste and touchable] make only one earth? And how could this single dharma make four? This is why it is not possible that the four dharmas are the earth or that the earth exists outside of the four dharmas.

Question. – I say it is not true that the four dharmas are earth, but that it is only because of the four dharmas that earth exists, and that earth resides in these four dharmas.

Answer. – If earth is the result of the four dharmas, earth is different from the four dharmas in the same way that a son, the result of his parents, is different from his parents. Now the eye (cakṣus) perceives color (rūpa), the nose (ghrāṇa) smells odors (gandha), the tongue (jihvā) tastes flavors (rasa) and the body (kāya) feels tangibles (spraṣṭavya). If earth were different from the four dharmas [color, etc.], there must be a special organ (indriya) and a special consciousness (viññāna) to cognize it. Since there is neither special organ or special consciousness to cognize it, there is no earth.

Question. – Then the specific characteristic of earth, [namely, solidity and heaviness] of which you spoke above, should define the nature of earth in conformity with the Abhidharma: “Earth (prthivī) is a substance derived (upadāyarūpa) from the four great elements (mahābhūta); just the element-earth (prthivīdhātu) has solidity as nature (khakkhaṭṭvalakṣaṇa); earth, in the ordinary sense of the word, is a visible color (sanidarśanarūpa).”⁵⁶⁰

⁵⁵⁷ The definition viññānaṃ prativijñapti is in Kośa, I, p. 30.

⁵⁵⁸ Direction and time are categories of the Nyāya-Vaiśeṣikas.

⁵⁵⁹ In common usage, “earth” – to be carefully distinguished from the element earth (prthivīdhātu) –, is color and shape (cf. Kośa, I, p. 23); now it is accepted that in every visible material, color is inseparable from odor, taste and tangible (ibid., I, p. 147).

⁵⁶⁰ Here the objector is defending the Vaibhāṣika thesis which carefully distinguishes the element earth (prthivīdhātu, rendered here by ti chong “seminal earth”) from earth in the common sense of the word. As great element (mahābhūta), the element earth has both its own nature, solidity (khakkhaṭṭva), and derived matter

⁵⁵⁵ See this definition of the four great elements in the Garbhāvākṛāntisūtra cited by the Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 244; cf. also Kośa, I, p. 22-23; Mahāvīyapatti, no. 1842-1844.

⁵⁵⁶ The Vaibhāṣikas believe in the reality of space or anāvṛti “which does not hinder” (Kośa, I, p. 8); but the existence of this principle is denied by the Sautrāntikas (Kośa, II, p. 279) and the Madhyamika (Catuḥśataka, no. 205; Madh, vṛtti, p. 505).

Answer. – Above, we stated the flaws that oppose earth being just color. Earth has solidity as nature. If it were only color perceived by the eye, it would be like the moon reflected in water (udakacandra) , a reflection in a mirror (ādarśabimba), a piece of straw; thus it would have no solidity. Being solid, it is known to the touch (sparśa) by the organ of the body (kāyendriya).

Furthermore, if the visibility of earth were confused with its solidity, the visibility of the element-earth (prthivīdhātu) would also be confused with the wetness (dravatva) of water and the heat (uṣṇatva) of fire, and would constitute the element-water (abdhātu) and the element-fire (tejo dhātu). In that case, there would be no distinction between wind (vāyu) and the element-wind (vāyudhātu) which, however, it is appropriate to distinguish.⁵⁶¹

If you say: “What is wind in relation to the element-wind; what is the element-wind in relation to wind? If they are identical, two distinct principles should not be asserted”, we would reply that, if they are without any difference, earth and the element-earth also are without difference.

Question. – The four great elements are inseparable from one another; in earth there are the four elements (dhātu); in water, in fire and in wind, likewise; but as in earth, it is the element-earth that predominates, therefore it is called earth; and it is the same for water, fire and wind.⁵⁶²

Answer. – That is not correct. Why? The four great elements present in fire should all be hot, for there is no fire without heat. If the three great elements (earth, water and wind) that are found in fire were not hot, they would not be called fire; if they were hot, they would lose their own nature (svabhāva) and would all be called fire.

If you say that this heat is not perceived because of its subtlety (saukṣmya), we would say that it would be no different from [pure and simple] non-existence. It is necessary that a coarse (sthūla) element be perceived in order that one could thereby deduce a subtle (sūkṣma) element; but without coarse element, [195a] there is no subtle element.

For these various reasons, the specific nature of earth is non-existent (nopalabhate) and if the nature of earth does not exist, neither does that of the other dharmas. Therefore all dharmas have [this absence of nature] as their identical nature.

(bhautika), which depends on it (upādāyarūpa). In ordinary usage, what is designated by the word “earth” is the color and shape (Kośa, I, p. 22-23). But the great elements never exist in the isolated state; all four manifest their presence in every material object by means of their own activity: support (dhṛti), cohesion (saṃgraha), burning (pakti) and expansion (vyūhana) (Kośa, I, p. 22; II, p. 146). On the other hand, as we shall see, color, derived matter, supported by the great elements, is inseparable from smell, taste and tangible. It follows that the smallest molecule (saṃghātānu) of matter existing in the isolated state entails at least eight substances, namely, the four great elements (mahābhūta) and four derived substances (bhautika): color, odor, taste, tangible, Kośa, II, p. 145). The Mppś makes a point here of refuting this theory.

⁵⁶¹ For example, the element earth, which has solidity as nature, exists in water, since water supports ships; etc.

⁵⁶² According to Kośa, I, p. 23-24, the element wind (vāyudhātu) is the dharma that has as its nature movement (īraṇa); that which is called ‘wind’ is either the element wind or else color and shape; we talk about ‘a black wind’, a ‘circular wind’, etc.

Question. – You cannot say that they are without nature. Why? Because the absence of nature in every dharma is a nature. Without this absence of nature, you could not deny all nature to dharmas. Why? Because there would not be absence of nature. But if this absence of nature does exist, you could not say that all dharmas are without nature.

Answer. – [We refuse to hypostatize this “absence of nature”]. It is because they are without nature that we deny any nature to dharmas, [including absence of nature]. If they had as nature this absence of nature, that would be to return to attributing natures to dharmas. Since we do not recognize any nature in dharmas, no objection can be made to the lack of nature [that we are assuming as our thesis: purely negative lack] which, after having destroyed any nature of dharma, also destroys itself, like the smoldering ember which, having used up all the kindling (indhana) , then burns itself up. This is why the saint (ārya) practices the *ānimittānimittasamādhī*⁵⁶³ which [after having destroyed all the characteristics] destroys the without-characteristics itself.

[7. Other identical natures in all dharmas]. – Finally, the bodhisattva sees all dharmas as being without cohesion or dispersion, without color (rūpa) or shape (saṃsthāna), non-resistant (apratigha), ineffable and unspeakable, of unique nature (ekalakṣaṇa), i.e., without nature.

These are the identical natures (ekalakṣaṇa) found in every dharma; now how does the bodhisattva see the multiple natures?

2. Multiple natures.⁵⁶⁴

[Groups of two dharmas]. – All dharmas are classed into two categories: name (nāma) and form (rūpa); material (rūpya) and non-material (ārūpya); visible (sanidarśana) and invisible (anidarśana); resistant (sapratigha) and non-resistant (apratigha); impure (sāsrava) and pure (anāsrava); conditioned (saṃskṛta) and unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), etc.

The two hundred groups of two dharmas are listed in the chapter on the Thousand difficulties.

There are other groups of two dharmas: patience (kṣānti) and harmony (saṃāgama); veneration (satkāra) and worship (pūjā); material generosity (āmiṣadāna) and generosity of the Dharma (dharmadāna); speculative power (vikalpanabala) and power of practice of the Path (mārgabhāvanabala); perfection of morality (śīlaparipūri) and perfection of right view (samyagdr̥ṣṭiparipūri); simplicity-sincerity (rjutva) and gentleness-kindness (mṛdutaruṇatva); concentrations (saṃādhi) and knowledge (jñāna); intelligence (yukti) and eloquence (nirukti); worldly dharma (laukikadharmā) and absolute Dharma (paramārthadharmā); thought and skillfulness; experiential truth (saṃvṛtisatya) and absolute truth (paramārthasatya); temporary liberation (sāmayiki vimukti) and liberation not destroying mind; sopadhiṣeṣha and mirupadhiṣeṣhanirvāṇa; end of activity (karmānta) and end of wish (prañidhānta); seeing knowledge (jñānadarśana) and seeing cessation (nirodhadarśana); conformity with meaning (arthasaṃyoga) and literal conformity (vyañjanasaṃyoga); moderation in desires (alpeccchā) and satisfaction (saṃtuṣṭi). easy nourishment and easy filling; Dharma and activity conforming to the Dharma (anudharmapratipatti); knowledge of cessation of vices (kṣayaajñāna) and knowledge of non-production of vices, as well as innumerable twofold dharmas of the same type.

⁵⁶³ The ānimittānimittasamādhī has as object the apratisaṃkhyānirodha of the ānimittasamādhī; cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 189.

⁵⁶⁴ These various groups of dharmas have already been mentioned above, Traité, I, p. 53F; II, p. 642-646F.

[Groups of three dharmas]. – Furthermore, the bodhisattva knows the three Paths: the Paths of seeing (darśanamārga) of meditation (bhāvanamārga) and of the arhat (aśaikṣamārga); the three natures (svabhāva), cutting, separation and destruction; the three cultivations (bhāvana): cultivation of morality (śīla) concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā); the three Bodhis: bodhi of the Buddhas, the pratyekabuddhas and the śrāvakas; the three Vehicles (yāna): Vehicles of the Buddhas, the pratyekabuddhas and the śrāvakas; the three [195b] refuges (pratisaraṇa): the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṃgha; the three abodes (vihāra), abodes of Brahma, deva and ārya; three exaltations (utkarṣa): exaltation of self, other and the Dharma; the three things not requiring secrecy (araksya): bodily action (kāyakarman), speech (vākkarman) and mental action (manaskarman); the three sources of merit (puṇyakriyāvastu): generosity (dāna), morality (śīla) and meditation (bhāvana); the three equipments: hearing (śravaṇa), renunciation (vairāgya) and wisdom (prajñā), the three wheels [or supernatural powers of the Buddha that allow him] to transform himself, to inform another and to teach; the three doors to liberation (vimokṣamukha): emptiness (śūnyatā, signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita), as well as innumerable threefold dharmas of the same type.

[Groups of four dharmas]. – The bodhisattva also knows the groups of four dharmas: the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) the four right efforts (saṃyakpradhāna), the four bases of miraculous power (rddhipāda), the four Noble Truths (āryasatya), the four families of saints (āryavaṃśa); the four fruits of the religious life (śramanaphala), the four knowledges, the four beliefs, the four paths, the four means of winning over others (saṃgrahavastu), the four supports (āśraya), the four good roots of penetration (prativedhakuśalamūla), the four paths, the four wheels of gods and men, the four solidities, the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), the four limitless ones (apramāṇacitta) as well as innumerable fourfold dharmas of the same type.

[Groups of five dharmas]. – He also knows the groups of five dharmas: the five āśaikṣas, the five exits (niryāna?), the five liberations (vimukti), the five senses (indriya), the five powers (bala), the five great gifts (mahādāna), the five knowledges (jñāna), the five anāgamins, the five heavens of the Śuddhāvāsadevas, the five antidotes (pratipakṣa), the concentration of the five knowledges (pañcājñānika samyaksamādhi), the concentration of the five noble members (pañcāryāṅgasamādhi), the five ways of expressing oneself according to the Dharma, as well as innumerable fivefold dharmas of the same type.

[Groups of six dharmas]. – He also knows the six abandonments, the six devotions, the six superknowledges (abhijñā), the six kinds of arhat, the six levels of the Path of seeing the truths (satyadarśanamārga), the six recollections (anusmṛti), the six samādhis, the six samāpattis, the six pāramitās, as well as innumerable sixfold dharmas of the same type.

[Groups of seven dharmas]. – He also knows the seven wings of enlightenment (bodhyaṅga), the seven riches (dhana), the seven supports (āśraya), the seven conscious absorptions, the seven good dharmas, the seven knowledges, the seven destinies of good people (saptapurusaḡati), the seven purities (viśuddhi), the seven meritorious material works (aupadhika puṇyakriyāvastu) and the seven non-material meritorious works, the seven auxiliary absorptions, as well as innumerable sevenfold dharmas of the same type.

[Groups of eight dharmas]. – He also knows the eightfold noble Path (aṣṭāṅgāryamārga), the eight liberations (vimokṣa), the eight spheres of mastery (abhibhāvayatana), the eight minds of the Great Man, the eight kinds of exertion (vīrya), the eight Puruṣas, the eight strengths (bala) of the arhat, as well as innumerable other dharmas of the same type.

[Groups of nine dharmas]. – He also knows the nine successive absorptions (anupūrvasamāpatti), the nine [members of the causal chain] starting from name-and-form (nāmarūpa) up to birth (jāti) and death (maraṇa), the nine pure knowledges (anāsravajñāna) leading to the knowledge of the destruction of the vices (āsravakṣayaajñāna), the nine pure levels or the Path of meditation (bhāvanamārga) of nine stages (six dhyānas and three ā rūpyas), as well as innumerable dharmas classified into nines.

[Groups of ten dharmas]. – He also knows the ten dharmas of the śaikṣa, the ten aspects of a corpse (saṃjñāgata), the ten knowledges (jñāna), the ten spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana), the ten mental events accompanying every good mind (kuśalamahābhūmika), the ten strengths of the Buddha, as well as innumerable tenfold dharmas of the same type.

[Other numerical groups]. – He also knows the eleven auxiliary dharmas of the Path, the twelve causes (niḍāna), the thirteen exits (niryāṇadharmā), the fourteen minds of transformation (nirmāṇacitta), the fifteen minds of the Path of seeing the truths (satyadarśanamārga), the sixteen practices related to breathing (ānāpāna), the seventeen noble practices, the eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā), the nineteen levels of separation, the 162 mārgas in the course of the Path of meditation (bhāvanamārga) necessary to break up the passions; the 178 [195c] fruits of the religious (śramanaphala) – 89 conditioned fruits (saṃskṛtaphala) and 89 unconditioned fruits (asaṃskṛtaphala) – as well as innumerable different dharmas of the same type. Arising and cessation, increase and decrease, acquisition and loss, defilement and purification: the Bodhisattva knows all of that.

3. Characteristics and emptiness of self nature.

Knowing all these dharmas, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva introduces them into the emptiness of self nature (svabhāvaśūnyatā) and experiences no attachment (saṅga, abhiniveśa) for dharmas; he surpasses the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas; he enters into the state of Bodhisattva. Having entered into the state of Bodhisattva, he distinguishes the various types of dharmas, saves beings and causes them to obtain the Triple Vehicle by means of his great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and the power of his skillful means (upāyabala). Thus, a skillful artisan, by the power of remedies (oṣadhi), can transform silver into gold and gold into silver.

Question. – If dharmas are really empty of self nature, why does the bodhisattva still distinguish their various names and does not limit himself to preaching their essential emptiness?

Answer. – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva does not claim that emptiness can be grasped (upalabdha) or accepted (abhiniviśya). If emptiness could be grasped and accepted, the bodhisattva would not speak of the various distinctive characteristics (nānāvidhabhinnalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. But an ungraspable emptiness (anupalacaśūnya) is not an obstacle (āvaraṇa). If it were an obstacle, it would be graspable and not ungraspable. Knowing this ungraspable emptiness, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva returns to distinguishing dharmas [in order to teach them more easily]. Saving beings by loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) is the power of Prajñāpāramitā; the true nature of dharmas about which he undertakes to speak is Prajñāpāramitā.

Question. – But all the ordinary books (lokasaṃvṛtigrantha) and the ninety-six kinds of religious works⁵⁶⁵ all speak of the true nature of dharmas; in the śrāvaka Piṭaka also it is a matter of the true nature of dharmas. Why is it not called Prajñāpāramitā [in these works] and only in the present sūtra is the true nature of dharmas called Prajñāpāramitā?

Answer. – The worldly books, which aim at the pacification of kingdoms, the perfecting of families and the pleasures of life, are not true. Religious heretics (tīrthikaparivṛājaka), who fall into wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi) and whose minds are perverted, are not truthful either. As for the śrāvakas, although they do have the four truths, they believe that the true nature of dharmas consists of impermanence (anitya), suffering (duḥkha), emptiness (śūnya) and non-self (anātma). Since their wisdom is imperfect (aparipūrṇa) and dull (atīkṣṇa), they are unable to help beings or to acquire the qualities of the Buddhas. They have a true wisdom, but it is not the ‘virtue of wisdom’.

It is said that the Buddha enters into and comes out of concentrations (samādhi) of which Śāriputra and the other disciples are ignorant even of their names, still less of their nature. Why? At the time of their first resolution (prathamacittotpāda), the arhats and pratyekabuddhas do not have the great vows (mahāprañidhāna), do not have great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) or great compassion (mahākaruṇā), do not seek all the qualities (guṇa) [of the Buddhas], do not honor all the Buddhas of the three times and the ten directions; they do not [196a] sincerely seek to understand the true nature of dharmas, for they seek only to escape from the suffering of old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maraṇa). On the other hand, from their first resolution, the bodhisattvas pronounce the great vow [to save beings], they have great loving-kindness and great compassion, they seek all the qualities and honor all the Buddhas of the three times and the ten directions, they have very keen knowledge (mahātīkṣṇajñāna) and seek the true nature of dharmas, they expel all kinds of opinions, namely, opinions regarding pure and impure (śucyaśuci), emptiness and reality (śūnyasadbhūta), the self and the non-self (ātmānātman). Rejecting these wrong views and theoretical opinions, they only see, in external things, that the true nature is neither pure nor impure, neither eternal nor transitory, neither happy nor unhappy, neither empty nor real, neither with nor without self. The bodhisattva is not attached to any of these opinions, for these are worldly theses (lokasaṃvṛtidharma): they are not absolute (pāramārthika), are neither completely pure (trimaṇḍalapariśuddha) nor irrefutable (ahārya) nor infallible (avikāra). The [completely neutral] position adopted by the saints (ārya) is called Prajñāpāramitā.

V. WAYS OF ACQUIRING PRAJÑĀPMARAMITĀ.

1. By the successive practice of the five virtues.

Question. – Now we know that the essential nature of Prajñā consists of the absence of nature (animitta) and non-perception (anupalabdhī); how does the ascetic (yogin) acquire it?

Answer. – The Buddha preaches the Dharma by skillful means (upāya), and the ascetic who acts in accordance with this sermon ends up by acquiring the Dharma. It is as if he borrowed a ladder to climb a steep cliff, or he took a boat to cross the great sea. From his first resolution (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisattva hears it said by the Buddha, by a disciple or in a sūtra that all dharmas are absolutely empty (atyantaśūnya), that they have no defined nature (anīyatasvabhāva) to which one can adhere or in which one can believe, that the absolute (paramārtha) Dharma destroys all futile proliferation (prapañca) and that nirvāṇa is safety par excellence. [Then the bodhisattva says to himself]: “Can I, who want to save all beings, alone take possession of nirvāṇa? At this time, my merits (puṇya), my qualities (guṇa), my knowledge and the power of my superknowledges (abhijñābala) are still imperfect (aparipūrṇa); thus I am unable to lead beings; first I should complete the causes and conditions.” Then he practices the five virtues (pāramitā), beginning with generosity:

1. By material gifts (āmiśadāna), he gains great wealth; by the gift of the Dharma, he acquires great wisdom (mahāprajñā). By practicing these two generosityes, he can guide poor people (daridrā) and introduce them into the Trip0le Vehicle.
2. By observing morality (śīla), he takes birth in a noble state among gods or men; he himself avoids the three unfortunate destinies (durgati) and he makes beings avoid them in their turn.
3. By patience (kṣānti), he avoids the poison of anger (krodhaviṣa), he obtains physical beauty and supreme distinction. Those who see him are joyful, respect him, esteem him and venerate him, all the more so when they hear him preach the Dharma.
4. By means of exertion (vīrya) he destroys all laziness (kausīdya) now and in the future in acquiring the merits of the Path; thus he obtains a vajra body and an unshakeable mind (achalacitta). With this body and mind, he destroys the pride (abhimāna) of worldly people and makes them obtain nirvāṇa.
5. By means of dhyāna, he destroys distraction (vikṣiptacitta). He escapes from the five desires (kāma) and guilty pleasures and teaches others to avoid them.

⁵⁶⁵ Works relating to the 96 heretical sects; cf. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 410.

[196b] Dhyāna is the basis of Prajñāpāramitā; the latter arises spontaneously when the virtue of dhyāna is relied upon. A sūtra says: “The one-pointed (ekacitta) and concentrated (samāhita) bhikṣu is able to contemplate the true nature of dharmas.”

Furthermore, the bodhisattva knows that the world of desire (kāmadhātu) abounds in sins of avarice (mātsarya) and greed (chanda) that keep shut the doors of good. By practicing the virtue of generosity he destroys these two faults and opens the doors of good. – Wishing to keep the doors open always, he practices the ten good paths of action (kuśalakarmapatha). – But, by the virtue of morality (śīla), he does not obtain dhyāna and wisdom, because, not having eliminated the desires (kāma), he is violating the virtue of morality; this is why he practices patience (kṣānti). He knows that, by the first three virtues [generosity, morality and patience], he can open the gates of merit (puṇya).

Besides, he knows that the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) is not eternal and that after enjoying bliss among the gods and humans, one will fall back down into suffering. Disgusted with these transitory merits, the bodhisattva seeks the true nature of Prajñāpāramitā. How will he obtain it? He will certainly succeed in obtaining it by mind concentration (ekacitta). To lay hold of the precious pearls (ratnamāṇi) of the nāga kings, one must watch attentively not to disturb the nāga: thus one will obtain a Jambudvīpa of value. [In the same way], by attentiveness (ekacitta) and dhyāna, the bodhisattva avoids the five desires (kāma) and the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa); to obtain spiritual joy, he makes use of great exertion (vīrya). This is why we talk about exertion immediately after patience. The sūtra actually says: “Sitting with body upright and having fixed his attention in front of him, the ascetic energetically seeks absorption and, even though his flesh and bones rot, he will never desist.”⁵⁶⁶ Thus exertion prepares dhyāna.

When one has wealth, giving it is not difficult; if one is afraid of falling into the three unfortunate destinies (durgati), or of losing one’s good reputation, to keep morality (śīla) and patience (kṣānti) is not difficult: this is why the first three virtues do not need any exertion. But here, to calm the mind and seek absorption in view of the true nature of Prajñāpāramitā is a difficult thing that requires exertion. This is how one will attain Prajñāpāramitā by exertion.

2. By practicing just one virtue.

Question. – Is it necessary to practice the five virtues to obtain the Prajñāpāramitā, or is it enough to practice one or two virtues in order to obtain it?

Answer. – The virtues have a twofold aspect: i) one single virtue, by interaction, includes all the virtues; ii) one practices the virtues each in turn (anukālam) and separately (prthak). [In the first case], it is the predominant virtue that imposes its name. It is the same for a conglomerate composed of the four great elements (mahābhūtasamghata); although the four great elements are inseparable (avisamyukta), it is the predominant element that imposes its name [on the conglomerate].⁵⁶⁷ There is, we would say, ‘interaction’ [between the virtues, for one single virtue includes the five others, and it is not possible to acquire the Prajñāpāramitā independently of the other five virtues. [In the second case], by practicing the virtues in successive order, the Prajñāpāramitā is acquired as a result of one or another virtue.

When a person who has produced the mind of supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarasamyaksambodhi) practices generosity (dāna), he tries to discover the characteristic (lakṣaṇa) of generosity. Generosity is neither one nor many, neither eternal nor non-eternal, neither existent nor non-existent, etc. as [196c] was said in the refutation of generosity (p. 724F). Thanks to generosity, the bodhisattva discovers the true nature which is the same for all dharmas. This is how, by means of generosity [alone], the Prajñāpāramitā may be obtained.

There are people who, by observing morality (śīla) have no trouble in not causing harm to beings. But when they seize the characteristics (nimittodgrahaṇa) and become attached to them (abhiniveśa), they provoke controversy (vivāda). These people who previously had no antagonism toward beings now experience aversion or affection for a (dogmatic) system and begin to hate their adversaries.

And so, if they want not to not cause harm to beings, they must practice fundamental equality in regard to all dharmas (dharmasamātā). If they distinguish between what is sinful and what is not, they are not practicing the virtue of morality. Why? Because they will detest sin and will love its opposite; their mind becomes excited and they return to harming beings. This is why, by means of a correct view of sin and its opposite, the bodhisattva experiences neither aversion nor affection in his hearts. Seeing in this way, he acquires the Prajñāpāramitā by practicing only the virtue of morality.

3. The bodhisattva has this thought: “If I do not acquire patience toward dharmas (dharmakṣānti), I will not always be able to be patient. As long as they do not undergo oppression, all beings are patient; but when suffering comes along to torture them, they lose their patience. They are like these prisoners who fear to be beaten and take refuge in death. This is why I must produce dharmakṣānti: there is no tormenter, no insulter, no victim; I alone must undergo the punishment (vipākaphala) for the mistakes (viparyāsa) of my earlier existences (pūrvajanman).” From then on, the bodhisattva makes no more distinctions between the object of the patience and the patience itself; he penetrates deeply into the absolute emptiness (atyantaśūnya); this is dharmakṣānti. Endowed with this dharmakṣānti, he will never again torment beings. The wisdom associated with this dharmakṣānti is Prajñāpāramitā.

4. Exertion (vīrya) is present in all the good dharmas and is able to realize all the good dharmas. While wisdom, in measuring and analyzing dharmas, penetrates the nature of things (dharmadhātu), exertion lends its help. On the other hand, knowing that the true nature of exertion is independent of the body and the mind, the bodhisattva is truly unshakeable. Such exertion can give rise to Prajñāpāramitā; other exertions, in the manner of magic (māyā) or dream (svapna) are false and unreal; that is why they are not spoken of.

⁵⁶⁷ The four elements are present in the lump of earth, for the earth possesses dampness, heat and movement; but as the element-earth (prthivīdhātu), characterized by solidity (khakkhaṭatva), predominates in the lump, we speak of ‘a lump of earth’. See above, p. 1099F.

5. When the mind concentrates its attention, it can truly see the true nature of dharmas. This true nature cannot be perceived [by experience], namely, what is seen (dr̥ṣṭa), heard (śrūta), thought (mata) and known (vijñāta). Why? Because the six senses and their six coarse objects are all deceptive and result from the retribution of causes and conditions. There, everything that is known and seen is deceptive; and no deceptive knowledge merits belief. That which merits belief is the true Wisdom alone obtained by the Buddhas in the course of incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa). Since this wisdom depends on dhyāna and careful consideration of the true nature of dharmas we can say that dhyāna gives rise to Prajñāpāramitā.

[197a] There are cases where, without practicing the five virtues, a person penetrates the true nature of dharmas solely by hearing (śravaṇa), study (adhyayana), reflection (manasikāra) or calculation (gaṇana): the knowledge of means (upāyavijñāna) gives rise to Prajñāpāramitā. Sometimes also it is two, three or four virtues that give rise to Prajñāpāramitā. Similarly, some realize the fruit of the Path (mārgaphala) by hearing only one truth (satya) preached; others realize the fruit of the Path by hearing two, three or four truths. The person who has doubts about the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya) finds the Path when the truth of suffering is preached to him; and it is the same for the other three truths, The person who has doubts about all four truths finds the Path when the four truths are preached to him. Thus the Buddha said to a bhikṣu: “If you are able to cut desire (rāga) I guarantee that you will obtain the state of anāgamin; if you cut desire, know that hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha) will indeed be cut by that very fact.”⁵⁶⁸ It is the same for the six virtues: to destroy the dominant fault of avarice (mātsarya), a sermon on generosity should be preached, and the other faults will be destroyed by that very fact; to destroy mixed faults, the six virtues should be preached at the same time. Consequently, if it is a question of a particular behavior or the group of behaviors, the six virtues are preached for everybody and not for just one person.

3. By abstaining from any practice.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva acquires the Prajñāpāramitā without practicing any dharma and without acquiring any dharma. Why? All practices (caryā) are erroneous and futile: from near or far, they present faults. In fact, bad dharmas (akuśaladharma) are faulty from close up; as for good dharmas, they are transformed and modified from far away; those who become attached to them will end up by experiencing pain and sorrow; thus they show defects from far off. [Good and bad practices] are like an appetizing food and a disgusting food both of which have been poisoned. As soon as one eats the disgusting food, one feels dissatisfied. When one eats the appetizing food, one feels pleasant satisfaction for the moment, but later it takes one’s life. Therefore both kinds of food should be avoided, and it is the same for good and bad practices.

⁵⁶⁸ For this text, see above, p. 1029F, n. 1.

Question. – If that is so, why did the Buddha preach the three practices, namely, the brāhmanic practice (brahmacarya), the godly practice (divyacarya) and the noble practice (āryacarya)?⁵⁶⁹

Answer. – The noble practice consists of practicing the absence of all practice. Why? Because during all noble practice, one never departs from the three gates of liberation (vimokṣamukha). The brāhmanic and the divine practices arise insofar as they grasp the characteristics of beings (sattvanimittodgrahaṇa); although they do not show defects at the time they are being practiced, they will show them later on and the realities they actually pursue will all appear to be false. However, the saint (ārya) who practices these two kinds of practice with a detached mind (asaktacitta) does not commit any fault.

For the person who practices the absence of practice thus, nothing exists any longer: errors (viparyāsa), deceptions (vañcana) and the afflictions (kleśa) no longer arise for they are purified like space (ākāśasūddha). He acquires the true nature of dharmas by holding his non-acquisition (anupalabdhi) as an acquisition. It is said in the non-acquired Prajñā: “Dharmas, form (rūpa), etc., are not empty as a result of emptiness; they are originally and eternally empty in themselves; dharmas, form, etc., are not non-perceptible because wisdom does not reach them: they are originally and eternally non-perceptible in themselves.”⁵⁷⁰ This is [197b] why we should not ask how many virtues must be practiced to obtain Prajñāpāramitā. Out of loving-kindness and compassion to beings, the Buddhas teach the practices in order to be in harmony with common usage (saṃvṛtti), but there is nothing absolute (paramārtha) there.

Question. – If Prajñāpāramitā can be neither acquired nor practiced, why does the ascetic seek it?

Answer. – There are two kinds of things that cannot be acquired:

i) Worldly pleasures, which can be sought but which do not respond to the attempt, cannot be acquired; ii) The true nature of dharmas, the definite notice (niyattanimitta) of which escapes perception, cannot be acquired. Not being non-existent, they include merit (puṇya) and increase the roots of good (kuśalamūla). Worldly people (prthagjana) who speculate about worldly affairs (lokadharma) have profit (lābha), etc.;

⁵⁶⁹ These are the three practices (caryā) or the three abodes (vihāra) defined above, Traité, I, p. 162-163F.

⁵⁷⁰ A vague and inexact reference to a classical passage in the Prajñā literature: cf. Pañcaviṃśati, ed. Dutt, p. 37-38 (Chinese transl. by Hui’an tsang, T 220, k. 402, vol. 7, p. 11b26-11c16; by Mokṣaḥ, T 221, k. 1, p. 4c18-28; by Dharmarakṣa, T 222, k. 1, p. 152a16-152b2; by Kumārajīva, T 223, k. 1, p. 221b25-221c10); Śatasāhasrikā, p. 118 seq, 81 seq, 932 seq. – The sūtras and the śāstras of the Greater Vehicle often used this text, citing it more or less faithfully: cf. Kāśyapaparivarta, p. 94, § 63; Madh. vṛtti, p. 248; Sūtrālaṃkāra, ed. Lévi, p. 76; Saṃgraha, p. 116-118; Siddhi, p. 521, 531. Here are some extracts from the Pañcaviṃśati version:

Iha bodhisattvo mahāsattvaḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ caran, bodhisattva eva san bodhisattvaṃ na samanupaśyati... rūpaṃ api na samanupaśyati... Tathā hi rūpaṃ rūpasvabhāvena śūnyam... Na śūnyatayā rūpaṃ śūnyam... nānyatrarūpac śūnyatā... rūpaṃ eva śūnyatā... śūnyataiva rūpaṃ... Nāmanātramidaṃ yad idaṃ rūpaṃ... Tathā hi māyopamaṃ rūpaṃ... māyā ca nāmanātram... Māyādarśanasvabhāvyā hi notpādo na nirodho na saṃkleśo na vyvadānam... Tathā hi kṛtrimaṃ nāma... Tāni bodhisattvaḥ prajñāpāramitāyāṃ caran sarvanāmāni na samanupaśyati, asamanupaśyan nābhiniṣīate.

The reasoning given here for rūpa is repeated for the other four skandhas and is applied in a general way to all dharmas without exception.

and it is the same for all the good qualities. But it is according to the mind of the world that we speak about acquisition, in the mind of the Buddha, nothing is acquired.

This is a summary of the meaning of Prajñāpāramitā; later we will speak of it at greater length.

INTRODUCTION

Volume II of the Treatise on the Great Virtue of Wisdom appeared in 1949 and more than twenty years separate it from Volume III which I [Lamotte] have the honor of presenting today. During this time Buddhist studies have made considerable progress in many directions and have brought new light to the Traité. An entire book would be needed to describe them in detail, which would delay further the publishing of the present volume. These introductory pages¹ will be limited to providing some detailed information on the Traité itself, its author, the sources from which it draws its inspiration, the Chinese translation of which it is the object and, finally, the contents of Volume III. The Supplement to the Bibliography that will follow it will inform the reader more fully.

I. THE TREATISE ON THE GREAT VIRTUE OF WISDOM

The Traité is a voluminous commentary on a lengthy version of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra. The short version that first appeared consisted of 8000 ślokas or units of 32 syllables and was entitled Aṣṭasāhasrikā Prajñāpāramitā. The original Sanskrit text was published by R. Mitra in 1888 and by U. Wogihara in 1932-35; it was translated into Chinese six times (T 220, nos. 4-5, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228) and once into Tibetan (Tib. Trip 734).

The long versions entitled Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra were three or possibly four in number:

1. The Aṣṭadaśasāhasrikā in 18,000 ślokas partially edited by E. Conze in 1962, translated once into Chinese (T 220, no. 3) and once into Tibetan (Tib. Trip. 732).
2. The Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā in 25,000 ślokas, the history of which is more complicated:
 - a. T 222: Koung-tsang-king, by Dharmarakṣa in 286 A.D.
 - b. Fang-kouang-pan-jo-king, by Mokṣala in 291.
 - c. Mo-ho-pan-jo-po-lo-mi-king, by Kumārajīva in 403-404.
 - d. T 220, no. 2: Ta-pan-jo-po-lo-mi-king, by Hiuan-tsang in 660-663.
 - e. Tib. Trip. 731: Śes-rab-kyi pha-rol-tu phyin-pa stoñ-phrag-ñi-śu-lia-pa, by unknown translators.

A modified version serving as commentary to the Abhisamayālaṃkāra of Maitreya also exists in Sanskrit and Tibetan.

a. Āryapañcaviṃśatisāhasrika bhagavatī prajñāpāramitā, abhisamayālaṃkāraṇūsāreṇa saṃśodhitā, partially edited by N. Dutt in 1934.

b. Tib. Trip. 5188: Śes-rab-kyi pha-tol-tu phyin-pa stoñ-phrag-ñi-śu-lia-pa, translated by Śi-ba bzañ-po and Tshul-khrims rgyal-ba.

3. The Śatasāhasrikā in 100,000 ślokas was partially edited in 1902 by P. C. Ghosa, translated once into Chinese (T 220, no. 1) and once into Tibetan (Tib. Trip. 730).

This list far from exhausts the enormous production of Prajñāpāramitās: there are still many other shorter texts of which the author of the Traité was unaware. E. Conze has recorded them for us in his work The Prajñāpāramitā Literature, 1960.

The Traité was a commentary in Sanskrit on the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra, in the present case the original version of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, a copy of which was in Kumārajīva's possession and which he translated at the same time as the Traité in 403-404: this is the Taisho 223. The translator had no knowledge of the modified version, the only one that has come down to us.

On the other hand, the Indo-Tibetan tradition is silent about the Traité, the only evidence of which is the abridged Chinese translation made by Kumārajīva under the name Ta-tche-tou louen (T 1509).

The East as well as the West has become accustomed to restoring this title in Sanskrit as Mahāprajñāpāramitāsāstra, "Treatise on the Great Perfection of Wisdom".

But, as P. Demiéville has commented,² various titles are found both in the editions as well as in the fragments of manuscript found at Touen-houang and especially Mo-ho-po-lo-mi-to-king-che-louen: "The latter (also denoted in the K'ai-yuan-lou, T 2145, K. 4, p. 513a4) is the one that appears at the head of the preface by Seng-jouei (at the beginning of T 1509), with an abridged variant also given by the Tch'ou-san-tsang-ki-tsi (T 2145, k. 10, p. 74c11). This title is probably the older one and could correspond to the Sanskrit Mahā-prajñāpāramitā-upadeśa-[-śāstra]: the word upadeśa is, furthermore, given in transcription in the Chinese biographies of Nāgārjuna which must emanate from Kumārajīva: in one of these biographies we read that 'Nāgārjuna made an upadeśa in ten thousand *gāthās*³ to explain the Mahāyāna in a developed manner' (Long-chou-p'ou-sa-tchouan, T 2047, p. 184c18; Fou-fa-tsang-yin-yuan-tchouan, T 2058, k. 5, p. 318b16)."⁴

But the characters che-louen do not necessarily render the Sanskrit upadeśa and do not appear among the Chinese expressions most often used to translate upadeśa, namely, louen-yi, fa-yi, chouo-yi, fa-chouo, yi-couo, ta-kiao.⁵

Be that as it may, Demiéville was right and, in the title in question, che-louen is the equivalent of upadeśa.

Actually, upadeśa is also the name of the twelfth and last member of the 'twelve-membered' word of the Buddha (dvādaśaṅgabuddhavadāna) which is frequently mentioned in the Sanskrit texts of the two

² Le Traité de la Grande Vertu de Sagesse de Nāgārjuna, JA, 1950, p. 375, n. 1

⁵ The Chinese characters are given rather than the numbers as in previous vols. I and II.

Vehicles; Kumārajīva uses only two ways of rendering this member: he either transcribes it as yeou-po-t'i-chō, or else he translates it as louen-yi.

And yet at kiuan 20, p. 208b16, which the reader will find below at p. 1237F, the Traité designates itself under the title of Pan-jo-po-lo-mi-louen-yi: pan-jo-lo-mi is the transcription of prajñā-pāramitā, and louen-yi is the translation of upadeśa.

Therefore the original Indian title was Prajñāpāramitopadeśa 'Detailed Analysis of the Perfection of Wisdom', or also Mahā-prajñā-pāramitā-sūtra-upadeśa, 'Detailed Analysis of the Great Sūtra on the Perfection of Wisdom', in the present case, the Pañca-viṃśati-sāhasrikā.

The works of scholastic Buddhism often have the title of Upadeśa: thus Vasubandhu composed upadeśas on the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka (T 1519, 1520), the Sukhāvatīvyūha (T 1524), the Ratnacūḍa (T 1526), the Dharmacakrapravartana (T 1533), etc.

At kiuan 33, p. 308a, the Traité will explain what it means by upadeśa: "Louen-yi (upadeśa) means to reply to questions (praśnavyākaraṇa), to explain why and then to explain broadly the meanings (artha). When the Buddha preached the four truths (satya), he was asked what they are, and the reply was that they are the four noble truths (āryasatya). He was asked what are these truths, and the reply was that they are the four noble truths on suffering (duḥkha), its origin (samudaya), its cessation (nirodha) and the path (pratipad): that is what the louen-yi (upadeśa) is. He was asked what is the noble truth of suffering (duḥkhāryasatya), and the reply was that it is the eight kinds of suffering, suffering of birth (jātiduḥkha), etc. He was asked what is the suffering of birth, and the reply was that beings, in every place of birth (jātisthāna), undergo suffering. Giving such answers to questions and broadly explaining the meanings is what is called yeou-po-t'i-chō (upadeśa).

II. THE AUTHOR AND HIS SOURCES

An almost twenty century-old legend has been woven around the author of the Traité and even to skim through it, it is evident that there will be further enrichment of it. Without pretending to 'render unto Caesar', for the time being, we are not prevented from disregarding it momentarily so as to study the author on the basis of his work alone. Indian writers in general and Buddhist scholars in particular are not in the habit of pushing themselves forward and, if a literary genre has been neglected in India, it is indeed that of autobiography. We cannot blame the philosophers who profess the anātman for concealing their own individuality in their works. Such reservation is easy when the work is not greater than five hundred stanzas, as was the case for the Madhyamakāśāstra, the Dvādaśamukhaśāstra, the Catuḥśatakaśāstra or the Śatakaśāstra. When, like the Traité, it reaches more than three million words in a thousand scrolls, it is more difficult for the author to maintain his incognito.

1. THE GEOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL MILIEU

According to the indications furnished by the author, he seems to have been active at the beginning of the 4th century of our era in north-western India. This region, which for a long time was the only gate half-way open to the exterior, already had had a long history. After having undergone the Achemenid yoke for two and a half centuries (559-326 B.C.) and the Macedonian occupation for twenty years (326-306 B. C.), it had rejoined the mother country on terms of the convention concluded between Seleucos the First Nicator and Candragupta. Having moved within the circles of the Mauryan Indian empire from about 306 to 189, it was conquered by the Greco-Macedonians of Bactria who founded two kingdoms in it: the western Greek kingdom consisting of Bactria, Sogdia, Arie, Sýistan and Arachosia; the eastern Greek empire extending over Kapiśa, Gandhāra and the Punjab. Devoured by internal quarrels, the Greeks eliminated themselves, and their last representative disappeared from the scene of history about 30 A.D. Previously, peoples of Iranian language had already infiltrated into India and, for a century and a half (ca. 90 B.C. – 50 A.D.) the north-west suffered invasions by Scytho-Parthians, the Śakas of Mauès (90-53 B. C.) and the Pahlavas of Gondopharesia (19-45 A.D.). Finally, about 50 A.D., Indo-Scythia passed into the hands of nomadic populations of poorly defined origin, called Ta Yue-tche, Yue-tche and Tou-houo-lo by the Chinese, Tokharoi and Thagouroi by the Greeks, Tochari and Togarii by the Romans, Tukhāra, Tusāra and Turuška by the Indians, Tho-Kar and Thod-Kar by the Tibetans, Tokhrī by the Ouigours, Ttaugara or Ttauḍāgara by the Khotanese. Starting out from Kan-sou in 174 B.C., they had seized hold of Bactria about 130 B.C., and had divided it up into five dynasties. One of their descendants, Kujula Kadphises, an officer of the Kouei-chouang region, dominated his fellows and laid the foundations of an immense empire which, at the time of its greatest extent, included Chinese Turkestan with Kashgar, Yarkhand and Khotan, eastern Iran with Sogdia, Bactria and Séistan, all of north-western India with Kashmir, the Indus basin and the middle Ganges area, possibly as far as Benares.

For two and a half centuries, the Kušāna empire played the role of crossroads of Asia, all the lines of communication of which it controlled.

The first dynasty represented by Kujula Kadphises and Vima Kadphises (ca. 50-80 A. D.) was succeeded by a second dynasty represented by the illustrious names of Kaniška, Vāṣiṣka, Kaniška II, Huviška and Vāsudeva. The date of Kaniška's accession is still debated: 78, 128 or 144 A.D.⁶ On his inscriptions, he inaugurated a new era lasting at least 98 years. The Kušāna empire became decadent with the accession to the Persian throne of the Sassanides (227-651): about 226, its founder, Ardahīr-i-Bābegān invaded Kapiśa, Gandhāra and the eastern Punjab.

Reigning over populations of very different race, language and religion, the Kušānas were wise enough to respect them all. Their coins bore inscriptions in Indian, Iranian and even Greek; on the reverse side, they showed Iranian deities, Sun, Moon, Wind, Fire, Mithra, Anaïtis; some Indian, Śiva, Mahāsena, Skandha, Budha (sic!) and also Serapis, Horus, Heracles, Selene, Helios and even Roma.

Kaṇiṣka favored Buddhism by building near Puruṣapura, his capital, a stūpa 700 feet high at the village of Kharjurikā, which, for many centuries, was admired by the Chinese pilgrims. Excavations at this site by D. B. Spooner and H. Hargreaves have unearthed an inscribed reliquary surmounted by three figures representing the Buddha between Brahmā and Indra; the body of the reliquary is engraved with various figures of orantes, particularly Kaṇiṣka flanked by two deities, the Sun and the Moon, the Miṛo and Mao of the coins. It appears from many inscriptions in Kharoṣṭhī and Brāhmī that the great emperor promoted the building of stūpas and vihāras. His successors followed his example, and the founding and endowment of a magnificent monastery at Jamālpur Mound near Mathurā is attributed to Huviṣka.⁷

A legend, which seems to be a replica of that of Aśoka, formed around Kaṇiṣka. It connects him with the minister Māthara, the physician Caraka and important religious individuals such as Saṃgharakṣa, Aśvaghoṣa, Jeyata, Pārśva, Vasumitra and Pūrṇa. The legend has it that he convened a great council at Kāśmīr to revise the Buddhist scriptures and to compose explanatory treatises on the Three Baskets.

The author of the Traité definitely lived at the time of the Great Kuṣāṇas since he makes frequent allusions to the Greater and Lesser Yue-tche or Tukhāras (p. 547F, 555F, 672F, 1584F). But curiously enough, he never mentions their personal names and limits himself to referring to them by the official title of devaputra, frequent on the inscriptions and coins (p. 475F, 1421F, 396c, 321a, etc.). Such reticence is perhaps a mark of respect, but more likely answers to the fundamental antipathy the Indians always experienced in regard to sovereigns of foreign origin. It explains the total silence maintained by the indigenous chronicles on Alexander's incursion into India, major event though it was. Despite their generous donations, the great Kuṣāṇas remained outsiders to the native population. The author of the Traité does not conceal his scorn for the borderlands (pratyantajanapada) which he considers to be places of lowly birth, and he adds to them not only the foreign kingdoms such as Tukhāra, Sogdia, Persia and the eastern Mediterranean, but also some regions of India occupied by primitive peoples such as the Śavaras, people of Dravidian languages such as the Andhras and even some slightly aryanized capitals such as Ujjayinī (p.174F, 1584-1586). In his eyes, the Buddhist Madhyadeśa was limited to the lands of Aryan tongue and, whatever their religious sympathies, he is not far from rejecting as barbaric foreigners all those who spoke Chinese, Scythian, Greek, Dravidian, Tibetan, Kāśgarian, Tokharian or Bactrian (p. 1586).

At the end of the Kuṣāṇa epoch, the religious situation was very complex. The inscriptions, the coins and the literary texts attest to the active presence, in the north-west, of Brahmanism and Hinduism, of Jainism and Buddhism, as well as the persistence of the primitive cult of the Nāgas. The holy Dharma particularly flourished and, starting from the reign of Aśoka (272-236), the region became, after Magadha, the second Holy Land of Buddhism. The great emperor flooded it with his edicts on the Dharma, published in Indian Prakrit, in Aramaic and in Greek.⁸ After this psychological preparation, the missionary Madhyāntika, sent by Moggaliputtatissa, settled down there with five hundred arhats; he introduced the cultivation of saffron and substituted the reign of the holy Dharma for the cult of the nāgas. The district was soon covered with monasteries (viḥāra, saṃghārāma) to shelter the monastics and with commemorative monuments (stūpa) to perpetuate the memory of Śākyamuni. The stūpas of the old style – described by Hiuan-tsang as ‘Aśoka’s stūpa’ – were especially numerous. Consisting of a raised hemispherical dome on a terrace surrounded by a balustrade, they marked the places where Śākyamuni, during his previous existences as Bodhisattva, had distinguished himself by his generosity, morality, patience and exertion. Thus, although the last lifetime of the Buddha had taken place in the region of the middle Ganges, the north-western India was the main theatre of his jātakas.

Later, at the time, more precisely, of the Kuṣāṇas, the stupa evolved in form: placed on a raised drum, it became more slender and gained in height. What is more, it was covered with sculptures representing the human form of the Buddha in various episodes of his last existence, a major innovation probably inspired by Hellenistic sculptors who may have developed unhindered in the large sculpture schools of Gandhāra and Mathurā.

At the same time, the legend of the Buddha, breaking with historical plausibility, devised a long journey of Śākyamuni across the north-west of India where he may have left traces of his passage. Accompanied sometimes by Ānanda, sometimes by the yakṣa Vajrapāṇi, the Teacher, starting from Mathurā, made this tour in twenty-five stages, taming the nāgas, converting the kings, predicting important events and leaving his shadow in the village of Pālitakūṭa, near Tchahār-Bāgh (p. 547-554F)

In the meantime, the Buddhist community had passed through many vicissitudes: “When the Buddha was in this world, the Dharma met with no opposition. After the Buddha died, when the Dharma was recited for the first time, it was still as it was when the Buddha was alive. One hundred years later, king Aśoka called together a great quinquennial (pañcavarṣa) assembly and the great Dharma teachers debated. As a result of their differences, there were distinct sects (nikāya) each having a name and each developing subsequently” (p. 106-108F). Following a schism provoked by Mahādeva, the Saṃgha split into two big parts, that of the Sthaviras “Old Ones”, partisans of a more strict orthodoxy, and that of the Mahāsāṃghikas “Majorities”, of laxer and democratic tendencies. These two sections in turn became subdivided into various sects which tradition has fixed as eighteen in number. They expanded over all of India and geographical separation further increased their differences.

In the Kuṣāṇa epoch, two sects, the Mahāsāṃghika and the Sarvāstivādin, contended with one another over the north-west. The former, represented at Mathurā and Kapiśa, used a hybrid language, a mixture of the Prakrit jargon and correct Sanskrit. The latter, derived from the Sthavira branch, resolutely opted for the use of Sanskrit as the religious language, They were by far the more powerful, and inscriptions in Karoṣṭhī and Brāhmī indicate their presence at Mathurā, Kalwan, Shāh-jī-Dherī, Zeda, Kurram (either in Afghanistan, Punjab and Sindh) with off-shoots as far away as Śrāvastī and Sāmāth.

The two sects, which were opposed especially in matters of buddhology, evolved somewhat over time, but the second in particular still represented the old Buddhism as Śākyamuni had taught it to his śrāvakas. Nevertheless, around the beginning of our era, they were infiltrated by adepts of a new form of Buddhism animated by a more daring ideal, inspired by more radical philosophical ideas and professing theories, hitherto unknown, on the nature of Buddha and future Buddhas. This movement, suggestive rather than revolutionary, took the name of Mahāyāna ‘Greater Vehicle (of salvation)’ and qualified as Hīnayāna, ‘Lesser Vehicle’, the old doctrines and practices. It did not constitute a new sect and its name never appears in the inscriptions, but it developed within the very bosom of the monastic communities.

Some monks, regarding the teachings transmitted for five hundred years as the holy Dharma (saddharma), refused to come to terms with the Mahāyāna, rejected its scriptures as false and charged the new movement with being the Counterfeit Dharma (pratirūpakadharmā): disciples they were, disciples they meant to remain. But beside these reactionary śrāvakas, there were progressive monks who took the Mahāyāna sūtras into consideration, held them or pretended to take them as the Word of the Buddha and adopted their ideas. Nevertheless, they did not leave their monastery and continued to co-habit with the ‘Old Ones’ who did not share their views. Thus, in the 7th century, Hiuan-tsang distinguished three types of monasteries: the monasteries within the jurisdiction of the Hīnayāna sects (Sthavira, Mahāsāṃghika, Sarvāstivādin, Saṃmatīya), the Mahāyāna monasteries, and finally the monasteries where practitioners of both Vehicles lived together.

In regard to his epoch and the sources that he uses, it seems that the author of the Traité was a Sarvāstivādin, perhaps belatedly converted to the Mahāyāna. His high esteem for the monastic life (p. 839-846F), his disdainful silence toward the Mahāsāṃghikas whom he mentions only once in his work suggests that he wore the yellow robe of the bhikṣu in some Sarvāstivādin monastery of north-western India, one of these monasteries built on the plains or on the hills, the ruins of which still exist at Shāh-jī-dherī, Shāh-dherī, Shahr-i-Bahlol, Sanghao, Takht-i-Bahai, Hamal-Garhī, Karkai, etc. Fa-hien, who visited them at the beginning of the 5th century, tells us that they were occupied almost exclusively by Sarvāstivādins.

Under the direction of learned teachers, the author devoted himself to the study of the sacred texts, memorized the Tripiṭaka and specialized in the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma. He manifests such a deep understanding of it that we may think he in turn taught it. Later, the reading of the Mahāyānasūtras must have made an impression on him, and study of the early Mādhyamikans (Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva, Rāhulabhadra) convinced him of the cogency of the new ideas. He went over to the Mahāyāyāna without, however, giving up his scholastic habits. In the form of a commentary on the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, he composed a voluminous exegetical treatise which is like a Mahāyāna reply to the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma. The author appears both as a Sarvāstivādin by training and a Mahāyānist by conviction, and it is under these two aspects that he should be studied.

2. THE SARVĀSTIVĀDIN BY TRAINING

The study program imposed on the north-western bhikṣus involved a formidable body of canonical and paracanonical texts. In contrast with most of the sects which had only three Baskets, the Sarvāstivādin Tripiṭaka, contrary to its name, had four: 1. the Vinayapiṭaka, the basket of discipline, 2. the Sūtrapiṭaka, the basket of dogmatic texts incorporating four “traditions” (āgama), 3. the Abhidharmapiṭaka, the scholastic basket, 4. the Kṣudrapīṭaka, the basket of minor texts.⁹ This is mentioned on p. 692-693F of the Traité and p. 412a of the Chinese translation.

A. Sarvāstivādin Sūtrapiṭaka.

It comprised four āgamas listed in the following order: 1) Ekottarāgama or Ekottarika, 2) Madhyamāgama, 3) Dīrghāgama, 4) Samyuktāgama.¹⁰ The text of the āgamas was translated into Chinese at the beginning of the 5th century (T 125, 26, 1, 99) and the sands of central Asia have yielded important fragments of their original Sanskrit: on the basis of these fragments, the patient work of E. Waldschmidt and his school have resulted in the reconstruction of numerous sūtras.

The Traité sometimes refers to these āgamas and occasionally cites the Ekottara (p. 103F, 1268F), the Madhyama (p. 4F, 103F, 307b, 456b), the Dīrgha (p. 103F, 300F, 544F) and the Samyukta (p. 103F, 447F, 542F, 614F, 288a, 295b, 298a, 307a, 444a). As general rule, however, it prefers to refer to the sūtras incorporated in these āgamas. These sūtras being familiar to all learned Buddhists, very often it omits mentioning their titles.

Comparative study of the texts shows that the author of the Traité used the Madhyamāgama and the Samyuktāgama of which Taisho 26 and 99 are the translations. In regard to the Ekottarāgama and the Dīrghāgama, he used originals slightly different from Taisho 125 and 1.¹¹

According to the immutable laws of religious exegesis, the author presents no event that is not based on a dogmatic source. On each page he refers explicitly or implicitly to a sūtra or a topic mentioned by several sūtras at the same time. This will become evident in the notes annexed to the French translation.

The sūtras being the very words of the Buddha, the author never rejects them. If they apparently contradict themselves, he makes efforts to assure their authenticity, then to interpret them according to the nature of things (dharmatā) by establishing a clear distinction between the scriptures of provisional meaning and those of definitive meaning (p.536-539F, 1621F n.). He shows himself thus to be a specialist trained in the school of rigorous intellectual discipline and respectful of the traditional game of exegesis.

⁹ The Vijñānavādins inherited this canon: cf. HBI, p. 167.

¹⁰ The same order was adopted by other schools; cf. HBI, p. 170.

¹¹ In Essays Offered to G. H. Luce, 1966, p. 49-58, A. Bareau has decisively established the Dharmaguptaka origin of the Dīrghāgama translated into Chinese by Buddhayaśas and Tchou Fo-nien (T 1).

The never-ending recourse to old canonical sūtras has the psychological effect of immersing the author in the past and making him relive in spirit the memorable events that occurred in Kosala, Magadha and the middle Ganges region at the time of the Buddha and his great disciples. He manifests an extensive and precise knowledge of the geography of the ancient epoch (p. 163-197F).

B. Sarvāstivādin Vinayaṭīka

The Traité is rather confused on the history of the Vinaya (p. 104F, 756c) but may be complemented thanks to information given by the Kaśmīrian tradition and collected in the 5th and 6th centuries by Kumārajīva, Seng-yeou and Houei-kiao.¹²

At the council of Rājagṛha presided over by Kāśyapa at the death of the Buddha, Upāli recited the Vinayaṭīka. As there were 80 repetitions of reciting this Vinaya, this last one will be called the ‘Vinaya of 80 recitations’. The first five patriarchs, Kāśyapa, Ānanda, Madhyāntika, Śāṇavāsa and Upagupta, conserved it carefully. As Upagupta, a contemporary of and advisor to Aśoka, had established residency at Mathurā, the old Vinaya which he retained was designated under the name ‘Vinaya of the land of Mathurā in 80 sections’. The text contained Avadānas and Jātakas.

But at that time, people, being of weak faculties, were unable to memorize so voluminous a code. The different Buddhist schools therefore published an abridgment of it and this is how the five Vinayas saw the light of day: Pāli Vin., Mahīśāsaka Vin. (T 1431), Mahāsāṃgika Vin. (T 1425), Dharmaguptaka Vin. (T 1428) and Sarvāstivādin Vin. (T 1435).

The Sarvāstivādin Vin. was compiled by Upagupta who reduced it to 10 sections by eliminating the stories of the Avadānas and Jātakas. It was entitled: ‘Vinaya in ten recitations’ (Daśadhyāya): sections 1 to 3 commented on the 250 rules of the bhikṣu; sections 4 to 6 dealt with the seven and the eight dharmas, in other words, the Skandhakas; section 7 explained the rules of the bhikṣuṇīs; sections 8 to 10 were reserved for appendices: Ekottara, Upālipariprecchā, Kṣudrakavarga and Kuśaladharmā. Some original fragments have come down to us and have been published by J. Filliozat and H. Kung¹³ and by V. Rosen.¹⁴ Introduced into Kaśmir, this Vinaya was also designated by the name ‘Vinaya of Kaśmir’. Kumārajīva translated it at Tch’ang-ngan in 404-405 under the name Che-song-liu (T 1435) and subsequently, after 409, Vimalākṣa completed it and enriched it with a preface.

Later, according to the Traité (p. 756c), there was a vibhāṣā in 80 chapters that commented on it. This vibhāṣā should not be confused with the primitive Vinaya which itself also consisted of 80 sections. Although the sources lack precision in this regard, this vibhāṣā, also composed in Kaśmir, is undoubtedly identical with the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya,¹⁵ definitely subsequent to the advent of the great Kuṣāṇas since it contains a prophecy relating to Kaniṣka.¹⁶ The Indian original has come down to us almost complete: various Sanskrit texts, such as the Divyāvadāna and the Avadānaśataka reproduce long passages of it; an apparently complete copy, written on birch-bark, was discovered at Gilgit in Kaśmir in 1931 and published by N. Dutt.¹⁷ Between the discovery and the editing, several sheets were misplaced, notably the major part of the Samghabhedavastu containing a detailed biography of Buddha Śākyamuni. G. Tucci recovered it in Afghanistan and it has appeared in the Serie Orientale Roma. The Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya also exists in Tibetan translation (Tib. Trip. 1030-1037) and in Chinese translation (T 1442-1451), but the latter, made by Yi-tsing between 700 and 712, is not quite complete.

The Traité has drawn up the table of contents of the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya (p. 104F) and borrows from it some important definitions, such as that of the Buddhadharmā (p. 81F), as well as various stories telling the circumstances that led the Teacher to formulate certain disciplinary regulations along with the exceptions they involve: the interdiction of eating impure food (p. 118-121F), of using bowls other than iron or baked clay pātra (p. 1674F), the authorization of accepting and wearing rich robes offered by lay people (p. 1678F), etc. But it is inspired much more frequently by the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya from which it borrows most of the Avadānas and Jātakas with which it ornaments its explanation. After the fashion of this vinaya, it explains most of the events in the life of the Buddha and his great disciples during their last lifetime. It would be impossible to list here the borrowings taken more or less directly from the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya: merely as example, the most characteristic are listed here: conversion of the old Subhadda (p. 205-209F, 1650F), Śuddhodana reassured by a god about the health of his son (p. 228-230F), the legend of Dharmaruci (p. 410-414F), Buddha’s journey to Śāla (p. 457-463), slander about the gardener Gaṇḍaka (p. 497-499), the nine or ten torments inflicted on the Buddha in the course of his last lifetime (p.507-511), the miracle of the multiplication of five buddhas (p. 531-535F, 1352-1353F), journeys of the Buddha in southern India, in north-western India and in Kaśmir (p. 546-548F), the story of Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana (p. 621-633F), the fable of the snake, the frog and the rat (p. 753F), the crimes of Devadatta (p. 868-878F, 1671-1674F), the story of Yaśodharā and the explanation of her prolonged pregnancy (p. 1001-1112), the relationship between king Bimbisāra and the courtesan Āmrapālī (p. 990-992F), etc.

The author has an interesting comment on the value of the Vinaya (p. 648b): like the sūtras, the code of monastic discipline is the word of the Buddha but concerns only the things of this world for the welfare of the Saṃgha; it imposes precepts (śīla) but does not explain the nature of things (dharmatā).

C. Sarvāstivādin Kṣudrakapīṭaka.

The Kṣudrakapīṭaka, also called Kṣudrakāgama or simply Kṣudraka by the Traité (p. 341F), formed a separate basket for the Sarvāstivādins, corresponding roughly to the Pāli Khuddakanukāya. It consists of old minor texts, usually versified, put into the mouth of the Buddha or one of his great disciples. Their number is not fixed, but the more or less complete lists that have come down to us¹⁸ mention the following texts, all of which the Traité has used:

- 1) Dharmapada (p. 29F, 1423F, 1513F, 278b, 316a, 464a).
- 2) Udāna (p. 325F, 1220F, 1513F).
- 3) Pārāyana (p. 220F, 237F, 295c).
- 4) Satyadṛṣṭa.
- 5) Śailagāthā.
- 6) Sthaviragāthā and Anavataptagāthā (p. 287F, 1363-1364F, 1386F, 1388F, 1426-1437F, 1439F, 1543F, 1546F).
- 7) Arthavargyāni sūtrāṇi (p. 39F, 65F, 1089F).

The more recent editions of these minor texts are mentioned in the Supplement to the Bibliography annexed to the present Introduction.

D. Sarvāstivādin Abhidharmapiṭaka.

This basket is the masterpiece of the Sarvāstivādin school; it shows but vague similarities with the Ceylonese Theravādin Abhidhammapiṭaka. It includes seven original works which tradition attributes, not to the Buddha himself, but to a series of disciples extending from the first to the sixth century after the Parinirvāṇa. The Chinese and Tibetan sources¹⁹ do not fully agree on the names of the supposed authors.

- 1) The Samgītiparyāya, composed by Śāriputra (T 1536) or by Maudgalyāyana, is a commentary on a sūtra of the Dīrghāgama, the Samgītiparyāya, of which important fragments have been published.²⁰
- 2) The Dharmaskandha by Mahāmaudgalyāyana (T 1537) or by Śāriputra is a collection of sūtras preached at Jetavana in Śrāvastī and briefly commented by canonical quotations.
- 3) The Prajñaptiśāstra by Mahāmaudgalyāyana (T 1538; Tib. Trip. 5587) shows some resemblance to the cosmological sūtra of the Dīrghāgama (T 1, no. 30) and the Li-che-a-p'i-t'an-louen (T 1644) which itself also shows all the characteristics of a sūtra.
- 4) The Vijñānakāya by Devakṣema (T 1539) or by Devaśarman was composed at Viśoka near Śrāvastī in the century following the Parinirvāṇa.

5) The Dhātukāya is attributed to Vasumitra by the Chinese (T1540), to Pūrṇa by the Tibetans: both authors are considered to be contemporaries of Kaṇiṣka.

6) The Prakaraṇapāda (T 1541, 1542) is given by the Traité (p. 111-112F) as a collective work: the first four chapters are said to be the work of Vasumitra and the last four, among them the chapter on the Thousand Apories, the work of the Kaśmīrian arhats.

7) The *Jñānaprasthāna*²¹ is the latest in date and by far the most important of the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma. It is the body (śārira) whereas the six preceding ones are the feet (pāda): this is why the Basket in question, although it consists of seven books, is entitled Ṣaṭpādābhidharma ‘Abhidharma of Six Feet’.

Its author was Kātyāyanīputra, or simply Kātyāyana, who lived in the 3rd century after the parinirvāṇa according to Seng-tchao and Hiuan-tsang, in the 3rd or 5th according to Paramārtha. The Mahāvibhāṣā has it that he composed his work ‘in the East’, but Hiuan-tsang locates him at Tāmasavana near Cīnabhukti in Kaśmir on the right bank of the Bias. According to Paramārtha, he went to Kaśmir with five hundred arhats and five hundred bodhisattvas to compile the Abhidharma of his school, and the result of this compilation was the Aṣṭaskandha, also called Jñānaprasthāna. As the work represents the Sarvāstivāda in its pure state, it is not likely that bodhisattvas, as adepts of the Mahāyāna, collaborated in it. Moreover, it may be noted that the traditions about the council of Kaṇiṣka do not have Kātyāyana appearing in them.

The Jñānaprasthāna was in Sanskrit: Vasubandhu’s Kośabhāṣya and Yaśomitra’s Kośavyākhyā cite lengthy extracts from it, and fragments of it have been found at Kapiśa and central Asia: those from Bāmiyān have been published by S. Lévi,²² and those from Koutcha by B. Pauly²³; these last were identified by P. Demiéville.²⁴

The work has been the object of two Chinese translations: 1. the Abhidharmāṣṭaskandhaśāstra (T 1543) translated in 383 at Tch’ang-ngan by Saṃghadeva and Tchou Fo-nien with a preface by Tao-ngan; 2. the Abhidharmajñānaprasthānaśāstra (T 1544) translated by Hiuan-tsang at Tch’ang-ngan in 657 to 660.

In the course of time, many commentaries have been made on the Jñānaprasthāna. According to Tao-ngan,²⁵ three arhats, Che-t’o p’an-ni, Ta-si and Pi-lo-ni, each dedicated a vibhāṣā to it; only the first is known to us. Later, five hundred great arhats in turn commented on it. Actually we have three vibhāṣās on the Jñānaprasthāna:

1) Vibhāṣāśāstra by Che-t'o-p'an-ni (T1547) or by Kātyāyanaputra himself (?), translated at Tch'ang-ngan in 383 by Saṃghabhadra, Dharmānandin and Buddharakṣa, and perhaps revised at Lo-yang by Saṃghadeva.²⁶

2) Abhidharmavibhāṣāśāstra, by five hundred arhats (T 1546), translated at Leang-cheou from 437 to 439 by Buddhavarman on the basis of an Indian mnauscript found by Tao-t'ai west of the Mountain of Onions (Pamir). It consisted of a hundred kiuan, but in 439, as a result of the invasion of the region by the barabarian T'o-pa T'ao, about forty of them were lost and only sixty remain.²⁷

3) Abhidharmamahāvibhāṣāśāstra by five hundred arhats (T 1545) translated by Hiuan-tsang at Tch'ang-ngan in 656-659.

But these facts tell us nothing about the date of the original Sanskrit texts. We know only that the Mahāvibhāṣā is later than Kaniṣka since it tells the well-known story of the eunuch and the bulls (T 1545, k. 114, p. 593a), placing it as 'once in Gandhāra, under Kaniṣka'.

Although the Traité contends with the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma, its author reveals himself as an outstanding specialist in this Abhidharma and I [Lamotte] personally think that before his conversion to the Mahāyāna, he professed the Vibhāṣā in some monastery in Kāśmīra-Gandhāra. As may be observed in reading the present volume, the explanation of the abhidharmic doctrines take up ten times as much space as their refutation, and the author is careful to say that his explanation is only a summary that could be further extended (p. 1186F, 1225F, 1232F, 1236F, 1273F, 1279F, 1309F, 1362F, 1483F, 1486F, 1492F).

Among the texts and authors that he mentions, the following may be noted:

1) The Ṣaṭpādābhidharma (p. 106F, 111F, 536a, 752b), the Abhidharmasūtra (p. 576c, 586b), the Abhidharmapiṭaka (p. 105F, 693F), the Abhidharmavibhaṅga (P. 1236F, 1702F, 1703F).

2) The Prakaraṇapāda (p. 11F) and its chapter on the Thousand Aporias (p. 1101F, 1171F, 1181F).

3) Kātyāyanīputra or simply Kātyāyana (p. 109F, 614F, 1383F, 1697F), his disciples (p. 245F, 285F, 330a), his work called Jñānaprathānāṣṭaskandha (p. 109F), Kātyāyana- or Kātyānanīputrābhidharma (p. 424F, 786F, 787F).

4) The Vibhāṣā (p. 110F, 377F), the Abhidharmavibhāṣā (p. 292F, 343a, 579c), the Kātyānīputrābhidharmavibhāṣā (p. 273a) and the Vibhāṣā scholars called Abhidharmavibhāṣopadeśācārya (p. 341c). According to some citations (p. 272F, 377F, 728F, 993F), it seems that the author of the Traité made use of a complete version of the Great Vibhāṣā by five hundred Kāśmīrian arhats. For the same reason, he was probably aware of the Abhidharmāmṛtarasa by Ghoṣaka (T 1553) and the Abhidharmasāra by Dharmāśrī (T 1550, by Upāśānta (T 1551) and perhaps also by Dharmatrāta (T 1552).²⁸ At times he was inspired by some Dhyānasūtras such as the Tch'an-yao-king (T6090, etc. (p. 1025F, 1322-1323F, 1422F, 1547F, 264c, 705b), but the question of borrowings is obscure and would require an in-depth inquiry.

The Traité does not mention the Dārṣṭāntika-Sautrāntikas often evoked in the Mahāvibhāṣā, but it was certainly familiar with the controversy on time which set them in opposition to the Sarvāstivādins (p. 1691-1694F) and takes its position, understood provisionally, on the side of the opinion of the latter.

In brief, the information that it provides is so vast that it can hardly be situated before the beginning of the 4th century A.D.

E. Postcanonical Literature.

The author would have been neither Indian nor a scholar if he had not been impassioned by the folklore of his region, the prose and verse biographies of the Buddha Śākyamuni, the tales of previous existences and the innumerable legends current in his time, legends that the Chinese Tripitaka grouped into the Section of previous facts (pen-yuan) from which É. Chavannes judiciously chose for his fine work Contes et apologues du Tripitaka chinois. In contrast to Vasubandhu, Saṃgharakṣa, Asaṅga, boring because of their technicality, the author excels in mingling the playful and the serious, without retreating at times in the face of the more spicy stories.

It goes without saying that these legends are without a country of origin. But it is quite natural that the author would have leaned preferentially on the folklore of his own region.

Among the Jātakas that he preferred are the tales where the future Buddha "sacrificed his body, his flesh, his head, his eyes, his marrow and his skull to his enemy" (p. 143F, 691F, 716F, 750F, 945F, 983F, 1654F, 1712F, 502c, 606b, 624c). These stories concern events situated by the 'Golden Legend' in north-west India and commemorated by the building of great stūpas which the Chinese pilgrims such as Fa-hien in about 630 did not fail to visit.

At Nagarahāra (Jelāl-ābād), Śākyamuni received the prediction of the Buddha Dīpaṃkara after having offered him seven blue lotuses and having spread his hair under his feet (p. 248F, 284F, 983F). – At Puṣkarāvātī (Shāh-Ḍheti), Śibi made the gift of his eyes to a beggar. – At Varṣapura (Shāhbāzgarhī), Sudinna or Viśvantara gave to an insatiable brahmin his white elephant, his kingdom, his chariot, his wife and his children (p. 713-714F, 304c). – At Mingora-Butkara), the bhikṣu Kṣhāntivādin gave himself up without complaint to the blows of king Kali (p. 264F, 889-990F, 1670F). – At Mahāvana (Sounigrām), the dethroned king Sarvada, wishing to give alms although he had no money, gave himself up to a beggar who then delivered him to the usurper and so obtained a great reward (p. 714-715F). – At Masūrasaṃghārāma (Goumbatai, near Tousak in the Bouner), the brahmacārin Dharmarakṣa or Dharmatrāta, in order to obtain a Buddhist verse, agreed to write it down using his skin as paper, one of his bones as pen and his blood as ink (p. 975-976F). – At Girārai, on the boundary between Peshāwār and Bouner, king Śibi, at the cost of pounds of his own flesh, rescued a pigeon chased by a falcon (p. 255-260F, 1713F, 304c, 314c). – In the Upper Indus, the Bodhisattva gave his body to a starving tigress about to devour her cubs (p. 143F, 723F, 979F). - At Kāpiśī (Bāmiyān), the Bodhisattva let himself be flayed by hunters and devoured by insects in order to remain faithful to his vows (p. 853-855F).

The least that can be said is that the geography of the north-west plays a large part in the Traité. It places among the populated and wealthy cities of its time the city of Puṣkarāvati (Prāṅg, Chārsadda and Rājar), the former Peukelaotis of the Greeks identified by them with Artemis, the tutelary goddess of the city, but which, at the time, belonged to the Ta Yue-tche (p. 172F, 672F). It mentions the miraculous healing of a leper by the bodhisattva Samantabhadra at Haḍḍa (near Jelāl-ābād) at the monastery of Buddhhoṣṇīṣa. It was familiar with the large Himalayan lakes of Anavatapta (p. 206F, 450F, 466F, 290b, 481a) and Mandākini (p. 466F), and for it, the great rivers of India are not only the Ganges, the Yamunā, the Sasabhū, the Aciravatī and the Mahī listed in the canonical sources (p. 266a), but also, and in particular, the northern rivers - the Ganges, Sindhu (Indus), Vakṣu (Oxus) and Sītā (Tarim) which flow out of Lake Anavatapta by the Mouths of the elephant, ox, horse and lion respectively (p. 385F, 450F, 290b, 348b, 611c).

As will be seen from the notes (incomplete, alas) appended to the French translation, the author of the Traité has taken the stories and apologies with which his explanation is sprinkled from an enormous mass of documents. Among the postcanonical sources that he preferred, the following texts may be mentioned: the Aśokasūtra and the Aśokāvadāna from which he borrowed the avadāna of the gift of earth (p. 723F, 277a, 301b), the story of Vītaśoka (p.1263-1264F) and probably also the macabre adventure of the man whose limbs were replaced by those of a corpse and who ended up doubting whether he still belonged to the world of the living (p. 738-740F); the Avadānaśataka from which was taken the deed of the future Śākyamuni who praised the Buddha Puṣya with a single stanza for seven days and seven nights (p. 253-255F, 297F), , the incident of the blind bhikṣu for whom the Buddha threaded a needle (p. 5690570F), 1645-1646) and the jātaka of the deer that sacrificed itself (p. 1651-1652).

Some texts used by the Traité are of an era in which the Buddhist legend about Kaniṣka was already stereotyped and were translated into Chinese at a late date. This was the case particularly for the Tsa-pao-tsang-king (T203), which dedicated four stories to Kaniṣka and was translated only in 472 under the Pei Wei by Ki-kia-ye and T'an-yao. From it the Traité borrows the story of the Kaśmirian arhat K'i-ye-to (Jeyata?) who lived 700 years after the Buddha and who, invited by Kaniṣka, categorically refused to get dressed (p. 879F).

The Kalpanāmaṇḍikā by Kumāralāta, considered by the Chinese to be the teacher of Harivarman, also dedicates two stories to emperor Kaniṣka. It was translated, or rather adapted, only in the 5th century by Kumārajīva who named it Sūtrālaṃkāraśāstra and attributed it to Aśvaghōṣa (T 201). The Traité, without ever designating it by name, borrows from it a good dozen stories as though they were autonomous avadānas: the artist from Puṣkarāvati (p. 672-674F); the outcaste Nītha converted by the Buddha (p. 1634F, 310a); the monastic quarrels at Kauśambī (p. 896-898F); king Aśoka and the monk who exhaled a sweet perfume (p. 695-698F); the Buddha disowns Śāriputra (p. 1526F); the Buddha and the cowherds (p. 146-153F); the Śibijātaka (p. 255-260F); Jyotiṣka and Śrīgupta (p. 184F, 1634F); Gautamī's nirvāna (p. 587F); the white six-tusked elephant (p. 716-718F); the bodhisattva deer-king (p. 972-975); the bodhisattva king who gave himself up to his enemy (p. 714F); the Dharma teacher who condemned the brahmanical institutions (p. 489-492F).²⁹

By their number and their precision often pushed to the point of being literal, these borrowings prove irrefutably that the author of the Traité is post-Kaniṣka and, consequently, he cannot be dated in the first or second centuries of our era as has been generally done.

F. Heretical Literature.

The Traité – and this is new proof of its Indian origin – is familiar with the religions and the philosophical systems which at that time swarmed all over the north-west of India. For its author, whoever is not a 'son of the Śākyas' is a heretic (īrthika) and, in its general meaning, he includes all wandering monks (parivrājaka) of poorly defined jurisdiction, Jains (Nirgrantha and Śvetāmbara), brahmins and Hindus, all given to practices condemned by the Buddha (p. 43F, 1409F, 1571F). He is familiar with their 'ninety-six systems' (p. 432F, 1426F, 261a, 325c, 349b, 412b, 581b) and their 'eighteen sacred books' (p. 48F, 92F, 637F, 639F, 1589F). He has read the Vedic literature with its four Vedas and its six Vedaṅgas without, however, neglecting the profane sciences (p. 1623-1624F). He enters into debate at times with those who profess the six brahmanic darśanas, those of the Sāṃkhya (p. 546c) and the Vaiśeṣika (p. 728F, 923F, 1449F). He knows the Hindu iconography and mythology with its great gods like Viṣṇu-Nārāyaṇa, Maheśvara-Śiva, Kumāra, Mahābrahmā the creator, etc., but recognizing in all of them a certain power, he denies any omniscience to them (p. 137-142F, 466F, 562F, 863F). However, he goes so far as to use a Śivaite cosmogony as an argument (p. 835-837F).

It is hard to see how a Chinese or even a Serindian would have been able to be so well-informed about Indian things.

3. THE MAHĀYĀNIST BY CONVICTION

Monk and Abhidharma specialist, the author of the Traité ended up by being converted to the Mahāyāna movement that had already been introduced into the north-west at least three centuries previously.

A. The Mahāyāna.

²⁹ Since this is a borrowing by the Traité from the Kalpanāmaṇḍikā, the hypothesis suggested on p. 490F, n. 1, is completely unfounded.

In contrast to the Vehicle of the śrāvakas in its religious ideal, its philosophical positions and its buddhology, the Mahāyāna constitutes, in fact, a new Path of liberation.

The Bodhisattva Ideal. – The śrāvaka aspired to the state of arhat, personal salvation involving the suppression, the eradication of the passions and some form of awakening (bodhi) or wisdom (prajñā) concerned with the three general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) of things: impermanence, suffering and selflessness. The saint's death is followed by nirvāṇa, the cessation of painful transmigration, the passing from the domain of contingency to that of the unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) Absolute. In order to attain this ultimate goal, the śrāvaka in the yellow robe of the monastic must travel the path to nirvāṇa, the three essential elements of which are morality (śīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā).

This ideal of sainthood clearly defined by the Buddha and his disciples could be pursued, in a strict sense and despite its demands, by monks retreating into solitude or within the confines of monasteries; it was beyond the reach of the lay person living in the world and prey to all the cares of the times. Accustomed to supporting their fellows and, moreover, to furnishing the Community with food, clothing and shelter, the lay people practiced the active virtues resulting from their estate rather than the passive virtues of which the monastics were an example. In literature as in art, there arose the infatuation of the upāsakas and the upāsikās for the Jātakas or stories of previous existences in the course of which the future Buddha Śākyamuni multiplied his actions of generosity, morality, patience, exertion and wisdom, thus giving the measure of his altruistic virtues. It was, therefore, him rather than the stiff and solitary monk that the lay people took as model with the secret hope that by following his example they too would arrive at the state of Buddhahood.

The Mahāyāna came to consecrate these profound aspirations by inviting not only the monastic but also the 'sons and daughters of noble family' to engage in the career of the bodhisattvas, i.e., the future Buddhas.

But the prerogative of the Buddhas is not just sainthood (arhatva) but also the possession of supreme perfect awakening (anuttarāsaṃyaksambodhi), omniscience (sarvajñāna), the awareness of things in all their aspects (sarvākārajñatā) put to the service of all beings.

For the adept who takes up the career of the bodhisattva, there are two crucial moments: i) the production of the mind of bodhi (bodhicittotpāda) by which the bodhisattva promises by solemn vows (prañidhāna) to conquer supreme awakening in order to devote himself to the welfare and happiness of all beings; ii) the attainment of the said awakening (sambodhipratilābha) which transforms him into a Buddha.

A long interval stretches out between these two moments, for the bodhisattva delays his entry into complete nirvāṇa indefinitely in order to practice his salvific activity as long as possible. He actually knows that, once entered into nirvāṇa, he will no longer be able to do anything for anyone. And so, in three, seven or thirty-three incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa), he traverses the ten stages (bhūmi) of his career, accumulating the meritorious actions and practicing the six or ten perfections (pāramitā), namely, generosity (dāna), morality (śīla), patience (kṣānti), exertion (vīrya), meditation (dhyāna), wisdom (prajñā), skillful means (upāyakaśālya), vows (prañidhāna) for sambodhi and the welfare of beings, power (bala) and knowledge (jñāna).

Infinite Multiplication of Buddhas and Bodhisattvas. – While recognizing in the Buddha a series of prerogatives and powers, the śrāvakas kept him on the human plane for a long time. They held him to be the possessor of the sciences and practices, the teacher of gods and humans; they were not aware that once he entered into nirvāṇa, he was invisible to gods and men, leaving them his Dharma as sole inheritance. According to them, the appearance of a Buddha was an exceptional event, as rare as the blossoming of the fig tree, and humanity remains without guide and without counsellor for long periods.

A god 'dead since nirvāṇa', as H. Kern defined it, could be enough for the monastics in the strict sense, but could not satisfy the aspirations of people who urgently required a supreme being, a pantheon of saints, a mythology and a cult. The popularization of the holy Dharma and its penetration into the masses had the result of transforming the wise preceptor of gods and men into a 'God higher than the gods' (devātideva) and to surround him with a crowd of dīi minores et maiores as powerful disciples.

The Hināyāna sects had already upheld this process of sublimation, the Sarvāstivādins by filling the legend of Śākyamuni with marvels, the Mahāsāṃghikas by setting aside his historical career into the domain of fiction. And as the need for efficacious protectors became more urgent, the śrāvakas imagined a compassionate messiah at the side of the transcendent Buddha, the future Buddha Maitreya, and some arhats, immortalized by the needs of the cause, ever ready to fly to the aid of the faithful.

These are but exceptions, and the Mahāyāna did not hesitate in multiplying the Buddhas and bodhisattvas infinitely. Breaking the narrow limits of the ancient cosmology, they imagined an infinite number of universes in the bosom of the cosmos, each ruled over by a Buddha assisted by one or more great bodhisattvas. The Buddha is already in possession of supreme awakening, whereas the great bodhisattvas, those of the tenth bhūmi, are merely 'close to awakening'. Apart from this difference, both Buddha and bodhisattva, inspired by the same loving-kindness, convert beings in the universes belonging to them and often appear simultaneously in multiple forms in different universes.

Śākyamuni, whose historical existence cannot be brought into doubt, will henceforth be seen to have aligned with him and comparable to him peers and emulators in number as many as the sands of the Ganges. He will remain the best known but not the only one. Other Buddhas will be seen to arise, such as Amitabha or Amitāyus reigning in the west over Sukhāvatī, Akṣobhya in the east governing his universe Abhirati, Bhaiṣajyaguru, also in the east, exercising his activity as healer. The most famous bodhisattvas were Maitreya waiting in Tuṣita heaven for the time to succeed Śākyamuni; Avalokiteśvara residing on Mount Potalaka before manifesting in China as the female deity Kouan-yin; Mañjuśrī, the bodhisattva of knowledge who, in various forms, appeared in India, Khotan, Nepal, finally to reside at Wou-t'ai-chen.

Most of these Buddhas and bodhisattvas have no ties with history and are only names; some, however, arise from anonymity to become personages of choice for the Mahāyānists, and the interest devoted to them was so lively that they leap out of legend quivering with life.

In the scholarly mind, they are, above all, symbols of universal wisdom and compassion. The Buddhas are identical in their essential body (dharmakāya), identified with the truth discovered and preached by them. They are enthroned in the paradises, surrounded by gods and saints whom they delight with their enjoyment bodies (sambhogakāya). They send down below representatives of themselves, emanated bodies (nirmāṇakāya) preaching the Dharma and converting beings. This salvific work is that of the truth that leads to the end of suffering, to detachment, to peace.

The twofold non-existence of beings and things. – Faithful to the teachings of Śākyamuni, the śrāvakas had proclaimed the non-existence of the individual (pudgalanairātmya); the Mahāyānists, by a later step, further professed the non-existence of things (dharmanairātmya).

Belief in the self (satkāyadr̥ṣṭi) is the most pernicious of errors because it plants as a root in the mind all kinds of desire, the cessation of which is the condition sine qua non of liberation. Śrāvaka and Mahāyānist agree in condemning the belief in a self (ātmagrāha) and the belief in mine (ātmīyagrāha): whatever the names they use to designate them, the soul, the living being, the person, the individual, the agent, does not exist; men, saints, bodhisattvas and Buddhas are only names corresponding to nothing substantial.

But if the śrāvakas were the first to deny the self, they did recognize some sort of reality in things. The great schools of the Sarvāstivādins and the Sautrāntikas prepared long or short lists of conditioned things (saṃskṛtadharmas), i.e., resulting from causes (pratītyasamutpanna) – material entities, minds and mental events, formations dissociated from mind and matter – having only momentary or infinitesimal duration, but nevertheless possessing a self-nature (svabhāva) and specific characteristics (lakṣaṇa): short-lived and transitory, but nevertheless realities.

For the Mahāyānists, on the other hand, dharmas, as arising from causes, do not exist in themselves; they are empty of self nature (svabhāvasūnya) and empty of specific characteristics (lakṣaṇasūnya).

Three corollaries follow from this emptiness:

- i) Dharmas are unborn and are not destroyed, for empty things arising from empty things are unborn. Being unborn, they are never destroyed.
- ii) Dharmas, being without production or destruction, are peaceful or ‘nirvāṇic’ from the beginning, nirvāṇa being none other than peace.
- iii) Dharmas, being without exception peaceful and nirvāṇic, are all equal and involve no duality.

This is why the Mahāyāna adept, the bodhisattva, does not grasp them and, as the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā says (p. 146F), if he does not grasp them, it is due to their absolute purity, namely, non-production, non-manifestation, non-activity, non-existence (anupalambha).

It follows that the four truths preached at Benares by Śākyamuni need a new interpretation. The Buddha said: “All phenomena of existence are suffering”, but these phenomena do not exist. He said: “The origin of suffering is desire”, but suffering is unborn. He said: “There is a cessation of suffering, nirvāṇa”, but as suffering in unborn, nirvāṇa is acquired by rights, and saṃsāra, painful transmigration, coincides with it. Finally he said: “The eightfold Path leads to the cessation of suffering”, but as suffering is not to be destroyed, the path to its cessation has already been traversed.³⁰

Face with the emptiness of beings and things, the attitude of the sage is to do nothing, to say nothing, to think nothing: that is the secret of peace.

Emptiness. – Some western interpreters have wanted to see in emptiness (śūnyatā) an absolute negation, but when the Mahāyānists say that beings and things are empty, they attribute no nature to them. They refuse to hypostatize an emptiness that is nothing other than what is (akimcid), a ‘simple non-existence’ (abhāvamātra). It is not by virtue of an emptiness that beings and things are empty; they are empty because they are not. The very notion of emptiness is only a provisional expedient: it is a raft that one abandons after having crossed over the river, a medicine that one rejects after being cured. This is why the Mahāyānists are not nihilists: nihilists deny what they see; Mahāyānists, not seeing anything, affirm nothing and deny nothing.³¹

Truth of appearance and absolute truth. – An objection naturally arises in the mind: on the one hand, the Mahāyāna nourishes the high ideal of goodness and multiplies the Buddhas and bodhisattvas who are its protagonists; on the other hand, it affirms the non-existence of beings and the emptiness of dharmas. Of the two things, either the Buddhas and bodhisattvas convert beings or else nobody converts anybody.

The Mahāyānists themselves posed this objection and found an answer to it in the theory of the twofold truth: the conventional or provisional truth (saṃvṛtisatya) and the absolute truth (paramārthasatya). Without living a daily life according to the customary norms, one does not grasp the true nature of things (dharmatā); but this is what must be understood in order to reach the goal. It is indispensable at the start to bow to conventions because they are the means of reaching nirvāṇa in the same way that someone who wants to empty out water first needs to get a vessel.

At the beginning of his career, the still partially awakened bodhisattva who sees beings and perceives things, must practice normally the virtues of his level: practicing generosity, observing discipline, maintaining patience, concentrating the mind, and awakening wisdom. That is the mundane and provisional way of practicing the virtues.

But when his mind has opened to the absolute truth, when he has penetrated the twofold emptiness of beings and things, he raises the same virtues to the rank of perfections (pāramitā). Conforming to the nature of things, he gives by making no further distinction between donor, recipient and the thing given; he observes discipline by identifying sin with merit; he is patient in considering suffering as non-existent; he is energetic by making no physical effort; he concentrates his mind by identifying concentration with distraction; he is wise by abstaining from opposing error and truth. In a word, the goal of the bodhisattva’s career is the stopping of all speech and all practice (sarvavāḍacaryoccheda) and, as this non-activity corresponds to reality, it assures the welfare of beings more effectively than a feverish activity inspired by false prejudice.

By accepting from the point of view of the truth of appearance that which he rejects from the point of view of the absolute truth and vice versa, the Mahāyānist stays equidistant between affirmation and negation, between the view of existence and that of non-existence: he is established in the Middle Way (madhyamā pratipad), sheltered from all criticism.

B. The Mahāyānasūtras.

The new ideas found their expression in the Mahāyānasūtras, also called Vaipulyasūtras, ‘Texts of Lengthy Development’, which spread in India about the time of our era, five centuries after the Parinirvāṇa.

The Traité gives some second-hand information on the genesis of this literature:

1. Having appeared in the east, immediately after his awakening the Buddha Śākyamuni preached publicly to the śrāvakas the famous Sermon at Benares dealing with the four Noble Truths. A little later, at Rājagṛha on Gṛdhrakūṭaparvata, he taught the Prajñāpāramitā, soon followed by other Mahāyānasūtras, to a chosen assembly of bodhisattvas and eminent śrāvakas such as Ānanda, Śāriputra and Subhūti. This last revelation remained unknown to the ordinary public and the śrāvakas had no knowledge of it, but the gods who heard it from the heavens uttered cries of joy and affirmed having been present at the second turning of the Wheel of Dharma (dvitīyaṃ dharmacakrapravartanam) (p. 517a).
2. After the Buddha’s death, Mahākaśyapa gathered a great council at Rājagṛha, and a thousand arhats compiled the texts of the Hīnayāna Tripiṭaka (p. 90-106F). Also, but in another place, on Mount Vimalasabhāva as it will be told later, the great bodhisattvas Mañjuśrī and Maitreya, taking Ānanda with them, compiled the Mahāyāna. But Ānanda, knowing deeply the aspirations and behavior of beings, did not preach the Mahāyāna to the śrāvakas who were incapable of understanding (p. 938-941F; 756b).
3. Conforming to a prediction, after the Buddha’s Parinirvāṇa, the Prajñāpāramitā, the first in the list of Mahāyānasūtras, came from the east to the south, from the south to the west, without, it would seem, meeting much success (p. 25F, 541b).
4. Finally, in the five hundred years after the Parinirvāṇa, it reached the north (uttarapatha) where there were many believers (p. 25F):

“This Prajñāpāramitā, in the north, will do the Buddha’s work. Here is the reason: when the Buddha was in this world, he was able to cut the doubts of the Saṃgha: the Buddhadharma prospered and there was no fear that it might disappear. But five hundred years after the Buddha’s Parinirvāṇa, the holy Dharma gradually, and from then on the work of the Buddha has been menaced. Then beings of keen faculties (tīkṣṇendriya) will study and meditate [the Prajñāpāramitā]; they will make offerings of flowers and perfumes to it. Beings of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya) will transcribe it and also offer flowers and perfumes. These two types of beings finally will find salvation... This profound Prajñāpāramitā will spread afar in the northern region. Indeed, among all the regions of Jambudvīpa, the north is the vastest. Furthermore, the Snow Mountains (Himālaya) are there and since it is cold, its plants can destroy the passions [of desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and ignorance (moha). As a result of the grains that are eaten, these three poisons have no great virulence. For this reason, people are gentle, their faith is steady and their faculties are powerful. Because of all that, in the north those who practice the Prajñāpāramitā are numerous.” (p. 26F, 531b)

And the Traité is kind enough to comment on a passage in the Prajñāpāramitasūtras that tells the circumstances in which the bodhisattva Sadāprarudita found a manuscript of the Prajñā written on gold leaf with molten beryl and sealed with seven seals at Gandhāra in the city of Gandhavatī (in Chinese Tchong-hiang-ti or Miao-hiang-ti) (p. 744a).

By adopting these legends among so many others, by considering these predictions as long realized, the author reveals once more his connections with the north-west and his relatively late date. It goes without saying that his Sarvāstivādin colleagues rejected all these Mahāyānasūtras as apocryphal and refused to consider them. Hence certain comments of the author, not free of bitterness: “You do not believe in the Mahāyāna, you reject the proof and you claim that only the śrāvaka system has value” (p. 1698F); “This is a big mistake, for the Mahāyānasūtras are the true Buddhadharma, uttered from the very mouth of the Buddha. You must not reject them. Besides, you take your origin from the Mahāyāna” (p. 293F); or also: “It is true that your Kātyāyanīputra expresses himself in that way and that is indeed why he is called the son of Kātyāyanī; if he were really a Śākyaputrīya, he would not say that” (p. 1697F).

In commenting on the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, the Traité does not draw its explanations solely from the Prajñā literature, but calls upon all the Mahāyānasūtras known at that time, the production of which extended over almost three centuries. It cites them abundantly but most often does not mention their titles. For this reason, I [Lamotte] have not been able to make a complete list of them. Since the Indian originals were never dated, I [Lamotte] have adopted a chronological order here based, for want of anything better, on the dates of the first Chinese translations of them.

From this list, incomplete as it is, it may be seen that the author of the Traité used the Mahāyānasūtras originally appearing in India over three centuries which had been translated into Chinese between 179 and 503A.D. At that time, these sūtras seem to have been independent publications and were not yet incorporated into vast collections like those of the Prajñā, the Avataṃsaka, the Ratnakūṭa or the Mahāsaṃnipāta.

C. The Madhyamaka.

Presenting themselves as the word of the Buddha, the Mahāyānasūtras do not have to justify their teachings: they proceed with categorical statements (more negative than affirmative) and only by way of exception do they sketch out any proof. From the philosophical point of view, they insist on the twofold emptiness of beings and of things and try to inculcate in their readers the ‘conviction that dharmas do not arise’ (anutpattikadharmakṣānti) with all its consequences. From the religious point of view, they turn the spotlight on certain Buddhas, certain bodhisattvas: Akṣobhya is the preference of the Prajñāpāramitās, Samantabhadra of the Pratyutpannasamādhis, Amitabhā of the Sukhāvātīyūhas, Vajrapāṇi of the Tathāgataguhyas, etc.

At one time the need was felt to condense the teachings of the Mahāyānasūtras. This was the work of the first Mādhyamika ‘philosophers of the Middle’ and partisans of emptiness (śūnyavāda), Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva and Rāhulabhadra. In technical perfect Sanskrit in the manner of Āśvaghoṣa, they wrote opuscles as memorial verses (kārikā).

The goal of Nāgārjuna and his disciple Āryadeva is to reduce to the absurd (prasaṅga) the realist and pluralist views of the philosophical systems current at their time, notably Sarvāstivādin Buddhism, brahmanical Sāṃkhya and Vaiśeṣika. They show that the facts or basic categories of the old Buddhism escape any preaching: existence, non-existence, existence and non-existence, neither existence nor non-existence, and that affirmation or negation of any proposition whatsoever necessarily involves the negation or affirmation of its opposite. Avoiding the extreme views, refusing to make any categorical statement on a defined subject, following a “Middle Path”, these authors escape from all criticism. More a mystic than philosopher, Rāhulabhadra dedicated to Prajñāpāramitā a hymn that was greatly appreciated by the Indians. All the information that could be desired on the life of Nāgārjuna, his works, his supposed relationship with Kaniṣka and the Śātavāhanas may be found in Venkata Ramanan’s work, Nāgārjuna’s Philosophy as presented in the Mahā-Prajñāpāramitā-Śāstra, 1966. Here I [Lamotte] will limit myself to documenting a passage from the Si-yu-tche ‘Description of the Western Lands’ by Tao-che Tao-ngan (312-385) reproduced in the Fa-yuan-tchou-lin by Tao-che (T 2122, k. 38, p. 589a).³⁴ To my knowledge [Lamotte], it is the oldest mention of Nāgārjuna; it has him living five hundred year after the Parinirvāṇa, but contrary to most later sources, it places him, not in Dakṣiṇakosala or Vidarbha, but in northern Kosala (capital Śrāvastī) and in the kingdom of Kāśī (Benares) which, at the time of the Buddha, was governed by king Prasenajit:

The Si-yue-tche says: “There is a large stūpa on the sea-shore five hundred li east of king Prasenajit’s capital. Within this big stūpa there is a small stūpa twelve feet high, adorned with precious ornaments; each night there is a flash of light like great fire. It is said that five hundred years after the Parinirvāṇa of the Buddha, the bodhisattva Nāgārjuna went into the ocean to convert a nāgarāja. The nāgarāja offered this precious stūpa to Nāgārjuna who then made a gift of it to this kingdom. The king then built a large stūpa to enclose the small one. For ages, people in search of a favor come there to prostrate themselves, burn incense and offer flowery parasols. These flowery parasols rise by themselves into the air, spin about and gradually ascend. After each night, they disappear without anyone knowing their whereabouts.

The Si-yu-tche says: “In the kingdom of Vāraṇasī (Benares), the bodhisattva Nāgārjuna built seven hundred stūpas and following that, the stūpas built by worldly people and the saints were innumerable. Just on the banks of the river Tcha-lien (for Ni-lien-tchan-na = Nairāṇjana), more than a thousand stūpas were built; every five hundred years (pañcavarṣa), a great free assembly is convened.”

It was Kumārajīva who who made known the works of the first Madhyamikas in China. Among other texts, he translated, during the 6th hong-che year (404), the second part of the Śatakaśāstra by Āryadeva with commentary by Vasu (T 1659) and, during the 11th hong-che year (409), the Madhyamakaśāstra by Nāgārjuna with commentary by Piṅgala (T1564),³⁵ two works known to and cited by the author of the Traité.

1. He took his inspiration mainly from Nāgārjuna’s Madhyamakaśāstra from which he reproduces many extracts sometimes by mentioning the title (p. 69F, 1142F, 1609-1620F, 338c), sometimes without naming it (p. 36F, 45-46F, 72F, 396-397F, 922F, 1204-1207F, 1436F, etc.).³⁶ He refers twice (p. 36F, 1638F) to the well-known dedicatory kārikā where Nāgārjuna summarizes his doctrine in a series of eight ‘No’s’: Anirodham anutpādam, etc.

³⁵ Cf. the preface by T’an-ying, T 2145, k. 11, p. 77b8-9; K’ui-yuan, T 2154, k. 4, p. 513a6.

2. He knows the ‘Centuries’ by Āryadeva and refers to it at least once (p. 1370F) by simply mentioning the title of one of its chapters, the Ātmapratishedhaprakaraṇa (see below, p. 1370-1375F as note).

3. He cites almost in its entirety the Prajñāpāramitāstotra by Rāhulabhadra whom the Chinese tradition unanimously gives as disciple of Āryadeva, himself the disciple of Nāgārjuna.³⁷

From these investigations we may conclude that the author is later than the first Mādhyamikas and should not be identified with Nāgārjuna the author of the Madhyamakāśāstra. If, as Kumārajīva has it, the real Nāgārjuna was born 880 years after the Buddha’s Parinirvāṇa which he fixes at the 15th year of king Siang, cyclic kia-chen order (637 B.C.), that is, in 243 A.D., the author of the Traité who knew the disciples and the grand-disciples of Nāgārjuna could hardly have been active before the beginning of the 4th century of our era.

Here, in its main features, is the picture that emerges from his work. A native of the north-west and steeped in his Indian nationality, he became a monastic in some monastery of Kaśmir-Gandhāra of Sarvāstivādin persuasion. He devoted himself passionately to the study of the Tripiṭaka and specialized in the Śatpādābhidharma and its various Vibhāṣās. He acquired such mastery of them that he was probably in charge of teaching them. Devoured by curiosity, he showed a pronounced taste for reading and soon the golden legend of Buddhism which was flourishing in the north-west no longer held any secrets for him. He did not, however, dissociate himself from the heretics with whom he was in close contact on their alms-rounds: he had a sufficient rather than schematic acquaintance with Vedic literature, of the Brahmanic systems, especially the Sāṃkhya and Vaiśeṣika, as well as the Hindu doctrines (Śivaism and Viṣṇuism). He took part in internal debates between the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikas and the Dārṣṭāntika-Sautrāntikas of Kumāralāta and did not hide his preference for the former.

But already, almost three centuries ago, the Mahāyānist movement had taken root in the north-west where it found favor with sons and daughters of good family. Accustomed to the routine of community life and intellectually tired, most of the Sarvāstivādin monks had but little interest in the new ideas that troubled their mental security and modified their customs. Our author was of a different nature. Becoming progressively more familiar with the Mahāyānasūtras that were published, becoming familiar with the mode of reasoning of a Nāgārjuna or a Deva, he thought he had discovered the ‘true nature of things’ and resolutely became a Mahāyānist. Such a turnabout did not provoke any moral or intellectual crisis in him. Convinced of the advantages of the monastic life, not for a moment did he think of leaving (hīṃyāvarte) it to return to lay life. His Buddhist faith was in no way shaken since he remained faithful to the Word of the Buddha ‘such as it was in the Sūtra and appeared in the Vinaya’ and, although he adhered preferentially to the sūtras of profound meaning, supramundane and associated with emptiness, he was aware of ‘not straying from the true nature of things’, but on the contrary, of staying even closer to it.

When he compared the fantasy and exaggerations of the texts of lengthy development with the tidy and methodical texts of the Tripiṭaka, his sense of moderation was not offended, but the uneasiness that he felt did not prevent him from discovering in the new literature a fire and heat lacking in the old literature. When this Abhidharma teacher examined the sibylline kārikās of a Nāgārjuna or a Deva closely, not only could he admire their precision and their terseness but he had to notice, on his own part that, compared with the enormous production of Kātyāyanīputra and the Kaśmir arhats, these opuscles, which did not even reach five hundred verses, were rather lightweight.

This is why he undertook to compose, in the form of a commentary on the Mahāyānaprajñāpāramitāsūtra, an exegetical treatise that would be the Mahāyānist replica of the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma.

According to a well-ordered plan which, however, never appears in the divisions adopted by successive editions, he transposes the Prajñā into early times by citing old canonical sūtras on every page and by evoking numerous individuals borrowed from Śākyamuni’s following. In this way, mixing the old and the new, he reveals, according to the fortunate phrase of Hiuan-tsang, a Sthavira-Mahāyāna. On the questions discussed, he begins by explaining, with complete objectivity, the opinions of the Sarvāstivādin masters; then he moves on to criticize them, frequently but not always, by taking his inspiration from two or three skillfully introduced and clearly explained Nāgārjunian kārikās.

In his work, the explanation of the Abhidharmic theories occupies ten times more space than their refutation for, to his eyes, the Abhidharma in which he had specialized is in no way without pertinence: actually, it comes under conventional truth (saṃvṛtisatya) which makes its presence felt by everyone in daily life and serves as a stepping-stone to reach the truth. But it fades and vanishes in the light of the absolute truth (paramārthasatya), before the ‘true nature of dharmas’, an expression rendered in Chinese by the four characters Tchou-fa-che-siang. For the sake of being literal, I [Lamotte] have usually restored it as sarvadharmāṇām bhūtalakṣaṇam, but in Kumārajīva’s translations, it may have, as its Indian correspondent, dharmalakṣaṇa, tattva, bhūtanaya and, most frequently, dharmatā. The expression is not very frequent in the Chinese version of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā (T 223, p. 231b, 244a, 257b, 392a, 416c) and appears only once in the Chinese kārikās of the Madhyamakāśāstra (T 1564, p. 24a). In turn, the true nature of things is the pivotal axis of the entire philosophy of the Traité. Evoked as early as the opening stanzas, it is trotted out obsessively throughout the entire work (p. 3, 15, 18, 45, 49, 51, 53 68, 131, 150, 156, 159, 213, 239, 298, 322, 327, 338, 340, 355, 399, 400, 439, 481, 500, 593, 677, 700, 708, 710, 769, 839, 902, 915, 916, 918, 924, 925, 926, 928, 929, 950, 954, 969, 1019, 1045, 1047, 1054, 1059, 1060, 1083, 1105, 1106, 1107, 1110, 1112, 1142, 1165, 1190, 1204, 1229, 1231, 1232, 1245, 1253, 1261, 1278, ³⁶ In his introduction to the Suvikrāntavikrāmin, p. LXX, R. Hikata notes several Nāgārjunian stanzas in T 1509 that have escaped me [Lamotte]: p. 61b11-12 = XVIII, 7; p. 64c9-10 = XVII, 20; p. 96c13-14 = XVIII, 7; p. 97b = I, 1 (anirodham anutpāda...); p. 107a13-14 = XV, ii.

This true nature, if one may say so, is undefinable by definition, for, being nothing whatsoever, it transcends any category of mind. It suffices to reproduce here the paraphrase that will be given below on p. 1501F: “The true nature of dharmas is unborn and unceasing, neither defiled nor purified, neither existent nor non-existent, ever peaceful, perfectly pure, like space undefinable, inexpressible; it is the cessation of all the paths of discourse; it surpasses the domain of all minds and mental events; it is like nirvāṇa: this is the Dharma of the Buddhas.”

We must be careful not to apostatize it as a negative Absolute, for emptiness is valid only as method of argument and has nothing to do with a metaphysical principle: “The person who produces the view of emptiness I declare to be incurable. I am not surprised that a person is attached to a view of the self as great as Mount Sumeru and I do not blame him. But if a fool is attached to a view of emptiness, be it as small as the sixteenth part of a hair, that I cannot allow.”

By means of his constant recourse to bhūtalakṣaṇa as criterion of the truth, the author of the Traité carves out for himself a place in the philosophy of the Middle.

The Taisho Index no. 13, p. 342-344, has prepared a list of the bodhisattvas mentioned in the Traité which contains more than 60 names, of which 22 are directly borrowed from the nidāna of the Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā (p. 428F). The author has a high opinion of the bodhisattvas and dedicates no less than six chapters to them (VIII to XIII) where he dwells at length on their qualities and their prerogatives. But his admiration bears upon the bodhisattva in abstracto rather than on any one bodhisattva in particular. He reveals himself to be a philosopher rather than a devotee.

Nāgārjuna’s Madhyamaakaśāstra aroused lively interest and was commented upon at least eight times: by Nāgārjuna himself (which is doubtful), Buddhapālita, Bhavya, Candrakīrti, Devaśarman, Guṇaśrī, Gunamati and Sthiramati. On the other hand, the Traité went unnoticed in India. Candrakīrti himself, the best commentator on the Madhyamakaśāstra in the 7th century, does not seem to have had any suspicion of its existence or, if he was aware of it, he did not rank it among the main works of Nāgārjuna. In a Madhyamakaśāstrastuti the original Sanskrit of which was found by G. Tucci,³⁸ he notes in stanza 10 only eight Nāgārjunian works:

1) Sūtrasamuccaya (T 635; Tib. 5330).³⁹

2) Parikathā Ratnāvalī = Rāja-parikathā-ratnāvalī (Tib. 5658).

3) Samstuti = Catuḥstava: Nirauḥpamyastava (Tib. 2011). Lokātīastava (Tib. 2012), Cittavajrastava (Tib. 2013), Paramārthastava (Tib. 2014).

4) Śāstragaditāḥ kārīkāḥ = Madhyamakaśāstra.

5) Yuktyākhyā ṣaṣṭikā = Yuktiṣaṣṭikā (Tib. 5225).

³⁸ In Oriens Extremus, IX, 1962, p. 47-56

³⁹ On the authenticity of this work, see J. Filiozat, Śikṣāsamuccaya et Sūtrasamuccaya, JA, 1964, p. 473-478.

6) Vidalā = Vaidulyasūtra (Tib. 5226) and Vaidulyaprakaraṇa (Tib. 5230).

7) Śūnyatāsaptati (Tib. 5227).

8) Vigrahasya... vyāvartanī = Vigrahavyāvartanī (Tib. 5228).

The Tibetan historians Bu-ston (I, p. 51F) and Taranātha (p. 302F) will be inspired by this list in their accounts of Nāgārjuna.

On the other hand, rather quickly and, in any case, as early as the 7th century, India retained no memory of the *Traité*⁴⁰ and the fact that it was saved from oblivion is due to Kumārajīva.

III. THE CHINESE TRANSLATION OF THE TRAITÉ

Kumārajīva (344-409 or 413), assisted by his disciples Seng-jouei (352-436) and Seng-tchao (384-414)⁴¹ as well as a group of Chinese scholars, translated at Tch’ang-ngan four works of Madhyamaka inspiration that he wrongly or rightly attributed to the bodhisattva Nāgārjuna:

1) Ta-tche-tou-louen = Mahāprajñāpāramitopadeśa (T 1509) between the summer of 402 and the 1st of February 406, with preface by Seng-jouei.

2) Che-eul-men-louen = Dvadaśanikāyaśāstra or Dvādaśamukhaśāstra (T 1568) in 408-409, with preface by Seng-jouei.

3) Tchong-louen = Madhyamakaśāstra (T 1564) in 409-410, with preface by Seng-jouei.

4) Che-tchou-p’i-cha-louen = Daśabhūmikavibhāṣāśāstra (T1521), at an undetermined date.⁴²

In the prefaces and colophons attached to these translations, there are some indications about the very circumstances of the translation, the date and the life of Nāgārjuna as they were imagined at Tch’ang-ngan at the beginning of the 5th century.

1. KUMĀRAJĪVA’S TRANSLATION

⁴⁰ Hiuan-tsang certainly knew the existence of it, but beyond his stay in India between 629 and 645, he collected no information on this subject.

⁴¹ Biographies of Kumārajīva and Seng-jouei in J. Nobel, Kumārajīva, Sitzungsberichte der preuss. Akad. d. Wissens, XX, 1927, p. 206-233. On Kumārajīva, see also Kao Seng Tchouan, transl. R. ⁴² The attribution of this text to Nāgārjuna is discussed among Japanese scholars: cf. A. Hirakawa, L’auteur du Daśabhūmikavibhāṣāśāstra, Jour. Indian and Buddhist Studies, V, 1957, p. 176-180; R. Hikata, Introduction to Suvikrāntavikrāmin, p. 52, 55, 73, 74.

The translation of the Traité went hand in hand with that of the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra (T 332) of which the Traité is a commentary. The documentation of these two texts has been gathered and critiqued by P. Demiéville⁴³ with his customary skill, and I [Lamotte] largely take my inspiration from his work.

Information taken from the colophon of the Ta-tchen-tou-louen (T 1409, k. 100, p. 756c, or T 2145, k. 10, p. 75b):

The dharmācārya Kumārajīva came to Tch'ang-ngan in the year 3 of the hong-che period of the Ts'in, sin-tch'eou cyclic order, the 20th day of the 12th moon (February 8, 402). During the summer of the 4th year (402), at Si-men-t'ang 'Pavilion of the Western Gate' of the Siao-yao-yuan 'Pleasure Park', he published this Che-louen (Upadeśa, T 509) for the emperor [Yao] Hing. The translation was finished on the 27th day of the 12th moon of the 7th year (February 1, 406).⁴⁴ During this period he also published:

1. the King-pen 'Sūtra Text',⁴⁵
2. the Tch'an-king 'Dhyāna Sūtra',⁴⁶
3. the Kiai-liu 'Vinaya',⁴⁷
4. the Po-louen 'Treatise in a century',⁴⁸
5. the Tch'an-fa-yao-kiai 'Summary explanation of the method of Dhyāna',⁴⁹ consisting of almpst 500,000 yen 'words or syllables'.

⁴³ Account in Journal Asiatique, 1950, p. 375-395.

⁴⁴ Compare the Tch'ou (T 2145, k. 2, p. 11a16): The Ta-tche-louen in 100 kiuan was translated at Suan-yao-yuan; it is sometimes divided into 70 kiuan. – Li-tai (T 2034, k. 8, p. 78c18: The Ta-tche-tou-louen in 100 kiuan is the work of the bodhisattva Nāgārjuna. It was translated during the 5th moon of the 6th year of the hong-che period (May 23 or June 23, 404) at Siao-yao-yuan. Seng-jouei did the brush-calligraphy and added the preface. See the Eul-ts'in-lou [catalog compiled between 309 and 415 by Seng-jouei and lost a long time ago]. Kumārajīva says that an integral translation [of the Upadeśa] should have consisted of 1000 scrolls, but he abridged it because of the weakness of mind of the Ts'in. – The K'ai-yuan (T 2154, k. 4, p. 513a4) adopts the date proposed by the colophon.

⁴⁵ This is the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra (T 223) of which the Upadeśa (T 1509) is the exegesis. But in his doctoral thesis. M. Saigura does not see things in this light: "Das Ching p'In ist ein erfundenes Werk, für dessen Existenz wir keinerlei Belege haben, und das aus folgendem Grund nie existiert haben kann." Upon which he launches into mathematical calculations!

⁴⁶ T 614: Tso-tch'an san-mei-king "Sūtra on the practice of Dhyāna and Samādhi", a compilation drawn by Kumārajīva mainly from works of the Indian patriarchs of the Kaśmir school, work begun on February 14, 402 and revised in 407 (cf. P. Demiéville, La Yogācārabhūmi de Saṃgharakṣa, BEFEO, XLIV, 1954, p. 355-356).

⁴⁸ T 1569: Po-louen or Śatakaśāstra by Āryadeva, with commentary by Vasu, translated in 404-405.

With the Che-louen (Upadeśa), this makes up 1,500,000 yen.

The first p'in 'chapter' of the [Che]-louen (Upadeśa) takes up 34 kiuan 'scrolls' [in the Chinese translation] and comments on only a single chapter [of the Sūtra, T 223] entirely.

Also, beginning with the second p'in 'chapter', the dharmācārya [Kumārajīva] abridged the integral text of the [Che]-louen, giving only what is essential, just what is necessary to explain the meaning of the text [of the Sūtra] from then on giving up the completion of the commentary in its full development. Thus he ended up with 100 kiuan 'scrolls' [of translation]. A complete translation would have been ten times as long.⁵⁰

Information taken from the preface by Seng-jouei to the Ta-tche-tou-louen (T 1509, p. 57, or T 2145, k. 10, p. 74c-75b).

Ma-ming (Aśvaghōṣa) was born at the end of the Authentic Dharma (saddharma), and Long-chou (Nāgārjuna) at the end of the Counterfeit Dharma (pratirūpakadharmā)...⁵¹ At the end of the Authentic Dharma it was easy to propagate [the doctrine]; thus Aśvaghōṣa worked directly with the inheritance that had been passed down to him and had only to dust it off. But the end of the Counterfeit Dharma was beset with many troubles; thus Nāgārjuna associated with lay people and taught them to understand things by the gradual path. Moreover, he went to the palace of the Nāgas to borrow the clarity to illuminate wisdom in the quest for the mystery. He dedicated himself to the study of the profound secret in order to exhaust the wonders of the subtle words. Then, taking the text of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra as a basis, he composed this Upadeśa...

He explains the true nature (dharmatā) so that people misled by wrong views are no longer led astray and are corrected. In this Upadeśa, he begins by explaining the views [of the Ābhīdharmikas ?] and mentions the differences in order to exhaust their beauty, but finally he recommends detachment (anabhiniveśa) from all these views as the proper solution. Where the explanation is incomplete, he engages in a discussion to illuminate it; if the discussion does not succeed, he opts for the Middle [Path] (madhyamā pratipad) as the definitive solution...

There is the dharmācārya Kumārajīva who, from an early age, acquired a reputation for insight and wisdom and who now, at a ripe age, enjoys extraordinary renown... He always depended on this Upadeśa.

On the 20th day of the 12th moon of the 3rd year of the hon-che period (Februray 8, 402), he came from Kou-tsang to Tch'ang-ngan. The Ts'in emperor [Yao Hing] for a long time humbly nourished the hope of seeing him and was overjoyed to meet him. In the course of their conversations, they lingered until the end of the day and, by trying to pierce the mystery, they forgot the year's fatigue...

⁵⁰ P. Demiéville, Journal Asiatique, 1950, p. 388.

The emperor gathered the śramaṇas in the capital who were specialists in doctrinal works and ordered scholars learned in criticism of the texts, noblemen, and ministers to assemble in the Siao-yao-yuan pavilion on the shore of the Wei... He personally examined the mysterious document and adjusted the [Chinese] words to the Sanskrit text... When the text of the [Prajñāpāramitā]sūtra (T 223) was established, he went on to the translation of this Upadeśa (T 1509).⁵²

The abridged version of the Upadeśa (in its original Sanskrit text) had 100,000 gāthās each of 32 characters (i.e., 100,000 units of 32 syllables), or a total of 3,200,000 'words' (Sanskrit syllables; for the Chinese, the notions of words and syllables overlap). Taking into account the contrast between Sanskrit and Chinese, the one being complicated and the other concise, he condensed it by two-thirds and thus obtained these 100 kiuan of the Chinese translation. In the 300,000 words of the Ta-tche-[you-louen] (condensed thus into about 300,000 Sanskrit syllables), the sublime meaning of the mysterious paragraphs appeared in full clarity. The complete Sanskrit text is as detailed as that of the first chapter (parivarta); the master of the Dharma abridged it by cutting it because the Chinese love conciseness. If he had translated the entire text, that would have come to at least 1000 kiuan.⁵³

From this somewhat confused information, some conclusions may be drawn:

1) The translation of the Upadeśa began at Tch'an-ngan between May 25 and June 23 of the year 404 and was completed February 1, 406.

2) It went along with the translation of the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra (T 223) of which it is the commentary. But here the evidence differs somewhat.

a. According to the preface by Seng-jouei in T 223, published in the Tch'ou (T 2145, k. 8, p. 53b), the translation of the Sūtra began on the 23rd day of the 4th moon of the 5th hong-che year (May 29, 403) and finished on the 5th day of the 12th moon of the same year (January 13, 404); after which, the Chinese texts were again revised up to the 23rd day of the 4th moon of the following year (May 18, 404).

b. According to the Tch'ou (T 2145, k. 2, p. 10c16) and the K'ai-yuan (T 2154, k. 4, p. 512b4), the translation of the Sūtra began on the 23rd day of the 4th moon of the 5th hong-che year (May 29, 403) and finished on the 23rd day of the 4th moon of the 6th year (May 18, 404).

⁵² However, in his preface to the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra (Tch'ou, T 2145, k. 8, p. 53b13), Seng-jouei states that the text of the sūtra had not been (definitely) fixed until the (translation) of the Upadeśa was finished (cf. P. Demiéville, l. c., p. 383, n. 3).

Demiéville, l. c., p. 383, n. 3).

⁵³ The translation of this paragraph is borrowed from P. Demiéville, l. c., p. 387-388.

3. The Ta-tche-tou-louen (T 1509) is just an incomplete translation of the Indian Upadeśa. The latter, which was divided into chapters (parivarta, p'in),⁵⁴ consisted of 100,000 gāthās or 3,200,000 Sanskrit syllables. A complete translation would have involved 1000 scrolls (kiuan) and 3,200,000 words (yen).

However, Kumārajīva actually translated only nine-tenths and his translation has only 100 scrolls and about 320,000 Chinese characters. This is how he did it:

a. He completely translated the first parivarta of the Indian Upadeśa.

b. He abridged two-thirds of the text of the other parivartas.

The subdivisions of the Ta-tche-tou-louen into chapters (p'in) as well as into scrolls (kiuan) varied considerably in the course of successive editions. In some of the Touen-houang manuscripts they are completely missing.⁵⁵

In the actual Taisho edition, the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra (T 223) consists of 90 chapters in 27 scrolls; the Ta-tche-tou-louen (T 1509) also has 90 chapters, but is divided into 100 scrolls. We may also note that in these two texts the titles of the chapters do not always coincide.

Scrolls 1 to 34 of the Ta-tche-tou-louen (p. 57c-314b) are the complete translation of the first chapter of the Indian Upadeśa; scrolls 36 to 100 of the same Ta-tche-tou-louen (p. 314b-756c) are the abridged translation of the rest of the Upadeśa.

4. Commissioned and supervised by Yao Hing, executed by the Serindian Kumārajīva, critiqued by more than 500 scholars, written down by brush and prefaced by Seng-jouei, the Chinese translation of the Upadeśa was so completely Sinicized that it succeeds in pulling the wool over one's eyes and makes one doubt its Indian origins. What we have said about its author shows that it is an illusion. The Upadeśa is the work of an Indian, but its translators gave it a Chinese flavor and that was the reason for its success.

Many comments and arguments exchanged orally during the course of a work prolonged over two years have passed into the translation either in the form of notes (written at the time in a single column in very tiny characters)⁵⁶ or as pure and simple interpolations.

Quite rightly, R. Hikata has distinguished in the Ta-tche-tou-louen passages that are clearly or probably by Kumārajīva and those that should be or conveniently be attributed to 'Nāgārjuna'.⁵⁷ mahāprajñāpāramitā (p. 1066F), vimokṣa (P. 1291F), samādhi (p. 1487F), ārṣa sthāna (p. 1593F), saṃskāra (p. 696b), etc.

Everyone agrees in attributing to Kumārajīva or to his collaborators explanations of Sanskrit terms with phonetic transcriptions and translations into 'the language of the Ts'in', such as samyaksambuddha (p. 128F0), sugata (p. 131F), lokavid (p. 132), puruṣadāmyasārathi (p. 133), śāstā devamanuṣyānām (p. 135F), buddha (p. 137F), saṃgha (p. 202F), dhāraṇī (p. 317F), Bhadrāpāla and Ratnākara (p. 428), Gaṇḍaka (p. 497), Vipāśyin, Śikhiṇ and Viśvabhu (p. 535F), Kauṣṭhika (p. 637F), pāramitā (p. 701F), Sudinna (p. 713-714), Aśoka (p. 723F), śīla (p. 770F), kṣānti (p. 865F), vīrya (p. 927F), Arbuda and Norarbuda (p. 963F)

Also seeming to be interpolations, some comments on the customs and usages of the T'ien-tchou, capable of being of interest to the Chinese but completely useless to an Indian reader: In India there are two words to designate time, kāla and samaya (p. 76F); it is a custom in India to call anything that is fine, heavenly (divya) (p. 523F); in India it is usually said that some one who has done what had to be done 'has crossed over to the other shore' (p. 702F): in India it is the custom to grasp someone's feet as a sign of respect (p. 847F); the Buddha inhabited the Indian Kingdoms, and in these kingdoms there are always many brāhmins (p. 1267F); Iśana and Varuṇa are at Indra's left and right respectively (p. 1338F); according to the rule of the Indian language, the combining of several syllables forms a word and the combining of several words forms a phrase (p. 380b-c); the Greater Vehicle in the Indian language is called Mahāyāna (p. 394c); the Buddha manifested only 32 lakṣaṇas and 80 anuvyañjanas in order to conform to Indian taste (p. 684b). etc.

But it would be dangerous to see interpolations everywhere: several passages of the Ta-tche-tou-louen may not correspond to the picture that one has, on the basis of late documents,⁵⁸ of a Nāgārjuna 'who was a Brāhmin from the south of India, contemporary with Kaniṣka and a friend of a Śatavāhana', but which may be passages quite natural coming from an author who lived and worked at the beginning of the 4th century in north-western India.

2. NĀGĀRJUNA SEEN FROM TCH'AND-NGAN

If, as I [Lamotte] think, the author of the Upadeśa is different from the author of the Madhyamakaśāstra, the problem of the date of Nāgārjuna loses some of its interest. However, we cannot pass over the information provided by the Tch'ang-ngan school of the 5th century in silence.

As we have seen above, Kumārajīva considered Nāgārjuna to be the author of the Upadeśa, of the Dvādaśanikāya, the Madhyamakaśāstra and the Daśabhūmikavibhāṣā of which he provided the translation.

⁵⁸ For a long time, the West has had at its disposal, as information about Nāgārjuna, only incomplete and late documents: a short summary of the Long-chou-p'ou-sa-tchouan (T 2047) in V. Vassilief, Le bouddhisme, ses dogmes, son histoire et sa littérature, 1865, p. 212-213, Tāranātha's Geshichte des Buddhisma translated by A. Schiefner, 1869, and the Si-yu-ki (T 2087) by S. Beal (1884) and Th. Watters (1904-05). The paucity of documentation explains the tendency of the moderns to exaggerate the importance of some old comments without any geographical and chronological significance. Thus, concerning Kumāralabdha (= Kumāralāta), the founder of the Sautrāntika school, we read in the Si-yu-ki (T 2087, k. 12, p. 942a16-18): "At that time, there was Aśvaghōṣa in the east, Deva in the south, Nāgārjuna in the west and Kumāralabdha in the north; they are called the four suns illuminating the world." And since legend attaches Aśvaghōṣa to Kaniṣka, it has been deduced that the four 'suns' appeared simultaneously in the 1st or the 2nd centuries of our era according to the date that is assigned to Kaniṣka. This is to give too much importance to a comment that is only a stylistic symbol.

But we know that Kumārajīva, who 'forgot small details'⁵⁹, did not look very carefully: perhaps he carelessly attributed Kumāralata's Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā to Aśvaghōṣa.

According to customary usage, he dated Nāgārjuna in post-Nirvāṇa years. In China until the beginning of the 6th century, the birth of Śākyamuni was placed at the 8th day of the 4th moon of the 10th year of King Tchouang (687B. C.).⁶⁰ But Kumārajīva brought a correction to this computation.

In a note dated 568 A. D. in the Eul-kiao-louen by Tao-ngan⁶¹ cited by Tao-siuan (596-667) in his Kouang-hong-ming-tei (T 2103, k. 8, p. 142a18-20), we read:

According to the chronology of the dharmacārya Che (Kumārajīva) and the Che-tchou-ming (inscribed pillar in the Wou-hin region) in agreement with the Springs and Autumns (Chronicles of the Lou principality), the Tathāgata was born on the 5th (correction: the 4th) year of king Houan of the Tcheu, yi-tch'eu cyclic order (716 B.C.). He went forth in the 23rd (correction: 22nd) year of king Houan, kouei-wei cyclic order (698 B.C.). He attained enlightenment in the 10th year of king Tchouang, kin-wou cyclic order (687 B. C.). He entered into nirvāṇa in the 15th year of king Siang, kia-chen cyclic order (637 B. C.): this was 1295 years ago (586 B.C.).

The dating of the Parinirvāṇa in 637 B.C. allows the use of the information provided by Ki-tsang (549-623) on Aśvaghōṣa, Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva and Harivarman in his commentary on the Śatakaśāstra (T 1827), the Madhyamakaśāstra (T 1824) and the Three Treatises (T 1852):

T 1827, k. 1, p. 233a8-14: The teacher [Seng]-jouei, in the preface to the Satyasiddhiśāstra [by Harivman] which he wrote after the death of his teacher Che [Kumārajīva], cites some words of the latter: "After the Buddha's death in the year 350, Ma-ming (Aśvaghōṣa) was born; in 530 Long-chou (Nāgārjuna) was born." He also said: "Aśvaghōṣa illustrated the end of the Authentic Law (saddharma); Nāgārjuna appeared at the beginning of the Counterfeit Law (pratirūpakadharmā)"... [Seng]-tchao and [Seng]-jouei say that T'i-p'o (Āryadeva) was born in the 800th year or later.⁶²

T 1824, k. 1, p. 18b23-25: At what time in the Counterfeit Law (pratirūpakadharmā) was Nāgārjuna born? The master [Seng]-jouei, in his preface to the Satyasiddhiśāstra, cites some words of his teacher Lo-che (Kumārajīva) who says: "Aśvaghōṣa was born in the year 350, and Nāgārjuna was born in the year 530."

⁶¹ This is not the well-known Tao-ngan of the 4th century.

⁶² Information confirmed by Seng-tchao's preface to the Śatakaśāstra by Āryadeva (T 1569, p. 167c12; Tch'ou, T 2145, k. 11, p. 77b12).

T 1852, p. 3c10-14: Once the dharmacārya Lo-che [Kumārajīva], after having translated the Satyasiddhiśāstra,⁶³ asked Seng-jouei to comment on it. After the death of master Kumārajīva, Seng-jouei wrote down his last teachings and composed the preface to the śāstra; he said: “The Satyasiddhiśāstra was composed by Harivarman, the most famous of Kumāralāta’s disciples, a scholar of the Hīnayāna from the land of Ki-pin (Kāśmir) in the 800th year after the Buddha’s Parinirvāṇa.”

As the preface to the Satyasiddhiśāstra has disappeared, it is difficult to verify the sayings of Ki-tsang. But it is wrong that Seng-jouei placed Āsvaghoṣa at the end of the Authentic Law and Nāgārjuna at the beginning of the Counterfeit Law. In his preface to the Ta-tche-tou-louen (T 1509, p. 57a12-13), he says, to the contrary, that Āsvaghoṣa was born at the end of the Authentic Law and Nāgārjuna at the end of the Counterfeit Law, and several lines lower down, (p. 57b13) he refers to the authority of an Indian Chronicle in terms of which Āsvaghoṣa and Nāgārjuna appeared at the end of the Authentic Law and at the end of the Counterfeit Law respectively. The two periods each cover 500 years, so it would follow that the two individuals were separated by about 500 years.

That being so, there is only one way to interpret Kumārajīva’s phrase which puts Āsvaghoṣa at 350 years and Nāgārjuna at 530 years after the Parinirvāṇa. We must understand that Āsvaghoṣa was born at 350 post-nirvāṇa (which gives 637-350 = 287 B.C.) and Nāgārjuna 530 years after Āsvaghoṣa (which gives 637- (350+530) = 243 A.D.).

If we accept these numbers, the Tch’ang-ngan school of the 5th century placed the great masters at the following dates:

637 B.C.: Parinirvāṇa of the Buddha

287 B.C.: Birth of Āsvaghoṣa

243 A.D.: Birth of Nāgārjuna who was followed by Āryadeva

253 A.D.: Publication of the Satyasiddhiśāstra by Harivarman, the disciple of Kumāralāta.

This information probably came from Kāśmir where Kumārajīva had been educated and with which he remained in contact. It may be compared with a passage from the Rājatasāṅgīnī (I, v. 168 and 173) by the Kāśmirian historian Kalhaṇa (12th century) in whose words a bodhisattva of the first bhūmi, the glorious Nāgārjuna, lived at Śaḍarhadvana (Hārvan) in the reigns of the last great Kuṣāṇas, Huṣka (Huviṣka?) and his successors.

Nevertheless, no historian will accept that an interval of almost 500 years separated Āsvaghoṣa from Nāgārjuna. In a note incorporated by Seng-tchao in his Commentary on the Vimalakīrti (T 1775, k. 8, p. 399b), Kumārajīva himself places Pārśva and Āsvaghoṣa in the 600 years post-nirvāṇa.

⁶³ According to the Li-tai (T 2034, k. 8, p. 78c22), Kumārajīva translated the Satyasiddhiśāstra in the 8th year of the hong-che period (406-407); according to the K’ai-yuan (T 2145, k. 4, p. 513a18), the translation began on the 8th day of the 9th moon of the 13th hong-che year (October 11, 411) and was finished on the 15th day of the 9th moon of the 14th year (November 4, 412).

One cannot escape the impression that all these dates are derived from theoretical views on the successive stages of the holy Dharma and that, as an absolute chronology, their value is rather weak.

It is doubtful that at the beginning of the 5th century, the Tch’ang-ngan school would have known Nāgārjuna’s Suhrillekha “Friendly Letter”,⁶⁴ of which three Chinese and one Tibetan translation exist:

1) T 1672: Long-chou-p’ou-sa wei Tch’an-to-kia-wang choui-fa-yao-kie “Summary of the Dharma in verse by the bodhisattva Nāgārjuna on behalf of king Jantaka”, translated in 431 at Nankin by Guṇavarman.

2) T 1673: K’iuan-fa tchou-wang yao-kie “Summary in verse to encourage kings”, translated in 434 at Nankin by Saṃghavarman, disciple and successor to Guṇavarman.

3) T 1674: Long-chou-p’ou-sa k’iuan-kaiai-wang song “Stanzas of encouragement to the king by the bodhisattva Nāgārjuna”, translated in 691 by Yi-tsing during his trip to India. In his Account sent from the southern seas (T 2125, k. 4, p. 227c13-15) Yi-tsing specifies that this letter was dedicated by Nāgārjuna to his former dānapati called Che-yin-tō-kia (Jantaka), king of southern India, called So-to-p’o-han-na (Śatavāhana).

4) Tib. 5409 and 5682: Bśes-paḥi phrin-yig “Friendly Letter “, addressed this time to king Bde-byed (Udayana), a contemporary of the Buddha!

The first translation, which makes the king, Jantaka, the recipient of the letter, is suspect in several regards. It is first mentioned in the Nei-tien-lou catalogue T 2149, k. 8, p. 312b25) compiled only in 664, and it is hard to see why Saṃghavarman would have retranslated a text published by his teacher three years previously.

The second translation, which does not specify the name of the recipient, gives more guarantee of authenticity: it is mentioned in the Tch’ou-san-tsang-ki-tsi (T 2145, k. 2, p. 12b23; k. 14, p. 104c25) already published in 515 and mentioned by Houei-kiao in his Kao-seng-tchouan (T 2059, k. 3, p. 342c3), which was not the case for the first.

Later, a biography of the bodhisattva Nāgārjuna entitled Long-chou-p’ou-sa-tchouan (T 2047) and published under Kumārajīva’s name was circulated. It has been translated into English by M. Walleiser.⁶⁵ It probably collected some information previously furnished by Kumāramjīva,⁶⁶ but he was not the author.

Firstly, the first catalogue to mention it was the Li-tai-san-pao-ki (T 2034, k. 8, p. 79a7) compiled at Tch’ang-ngan in 597 by Fei Tchang-fang and, contrary to his custom, this editor was unable to refer to any earlier catalogue.

Secondly, this biography, which correctly mentioned the Upadeśa in 100,000 gāthās (T 1509) and the Madhyamakaśāstra in 599 gāthās, also attributes to Nāgārjuna three works unknown as yet and which will not be considered further: a śāstra on the marvelous Bodhi of the Buddhas in 5,000 gāthās, a śāstra on the skillful means of great compassion in 5,000 gāthās and a śāstra on the absence of fear of which the Madhyamakaśāstra would be an extract.⁶⁷

Finally and above all, this biography presents its hero as a high-flying adventurer and complacently describes his stormy youth, his exciting voyages, his daring attempts at reform, his sensational discoveries in the Nāga palace, his quarrels with the prince, his magic contests with the Brāhmins and finally, his mysterious death. The picture thus sketched gives a good idea of what the upper middle ages thought of a siddha, but corresponds poorly to the image that we ourselves have of this penetrating and rigorous logician who was the author of the Madhyamakaśāstra, this wise encyclopedist who was the author of the Upadeśa.⁶⁸

IV. SUBJECT AND SOURCES OF VOLUME III

Volume II of the present work, which appeared in 1949 treated the six virtues – generosity, morality, patience, exertion, meditation and wisdom – which the bodhisattva must practice in order to reach supreme complete enlightenment and, at the same time, to assure the welfare and happiness of all beings.

The canonical and postcanonical texts of early Buddhism had already mentioned these virtues and, for a long time, the deeds of future Buddhas appeared in the bas-reliefs. But in the view of the Prajñāpāramitā, these virtues are raised to the level of perfections (pāramitā) insofar as the bodhisattva ‘keeps them and does not keep them’ (asthānayogena tiṣṭhati) in the sense that he practices them with the deep conviction (kṣānti) that beings do not exist and that things are unborn. From the perspective of their true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa, dharmatā), all contingent phenomena are reduced to being identical (śamatā) in a fundamental non-existence. The result is that the bodhisattva will be completely generous if he eliminates the notions of donor, recipient and gift given, perfectly moral if he mixes merit and wrong-doing, perfectly wise if, rejecting both true and false, he professes no system whatsoever.

In the present Volume III, the author dedicates no less than twelve chapters (XXXI – XLII) to commenting on a few pages of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra (Pañcaviṃśatisāhasrikā, p. 19-21); Śatasāhasrikā, p. 56-66). This part, the most technical and without a doubt the most interesting part of the Traité, has as its subject the practices forming the Path of Nirvāṇa and the attributes of the Buddhas.

⁶⁷ Cf. T 2047, p. 184c18-21; 186b9-12. The same list appears in T 2058, k. 5, p. 318b16-19. – This “Śāstra on the absence of fear” has been compared with the Mūlamadhyamakavṛtti-akutobhayā attributed to Nāgārjuna and appearing in the Tib. Trip., no. 5229, but the comparison is forced

Such a subject is somewhat unexpected. The bodhisattva delays his entry into nirvāṇa indefinitely and remains in saṃsāra with the sole purpose of dedicating himself as long as possible to the welfare and happiness of beings. Why then should he be interested in practices that are aimed precisely at hastening nirvāṇa? The answer is simple. The bodhisattva must know these practices so as to teach them eventually to beings destined to be converted by the old Vehicle – that of the śrāvakas, a fact that does not prevent them, at the appropriate time, from being redirected towards the Greater Vehicle. This is why the bodhisattva ‘completely fulfills’ (paripūrayati) the practices of the path in order to be able to teach them or review them with awareness of their cause, but he does not realize (na sāksātkaroti) them personally, for he would, by that very fact, betray his ideal of future Buddha and he would rejoin the ranks of the arhats who are more preoccupied with their sainthood than with the salvation of others.

As for the attributes of the Buddha, they are still beyond the reach of the bodhisattva. But although he has not ‘fulfilled them completely’, he is ‘anxious to understand them’ (parijñmatukāma). This is why it is necessary to speak of them. The division into chapters as presented in the Taisho edition leaves much to be desired and so it is useful to present a summary of Volume III here.

FIRST PART: The dharmas of the Path arranged in order of importance:

I. The thirty-seven bodhipākṣikadharmas divided into seven classes (chap. XXXI):

1. Four smṛtyupasthānas.
2. Four samyakpradhānas.
3. Four rdhipādas.
4. Five indriyas.
5. Five balas.
6. Seven sambodhyaṅgas.
7. Eight mārgāṅgas.

II. The eight complementary classes of dharmas of the Path (chap. XXXII-XXXIV):

1. Three samādhis.
2. Four dhyānas.
3. Four apramāṇas.
4. Four ārūpyasamāpattis.
5. Eight vimokṣas.
6. Eight abhibhāvāyatanas.
7. Ten kṛtsnāyatanas.
8. Nine anupūrvasamāpattis.

III. Six other classes of dharmas of the Path (chap. XXXV- XXXVIII):

1. Nine aṣubhasamjñās.
2. Eight anusmṛtis.
3. Ten samjñās.
4. Eleven jñānas.
5. Three samādhis.
6. Three indriyas.

SECOND PART: The attributes of the Buddhas (chap. XXXIX-XLII):

1. The eight balas according to the Abhidharma (chap. XXXIX).
2. The four vaiśāradyas according to the Abhidharma (chap. XL).
3. The ten balas and the four vaiśāradyas according to the Mahāyāna (chap. XL).
4. The four pratisamvids according to the Abhidharma and according to the Mahāyāna (chap. XL).
5. The eighteen āveṇikadharmas according to the Mahāyāna list (chap. XLI).
6. The eighteen āveṇikadharmas according to the Sarvāstivādin lists (chap. XLI)
7. Mahāmaitrī and mahākaruṇā (chap. XLII).

For each of these subjects, the Traité first explains the theories of early Buddhism according to the interpretation of the Abhidharma and the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika-Vibhāṣā; then it presents the contrasting view of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra and the other Mahāyānasūtras, taking its inspiration most frequently from refutation of arguments condensed in the Madhyamakaśāstra.

A clear distinction is made in the account between the Abhidharmic theories and the Mahāyānist criticism. The subtitles, added here to the French translation, carefully mark the separation. It often happens, as a matter of fact, that the contemporary exegesis quoting one or another passage taken from the Traité, without placing it in context, attributes theories to the author which he presents only to oppose them.

By means of these frequent allusions to the early Tripiṭaka, the author plunges us into the elating atmosphere of the 6th century B. C. In the course of Volume III, we will see ‘humans and non-human beings’ whom Śākyamuni met at random in his preaching tours march past helter-skelter: Ājñātakauṇḍinya (p. 1426F, 1576F), Ambaṭṭha (p. 1576F), Ānanda (p. 1352F, 1547F, 1589F, 1631F, 1649F, 1676F), Anavataptanāgarāja (p. 1343F), Aṅgulimāla (p. 1542F, 1579F), Aniruddha (p. 1405F, 1558F, 1630F), Apālāla (p. 1578F), Asita (p. 1344F), Āṭavaka (p. 1578F), Bakkula (p. 1386F, 1530F), Bhāradvāja (p. 1401F), Bimbisāra (p. 1577F), Brahmaddatta (p. 1577F), Brahmā devarāja (p. 1343F, 1583F), Brahmāyus (p. 1577F), Caṇḍa Pradyota (p. 1577F), Cāturmahārājakāyikadeva (p. 1679F), Cūḍapanthaka (p. 1543F), Devadatta (p. 1545F, 1662F, 1671F seq.), Dīrgha the yakṣa (p. 1405F), Dīrghanakha (p. 1576F, 1688F),

I [Lamotte] am pleased to be able to express my gratitude to my colleagues and friends who have shown interest in this work. With the kindness of a bodhisattva, P. Demiéville has given me tireless assistance. W. Simon and J. Brough have furnished precious information. My young colleague, R. Shih, has proposed judicious corrections. H. Durt, J. Kato and M. Van Velthem have shared in correcting the proofs.

At the intervention of J. Willems, the very distinguished President of the University Foundation and the National Council for Scientific Research, the Franqui Foundation has granted a generous subsidy for this publication and thus relieved the burden of the Oriental Institute of Louvain and its President, Count J. Ryckmans.

To these worthy individuals, to all these kalyāṇamitras, I express my highest thanks.

I would also like to thank particularly E. Peeters, director of the Orientalist Press, who has tried hard to meet my wishes and speed the publication of this Volume.

CHAPTER XXXI: THE THIRTY-SEVEN AUXILIARIES TO ENLIGHTENMENT

PRELIMINARY NOTE (p. 1119F)

I. LISTS OF AUXILIARIES

The title of the fourth noble truth preached by the Buddha in his sermon at Benares is the path of cessation of suffering (duḥkhanirodhagāminī pratipad). It deals with the noble eight-membered Path (ārya aṣṭāṅgamārga), the culmination of a method of liberation involving an infinite number of more or less efficacious spiritual practices. The most important – among which are included the eight Path members – are designated by the name ‘Auxiliaries to Enlightenment’, bodhipakkhika or bodhipakḥhiya in Pāli, bodhipākṣika, bodhipakṣika, bodhipakṣya or bodhipakṣa dharma in Sanskrit.

Definition of the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 96, p. 496b18-21): “ Why are they called bodhipākṣika? The two knowledges of the saint, the knowledge of the cessation of the impurities (āśravaṣaya-jñāna) and the knowledge that they will not arise again (anutpāda-jñāna) are given the name of Bodhi because they consist of the complete understanding of the four Truths. If a dharma is favorable to this complete understanding, it is given the name of bodhipākṣika.”

Definition of the Kośa, (VI, p. 282-284): “Kṣaya-jñāna and anutpāda-jñāna are Bodhi which, due to the difference of the saints who attain it, is threefold: śrāvakabodhi, pratyekabodhi, anuttarā samyakṣambodhi. Indeed, ignorance is completely abandoned (aśeṣāvidyā-prahāṇāt) by these two jñānas: by means of the first, one knows truly that the task has been accomplished; by means of the second, one knows that the task will no longer have to be accomplished. Inasmuch as they are favorable to this Bodhi, thirty-seven dharmas are its auxiliaries (tadanulomyataḥ saptatṛiṃśat tu tatpakṣāḥ)... All these auxiliaries to Bodhi are also a group of pure (anāśrava) or impure (sāśrava) qualities of hearing (śruta), reflecting (cintā) and meditating (bhāvanā), arising from practice (prāyogika).”

But the classical list of the thirty-seven auxiliaries to enlightenment (saptatṛiṃśad bodhipākṣikādharmāḥ) was slow in being formulated:

1. In the Nikāyas and the Āgamas the term bodhipākṣika dharma is rather rare and still poorly defined. The Aṅguttara, III, p. 70, 300 (cf. Vibhaṅga, p. 244) includes among them: the guarding of the senses (indriyeṣu guttadvāratā, sobriety (bhojane mattaññutā) and heedfulness (jāgariy’ ānuyoga). For the Saṃyutta, V, p. 227, 239, the bodhipākṣika are the five spiritual faculties (indriya); for the Vibhaṅga, p. 249, they are the seven members of enlightenment (sambojjhaṅga).

2. In the Canon there is frequently a list of 37 dharmas divided into seven classes: 1) the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthana), 2) the four right efforts (samyakpradhāna), 3) the four bases of magical powers (ṛddhipāda), 4) the five spiritual faculties (indriya), 5) the five strengths (bala), 6) the seven members of enlightenment (sambodhyaṅga or bodhyaṅga), 7) the seven members of the path (mārgāṅga).

Except for the Ekottarāgama, the Nikāyas and the Āgamas do not enumerate these dharmas which are 37 in total, and do not describe them as bodhipākṣika.

See, for example, Dīgha, II, p. 120 (cf. Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, ed. Waldschmidt, p. 196, 224); Dīgha III, p. 102, 127; Majjhima, II, p. 238-239; III, p. 296; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 125, 203; Udāna, p. 56. It is the same for the Pāli Vinaya, II, p. 240; III, p. 93; IV, p. 26, etc. – Madhyamāgama, T 26, k. 8, p. 476c20-21; k. 9, p. 479a18-19; k. 52, p. 753c6-7; Saṃyuktāgama, T 99k. 2, p. 14a7-8; k. 3, p. 19c5-6; k. 13, p. 87c3-4; k. 24, p. 176c14-15; k. 26, p. 188b26-27.

The Ekottarika, a late text crammed with Mahāyānist interpolations, is the only Āgama to enumerate these dharmas and describe them as bodhipākṣika: cf. T 125, k. 3, p. 561b20-22; k. 7, p. 579c26; k. 13, p. 612a19-20; k. 18, p. 635b25-26; k. 26, p. 696c9; k. 40, p. 765c15.

3. Sometimes the seven classes are incorporated into a list of more than 37 dharmas, e.g., Majjhima, II, p. 11-12; Aṅguttara, I, p. 39-49; and also for the Greater Vehicle, Pañcaviṃśati, p. 203-308; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1427-1439.

4. Paracanonical or postcanonical texts, whether Pāli or Sanskrit, the sūtras and śāstras of the Greater Vehicle list the seven classes in question, number their components and give them a name, ‘the 37 bodhipākṣika dharmas’, that will remain classical.

For the Pāli sources, see Nettippakaraṇa, p. 197, 261; Milinda, p. 30; Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 582-583; commentaries by Buddhaghosa on the Saṃyutta, I, p. 104; II, p. 139; III, p. 136; and on the Aṅguttara, I, p. 85; II, p. 11; III, p. 56; IV, p. 111; Compendium of Philosophy, p. 179.

For the Sanskrit-Chinese sources, see an infinity of texts on the two Vehicles: Divyāvadāna, p. 350, 616; Avadānaśataka, I, p. 340; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 96, p. 495c27-28; Kośa, VI, p. 281; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 57 seq.; Lalitavistara, p. 9; Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 18, p. 350b9; Kāśyapaparivarta, p. 75; Saddharmapund., p. 458; Vimalakīrti, p. 117, 139, 144, 201-202, 216, 378; Sūtrālaṃkāra, p. 140-146; Madhyantavibhāga, p. 89-94; Yogācārabhūmi, T 1579, k. 28, p. 439c-440a (for the śrāvakas): Bodh. bhūmi, p. 259 (for the bodhisattvas); Dharmasaṃgraha, ch. 43; Arthaviniścaya, p. 569-575; Mahāvvyut., no. 952-1004.

5. As well as the classical list of 37 bodhipākṣikas which is by far the most widespread, there are also aberrant lists:

a. The Nettippakaraṇa, which notes (p. 31, 261) the list of 37, mentions (p. 112, 237) a list of 43 bodhipakkhiyas beginning with six saññā: anicca, dukkha, anatta, pahāna, virāga and nirodhasaññā.

b. In his commentary on the Aṅguttara (I, p. 85) Buddhaghosa mentions as heretical (adhamma) a list of 38 bodhipakkhiyas, consisting of 3 sati, 3 padhāna, 3 iddipāda, 6 indriya, 6 bala, 8 bojhihaṅga and 9 maggāṅga.

c. According to the Vibhāṣā (T 545, k. 86, p. 499a14-15), the Vibhajyavādins have a list of 41 bodhipākṣikas, by adding the four āryavaṃśas ‘Ārya stock’ - being content with clothing, food and seat, and taking delight in cessation and the Path - to the 37 traditional ones.

d. According to Bhavya (M. Walleser, Die Sekten des alten Buddhismus, 1927, p. 90: A. Bareau, Trois Traités, JA 1956, p. 186) place the four apramāṇas, also called brahmavihāras, loving-kindness, etc., among the bodhyaṅgas.

[In Kośa, VI, p. 281, note, de La Vallée Poussin comments that the Aṅguttara, I, p. 53, recognizes only six bodhyaṅgas, memory being omitted. This is wrong, for memory (satisaṃbojjaṅga) is mentioned in the first line on p. 53.]

II. CANONICAL DEFINITIONS OF THE 37 AUXILIARIES

1. The 4 smṛtyupasthānas

Pāli formula in Dīgha, II, p. 290; Majjhima, I, p. 55-56; Saṃyutta, V, p. 141, 167, 185; Vibhaṅga, p. 193. Ekāyano ayaṃ bhikkhave maggovuneyya loke abhijjhādomanassaṃ.. – Sanskrit formula in Pañcaviṃśati, p. 204; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1427; Daśabhūmika, p. 38. Sa ... kāye kāyānupaśyi (var. kāyānudarśi) ... vinīyā loke ‘bhidyādaurmanasye.

Transl. – O monks, there is only one way for the purification of beings, for going beyond sorrow and lamentation, for the disappearance of suffering and sadness, for the conquest of the right Path, for the realization of nirvāṇa: this is the four foundations of mindfulness. What are these four?

1. The monk dwells considering the body in the body, energetic, aware, mindful of controlling greed and sorrow in the world.
2. He dwells considering feeling in the feelings, energetic, aware, mindful of controlling greed and sorrow in the world.
3. He dwells considering the mind in the mind, energetic, aware, mindful of controlling greed and sorrow in the world.
4. He dwells considering dharmas in the dharmas, energetic, aware, mindful of controlling greed and sorrow in the world.

Pāli formula: Dīgha, II, p. 216, 292-306; Majjhima, I, p. 56-57, 59; Aṅguttara, III, p. 450; Saṃyutta, V, p. 143, 294, 296; Vibhaṅga, p. 193, 195, 197. Iti ajjhataṃ vā kāye kāyānupassī ... dhammesu dhamānupassī viharati. – Sanskrit formula: Pañcaviṃśati, p. 204 seq; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1427 seq.; Daśabhūmika, p. 38. Evam adhyātmaṃ kṃye kāyānupaśyi (var. anudarśi) ... bahirdhā dharmeṣu dharmānupaśyī viharati.

Transl. – 1. Thus he dwells considering the body in the body internally (i.e., in his own body), considering the body externally (i.e., in the body of another) or considering the body (both) internally and externally.

2. He dwells considering feelings in the feelings internally, considering feeling in the feelings externally or considering feelings internally and externally.
3. He dwells considering the mind in the mind internally, considering the mind in the mind externally or considering the mind in the mind internally and externally.
4. He dwells considering dharma in the dharma internally, considering dharma in the dharma externally or considering dharma in the dharma internally and externally.

2. The 4 samyakpradhānas

In the Pāli sources, sammappadhāna ‘right efforts’; in the Sanskrit sources, samyakprahāṇa ‘right cessations’, translated into Tibetan as yañ dag par spon ba, but glossed as samyakpradhāna in the Kośavyākhyā, p. 601, l. 29. The Chinese translations give a choice between tcheng cheng or tcheng k’in on the one hand, and tcheng touan on the other hand.

Pāli formula in Dīgha, III, p. 221; Majjhima, II, p. 11; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 364-365; V, p. 244; Anguttara, II, p. 15; IV, p. 462; Paṭisambhidā, II, p. 15, 17. Cattāro sammappadhānā: 1. Idha bhikkhu anupannānaṃ pāpakānaṃ ... ārabhati cittaṃ paggaṇhāti padahati. – Sanskrit formula in Pañcaviṃśati, p. 307; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1435-36; Daśabhūmika, p. 38; Mahāvvyut., no. 958-965. Catvāri samyakprahāṇāni: 1. Anupannānaṃ pāpakānaṃ akuśalānaṃ ... pragrṇāti samyak pradhāni (var. pranidadhāni).

Transl. – The four right efforts:

1. Here the monk gives rise to zeal, exerts himself, activates his energy, stimulates his mind and strives so that evil bad dharma not yet arisen do not arise.
2. He gives rise to zeal, exerts himself, activates his energy, stimulates his mind and strives so that evil bad dharma already arisen are destroyed.
3. He gives rise to zeal, exerts himself, activates his energy, stimulates his mind and strives so that good dharma not yet arisen arise.
4. He gives rise to zeal, exerts himself, activates his energy, stimulates his mind and strives so that good dharma already arisen are maintained, preserved, developed increased, cultivated and completed.

3. The 4 ṛddhipādas.

Pāli formula: Dīgha, II, p. 213; III, p. 77, 221; Majjhima, I, p. 103; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 365; V, p. 254, 263-264; 278; Anguttara, I, p. 30, 297; II, p. 256; III, p. 82; IV, p. 464; Vibhaṅga, p. 216; Paṭisambhidā, I, p. 111, 113; II, p. 205. Cattāro iddhipādā: 1. Idha bhikkhu ... iddhipādaṃ bhāvati. – Sanskrit formula:

Pañcaviṃśati, p. 207-208; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1436; Daśabhūmika, p. 38-39; Mahāvvyut., no. 967-975. Catvāra ṛddhipādāḥ: 1. Chandasamādhiprahāṇasamskārasamanvāgatam ... vyavasargaparīṇatam.

Transl. – The four bases of magical power:

1. Here the monk cultivates with active effort the basis of magical power that is provided with zealous concentration, a basis that rests on separation, that rests on detachment, that rests on cessation and results in rejection.
2. He cultivates with active effort the basis of magical power that is provided with energetic concentration, a basis that rests, etc.
3. He cultivates with active effort the basis of magical power that is provided with the concentration of mind, a basis that rests, etc.
4. He cultivates with active effort the magical power that rests on concentration of examination, a basis that rests, etc.

[The formula vivekaṇīśritam, etc., that does not appear here in the Pāli wording, however, does occur.

Definition of the four samādhis constituting the bases of magical power. – Pāli wording: Saṃyutta, V, p. 268; Vibhaṅga, p. 216. 1. Chandaṃ ce bhikkhu nissāya (var. adhipatiṃ karitvā) ... vuccati vīmaṃsāsamaādhi – Sanskrit wording: Kośavyākhyā, p. 601-602. 1. Chandaṃ cāpi bhikṣur adhipatiṃ ... 'sya bhavati mīmāṃsāsamaādhiḥ.

Transl. – Concentration, the application of the mind to a single object which the monk acquires by resting on (while giving predominance) to zeal, to energy, to the mind, or to examination, concentration of the mind or concentration of examination.

4. The 5 indriyas

The five spiritual faculties, not to be confused with the five organs also called indriyas, are frequently mentioned in the canonical texts but rarely defined in extenso, and the definitions given are rarely identical. There is no classical definition as there is for the other auxiliaries.

Vibhaṅgasutta of the Saṃyutta, V, p. 196-197, to be compared to the Tsa a han, T 99, no. 647, k. 26, p. 182b-c:

Pañcimāni bhikkhave indriyāni. katamāni ...idaṃ vuccati bhikkhave paññindriyaṃ.

Transl. – Now, O monks, the five faculties. What are these five? The faculty of faith, the faculty of exertion, the faculty of attention, the faculty of concentration, and the faculty of wisdom.

1. What is the faculty of faith? Here the noble disciple has faith; he believes in the enlightenment of the Tathāgata and says: The Blessed One is holy, completely and fully enlightened, endowed with the sciences and methods, well-come, knower of the world, peerless, leader of men to be tamed, teacher of gods and men, the Buddha and Blessed One. This is called the faculty of faith.

2. What is the faculty of exertion? Here the noble disciple dwells actively energetic in destroying the bad dharmas and producing the good dharmas; he is firm, of proven courage, and does not reject the burden of the good dharmas. This is called the faculty of exertion.

3. What is the faculty of attention? Here the noble disciple is attentive, endowed with vigilance and supreme discrimination, unceasingly recalling and remembering what was done and what was said a long time ago. This is called the faculty of attention.

4. What is the faculty of concentration? Here the noble disciple, making renunciation the object of his mind, acquires concentration, acquires the application of mind to a single object. This is called concentration.

5. What is the faculty of wisdom? Here the noble disciple is provided with wisdom: He is endowed with wisdom to determine the rising and falling of things, wisdom that is noble, penetrating, leading to complete cessation of suffering.

Daṭṭhabbaṃ sutta of the Saṃyutta, V, p. 196 (cited in Nettippakaraṇa, p. 19), corresponding to Tsa a han, T 99, no, 646, k. 26, p. 182b:

1. Kattha ca bhikkhave saddhindriyaṃ ... ettha paññindriyaṃ daṭṭhabbaṃ.

Transl. – 1. Where, O monks, is the faculty of faith to be found? In the four members of entry into the stream. That is where the faculty of faith is found.

2. Where is the faculty of exertion to be found? In the four right efforts. That is where ...

3. Where is the faculty of attention to be found? In the four foundations of mindfulness. That is where ...

4. Where is the faculty of concentration to be found? In the four trances. That is where ...

5. Where is the faculty of wisdom to be found? In the four noble truths. That is where ...

This outline is developed in the Vibhaṅgasutta, no, 2, of the Saṃyutta, V, p. 197-198, where the viriyindriya is defined in exactly the same terms as the four sammāpadhāna.

I [Lamotte] have searched in vain in the Sanskrit sources for a text corresponding to the Pāli sources cited here. The Mahāvīyutpatti, no. 977-981, mentions the five indriyas but does not give a definition; the Arthavinīścaya, p. 571-572, gives a definition borrowed, it seems, from the Akṣayamatisūtra cited in the Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 316-317, but its wording has nothing in common with the old canonical sources.

5. The five balas

Pāli formula: Aṅguttara, III, p. 10; Majjhima, II, p. 12; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 366. Pañc' imāni bhikkhave ... samādhibalaṃ paññābalaṃ.. - Sanskrit formula: Pañcaviṃśati, p. 208; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1437; Daśabhūmika, p. 39. Sa śraddhābalaṃ ... samādhibalaṃ, etc., prajñābalaṃ, etc.

Except for the samādhibala, the Aṅguttara, III, p. 10-11, uses exactly the same terms to define the five balas as the Saṃyutta, V, p. 196-197, cited above, uses to define the five indriyas. The same formulas appear also in the definition of the seven balas presented by the Aṅguttara, IV, p. 3-4.

Actually, it has always been recognized that there is just a difference in intensity between bala and indriya. Cf. Saṃyutta, V, p. 220: Evaṃ eva kho bhikkhave yaṃ saddhinriyaṃ taṃ saddhābalaṃ, yaṃ saddhābalaṃ taṃ saddhindriyaṃ. pe. yaṃ paññindriyaṃ taṃ paññābalaṃ, yaṃ paññābalaṃ taṃ paññindriyaṃ: “Similarly, O monks, the faculty of faith is the power of faith, and the power of faith is the faculty of faith. And so on up to: the faculty of wisdom is the power of wisdom, and the power of wisdom is the faculty of wisdom.”

This identity is confirmed by the Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 141, p. 726b13-20; Kośa, VI, p. 286.

6. The 7 saṃbodhyaṅgas

Pāli wording: Majjhima, I, p. 11; II, p. 12; III, p. 275, etc. 1. Idha bhiikkhu satisambojjhaṅgaṃ ...bhāveti, etc.– Sanskrit wording in Pañcaviṃśati, p. 208; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1438; Daśabhūmika, p. 39; Mahāvīyut. no. 989-995. 1. Sa smṛtysaṃbodhyaṅgaṃ ...Upekṣāsaṃbodhyaṅgaṃ bhāvayati, etc.

Transl. – Here the monk cultivates the members of enlightenment called:

1, attention, 2, discernment of dharmas, 3. exertion, 4. joy, 5. relaxation., 6. concentration, 7. equanimity: members that rest on detachment, that rest on cessation and result in rejection.

In the Pāli sources, a stock phrase defines these seven saṃbodhyaṅgas: cf. Majjhima, III, p. 86-87; Saṃyutta, V, p. 67-69, 331-332, 337-339; Vibhaṅga, p. 227:

1. Yasmiṃ samaye, bhikkhave, bhikkhuno ... bhāvanāparipūriṃ gacchati.

Transl. – 1. O monks, when an unfailing attention has arisen in the monk, then the member-of-enlightenment called attention has begun in the monk, then the monk develops the member-of-enlightenment called attention, then the member-of-enlightenment called attention reaches its full development in the monk.

2. When the monk thus dwelling attentively examines, inquires and investigates this thing by means of wisdom, then the member-of-enlightenment called discernment of dharmas is launched in him.

3. When exertion without laziness arises in this monk who is examining, inquiring and investigating this thing by means of wisdom, then the member-of-enlightenment called exertion is launched in him.
4. When spiritual joy is produced in this energetic monk, then the member-of-enlightenment called joy is launched in him.
5. When the body and also the mind relaxes in this monk with joyful spirit, then the member-of-enlightenment called relaxation is launched in him.
6. When the mind is concentrated in this monk of relaxed and happy body, then the member-of-enlightenment called concentration is launched in him.
7. When this monk considers his mind thus concentrated with equanimity, then the member-of-enlightenment called equanimity is launched in him, then the monk develops the member-of-enlightenment called equanimity, then the member-of-enlightenment called equanimity reaches its full development in the monk.

8. The 8 mārgaṅgas

Transl. – Here the monk cultivates right view, right concept, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration, which rest on separation, which rest on detachment, which rest on cessation and lead to rejection.

A stock phrase defines the eight mārgaṅgas; it occurs frequently in the Pāli Nikāyas, e.g., Dīgha, II, p. 311-313; Majjhima, III, p. 252-252; Saṃyutta, V, p. 8-10; Vibhaṅga, p. 235-236. The Sanskrit Āgamas do not reproduce it exactly: cf. T'chong a han, T 26, k. 7, p. 469a15-b 29:

Ayam eva ariyo aṭṭhaṅgiko maggo, ... catutthajjhānaṃ upasampajja viharati ...

Transl. – Here is the eightfold noble Path: 1. right view; 2. right resolve; 3. right speech; 4. right action; 5. right livelihood; 7. right mindfulness; 8. right concentration.

1. What is right view? It is the knowledge of suffering, the knowledge of the origin of suffering, the knowledge of the cessation of suffering, the knowledge of the path leading to the cessation of suffering.

2. What is right concept? The concept of renunciation, the concept of non-maliciousness, the concept of non-violence.

3. What is right speech? Abstaining from falsehood, abstaining from gossip, abstaining from abusive speech, abstaining from unnecessary speech.

4. What is right action? Abstaining from killing, abstaining from theft, abstaining from illicit sexual activity.

5. What is right livelihood? Here the noble disciple, excluding the evil way of life, earns his livelihood by way of right living.

6. What is right effort? Here the monk gives rise to a wish, exerts himself, activates his energy, stimulates his mind and strives so that the evil bad dhammas not yet arisen do not arise. He gives rise to a wish... and strives so that the evil bad dhammas already arisen are destroyed. He gives rise to a wish... and strives so that the good dhammas not yet arisen arise. He gives rise to a wish... and strives so that the good dhammas already arisen are maintained, preserved, developed, increased, cultivated and completed.

7. What is right mindfulness? Here the monk dwells considering the body in the body, energetic, aware and mindful of controlling greed and sadness in the world. Similarly he dwells considering feeling in the feelings, mind in the mind and dhammas in the dhammas...

8. What is right concentration? Here the monk, having eliminated desires, having eliminated bad dhammas, enters into the first trance, provided with examination, provided with judgment, resulting from detachment, which is joy and happiness. – By the suppression of examination and judgment, he enters into the second trance, inner peace, one-pointedness of mind, without examination and judgment, arisen from concentration, which is joy and bliss. – By renouncing joy, he dwells equanimous, reflective, aware; he experiences bliss in his body; he enters into the third trance where the saints say that he is ‘equanimous, reflective, dwelling in bliss’. – By cessation of bliss and by cessation of suffering, by the previous suppression of joy and sadness, he enters into the fourth trance, free of suffering and bliss, purified in renunciation and reflection.

We may note that the definitions of samyagvyāyāma (no. 6) and samyaksmṛti (no. 7) given here are the same, respectively, as the definitions given above of the four samyakpradhānas and the four smṛtyupasthānas.

For an original definition of the eight mārgaṅgas, see Arthavinīścaya, p. 573-575.

III. THE AUXILIARIES IN THE ABHIDHARMA

Of the eighteen treatises contained in the Pāli Vihaṅga, the eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh are dedicated to the five classes of bodhipākṣikas respectively: the smṛtyupasthānas (p. 193-207), the samyakpradhānas (p. 208-215), the ṛddhipādas (p. 216-226), the saṃbodhyaṅgas (p. 227-234) and the mārgāṅgas (p. 235-243). Each treatise is made up of three parts: 1) the suttantabhājanīya or literal explanations of the canonical sources; 2) the abhidhammabhājanīya or scholastic explanations of the same sources; 3) the pañhāpucchaka or summary by means of questions and answers.

The bodhipākṣikas are often discussed in the Visuddhimagga as well by Buddhaghosa who summarizes his views at the beginning of chapter XXII (ed. Warren, p. 582-585, tr. Ñānamoli, p. 792-796).

But in the second part of the present chapter, the Traité takes its inspiration solely from the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika sources and enunciates theories already described in the Śatpādābhidharma (T 1553-1554), the Vibhāṣā (T 1545), the Amṛtasāra (T 1550-1552), the Abhidharmāmṛtarasa (T 1553), all texts dealing copiously with the bodhipākṣikas. It seems that the Traité preferably consulted the Prakaraṇapāda of Vasumitra (T 1541-42) which it cites twice under the heading of chapter VII, namely ‘the Thousand Difficulties’.

The Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma shows considerable progress in elaborating the doctrine of the auxiliaries in regard to the number of elements (dravya) entering into the constitution of the bodhipākṣikas, their successive appearance in the course of practice of the Path and their distribution in the levels (bhūmi) of birth or absorption.

1. Elements making up the bodhipākṣikas. – The Abhidharma authors rightly noted that although the canonical lists enumerate 37 bodhipākṣikas, many of them are fundamentally the same. Thus, when the lists speak of samyakprahāna, vīryendriya, vīryabala, vīryasaṃbodhyaṅga and samyagvyāyāma, basically it is a matter of one and the same thing, exertion. This is why these authors were led to reducing the 37 bodhipākṣikas to a certain number of constitutive elements, i.e., faith, exertion, mindfulness, etc. The Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 96, p. 496a-b) hesitates between ten, eleven or twelve constitutive elements; the Abhidharmāmṛtarasa (T 1553, k. 2, p. 977c11-12; Reconstruction by Bhikṣu Sastri, p. 116) settles for ten; the Kośa (VI, p. 283-284) has ten and the Abhidharmadīpa (p. 358) has eleven. Here the Traité also has ten.

2. Successive appearance of the bodhipākṣikas. – But if several auxiliaries are intrinsically the same, should we not accuse the canonical lists of having introduced fictional distinctions? No, for a given practice may have been practiced more or less efficaciously at different stages. This is why exertion, as it progresses, successively takes the name of samyakprahāna, vīrendriya, vīryabala, vīryasaṃbodhyaṅga and finally samyagvyāyāma.

Since then, the authors of the Abhidharma were brought to determining the successive appearance of the seven classes of bodhipākṣikas in the course of the various stages of the path:

1) The first class, that of the smṛtyupasthānas, appears at the beginning stage (adikāramika).

2) – 5) The four following classes appear during the preparatory Path (prayogamārga) or the practice of the four roots of good (kuśalamūla) ‘leading to penetration’ (nirvedhabhāgīya): 1) The four samyakpraghānas, in the Heat (uṣmagata); 2) the four ṛddhipādas in the Summits (mūrdhan); 3) the five indriyas in the Patiences (kṣānti); 4) the five balas in the Supreme worldly dharma (laukikāgradharma).

6) The sixth class, that of the seven saṃbodhyaṅgas, develops in the Path of meditation (bhāvanmārga).

7) The seventh and last class, that of the eight mārgāṅgas, appears in the Path of seeing (darśanamārga).

Here, the Traité will not mention this classification although it appears in the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 96, p. 496c22-497a2), the Kośa (VI, p. 287-288), the Abhidharmadīpa (p. 362), etc.

3. Distribution of the bodhipākṣikas in the levels. – On the other hand, the Traité borrows textually from the Vibhāṣā the paragraph on the distribution of the bodhipākṣikas in the levels (bhūmi). This distribution is also accepted by the Abhidharmāmṛta (T 1553, k. 2, p. 977c21-26; Reconstruction of Sastri, p. 117), the Kośa, VI, p. 291-292, and the Abhidharmadīpa, p. 365.

In this entire section, the Traité shows its complete understanding of the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma.

IV THE AUXILIARIES IN THE MAHĀYĀNA

1. The Madhyamaka viewpoint

Preliminary question. – From the beginning of this chapter, the Traité is confronted with an objection of principle. The auxiliaries of Bodhi that lead directly to nirvāṇa are of interest primarily to the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas whose aspirations concern nirvāṇa. But can we say that they also concern bodhisattvas who delay their nirvāṇa indefinitely in order to dedicate themselves to the welfare and happiness of beings?

The answer of the Traité is categorical: the bodhisapākṣikas concern the bodhisattvas as well as the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas and consequently are relevant to the three Vehicles.

Some arguments drawn from scripture and reasoning support this thesis:

1. In the Great Prajñās (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 194-223; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1405-1473), there is a long chapter dedicated to the constitutive elements of the Mahāyāna. These are the six pāramitās, the twenty śūnyatās, the one hundred and twelve samādhis, the twenty-one practices, the forty-three dhāraṇīmukhas and the ten bhūmis. The seven classes of bodhipākṣikas are placed at the head of the twenty-one practices

(Pañcaviṃśati, p. 203-308; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1427-1439). This is proof that the bodhipāṅśikas are an essential part of the Greater Vehicle and must be practiced in some way by the bodhisattvas.

Other Mahāyānasūtras may be called upon as witness. Thus the Avatamsaka (T 278, k. 38, p. 640a27-28; T 279, k. 54, p. 286c24-25) makes the seventh of the ten gardens frequented by the bodhisattvas to be the six pāramitās, the three saṃgrahavastus and the thirty-seven bodhipāṅśikas. In its section on the Daśabhūmika (p. 38-39, 42, 57), the same Avatamsaka comments that the bodhisattva practices (bhāvayati) the bodhipāṅśikas as early as the fourth bhūmi, purifies them by the view of sameness (samatā) in the fifth and fulfills them completely (paripūrayati) in the seventh.

Similarly, the Bodh. bhūmi (p.342) section of the Yogācārabhūmi, describes the Arcismatī, the fourth bodhisattva level, as the level ‘associated with the auxiliaries’ (bodhipāṅśhyapratīsamūyukta).

2. We also know from reasoning that the bodhipāṅśikas are a part of the bodhisattva path, the intent of which is to save beings and lead them to nirvāṇa. But there is no nirvāṇa without bodhi, and bodhi can be attained only by practice of the Path (mārgabhāvana) with all the auxiliaries of bodhi (bodhipāṅśika dharma). It is thus necessary that the bodhisattva fulfill them completely (paripūr) himself in order that he can teach them to others. But although he fully completes them (paripūrayati), he does not realize (na sākṣātkaroti) them immediately for, if he did that, he would enter into nirvāṇa immediately. He means, however, in his great compassion imitating the Buddhas, to stay in saṃsāra for a long time in order to ripen (paripācana) the greatest possible number of beings. Established in the perfection of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā), he knows that saṃsāra is identical with nirvāṇa, but that does not prevent him in any way from perfecting beings by the practice of the Path. This is why ‘his wisdom is accompanied by skillful means, and his skillful means is accompanied by wisdom’ (upāyasahitā prajñā, prajñāsahita upāyah).

The Traité will develop considerations of this type in the first section of this chapter. But although the bodhisattva shares the thirty-seven auxiliaries with the śrāvaka and the pratyekabuddha, he practices them in quite a different spirit. This is what the Traité will set out to show in the third section of the chapter.

View and aim of the bodhisattva in the practice of the auxiliaries. – Two passages of the Great Prajñās are involved here:

1. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 146-147; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 841-842. – The bodhisattva clings (nopalabhate) to no dharma in general nor to any class of bodhipāṅśika in particular because of their absolute purity (atyantaviśuddhitām upādāya). This purity is a non-arising (anuppadā), a non-manifestation (apradurbhāva), an absence of clinging (anupalambha), a non-activity (anabhisamskāra). Things do not exist (na saṃvidyante) as worldly fools would like to believe (yathā bālaprthagjanā abhiniviṣtāḥ); things exist by not existing (yathā na saṃvidyante tathā saṃvidyante). Consequently, because they exist only out of ignorance, they are called (the result) of ignorance (evam asaṃvidyamānās tenocyate ‘vidyati’).

2. Śatasāhasrikā, p. 56-57. – Dharmas in general and the seven categories of bodhipāṅśikas in particular must be completely fulfilled (paripūrayitavya) by the bodhisattva who abides in the perfection of wisdom by a method of non-abiding (bodhisattvena prajñāpāramitāyām sthitvāsthānayogena) basing himself on the impossibility of their being apprehended (anupalabdhitām upādāya).

The Traité has defined the method of non-abiding (asthānayoga) above (p. 656F): it consists of not grasping any characteristic (nimitta) in things. The translation of anupalabdhī and anupalabdhitā, rendered in Tibetan by mi dmigs pa and in Chinese by wou so tō, is very tricky. In his Materials for a Dictionary, p. 35, Prof. E. Conze proposes different translations such as no(n)-apprehension, impossibility of apprehending, that cannot be got at, etc., and he cannot be blamed for sticking to the purely literal meaning. However, I [Lamotte] think that the understanding of the term is much vaster than may be given to it by understanding the etymology. A dharma is anupalabhda, non-apprehended, not only because it is not grasped by any faculty whatsoever, but also as a result of its basic non-existence which puts it beyond the range of any clinging. For my part, the ultimate meaning of anupalabdhī and anupalambha is pure and simple non-existence. We may cautiously say, with J. May (Candrakīrti, p. 167) that the anupaladhasvabhāva dharma is that which is not perceived as existing in itself.

The two passages of the Prajñās that have just been presented permit the attitude of the bodhisattva towards the thirty-seven bodhipāṅśikas to be defined:

1. For the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, the ātman, the individual, does not exist in itself, but things (dharma) exist as they are produced by causes. For the bodhisattva, on the other hand, there is neither ātman nor dharma, and it is from the twofold perspective of pudgala- and dharmanairātmya that he ‘completely fulfills’ (paripūrayati) the auxiliaries of bodhi ‘by being based on their non-existence’ (anupalabdhitām upādāya).

The Traité as well will dedicate the third section of the present chapter to showing that the bodhipāṅśikas operate within emptiness. The body, feelings, mind and dharmas, the objects of the four smṛtyupasthānas, are not only without self (anātman) and without ‘mine’ (anātmīya), but also non-existent (asat). The four samyakpradhānas and the four ṛddhipādas are empty (śūnya) and without basis (apratīṣṭhāna). The five indriyas and the five balas are applied to empty (śūnya) dharmas, without characteristics (ānimitta) and are of no interest (apranīhita). The seven saṃbodhyaṅgas illuminate the True nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of things, namely, pure and simple non-existence. Finally, the eight mārgaṅgas lead to total absence of mind, speech and action.

2. The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas who aspire to bodhi and nirvāṇa ‘realize’ (sākṣātkurvanti) the bodhipāṅśikas regarded as leading to it. On the other hand, the bodhisattva, wishing to remain in saṃsāra in order to work for the benefit and happiness of all beings, keeps from realizing the dharmas that would have the effect of making this task impossible and in which he does not believe. If he does ‘completely fulfill’ them (paripūrayati), it is not for himself but for a purely altruistic end, to teach them to beings destined to be converted by way of the Vehicle of the śrāvakas. For the bodhisattva, the bodhipāṅśikas are merely skillful means (upāya) to be used according to the circumstances.

By this twofold attitude of theoretical refusal and practical acceptance, the bodhisattva remains faithful to his plan, namely, prajñā accompanied by upāya and vice versa.

2. The Vijñānavādin viewpoint

In contrast to the Prajñāpāramitā and the Madhyamaka of which the Traité is here the spokesman, the Vijñānavādin school is of the opinion that the True nature of dharmas is not pure and simple non-existence but a True manner of being (bhūtataṭatā) and that the practice of the bodhipākṣikas allows its attainment.

To illustrate this point of view, a passage from the Bodh. bhūmi, p. 259, is cited:

Bodhisattva upāyaparigṛhītena jñānena ... iyaṃ asya pāramāṛthikī kāyānupaśyanā.

Transl. – By means of wisdom incorporating skillful means, the bodhisattva understands fully the thirty-seven auxiliaries but does not realize them; and he understands them fully from the point of view of both Vehicles, namely, the point of view of the śrāvaka Vehicle and the point of view of the Greater Vehicle.

From the point of view of the śrāvaka Vehicle, he understands precisely those that have been explained completely in (the chapter) on the śrāvaka level to which reference will be made (T 1579, k. 21-34, p. 395c-477c; cf. A. Wayman, A report on the Śrāvaka-Bhūmi and its Author Asaṅga, J. Bihar research Soc., XLII, 2-4, P{arts 3-4, 1956, p. 1-14).

But how does the bodhisattva understand exactly the thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment from the point of view of the Greater Vehicle? Here the bodhisattva abides considering the body in the body, but he does not conceive the body as being body [which is the viewpoint of the śrāvakas], nor as not existing in any way whatsoever [which is the viewpoint of the Mādhyamikas]; but he understands exactly the manner of existence of the inexpressible nature of the body [which is the viewpoint of the Vijñānavādins]. That is the bodhisattva's consideration of the body in the absolute sense.

Śāstra. –

First Part THE AUXILIARIES BELONG TO THE GREATER VEHICLE AS WELL

Question. – The thirty-seven auxiliaries (pākṣika) are the path (mārga) of the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha; the six perfections (pāramitā) are the path of the bodhisattva-mahāsattva. Then why speak of things concerning only the śrāvaka when dealing with the bodhisattva?

Answer. - 1. The bodhisattva-mahāsattva must practice the paths of all the good dharmas. Thus the Buddha said to Subhūti: “The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who practices the Prajñāpāramitā should practice the paths of all the good dharmas, from the level of sharp wisdom (śuṣka- or śuklavipāśyanābhūmi) up to the level of the Buddhas (buddhabhūmi). He must practice (śikṣitavyam) the first nine levels but not realize them (sakṣātkartavyam); as for the level of the Buddhas, he must practice and realize it.”⁷⁰

Transl. – “When the bodhisattva-mahāsattva, with his skillful means, practices all the perfections, practices the thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment, practices the [four] limitless ones, the trances and the formless absorptions, practices the ten strengths of the Tathāgata, the [four] unhindered knowledges and the eighteen special attributes of the Buddhas, when he goes beyond nine levels, namely, the level of clear seeing, the level of the spiritual lineage, the level of the eighth saint, the level of seeing, the refined (?) level, the level of renunciation, the level of the one who has finished his career, the level of the śrāvaka, the level of the pratyekabuddha and the level of the bodhisattva, when he is established in the level of the Buddha, that is the level of the bodhisattva-mahāsattva.”

The ten levels cited here are the levels common (sādhāraṇabhūmi) to both vehicles. On this subject, see Śūramgaśāstra, p. 248-251, note. The Sarvāstivādin treatises are not unaware of them, as Prof. A. Hirakawa has shown in The Rise of Mahāyāna Buddhism, Memoirs of the Research Dept. of the Tokyo Bunko, No. 22, 1963, p. 67-68.

2. Moreover, where is it said that the thirty-seven auxiliaries are the qualities of śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas alone and do not constitute the path of the bodhisattva? In this Prajñāpāramitāsūtra, in the chapter entitled Mahāyāna, the Buddha says that [the thirty-seven auxiliaries], from the four foundations of [197c] mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) up to the eight members of the noble path (āryāṣṭāṅgamārga) are contained in the Three Baskets (tripiṭaka) of the Greater Vehicle;⁷¹ but he does not say that the thirty-seven auxiliaries are things exclusively (kevalam) concerning the Lesser Vehicle.

In his great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī), the Buddha preached the thirty-seven auxiliaries that are the path to nirvāṇa. In accordance with the vows (praṇidhāna) of beings, in accordance with karmic causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), each finds his own path. The person who seeks (pariyeṣate) to be a śrāvaka finds the śrāvaka path; the person who has planted the roots of good (kuśalamūla) of the pratyekabuddha finds the pratyekabuddha path; the person who seeks the bodhi of the Buddhas finds the Buddha path.

According to his previous vows (pūrvapraṇidhāna) and the sharpness (tikṣṇa) or dullness (mṛḍu) of his faculties (indriya), the person has great compassion (mahākaruṇā) or does not have great compassion. Similarly, when the nāga king (rāja) makes rain (vr̥ṣṭi) to fall, it rains on the earth everywhere indiscriminately (nirviṣeṣam); the big trees (mahāvṛkṣa) and the large plants (mahātṛṇa) receive a lot of rain because of their big roots (mūla); the small trees (alpavṛkṣa) and the small plants (alpatṛṇa) receive but little because of their small roots.

Question. - So be it. Nowhere is it said that the thirty-seven auxiliaries are exclusively the path of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas and are not the path of the bodhisattvas, but it can be known by rational induction. The bodhisattva who remains in saṃsāra and the five destinies (pañcagati) for a long time does not get nirvāṇa quickly. And yet the thirty-seven auxiliaries are presented only as adjuvants to nirvāṇa, whereas the perfections (pāramitā) and the great compassion (mahākaruṇā) of the bodhisattvas are not. This is why we know that [the thirty-seven auxiliaries] are not the bodhisattva path.

Answer. - 1. Although the bodhisattva remains in saṃsāra for a long time, he must know the True Path (bhūtamārga) and the false paths (abhūtamārga), the world (saṃsāra) and nirvāṇa. Knowing that, he makes his great vow (mahāpraṇidhāna): “Beings are worthy of compassion; I must save them and bring them to unconditioned (asaṃskṛtapada) safety.” The bodhisattva who practices the perfections (pāramitā) is able, by means of this true dharma (bhūtaadharma), to reach the Bodhi of the Buddhas. But although he practices and understands this dharma, he has not yet fulfilled the six perfections and this is why he does not immediately realize (na sāṅgātakaroti) this true dharma.

Thus the Buddha said: “It is like [an archer] who, raising his head, shoots his arrows into the air (ūrdhvaṃ kāṇḍaṃ kṣipati): the arrows support each other so that they do not fall to earth. In the same way, the bodhisattva, taking the arrow of the Prajñāpāramitā, shoots it into the air at the three gates of deliverance

(vimokṣamukha); then, taking the arrow of skillful means (upāya), he shoots it at the arrow of Prajñā so that it does not fall on the ground of nirvāṇa.”⁷²

Transl. - “It is, O Subhūti, as if a powerful master archer, well practiced and well versed in the practice of shooting the bow, shot an arrow into the air and, having shot one arrow into the air prevented, by means of other arrows, this arrow from falling to the ground, by means of a series of arrows, prevented the first arrow from falling to the ground: this first arrow would not fall to the ground as long as the master archer did not consent to its falling to the ground. In the same way, O Subhūti, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva, progressing in the perfection of wisdom and endowed with skillful means, does not realize the supreme summit of the real (i.e., nirvāṇa) as long as these roots of good are not ripe, are not indeed ripened by supreme complete enlightenment. But when these roots of good are ripe, are indeed ripened for supreme complete enlightenment, then he realizes this supreme summit of the real.”

The example of the master-archer appears in every version of the Prajñā: Aṣṭasāhasrikā T 224, k. 7, p. 458c16; T 225, k. 4, p. 497c10; T 226, k. 5, p. 531c11; T 227, k. 7, p. 560a16; T 228, k. 18, p. 649c8; Pañcaviṃśati, T 221, k. 14, p. 94c21; T 223, k. 18, p. 350c3; T 220, t. VII, k. 452, p. 281a9; Aṣṭādaśa, T 220, t. VII, k. 517, p. 646c19.

The same example is summed up in the Ratnaguṇasaṃcaya, XX, 9-10, p. 74, as follows:

Iṣvastraśita yathā puruṣordha kāṇḍaṃ kṣepitva anyā puna kāṇḍaparampareṇa/patanāya tasya purimasya na deya bhūmiṃ ākāṅkṣamāṇa puruṣasya pataye kāṇḍaṃ//

Evam eva prajñāvarapāramitām caranto prajñā-upāyabalarddhivicāramāṇo/tāvan na tām paramaśūnyata prāpuṇotī yāvan na te kuśalamūla bhavanti pūrnāḥ//

Transl. - “It is as if a man practiced in shooting the bow shot an arrow into the air and then, by means of a series of other arrows, did not allow the first arrow to fall: but if the man so wished, the arrow could fall. In the same way, the person who practices wisdom, the best perfection, and who practices wisdom and skillful means, the strengths and magic, would not take this supreme emptiness as long as these roots of good are not fulfilled.”

⁷¹ Actually the Prajñāpāramitā, in the chapter on the Mahāyāna, mentions the thirty-seven bodhipāṅkṣikas, from the four smṛtyupasthānas to the āṣṭāṅgamārgas, among the Mahāyāna practices (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 203-208; Śata. P. 1427-1439).

2. Furthermore, if, as you have said, the bodhisattva abides for a long time in saṃsāra, he must undergo all the physical and mental sufferings (nānavidha kāyikacaitasikaduhkha). If he has not attained true knowledge (bhūtajñāna), how could he endure these things? This is why the bodhisattva-mahāsattva seeks the auxiliaries to enlightenment (bodhipāṅśika) and true knowledge. From then on he can transform (pariṇamitum) the world (saṃsāra) into the fruits of the path (mārgaphala) and into nirvāṇa by the power of Prajñāpāramitā. Why? The threefold world (traiḍhātuka) is the result of a complex of causes and conditions (sāmagrī). That which is born from this complex has no intrinsic nature (svabhāva); having no intrinsic nature, it is empty (śūnya). Empty, it is ungraspable (agrāhya). The ungraspable is nirvāṇa. This is why [the Prajñāpāramitā] says here: “The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who abides in the perfection of wisdom by the method of non-abiding must, without producing them, fulfill the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna).”⁷³

3. Furthermore, in the śrāvaka and praykabuddha system, it is not said [198a] that saṃsāra and nirvāṇa are the same. Why? Because their wisdom (prajñā) does not penetrate dharmas deeply. In the bodhisattva system, it is said that saṃsāra and nirvāṇa are identical because their wisdom deeply penetrates dharmas.

Thus the Buddha said to Subhūti: “Form is emptiness and emptiness is form (rūpaṃ eva śūnyatā śūnyataiva rūpaṃ); feelings (vedanā), ideas (saṃjñā), formations (saṃskāra) and consciousnesses (viññāna) are emptiness, and emptiness is feelings, ideas, formations and consciousnesses. Emptiness is nirvāṇa and nirvāṇa is emptiness (śūnyataiva nirvāṇam, nirvāṇam eva śūnyatā).”⁷⁴

The Madhyamakāśāstra also says:

Nirvāṇa is no different from saṃsāra,

Saṃsāra is no different from nirvāṇa.

The limit of nirvāṇa and the limit of saṃsāra

Are the same limit, for there is no difference.⁷⁵

Having fond this True nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa), the bodhisattva-mahāsattva is not disgusted with saṃsāra and not pleased with nirvāṇa. The thirty-seven auxiliaries are the ground of true knowledge (bhūtajñānabhūmi).

⁷³ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 1137.

This is a stock phrase endlessly repeated in the Prajñās: Pañcaviṃśati, T 222, k. 1, p. 221c1, p. 223a14; k. 3, p. 235a11. Other references above, p. 1112F, n. 2.

Second part THE AUXILIARIES ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA (p. 1143F)

I. NUMBER OF AUXILIARIES

Question. – Since the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) suffice to obtain the path (mārga),⁷⁶ why talk about thirty-seven auxiliaries? Would it be for the sake of abridgment (saṃkṣiptena deśanā) that you speak of the four foundations of mindfulness and for the sake of expansion (vistareṇa deśana),⁷⁷ that you speak of the thirty-seven auxiliaries? Then that is not correct (ayukta) because, if one wants to expand, there would be innumerable (apramāṇapakṣa) auxiliaries.

Answer. – 1. Although the four foundations of mindfulness are sufficient to attain the path, the four right efforts (samyakpradhāna) and the other auxiliary dharmas must also be preached. Why? Among beings, minds (citta) are multiple (nānavidha) and varied (viśama); their fetters (samyojana) and the things that they love and those to which they are unattached also are multiple.

⁷⁶ The fourth noble Truth concerning the path to the cessation of suffering is so complex that it consists not only of the eightfold path (aṣṭāṅgamārga) preached by the Buddha but also the thirty-seven auxiliaries to enlightenment (bodhipāṅśika) and a whole infinity of dharmas.

The person who raises the objection is here contesting the need to speak of the thirty-seven auxiliaries in detail, as some of them are enough to lead to nirvāṇa. This is mainly the case of the four foundations of mindfulness since the Buddha stated in the Majjhima I, p. 63:

Ehāyano ayaṃ bhikkhave satītaṇaṃ visuddhiyā sokaparividdavāvaṃ satikkamāya dukkhadomanassānaṃ atthagamāya nāyassa adhiḡamāya nibbānassa sacchikiriyāya, yadidaṃ cattāro satipaṭṭhānā ti. – “There is one single way, O monks, leading to the purification of beings, to the transcending of sorrow and lamentation, to the disappearance of suffering and sadness, to the attainment of knowledge and realization of nirvāṇa; this is the four foundations of mindfulness.”

But the objection does not hold, for although the smṛtyupasthānas and the other auxiliaries to enlightenment constitute paths that are sufficient to the attainment of enlightenment, they are not suitable for all adepts indiscriminately: each must choose the one best suited to his own capacities and aptitude. Hence the need to propose a complete listing of auxiliaries to adepts without, however, excluding an infinity of other practices which will make up the object of chapters XXXII to XXXVIII.

⁷⁷ The Dharma may be preached in an abbreviated form (saṃkṣiptena) or in a long form (vistareṇa): cf. Anguttara, I, p. 53; II, p. 189.

Although it is a single truth (ekārtha) and is of a single nature (ekalakṣaṇa), the Buddhadharma is expressed in distinct explanations (sambhinnadeśana): twelve classes of texts (dvādaśāṅgadharmapravacana) and eighty-four thousand dharmas (caturśītisahasradharmaskandha).⁷⁸ If it were otherwise, after having preached the four noble Truths (āryasatya) in the course of their first sermon, the Buddhas should stop and should preach nothing more. Because there are beings who detest suffering (duḥkha) and love happiness (sukha), the Buddhas preach the four truths: 1) physical and mental dharmas, etc. (kāyikacaitasikādidharma) are all suffering and have no happiness (sukha); 2) the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) of this suffering are craving (trṣṇā) and the other passions (kleśa); 3) the cessation of this suffering (duḥkhanirodha) is called nirvāṇa; 4) the way to reach nirvāṇa is the Path (mārga).

There are beings who, as a result of worries (bahucintā), distractions (vikṣiptacitta) and misunderstanding (viparyāsa), cling (abhinivīśante) to the body (kāya), feelings (vedanā), the mind (citta) and things and lead a bad life (mithyācāra). For these people the Buddhas preach the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna). It is the same for the other [auxiliary] dharmas of the Path: each of them is preached to a certain type of being. It is like a master physician (bhaiṣajyaguru) who cannot cure all sickness with a single drug (bhaṣajya): sicknesses (vyādhi) are dissimilar and the remedy to be applied is not single. In the same way, the Buddha adapts himself to the various types of mental illnesses (cittavyādhi) from which beings suffer and cures them with different remedies.

Sometimes the Buddha saves beings by preaching only one thing. Thus the Buddha said to a bhikṣu: “This is not yours, do not grasp it (na tāvakam, tan mā grhāṇa).” – The bhikṣu said: “I know it already, O Bhagavat.” – The Bhagavat replied: “What do you know?” – The bhikṣu answered: “Dharmas are not ‘mine’ (ātmīya); they should not be grasped.”⁷⁹

Sometimes the Buddha saves beings by means of two things, concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā). Sometimes, by three things, morality (śīla), concentration and wisdom. Sometimes by four things, the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna).

[198b] Thus, although the four foundations of mindfulness are enough to attain the Path, there are other dharmas that differ in practice (ācāra), concepts (vikalpa), quantity and point of view. This is why the four right efforts (samyakpradhāna) and the other [auxiliary] dharmas must also be preached.

2. Furthermore, the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas have a power of faith (śraddhābala) so great that they save all beings, and so the Buddha preaches the thirty-seven auxiliaries to them simultaneously. And although he preaches other dharmas favorable to the Path, such as the ten concepts (daśasaṃjñā)⁸⁰, etc., all are included (saṃgrhīta) in the thirty-seven auxiliaries. These thirty-seven are a collection of all the remedies (sarvabhaiṣajyasasamsarga) that can cure all the illnesses (vyādhi) of beings. This is why it is not necessary to multiply the auxiliaries to the Path infinitely. Similarly, although the Buddha possesses innumerable powers (bala), we speak only of ten powers, for they are enough to save beings.

II. THE ELEMENTS CONSTITUTING THE THIRTY-SEVEN AUXILIARIES

These thirty-seven auxiliaries have ten things (dravya)⁸¹ as roots (mūla). What are these ten? 1) Faith (śraddhā), 2) morality (śīla), 3) thought (saṃkalpa), 4) exertion (vīrya), 5) mindfulness (smṛti), 6) concentration (samādhi), 7) wisdom (prajñā), 8) relaxation (praśrabdhi)⁸², 9) joy, (prīti), 10) equanimity (upekṣā).

- 1) Faith (śraddhā) constitutes: a. the faculty of faith (śraddhendriya); b. the power of faith (śraddhābala).
- 2) Morality (śīla) constitutes: a. right speech (samyagvac); b. right action (samyakkarmānta); c. right livelihood (samyagājīva).
- 3) Thought (saṃkalpa) constitutes: right thinking (samyaksaṃkalpa).]
- 4) Exertion (vīrya) constitutes: a. the four right efforts (samyakpradhāna); b. the faculty of exertion (vīryendriya); c. the power of exertion (vīryabala); d. the factor-of-enlightenment called exertion (vīryasambodhyaṅga); e. the [factor-of-the path] called right effort (samyagvyāyāma).
- 5) Mindfulness (smṛti) constitutes: a. the faculty of mindfulness (smṛtīndriya); b. the power of mindfulness (smṛtibala); c. the factor-of-enlightenment called mindfulness (smṛtisambodhyaṅga); d. the [factor-of-the-path] called right mindfulness (samyaksmṛti).
- 6) Concentration (samādhi) constitutes: a. the four foundations of magical power (ṛddhipāda); b. the faculty of concentration (samādhīndriya); c. the power of concentration (samādhibala); d. the factor-of-enlightenment called concentration (samādhisambodhyaṅga); e. the [factor-of-the-path] called right concentration (samyaksamādhi).

⁷⁹ Natumhākasutta in Samyutta, III, p. 33-34, and Tsa a han, T 99, no. 269, k. 10, p. 70b, repeated in the Alagaddūpamasutta in Majjhima, I, p. 140-141: Yaṃ bhikkhave na tumhākaṃ taṃ pajahatha, taṃ vo pahīnaṃ dīgharattaṃ hitāya sukhāya bhavissati. Kiñ ca bhikkhave na tumhākaṃ: Rūpaṃ bhikkhave na tumhākaṃ, taṃ pajahatha, taṃ vo pahīnaṃ dīgharattaṃ hitāya sukhāya bhavissati. Vedanā pe. Saññā pe. Saṅkhārā pe. Viññānaṃ pe.

⁸² This is cittapraśrabdhi, ‘the dharma by means of which the mind is skillful, light, capable’: cf. Kośa. II, p. 157. Kumārajīva renders praśrabdhi here by tch’ou “to get rid of?”; the translation k’ing-ngan ‘lightness-peace’ adopted by Huan-tsang in his version of the Kośa (T 1558, k. 2, p. 7c7; k. 4, p. 19b6; k. 12, p. 67a1-2; k. 25, p. 132b11; k. 28, p. 147a13) seems preferable.

7) Wisdom (prajñā) constitutes: a. the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna); b. the faculty of wisdom (prajñendriya); c. the power of wisdom (prajñābala); d. the factor-of-enlightenment called discernment of dharmas (dharmapracicayasambodhyaṅga); e. the [factor-of-the-path] called right view (samyagdr̥ṣṭi).

8) Relaxation (praśrabdhi) constitutes the factor-of-enlightenment called relaxation (praśrabdhisambodhyaṅga).

9) Joy (prīti) constitutes the factor-of-enlightenment called joy (prītisambodhyaṅga).

10) Equanimity (upekṣā) constitutes the factor-of-enlightenment called equanimity (upekṣāsambodhyaṅga].⁸³

III. THE SEVEN CLASSES OF AUXILIARIES

1. The dharmas where mindfulness (smṛti) is focused (upatiṣṭhati) on the objects of knowledge (prajñālabana) are called ‘foundations of mindfulness’ (smṛtyupasthāna).

2. Those that destroy bad dharmas and move in the right path (samyagmārga) are called ‘right effort’ (samyakpradhāna).

3. When the concentrated mind (pragr̥hītacitta) stops worrying (āśvasiti) about things (ālambana), there is ‘foundations of magical power’ (rddhipāda).

4. When a mind of dull knowledge (mṛdujñānacitta) is acquired, there is ‘faculties’ (indriya).⁸⁴

5. When a mind of sharp knowledge (tīkṣṇajñānacitta) is acquired, there is ‘powers’ (bala).⁸⁵

6. By the practice of the path of meditation (bhāvanāmārgavyāpāra), there is ‘[factors] of enlightenment’ (sambodhyaṅga).

7. By the practice of the path of seeing (darśanamārgavyāpāra), there is ‘[factors] of the path’ (mārgāṅga).

IV. ORDER OF THE THIRTY-SEVEN AUXILIARIES

Question.⁸⁶ – First we must speak about the [factors] of the path (mārgāṅga). Why? Because only after having traveled the path are the good dharmas acquired. Thus, a person first travels over a road and later arrives at his destination. Here, by what mistake (viparyāsa) do you first speak of the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) and only at the end, of the eight factors of the path (mārgāṅga)?

⁸³ The text in square brackets is taken from Kośa, VI, p. 284, so as to complete the list.

⁸⁴ The punctuation in Taisho is defective, the period should be placed between ken and li.

⁸⁶ For the logical and chronological order of the seven classes of auxiliaries, cf. Kośa, VI, p. 288-290.

Answer. – It is not a mistake (viparyāsa). The thirty-seven auxiliaries are involved as soon as one wants to enter onto the Path.

1. Thus, when the yogin goes to the teacher (ācārya) and hears the teaching on the Path (mārgadharma) from him, first he uses his mindfulness (smṛti) to retain (dhāraṇa) this teaching: that moment is called ‘foundation of mindfulness’ (smṛtyupasthāna).

2. When he has retained and followed this teaching, the yogin who is looking for the fruit (phalaparyeṣin) practices with exertion (vīryeṇa prayuñjate): this is called ‘right effort’ (samyakpradhāna).

3. As a result of this expenditure of energy (bahuvīrya), his mind is distracted (vikṣipta). He concentrates his mind (cittaṃ pragr̥hṇāti) and controls it (damayati): this is called ‘foundation of magical power’ (rddhipāda).

4. His mind being tamed (dānta), he produces the ‘five faculties’ (pañcendriya).

a. The True nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas is very profound (atigambhīra) and difficult to probe (durvigāhya), but by means of the faculty of faith (śraddhendriya), he believes in it: this is called the ‘faculty of faith’ (śraddhendriya).

b. He does not spare his own life (kāyajīvita) and seeks enlightenment (bodhiṃ paryeṣate) wholeheartedly (ekacittena): this is called ‘faculty of exertion’ (vīryendriya).

c. He constantly thinks about the Bodhi of the Buddhas and does not think about anything else: this is called the ‘faculty of mindfulness’ (smṛtindriya).

d. He always concentrates his mind on Bodhi: this is called the ‘faculty of concentration’ (samādhindriya).

e. He considers (samanupaśyati) the four truths and the True nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa): this is called the ‘faculty of wisdom’ (prajñendriya).

5. When the five faculties (pañcendriya) have been developed (vṛddha), [198c] they are able to intercept the afflictions (kleśa): this is like the power of a big tree (mahāvṛkṣa) that is able to block off water. These five faculties, when they have been developed, are able to gradually penetrate the profound Dharma (gambhīradharma):⁸⁷ this is called ‘power’ (bala).

6. Having obtained the powers (bala), the yogin distinguishes the dharmas [of the path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga)]:

There are three factors (aṅga): 1) the [second] factor-of-enlightenment called discernment of dharmas (dharmapracicayasambodhyaṅga); 2) the [third] factor-of-enlightenment called exertion (vīryasambodhyaṅga); 3) the fourth factor-of-enlightenment called joy (prītisambodhyaṅga). If the mind sinks when one is practicing the Path, these three factors (aṅga) raise it up again (samutthāpayanti).

[There are three other factors]: 1) the [fifth] factor-of-enlightenment called relaxation (praśrabdhisambodhyaṅga); 2) the [sixth] factor of enlightenment called concentration (samādhisaṃbodhyaṅga); 3) the [seventh] factor-of-enlightenment called equanimity (upekṣasahasambodhyaṅga). If the mind is distracted (vikṣipyate) when one is practicing the Path, these three factors settle it (pragrhṇanti) so that it is concentrated.

As for the remaining factor, namely: the [first] factor-of-enlightenment called mindfulness (smṛtisaṃbodhyaṅga), it operates in both cases [when the mind sinks and when it is distracted]. It can unite the good dharma and stop the bad ones; it is like a gate-keeper (dauvārika) who allows what is useful (arthavat) to enter and sends away what is useless (anarthaka).⁸⁸

If the mind sinks, mindfulness (smṛti) and the three factors [nos. 2-4] raise it up. If the mind is distracted, mindfulness and the three factors [nos. 5-7] settle it.

Because these seven things work (gāmitvāt), they are called ‘factors’ (aṅga).

7. When the yogin has obtained these things and his tranquility (kṣema) is complete (saṃpanna), he wishes to enter into the unconditioned city of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasaṃskṛtanagara).⁸⁹ This is why he practices the dharma [of mārgaṅga]: that moment is called ‘Path’ (mārga).

V. DETAILED STUDY OF THE AUXILIARIES

1. The Four Foundations of Mindfulness

A. Foundations and mistakes

Question. – What are the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna)?⁹⁰

Answer. – The foundation of mindfulness on the body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna) and the foundations of mindfulness on feeling (vedanā), mind (citta) and dharma are the four foundations of mindfulness. The yogin considers (anupaśyati) these four things in four ways: 1) he considers the impurities of the body (kāyāśuci); 2) he considers the painfulness of feelings (vedanāduḥkha); 3) he considers the impermanence of the mind (cittānityatā); 4) he considers the non-self of dharma (dharmanairātmya).

Although each of the four things has these four characteristics, in the body it is especially the impurities that must be considered; in feelings, the suffering; in the mind, impermanence; and in dharma, non-self.

⁸⁹ The ‘City of nirvāṇa’ is a canonical expression: cf. Tch’ang a han, T 1, k. 4, p. 30a19 seq.; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 16, p. 626a1; k. 23, p. 669b27; k. 25, p. 687b19-20; k. 39, p. 760c24. We will see (p. 1231F) that the three gates of the City of nirvāṇa are the three vimokṣamukha.

Why? The worldly person (prthagjana), who has not yet entered into the Path, is deluded about these four things and produces four mistakes (viparyāsa): 1) the mistake that consists of taking what is impure to be pure (aśucau śucir iti viparyāsa); 2) the mistake that consists of taking what is suffering to be happy (duḥkhe sukham iti viparyāsa); 3) the mistake that consists of taking what is impermanent to be permanent (anitye nityam iti viparyāsa); 4) the mistake that consists of taking what is not a ‘self’ to be a ‘self’ (anātmany ātmeti viparyāsa).⁹¹

In order to destroy these four mistakes, the Buddha preached the four foundations of mindfulness: 1) to destroy the mistake about purity (śuciviparyāsa), he preaches the foundation of mindfulness on the body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna); 2) to destroy the mistake on happiness (sukhaviparyāsa), he preaches the foundation of mindfulness on feelings (vedanāsmṛtyupasthāna);

3) to destroy the mistake on permanence (nityaviparyāsa), he preaches mindfulness on the mind (citasmṛtyupasthāna); 4) to destroy the mistake on the self (ātmaviparyāsa), he preaches the foundation of mindfulness on dharma (dharmasmṛtyupasthāna). It is for this reason that he preached four, no more and no less.⁹²

B. Foundation of mindfulness on the body

Question. – How does one obtain these four foundations of mindfulness?

Answer. – The yogin who is established in pure morality (viśuddhaśīla) and is practicing exertion (vīrya) wholeheartedly (ekacittena) considers (anupaśyati) the fivefold impurity of the body (kāyāśuci). What are these five impurities? 1) The impurity of birthplace (jātisthānāśuci); 2) the impurity of seed (bījaśuci); 3) the impurity of intrinsic nature (svabhāvāśuci); 4) the impurity of intrinsic characteristics (svalakṣaṇāśuci); 5) the impurity of the final outcome (paryavasānāśuci).

1. What is the impurity of the place of birth (jātisthānāśuci)? Head (śiras), feet (pāda), belly (udara), back (prṣṭha), thighs (pārśva), that which is called a woman’s body (striḥkāya) is a collection of impure things (aśuddhavadustasamāgrī).

Inwardly (adhyātman), it contains a stomach (āmāśaya), a belly (pakvāśaya), excrement (viṣ), urine (mūtra)⁹³ and [other] impurities (aśuci). Outwardly (bahirdhā), there is a wind (vāta) conditioned by the afflictions (kleśa) and actions (karman), a wind that blows on the seed-consciousness (vijñānabīja)⁹⁴ and ⁹¹ On these mistakes (viparyāsa), see Anguttara, II, p. 52; Vibhaṅga, p. 376; Kośa, V, p. 21;

Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 198; Traité, p. 925F.

⁹² The contrast between viparyāsa and smṛtyupasthāna has already been noted above, p. 1076F.

⁹³ See also Mahāvīyut., nos. 4026, 4027, 4065, 5063.

viññāna was the subject of a conversation between the Buddha and Ānanda (Dīgha, II, p. 63: Kośavyākhyā, p. 669; Madh. vṛtti, p. 552).

Transl. – If the viññāna, O Ānanda, did not descend into the mother’s womb, would the nāmarūpa (i.e., the entire living individual) coagulate as an embryo? – No, Lord.

If the viññāna went away after having descended into the mother’s womb, would the nāmarūpa come into existence? – No, Lord.

If the viññāna were to be cut off in the child, boy or girl, would the nāmarūpa grow and develop? – No, Lord.

The technical term viññānabīja used here by the Traité does not appear, it seems, in the canonical scriptures, but occurs in some Mahāyānasūtras, especially in the Śālistamba, ed. Sastri, p. 13-14 (cited with a few variants in Madh. vṛtti, p. 566, and Pañjikā, p. 480:

Transl. – “Although this twelve-membered co-dependent production set in action for all of eternity continues to function uninterruptedly like the current of a river, however, four members of this twelve-membered co-dependent production function as cause to ensure its substance. What are these four? They are ignorance, craving, action and consciousness. Here consciousness is cause as seed: action is cause as field; ignorance and craving are causes as defilements. Action and the defilements give rise to the seed-consciousness; action plays the part of field for the seed-consciousness; craving waters the seed-consciousness, ignorance plants the seed-consciousness. If these four conditions do not exist, there is no arising for the seed-consciousness.”

But it seems that the Śālistamba may have been directly inspired by the Bhava-sutta of Anguttara, I, p. 23-224, where the Buddha explains to Ānanda: “If the action destined to be retributed in kāma-, rūpa- or ārūpyadhātu did not exist, existence (bhava) in one of these three realms would not manifest.” The Sūtra continues by saying:

Iti kho Ānanda kammaṃ khettaṃ, viññānaṃ bījaṃ, taṇhā sineho avijjānīvaraṇānaṃ sattānaṃ taṇhāsamyojanānaṃ hināya... majjhimāya... pañitāya dhātuyā viññānaṃ patitṭhitaṃ. “Indeed, O Ānanda, action is the field, consciousness is the seed, and craving is the moisture (of the soil). In beings chained by ignorance, fettered by craving, consciousness manifests in the lower, middle or higher realm.”

The Bhava-sutta exists in a Chinese version in the Ts’i tch’ou san kouan king (T 150a, no. 42, p. 881c), an anthology of 47 sūtras translated by Ngan Che-kao, the first year of the yuan-kia period (151A. D.). Tan-ngan claims that these sūtras are extracts from the Samyuktāgama (cf. Li-tsi, T 2034, k. 4, p. 50b1), but actually, only two sūtras – the Sattatṭhāna (no. 1) and the Puggala (no. 30) – come from the Samyukta, and all the others are borrowed from the Ekottara. The anthology is entitled Ts’i tch’ou ‘The Seven Subjects’, after the title of the first sūtra Sattatṭhāna (cf. K’ai-yuan, T 2154, k. 1, p. 479c16).

It is quite characteristic that the Bhava-sutta, dealing with the viññāna-bīja, should have been one of the first to be translated into Chinese. The seed-consciousness was called upon to play a large role in the Abhidharma (see Kośa, III, p. 25, 26, 124, 26); it is the basis of the Viññānavādin psychology introduces it within the two viscera. During eight or nine months, the seed-consciousness dwells in a pit of excrement and urine (vinmūtragarta). Thus it is said:

This body is foul and revolting:

It is not from a flower that it is born,

[199a] Neither does it come from Campaka,

And it does not come from a jewel mountain.

This is what is called the impurity of the place of birth.

2. The impurity of the seed (bījaśuci). – By means of the wind (vāta) of deceptive concepts (mṛṣāvikalpa) and wrong thoughts (mithyāmanasikāra), the father and mother (mātāpitṛ) blow upon the fire (agni) of sexual desire (rāga); blood (rudhira), marrow (majjan) and fat (vasā) escape, get hot and are changed into sperm. The seed-consciousness (viññānabīja) conditioned by previous actions (pūrvakarma) settles in the blood (śoṇita) and whitish sperm (śukra). That is what is called the seed of the body (kāyabīja). Thus it is said:

The seed of the body is impure,

It is not a precious substance,

It has not come from pure innocence,

It has come only from the urinary pathways.

That is what is called the impurity of the seed.

3. The impurity of intrinsic nature (svabhāvāśuci). – From head to toe and on all four sides, the body is a lowly rag. Everything in it is full of impurities. Decorate it with garments, bathe it with perfumed water, nourish it with the best dishes and food of many flavors, at the end of one night all of it will be impure.⁹⁵ Even if that you clothe it in celestial garments (divyavastra) and feed it with celestial food (divyāhāra), because of the body itself, all of it will become impure. Then what can be said if you give it only human garments and human clothes? Thus it is said:

which made the ālayaviññāna, the consciousness-receptacle ‘provided with all the seeds’ (sarvabījaka) the support of the knowable (jñeyāśraya); cf. Mahāyānasamgraha, p. 12 seq.

⁹⁵ Reminder of a canonical topic: Dīgha, I, p. 76, 173, 209; Majjhima, I, p. 144, 500; II, p. 17; Samyutta, IV, p. 83, 194, 202; V, p. 370; Anguttara, IV, p. 386: Ayaṃ kāyo rūpī cātummahābhūtika mātāpettikasambhavo odanakummāsūpacayo anico

ucchādanaparimaddanabhedanavidhamsanadhammo: “The material body, composed of the four great elements, coming from the mother and father, fattened with boiled rice and gruel, that always must be oiled and massaged, nevertheless breaks up and is destroyed.”

The corresponding Sanskrit wording (Mahāvastu, II, p. 269, 278; Kāśyapaparivarta, § 152, shows asome variations: cf. Vimalakīrti, p. 134 as n.

Formed from earth, water, fire and wind,

It transforms everything into impurities.

Empty the sea to bathe the body,

Still you will be unable to clean it.

That is what is called the impurity of intrinsic nature..

4. The impurity of intrinsic characteristics (svalakṣaṇāśuci). – This body with its nine gates (nanadvāra) is always secreting impurity: the eyes (akṣi) spill out rheum (akṣigūthaka) and tears (aśru); the ears (karṇa) produce wax (karṇagūthaka); the nose (nāsā) contains snot (siṃghāṇaka); the mouth (mukha) has saliva (lālā) and vomit (vāntīkṛta); the anus (guda) and the urethra (mūtramārga) constantly empty out excrement (viṣ) and urine (mūtra); and the hair-pores (romakūpa) sweaty impurity.⁹⁶ Thus it is said:

All kinds of impure things

Fill the interior of the body.

It flows ceaselessly

Like a filter-sack containing dirt.

That is what is called the impurity of intrinsic characteristics.

⁹⁶ Cf. the Vijayasutta of the Suttanipāta, p. 34, verse 197-198:

Ath' assa navahi sotehi asūci sabbadā/akkhimhā akkhigūthako, kaṇṇagūthako// siṃghāṇikā ca nāsāto, mukhena vanat' ekadā/pittam semhañ ca vamatī, kāyamhā sedajallikā//

“Impurity flows from him ever in nine streams: from the eye, rheum; from the ear, wax; from the nose, snot; from the mouth sometimes bile and sometimes phlegm vomit; and from the entire body there flows sweat and filth.”

A sermon of the Buddha, cited in Milinda, p. 74, and Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 161, is expressed thus:

*Allacammaṭṭicchasno navadvāro mahāvaso /
samantato paggharati asuci pātiganhiyo//*

“Covered with damp skin, [the body] with its nine gates, a great suffering, pours out stinking secretions from very part.”

The nine gates (dvāra), holes (chidra) or wounds (vraṇa) of the body are the two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, mouth, anus and urinary canal. They are often mentioned in Buddhist texts: Fo pan ni yuan king, T 5, k. 2, p. 171a16; Tsa pan nie pan king, T 7, k. 1, p. 194c13; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 5, p. 453c5; Anguttara, IV, p. 386; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 30, p. 713a28; Ts'i tch'ou san kouan king, T 150, p. 880b5; Sieou hing pen k'i king, T 184, k. 2, p. 466c16; Ta tchouang yen louen king, T 201, k. 12, p. 324b28 (tr. E. Huber, Sūtrālaṃkāra, p. 346); Fa kiu king, T 210, k. 2, p. 573c27; Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 82, l. 1 (navavraṇamukha).

5. The impurity of the final outcome (pariyavāsanāśuci). – Thrown on the fire (agni), the body becomes ash (bhasman); devoured by insects (kurmi) it becomes dung (purīṣa); placed in the earth, it decays, decomposes, and becomes earth; put into the water, it swells up and decays or it is eaten by water-insects. Of all corpses (kuṇapa), that of man is the most impure: his impurities (asūcidharma) will be explained at length in reference to the nine concepts (navasaṃjñā).⁹⁷ Thus it is said:

Examine the body minutely:

It ends up necessarily in death.

Difficult to control,⁹⁸

It gives nothing in return,

Ungrateful like a lowly individual.

That is what is called the impurity of the final outcome.

Moreover, from birth (jāti) until death, everything that moves close to the body, everywhere that it rests, all is defiled. Just as perfumed clear waters that [199b] flow in a hundred rivers are changed into bitter salt as soon as they reach the great sea (mahāsamudra), so whatever the body eats, the most delicate dishes of various flavors, beautiful colors and fine smells, as soon as they penetrate into the sea of the belly (udarasamudra), are changed into filth. Thus the body, from birth to death, always contains disgusting impurities.

The yogin wonders if this body, impure as it is, does not have some permanence. Wrong! It is a great suffering (mahāduḥkha). This body is the place of arising (upapattisthāna) of all the suffering. Just as water (ap) arises from the earth (prthivī), wind (vāyu) from the ether (ākāśa) and fire from wood (dāru), so all the inner (ādhyātmika) and outer (bāhya) suffering comes from the body. The inner sufferings are old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maraṇa); the outer sufferings are the knife (asi), the stick (daṇḍa), cold and heat (śītoṣṇa), hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsā), etc. It is because there is a body that these sufferings exist.

Question. – The body is not suffering alone basically (duḥkhasvabhāva); happiness (sukha) also comes from it. If there were no body, who would experience the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) as they like?

Answer. –The suffering which the four noble truths [mention] the saint cognizes truly as suffering, but worldly people (prthagjana) call it happiness. It is necessary to rely on the noble truth (āryatattva) and reject error (moha) and doubt (kāṅkṣā). This body is really suffering because it rests on the ‘Great Suffering’ (mahāduḥkha) [of saṃsāra], and it is only a lesser suffering (parītadaḥkha) that constitutes happiness. Thus, when a man condemned to death undergoes punishment (daṇḍa) instead of being executed, he feels great joy. This punishment is really suffering, but as he escapes from death, the condemned man calls it happiness.

⁹⁷ The nine concepts, objects of meditation on the horrible (aśubhabhāvanā), will be studied below in Chap. XXXV.

⁹⁸ Like a stubborn horse.

Furthermore, recent suffering (navaduḥkha) is ‘happiness’ (sukha) [in contrast] to the old suffering (pūrvaduḥkha) which is ‘suffering’. Thus, when one sits down (sīdati) one feels happiness, but when this position persists, it gives rise to suffering. At the beginning, walking (caṅkrama), standing (sthāna) and lying down (śayyā) are happiness, but in the end they too are suffering. Whether one is bending (saiṇṇjite) or one is stretching (prasārite), whether one is bowing the head or raising it, whether one looks straight ahead (ālokitē) or to the side (vilokite), whether one is breathing out (praśvasite) or breathing in (āśvasite),⁹⁹ suffering always follows the body. From conception (garbhāvakrānti) and birth (jāti) to death (maraṇa), there is not a single moment of happiness.

You enjoyed pleasures (rāga) as if they were happiness; when the sickness of lust (abrahmacaryavyādhi) increases, you seek women outside, but the more you find, the more your torment increases. It is like when one suffers from scabies (kacchū), one goes near the fire, one scratches one’s hands and roasts them. At that time, one feels a little joy, but in the long run (read kīeou) the sickness increases in intensity. This little joy, it too becomes the cause of sickness: it was not a true happiness or the elimination of the sickness. Those who see people with scabies act thus, feeling pity (karuṇā) for them. The person who has renounced desire (vītarāga) has the same feelings towards the lustful: he has compassion for these angry madmen, burned by the fire of desire (kāmadagḍha) who suffer more than they enjoy. For many reasons of this kind, we know that the body has the nature of suffering (duḥkhalakṣaṇa) and is the cause of suffering (duḥkhaḥetu).

The yogin knows that the body is mererly impure (aśuci), impermanent (anitya) and suffering (duḥkha) but he cannot do otherwise than nourish it. It is like parents who have given birth to a son: however vicious the child, he is born from themselves (ātmaja) and this is why they must feed him and raise him.

The body is, in truth, not the self (ātman). Why? Because it is not independent (svatantra). It is like a man sick with an illness of wind (vāyuvyādhi), unable to raise or lower his head, unable to come or go; or like a man suffering from an obstruction in his throat, unable to speak. This is why we know that [199c] the body is not independent. If a man has something, he uses it as required. This is not the case for the body; as it escapes from all influence, we know that it is not ours.

It is in this way that the yogin meditates on the body, the impure (aśuci), impermanent (anitya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya), selfless (anātmān) body possessing innumerable defects of the same type. The various considerations on the body are called mindfulness of the body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna).

C. Mindfulness of feeling (p. 1158F)

In possession of this consideration called kāyasmṛtyupasthāna, the yogin pursues his reflections and asks himself why beings are attached (abhinivīśante) to this body. It is because of pleasant feeling (sukhavedanā). How? From the meeting between the six internal organs (ādhyātmikendriya) and the six outer objects (bāhyaviṣaya) the six kinds of consciousnesses (viññāna) arise. From these six consciousnesses arise the three kinds of feelings (vedanā), unpleasant feeling (duḥkhavedanā), pleasant feeling (sukhavedanā), neither unpleasant nor pleasant feeling (aduḥkhaśukhavedanā). Pleasant feelings are loved by all beings; unpleasant feelings are hated by all beings; as for the neither unpleasant nor pleasant feelings, people neither reject them nor cling to them. Thus it is said:

Evil-doers and monks (pravrajita).

Gods, humans and small worms:

Amongst these beings divided among the five destinies (gati) in the ten directions,

There is not one that does not love happiness and hate suffering.¹⁰⁰

Out of error (moha), mistake (viparyāsa) and ignorance (ajñāna),

They do not know nirvāṇa, the abode of eternal bliss.

Considering pleasant feeling (sukhavedanā), the yogin truly knows that it contains no happiness but only suffering. Why? Happiness (sukha), i.e., ‘true happiness’ (bhūtasukha) is free of errors (viparyāsa). And yet all the pleasant feelings of the world come from mistakes and contain no reality.¹⁰¹

Furthermore, while greedily seeking the happiness of pleasant feeling, one will encounter great suffering. Thus it is said:

Those who go to sea encounter heavy winds

The waves rise up as high as the Kālaparvata.

Those who go into the army to fight

¹⁰¹ See the Rahogataka-suttanta of the Saṃyutta, IV, p. 216 (Tsa a han, T 99, no. 476, k. 17, p. 121c) cited in Kośa, VI, p. 131, and Kośavyākhyā, p. 519:

Transl. – “I have spoken, O monks, of three feelings: pleasant feeling, unpleasant feeling and neither unpleasant nor pleasant feeling. But I have also said that every feeling is suffering (acc. to the comm., dukkhasmiṃ = dukkha-sannissitam): it is by viewing the impermanence of [all] the formations, the perishable, transitory, unpleasant, destructible and changing nature of [all] the formations that I have declared that all feeling is suffering.”

In other words, all the phenomena of existence, by reason of their transitory nature, are suffering and, if sometimes they seem to us to be pleasant, sometimes unpleasant and sometimes indifferent, that is purely a mistake.

Cross very dangerous paths and perilous gorges.

Noble śreṣṭhins must bow down when approaching vile people in order to satisfy their sexual desires.

These many great sufferings

All come from attachment to happiness and to cupidity (rāgacitta).

This is why we know that pleasant feeling can give rise to all sorts of suffering.

Furthermore, although the Buddha spoke of the three kinds of suffering, one of them, that of pleasant feeling, merits the name of suffering because in it happiness is rare. It is like a bushel of honey (madhu) which, when thrown into a big river, loses its smell and its taste (rasa).

Question. – Happiness [such as it is conceived in the world (laukikasukha)], having error (viparyāsa) as cause and condition (hetupratyaya), is suffering (duḥkha). But the concentrations (samādhi) practiced by the saints (āryapudgala) give rise to a pure happiness (anāsravasukha) which itself is real happiness. Why? Because this happiness is not derived from delusion (moha) or mistake (viparyāsa). How then could it be suffering?

Answer. – It is not suffering. Although the Buddha said: “All that is impermanent is suffering” (yad anityaṃ tad duḥkham),¹⁰² it was only in regard to impure dharmas (sāsravadharma) that he was speaking of suffering. Why? Worldly people (prthagjana) are mentally attached to impure dharmas, and as these impure dharmas are impermanent (anitya) and perishable (vyaya), they give rise [200a] to suffering. But the mind does not become attached (nābhivīśate) to pure dharmas and, although they are impermanent (anitya), they do not produce sadness (daurmanasya), lamentation (parideva), suffering (duḥkha), torment (viheṭhana), etc. That is why they are not called suffering. And besides, the bad contaminants (anuśaya) do not take shelter there.¹⁰³

Furthermore, if pure happiness were suffering, the Buddha would not have treated it separately in the truth of the Path (mārgasatya), since, [as suffering], it would have been included (saṃgrhāta) in the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya).¹⁰⁴

Question. – “There are two kinds of happiness (sukha): impure (sāsrava) happiness and pure (anāsrava) happiness.”¹⁰⁵ Impure happiness is lowly, vile, perverse and bad; pure happiness is excellent. Why does one become attached to the lowly vile happiness and not attached to the excellent happiness? One should

¹⁰⁴ The Buddha spoke of samādhi, the second element of the Path of nirvāṇa, when he was dealing with the fourth noble truth. This proves that samādhi, which gives rise to the pure happiness of nirvāṇa, is truly happiness and not suffering. If it were suffering, the Buddha would have spoken of it in connection with the first truth which deals precisely with universal suffering.

become attached preferentially to the excellent happiness in the same way that one would prefer to be attached to precious objects of gold (hemaṇ) or silver (rajata) rather than to straw (iraṇa) or to wood (kāṣṭha).

Answer. - Pure happiness being excellent, wisdom (prajñā) abounds there and, as wisdom is abundant there, it can eliminate attachment (abhiniveśa). In the impure happiness, it is the fetters (saṃyojana), thirst (trṣṇā), etc., that abound, and thirst is the root of attachment (abhiniveśamūla). The true wisdom (bhūtaprajñā) [inherent in pure happiness] is able to eliminate attachment. That is why it is not attached to [the pure happiness].

Furthermore, pure wisdom (anāsravaprajñā) always considers (anupaśyati) universal impermanence (sarvāṇityatā) and because it considers impermanence it does not produce the fetters (saṃyojana), thirst (trṣṇā), etc. It is like a sheep (eḍaka) that is kept near a tiger (vyāghra): even if it has good grass and good water, it does not get fat.¹⁰⁶ In the same way, even though they experience pure happiness (anāsravasukha), the saints nevertheless contemplate impermanence (anityatā) and emptiness (śūnya) and that is why they do not produce the ‘fat’ of desire (rāgamedā).

Furthermore, pure happiness (anāsravasukha) is inseparable from the sixteen noble aspects (ṣoḍaśākāra) of the three concentrations (samādhi)¹⁰⁷ and is always without the mark of a self (sattvanimitta). If it were endowed with the mark of a self, it would produce minds of attachment (abhiniveśacitta). Thus pure happiness, although excellent, does not give rise to attachment.

For many reasons of this kind, the yogin considers pleasant worldly feeling (laukikā sukhavedanā) as suffering.

He considers unpleasant feeling (duḥkhavedanā) as an arrow (śaḷya); as for the neither unpleasant nor pleasant feeling (adhuḥāsukhavedanā), he considers its impermanent and perishable nature (anityavyayanimitta).

Thus he does not experience desire (rāga) for pleasant feeling; he does not experience hatred (dveṣa) for unpleasant feeling and he does not experience delusion (moha) for neither unpleasant nor pleasant feeling.

That is what is called mindfulness of feeling (vedanāsmṛtyupasthāna).

D. Mindfulness of mind

The yogin also says to himself: “It is because of happiness that one becomes attached to the body; but who is experiencing (vedayati) this happiness?” Having reflected, he knows that feeling (vedanā) comes from the mind (citta). It is following mental elation (cittakṣepa) and a misunderstanding (viparyāsa) that beings experience a given happiness. The yogin must take into account that the mind which is transitory (anitya) has the nature of being born and perishing (utpādbhaṅgalakṣaṇa) and lasts for only a moment, is unable to experience happiness. It is by mistake that a person claims to feel happiness. Why? At the very moment when one wishes to experience happiness, the mind has already changed; at the moment when the happiness arises, the mind is another (anya) mind. There is no connection between happiness and the mind. How could it be said that the mind experiences happiness?

¹⁰⁶ See the apologue of the big but not fat sheep, above (p. 908-909F)

The past mind (atītacitta), being already destroyed (bhagna), does not experience the happiness; the future mind (anāgatacitta), being not yet born (utpanna), does not experience the happiness; the present mind (pratyutpannacitta), being momentary (ekakṣaṇika) and fleeting (kṣipra), does not have the awareness to experience the happiness.

Question. – We accept that the past mind and the future mind cannot experience happiness. But the present mind, which endures for a moment, must experience happiness. How can you say that it does not?

Answer. – I have just said that, being fleeting, it does not have the awareness to experience happiness. [200b]

Besides, being impermanent in nature (anityalakṣaṇa), all dharmas have no span of duration (sthitikāla). If mind lasted for a moment, it would also last during the second moment. It would then be eternal in duration and without the nature of disappearing (vyayalakṣaṇa). And yet, among the three characteristics of conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmalakṣaṇa), the Buddha also mentioned the characteristic of disappearance (vyayalakṣaṇa).¹⁰⁸ If the mind did not have disappearance, it would not show the characteristics of the conditioned.

¹⁰⁸ The sūtras of the Āgamas and the Nikāyas set out the three characteristics of conditioned dharmas: production or origin, disappearance, and duration-change.

Sanskrit version (cf. Nidānasamyukta, p. 139, cited in Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 39, p. 199c22-23; Kośa, II, p. 223; Kośavyākhyā, p. 171; Madh. vṛtti, p. 145): Trīṇīmāni bhikṣavaḥ saṃskṛtasya saṃskṛtalakṣaṇāni. Katamāni trīṇi. Saṃskṛtasya bhikṣava utpādo 'pi prajñāyate, vyayo 'pi prjñāyate, sthityanyathātvam apīti: “There are, O monks, three characteristics of the conditioned that are themselves conditioned. What are these three? Of the conditioned, the production is object of consciousness; the disappearance is also object of consciousness; likewise the duration-change.”

Pāli version (Anguttara, I, p. 152; Saṃyutta, III, p. 37): Tīṇ' imāni bhikkhave saṅkhatassa saṅkhatalakṣaṇāni. Katamāni tīṇi. Uppādo paññāyati, vayo paññāyati, thitassa (variant: thitānam) aññathattaṃ paññāyati.

The Pāli reading thitassa (or thitānam) aññathattaṃ ‘change while it (they) endure(s)’ is in contrast with the Sanskrit reading sthityanyathātvam attested by the preceding sources and by a fragment from Central Asia published by L. de La Vallée Poussin, Documents sanscrits de la seconde collection A. Stein, JRAS, 1913, p. 573.

c. The Chinese versions of the Āgamas render the originals only imperfectly: the Tsa a han, T 99, k. 2, p. 12a29 (corresponding to the Saṃyutta, III, p. 37) mentions only utpāda and vyaya; the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 12, p. 607c15 (corresponding to Anguttara, I, p. 152) has utpāda, anyathātva and

Furthermore, if dharmas suffered a destruction a posteriori (uttareṇa), we would know that they possessed it already a priori (pūrveṇa). Thus, when a person clothes himself in a new garment (navavastra), if on the same day that he puts it in, the garment is not yet old, it would not be old on the second day either, and so on for ten years: the garment would always be new and never old. In truth, the garment was already old, and we should know that [this ageing] coexisted with its newness. But since this ageing was subtle, we were not aware of it. It is only in the presence of old things that we notice it. This is why we know that dharmas do not have a time of duration (sthitikāla). How then could the mind last long enough to be able to experience happiness? Since it has no duration, it is impossible that it experiences happiness.

This is why we know that there is nothing that can truly experience happiness. [A mind ‘experiencing happiness’] is a purely conventional entity (prajñaptimātra dharma): we speak of a single entity experiencing happiness as a result of the succession of minds (cittaprabandha).

Question. – How do you know that all conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma) are impermanent (anitya)?

Answer. – Here I must repeat what I have already said above (p. 37F). These conditioned dharmas, which all depend on causes and conditions (hetupratyayāpekṣa), are impermanent. Because not existing earlier, they exist now and because existing now, they will not exist later, they are impermanent.

Furthermore, the nature of impermanence (anityatālakṣaṇa)¹⁰⁹ always follows (anusrati) conditioned dharmas. Conditioned dharmas have neither increase (upacaya) nor decrease (apacaya), and finally, all conditioned dharmas are mutually destroyed (parasparaviheṭhaka): therefore they are impermanent.

Furthermore, a twofold old age (dvidivhajarā) always follows (anusrati) conditioned dharmas: i) primary old age (mūlajarā); ii) the old age of old age (jarājarā).¹¹⁰ A twofold death (dvidhamaraṇa) always vyaya; the Tsa a han, T 99, k. 12, p. 83c16 (corresponding to Nidānasamyukta, p. 139) subdivides the sthityanyathātvam of the original and thus has four characteristics: utpāda, sthitī, anyathātvam and vyaya.

d. The Pāli Abhidhamma accepts only three characteristics: uppāda, vaya and thitānam aññathathattam (Kathāvatthu, p. 61; Compendium, p. 25, 125).

e. The Sanskrit Abhidharma of the Sarvāstivādins, while referring to the canonical sources that accept three characteristics, nevertheless puts forth four: birth (jāti), old age (jarā) duration (sthitī) and impermanence (anityatā) according to the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 39, p. 200c10-12) and Kośa, II, p. 222; jāti, jarā, nāśa according to the Abhidharmaḍḍipā, p. 104.

f. For the Sautrāntikas and for Vasubandhu, the four characteristics of the conditioned, being the viprayuktasaṃskāras, are not real entities (cf. Kośa, II, p.226-234).

¹⁰⁹ Fourth saṃskṛtalakṣaṇa according to the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma (see preceding note).

¹¹⁰ According to the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma whose theories the Trāitē reproduces here, the four primary characteristics (mūlalakṣaṇa) of the conditioned, namely jāti, jarā, sthitī and anityatā, have secondary characteristics (anulakṣaṇa) in their turn: birth-of-birth (jātijāti), old-age-of old-age (jarājarā) duration-of-duration (sthitisthitī) and impermanence-of-impermanence (anityatānityatā): cf. Kośa, II, p. 224-225). – But Nāgārjuna refuted the theory of the anulakṣaṇas in Madh. Kārikā, VII, 3 (Madh. vṛtti, p. 147): Utpādashthitibhaṅgānām anyat saṃskṛtalakṣaṇam / asti ced anavasthaivam; nāsti follows them: i) death by oneself (ātmanā maraṇam); ii) being put to death by another (pareṇa maraṇa).¹¹¹ This is why we know that all conditioned dharma are impermanent.

Among the conditioned dharma, the impermanence of the mind (cittānityatā) is very easy to detect. Thus the Buddha said: “Sometimes worldly people (prthagjana) recognize the impermanence of the body (kāyānityatā) but do not recognize the impermanence of the mind (cittānityatā). Some worldly people say that the body is eternal, but the mistake that holds the mind to be eternal is even more fatal. Why? It may be that the body will last for ten years or twenty years, whereas the mind, night and day, disappears each moment (ekakṣaṇalavamuḥūrte), arising as one thing, perishing as another, without stopping for a single moment. On the point of arising, it is born one thing; on the point of perishing, it dies another thing.¹¹² The true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of such a magical thing (māyāvastu) is ungraspable (anupalabdha).

cet te na saṃskṛtāḥ //: “If production, duration and destruction have a secondary characteristic, there is infinite regression; if they do not have a secondary conditioned characteristic, they are not conditioned.”

¹¹¹ Dīgha, III, p. 231; Anguttara, II, p. 159: Atth ’āvuso attabhāvaapaṭilābho yasmim attabhāvaapaṭilābhe attasaṃcetanā yeva kamati no parasamcetanā. Atth ’āvuso attabhāvaapaṭilābho yasmim attabhāvaapaṭilābhe yeva kamati no attasaṃcetanā: “There is an occasion in life [note, p. 1165F] in the course of which it is one’s own volition that acts, not the volition of another. There is an occasion in life during the course of which it is the volition of another that acts and not one’s own volition.”

According to the explanations of Anguttara (I. c.) summarized in Kośavyākhyā, p. 170, in the first case, death is due to one’s personal will (ātmanā maraṇam), in the second case, to the will of another (pareṇa maraṇam). Kośa, II, p. 218, cites several examples of these two kinds of death.

Transl. of the Sanskrit. – 1. A foolish and unlearned worldly person, O monks, can indeed become disgusted with it, detached from it, and liberated from the body formed of the four great elements.

2. Why? We notice, O monks, that this body formed by the four great elements gets bigger, gets smaller, is taken and rejected. [This is why one can become disgusted with it.]

3. But in regard to the ‘mind’, or the ‘consciousness’, the foolish and unlearned worldly person is incapable of becoming disgusted with it and liberated from it.

4. Why? During the long night [of saṃsāra], this [mind] has been cared for, guarded, assimilated, espoused, adopted by the foolish unlearned worldly person, who says to himself: “It belongs to me, it is me, it is my self.”

This is why the foolish unlearned worldly person is incapable of becoming disgusted with it, detached from it, liberated from it.

5. And moreover, O monks, it would be preferable that the foolish unlearned worldly person considers as his self the body formed by the four great elements rather than the consciousness.

6. Why? We notice that the body formed by the four great elements, when it is maintained [in health], lasts for ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, a hundred years, or even a little longer.

For innumerable reasons of this kind, we know that the mind is impermanent. That is what is called mindfulness of mind (cittasmṛtyasthāna).

E. Mindfulness of Dharmas

The yogin asks himself on whom does the mind depend (apekṣate) and who controls the mind. Having considered well, he does not see that the mind has a master. The dharma resulting from the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī) are not independent (svatantra); not being independent, they have no intrinsic nature (svabhāva); not having any intrinsic nature, they have no self (ātman). If there is no self, then who controls the mind?

Question. – 1) There must be an ātman. Why? If the mind (citta) controls [200c] the body (kāya), there also must be an ātman to control the mind. In the same way that the master of a kingdom (rāṣṭreśvara) controls the general (senāpati) and the general controls the soldiers (patti), there must be an ātman to control the mind, and there must be a mind to control the body so that it may enjoy the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa).

2) Moreover, as each person possesses his own mind (ātmacitta), we know that there really is an ātman. If it were only due to a mistake (viparyāsa) about the body and the mind that we assume an ātman, why would we not produce the idea of an ātman in regard to another?¹¹³ Thanks to this sign, we know that each one possesses his own ātman.

Answer. – 1) If, the mind controlling the body, there were an ātman to control the mind, there still must be someone to control the ātman. If there were still someone to control the ātman, there would be an infinite regress (anavasthā); as there would be still someone to control the ātman, there would be two ātmans.

If there is no ātman to control the mind, there can only be the mind to control the body. You consider the mind to be dependent on a soul (pudgalāpekṣa), but in the absence of the mind, the soul has no object of consciousness (jñeya) and, having no object of consciousness, how would it control the mind? If the soul had the characteristics of a knowledge (jñānalakṣaṇa), why resort again to the mind? This is why we know that only the mind presents the characteristics of a consciousness (vijñānalakṣaṇa). Therefore it is able to control the body and does not depend on a soul (pudgalaṃ nāpekṣate). It is like fire (agni) which, by its nature, burns things without the intervention of a person (puruṣa).

7. On the contrary, what is called ‘mind’, ‘consciousness’, over the days and nights, in the course of instants, moments and hours, appears in many different aspects: when it arises, it is [already] another mind that is born, when it disappears, it is another mind that is destroyed.

8. It is like a monkey who grasps a branch of a tree and, having let go of it, grasps another. In the same way, what is called ‘mind’ or ‘consciousness’, over the course of nights and days, etc., as before up to ‘when it is disappears, it is another that is destroyed.’

¹¹³ This objection has already been formulated above, p. 736F.

Objection. – Although fire has the power to burn, it is not useful without a person; although the mind has the characteristic of a consciousness (vijñānalakṣaṇa), it is not controlled without the soul (pudgala).

Answer. – Dharmas exist insofar as they have their own characteristics (lakṣaṇa). Not having any characteristics, the soul does not exist. You consider the inbreath and the outbreath (ānāpāna), suffering and happiness (duḥkhasukha), etc., as characteristics of the soul; but that is not right (ayukta). Why? Because the inbreath and the outbreath, etc., are characteristics of the body, and the fact of feeling suffering, happiness, etc., is characteristic of the mind. Why make the body and the mind into characteristics of the soul?

Moreover, fire (agni) burns things by itself without depending on a person (pudgala). We say that a man burns something only metaphorically. You have fallen into an untenable position (nigrahasthāna). Why? Because the soul (puruṣa) is the person (pudgala) and you cannot compare the person with the person.

2) Moreover, you said: “Each one possessing his own mind (ātmacitta), we know that there really is an ātman. If it were only due to a mistake (viparyāsa) about the body and the mind that an ātman is assumed, why not produce the idea of an ātman in regard to another?”

Without knowing if the ātman exists or does not exist, you are asking why one does not produce the idea of the ātman in regard to another.¹¹⁴ [The distinctions] between one’s own body (ātmakāya) and another’s body (parakāya) exist as a function of the ātman. But the ātman is non-existent (nopalabhyate). [The characteristics attributed to it]: having form (rūpin) or formless (arūpin), permanent (nitya) or impermanent (anitya), finite (antavat) or infinite (ananta), moveable (gantr) or motionless (agantr), cognizant (jñātṛ) or ignorant (ajñātṛ), active (kāraka) or inactive (akāraka), autonomous (svatantra) or non-autonomous (asvatantra): all these characteristics of the ātman do not exist (nopalabhyante), as we have said above in the chapter on the ātman.

For many reasons of this kind, the yogin considers that dharmas come from complexes of causes and conditions, that there are no real dharmas endowed with ātman. That is what is called mindfulness of dharmas (dharmasmṛtyupasthāna).

F. Mindfulness itself, by connection with or as object.

The four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) are of three kinds: i) mindfulness in itself (svabhāvasmṛtyupasthāna); ii) mindfulness by connection (saṃsargasmṛtyupasthāna); iii) mindfulness as object (ālambanasmṛtyupasthāna).¹¹⁵ [201a]

¹¹⁴ Compare the refutation developed above, p. 737-747F.

¹¹⁵ See Kośa, VI, p. 159-161; Kośavyākhyā, p. 529-531:

Smṛtyupasthāna itself (svabhāva) is fixing of the attention (smṛter upasthānam): it is a wisdom (prajñā) by which the attention is fixed (smṛtir anayopatiṣṭhate) on the body, the feelings, the mind, dharmas. The person who possesses this prajñā becomes an anupaśyin: hence the phrase: kāye kāyānupaśyī smṛta upasthitasmṛtiḥ.

i) What is mindfulness in itself (svabhāva)? The wisdom (prajñā) that considers the body (kāyam anupaśyan) is mindfulness of the body. – The wisdom that considers the feelings (vedanā) is mindfulness of feelings. – The wisdom that considers the mind (citta) is mindfulness of mind. – The wisdom that considers dharmas is mindfulness of dharmas. This is mindfulness in itself.

ii) What is mindfulness by connection (saṃsarga)? When they consider the body at the head of the list, the dharmas of the Path [other than prajñā], coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), are mindfulness of the body. – When they consider feelings, the mind or dharmas as head of the list, the dharmas of the Path [other than prajñā], coming from causes and conditions, impure or pure, are mindfulness of feelings, mind or dharmas [respectively]. This is mindfulness by connection.

iii) What is mindfulness as object (ālambana)?¹¹⁶ All dharmas with form (rūpadharma), namely, the ten bases of consciousness (daśāyatana) and a small part of the *dharmāyatana*¹¹⁷ are mindfulness of body. – The six kinds of feelings, namely, feeling arising from contact with the eye (caṅkṣuṣaṃsparśajā vedanā) and the feelings arising from contact with the ear (śrotra), nose (ghrāṇa), tongue (jihvā), body (kāya) and mind (manas) respectively¹¹⁸ – The six kinds of consciousnesses, namely, consciousness of the eye (caṅkṣurvijñāna) and consciousnesses of the ear, nose, tongue, body and mind¹¹⁹ are mindfulness of mind. – The notion aggregate (saṃjñāskandha), the volition aggregate (saṃkāraskandha) and the three unconditioned (asaṃskṛta)¹²⁰ are mindfulness of dharmas. That is mindfulness as object.

Mindfulness in itself (svabhāva), having wisdom (prajñā) as nature, is formless (arūpin), invisible (anidarśana), non-resistant (apratigha), sometimes impure (sāsrava) and sometimes pure (anāsrava)...¹²¹.

These things are fully explained in the Ts’ien-nan ‘The Thousand Aporias.’¹²²

When other dharmas, the auxiliaries to the path that are not prajñā, are dharmas co-existing with prajñā, they are smṛtyupasthāna by connection (saṃsarga).

The objects – body, feelings, mind, dharmas – to which the attention is applied are smṛtyupasthāna as object. In this sense, kāyasmṛtyupasthāna should be analyzed as kāyaḥ smṛtyupasthānam ‘the body is fixation of the attention’ as the attention is fixed on it.

¹¹⁶ In other words, on what objects is the attention fixed in the course of the smṛtyupasthāna?

¹¹⁷ Five *ādhyātmikāyatana*s or organs: caṅkṣus, śrotra, ghrāṇa, jihvā and kāya; five *bāhyāyatana*s or objects: rūpa, śabda, gandha, rasa, spraṣṭavya; and the material part of the dharmāyatana, namely, avipijñapti (cf. Kośa, I, p. 20).

¹¹⁸ The six vedanākāyas (cf. Saṃyutta, III, p. 60).

¹¹⁹ The six vijñānakāyas (cf. Saṃyutta, III, p. 61).

¹²⁰ The six saṃjñākāyas (Saṃyutta, III, p. 60), the six cetanākāyas (Saṃyutta, ibid.) and the three asaṃskṛtas - ākāśa and two nirodhas – accepted by the Sarvāstivādin (Kośa, I, p. 8-9).

¹²¹ There follows a long list which I [Lamotte] think need not be translated here. It shows many analogies with the Pāli Vibhaṅga, p. 206.

G. Inner, outer and mixed mindfulness

[1. In regard to kāyasmṛtyupasthāna.] – What is the inner body (adhyātmakāya); what is the outer body (bahirdhākāya) and, since everything is already included (saṃgrhīta) in the inner and outer body, why does the sūtra¹²³ speak again about the consideration of both the inner and outer body (adhyātmabāhirdhākāyānupaśyanā)?

Answer. – One’s own body (svakāya) is inner; another’s body (parakāya) is outer.

One’s own body is of two kinds: i) the impurities (aśuci) inside the body; ii) the skin (tvac), the hairs (roman), the nails (nakha), the hairs of the head (keśa), etc., outside.

¹²² Prakaraṇapāda, T 1541, k. 8-9, p. 667c-672a; T 1542, k. 11-12, p. 739b-743c.

The Traité cites the Ts’ien-nan (p’in) ‘Chapter of the thousand Aporias’ three times: k. 18, p. 195a15-16 (see above, p. 1101F); k. 19, p. 202a5; 203a8. It is the seventh chapter of the [Abhidharma]-Prakaraṇapāda-[śāstra] entitled in the Chinese versions Ts’ien wen louen p’in (T 1541, k. 8, p. 663a5) or Pien ts’ien wen p’in (T 1542, k. 10, p. 733a17) corresponding to a Sanskrit original like Sahasrapariprcchā-varga ‘Chapter of the Thousand Aporias’.

The Prakaraṇapāda, also called Prakaraṇagrantha or simply Prakaraṇa, is part of the Śaṭpādābhidharma of the Sarvāstivādin made up of the Jñānaprasthāna of Kātyāyanīputra and six annexed treatises (see above, p. 111F, n. 1).

The Sanskrit sources (Kośavyākhyā, p. 9), Tibetan sources (Bu ston, I, p. 49; Tāranātha, p. 296) and the Chinese sources attribute the Prakaraṇapāda to Vasumitra who composed it at Gandhāra, not far from Puṣkarāvati (Si-yu-ki, T 2087, k. 2, p. 881a15-16). But according to the Traité (above, p. 111-112F), only the first four chapters were by Vasumitra, the last four of which are the Ts’ien-nan p’in were the work of the Kaśmir arhats.

According to the modern exegetists, the Prakaraṇapāda belonged to the Abhidharma of the late period and shows affinities with the Vibhaṅga of the Pāli Abhidhamma: cf. Kogen Mizuno, Abhidharma Literature, Ceylon Enc., I, p. 70-71; A. C. Banerjee, Sarvāstivādin Literature, 1957, p. 62-64; B. C. Law, History of Pāli Literature, I, 1933, p. 340.

The Prakaraṇapāda is often cited by Vasubandhu in his Kośa, by Yaśomitra in his Kośavyākhyā and by Saṃghabhadra in his Nyāyānusāra (cf. Taisho Index, 16, p. 174).

Two Chinese translations of the Prakaraṇapāda have been made:

a. Tchong che fen a-p’i-t’an louen (T 1541) by the Indian Brahmin Guṇabhadra (394-468) and his disciple Bodhiyaśa (cf. Li tai san pao ki, T 2034, k. 10, p. 91a25; K’ai yuan mou lou, T 2154, K. 5, p. 528b11).

b. A-p’i-ta-mo p’in tsou louen (T 1542) by Hiuan-tsang. The translation was started in the Yun-kouang hall at Yu-houa sseu the 1st of the 9th month of the 5th hien-k’ing year (October 10, 660) and finished the 23rd day of the 10th month of the same year (November 30). Ta-cheng-kouang, etc., wrote it down with the brush (K’ai yuan mou lou, T 2154, k. 8, p. 447a14-15).

¹²³ The canonical sūtra mentioned above, p. 1122F.

Furthermore, when the yogin considers a corpse (mṛtaśarīra), bloated (vyādhmātaka) and rotting (vipūyaka), he grasps the characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇāti) and examines his own body, saying: “This body, too, is of the same nature, the same constitution and has not gone beyond this state of affairs” (sa imam eva kāyam upasaṃharati: ayam api khalu kāya evaṃdharma evaṃbhāvy etad anatīta iti),¹²⁴ then the corpse is the ‘outer’ body, whereas the yogin’s body is the ‘inner’ body.

If the yogin, possibly seeing a beautiful woman (abhirūpastrī), becomes attached to her in his mind and then considers the impurities (aśuci) of this female body, it is a matter of an outer body. But if the yogin recognizes that his own body is exactly like it, it is a question of an inner body.

Furthermore, the five organs (indriya), eye (cakṣus), etc., are inner body whereas the five objects (viśaya), color (rūpa), etc., are outer body.

The four great elements (mahābhūta) are inner body whereas the matter derived from the four great elements (bhautikarūpa) are outer body.

The place where suffering and happiness are experienced is the inner body; the place where one does not experience suffering and happiness is outer body.

One’s own body (svakāya) and the organs (indriya), eye (cakṣus), etc., are inner body; one’s wife (bhāryā), son (putra), wealth (dhana), fields (kṣetra), house (grha) and other utilized objects are outer body. How is that? Since material dharmas (rūpadharma) are all [objects] of mindfulness of the body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna).

First the yogin examines the inner body (adhyātmakāya) to find out if he can find a pure (śuci), eternal (nitya) and happy (sukha) ātman there, but he examines thoroughly and can find no ātman, as has been said above (p. 1167F) in regard to the examination of dharmas.

But if he finds no ātman when he examines the inner [body], perhaps this ātman is outside (bahirdhā). Why? Because outer things (bāhyavastu) are an object of attachment (abhiniveśasthāna) for all beings.¹²⁵ But when the yogin examines the outer body, the ātman is not found there either.

Then the yogin makes this reflection: “When I examined inwardly (adhyātmam anupaśyan), I did not find the ātman and [I wondered] if it was not on the outside (bahirdhā), but when I examined [things] on the outside, I did not find it either. I wonder if the ātman is not a delusion (bhrānti). Now I must examine internally and externally simultaneously (yugapat). Examining internal and external are two distinct operations (bhinna); examining [internal and external] at the same time (ekakāle) and simultaneously (sārdham) are conjunct operations!” But although he examines [internal and external] conjointly or separately, the ātman is not found anywhere (nopalabhyate): the examination is therefore ended.

[2. In regard to vedanāsmṛtyupasthāna.] – Question. – In regard to mindfulness of the body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna), it might be a matter of the inner [body] and the outer [body]. But here, all the ¹²⁴ Canonical expression: cf. Dīgha, II, p. 297; Majjhima, I, p. 58: Ayam pi kho kāyo evaṃdhammo evaṃbhāvī etaṃ anatīto ti.

¹²⁵ Therefore capable of being taken for the ‘self’ or ‘mine’ feelings (vedanā) are included (saṃgrhita) in the external bases of consciousness (bāhyāyatana);¹²⁶ so how can there be a difference between inner feelings (ādhyātmikavedanā) and outer feelings (bāhyavedanā)?

Answer. – The Buddha said: “There are two kinds of feelings: bodily feeling (kāyikī vedanā) and mental feeling (caitasikī vedanā).”¹²⁷ Bodily feeling is outer (bāhya) and mental feeling is inner (ādhyātmika).

Furthermore, the feelings associated with the [first] five consciousnesses (pañcavijñānasamprayuktavedanā) are outer, and the feelings associated with the mental consciousness (manovijñānasamprayuktavedanā) are inner.

The feelings arise in dependence on the twelve bases of consciousness [202b] (dvādaśāyatana). The group of the six inner bases (ādhyātmikāyatana) produce feelings that are inner; the outer six bases (bāhyāyatana) produce feelings that are outer.

Coarse (audārika) feeling is outer; subtle (sūkṣma) feeling is inner.

There are two kinds of suffering (duḥkha): inner suffering and outer suffering.

a. Inner suffering (ādhyātmika duḥkha) is of two types: physical suffering (kāyika duḥkha) and mental suffering (caitasika duḥkha).¹²⁸ Physical suffering is the four hundred and four sicknesses (vyādhi), bodily pains (kāyavyādhi), headaches (śirovyādhi), etc.¹²⁹: those are physical suffering. – Mental suffering is grief (daurmanasya), sadness (śoka), hatred (dveṣa), fear (bhaya), jealousy (īrṣyā), doubt (vicikitsā), etc.: those are mental suffering. These two sufferings together are inner suffering.

b. Outer suffering (bāhyaduḥkha) is of two types: i) the king (rājan), the victorious enemy (vijetr), the wicked thief (caura), the lion (siṃha), tiger (vyāghra), wolf (vṛka), snake (sarpa) and other nuisances (viheṭhana); ii) the wind (vāta), rain (vṛṣṭi), cold (śīta), heat (uṣṇa), thunder (meghagarjita), lightning (vidyut), thunderbolts, etc.: these two kinds of suffering are outer suffering.

It is the same for pleasant feeling (sukhavedanā) and neither unpleasant nor pleasant feeling (aduḥkhāsukhavedanā).

Furthermore, the feeling that takes as object (ālambate) an inner dharma is an inner feeling; that which takes as object an outer dharma is an outer feeling.

Furthermore, the one hundred and eight feelings¹³⁰ are inner feelings; the others (śeṣa) are outer feelings.

¹²⁸ Cf. Majjhima, I, p. 302: Yaṃ kho āvuso kāyikaṃ vā cetasikaṃ vā dukkhaṃ asātaṃ vedayitaṃ ayaṃ dukkhā vedanā.

¹²⁹ See above, p. 494-495F, 583-585F.

¹³⁰ The canonical sources distinguish two, three, five, six, eighteen, thirty-six, and one hundred and eight kinds of vedanā: cf. Samyutta, IV, p. 231-232; Tsang, T 99, no. 485, k. 17, p. 123c-124b. Later the Traité (k. 36, p. 324b4-8) will return to this subject.

[3. In regard to cittasamṛtyupasthāna.] – Question. – The mind is included (saṃgrhita) in the inner bases of consciousness (ādhyātmikāyatana): how can the sūtra say that [the yogin] “also considers the mind outwardly” (bahirdhā vā citte cittānupaśyī viharatī)?

Answer. – Although the mind is included in the inner bases of consciousness, when it takes as object (ālambate) an outer dharma, it is outer mind, and when it takes as object an inner dharma, it is inner mind.

The mental consciousness (manovijñāna) is an inner mind, and the [first] five consciousnesses (pañcavijñāna) are outer minds.

The concentrated mind (saṃkṣiptacitta) that penetrates into meditation (dhyānapraviṣṭa) is an inner mind; the distracted mind (vikṣiptacitta) is an outer mind.

The mind associated (saṃprayukta) with the five inner obstacles (ādhyātmikanīvaraṇa)¹³¹ or with the inner seven factors of enlightenment (ādhyātmikabodhyaṅga) is an inner mind; the mind associated with the five outer obstacles (bāhyānīvaraṇa) or with the seven outer factors of enlightenment (bāhyabodyaṅga) is an outer mind.

For various reasons of this kind, we distinguish inner mind, outer mind and both inner and outer mind.

[4. In regard to dharmasmṛtyupasthāna.] – Mindfulness of dharmas (dharmasmṛtyupasthāna) is included (saṃgrhita) in the outer bases of consciousness (bāhyāyatana): how can [the sūtra] say that [the yogin] “also considers dharmas inwardly” (ādhyātmaṃ vā dharmeṣu dharmānupaśyī viharatī)?

Answer. – Outside of feeling (vedanāṃ sthāpayitvā), there are other mental dharmas (caitasika dharma). Mental dharmas that have as object (ālambante) an inner dharma are inner dharmas; mental dharmas that have as object an outer dharma, the unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) or the formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra)¹³² are outer dharmas.

Furthermore, the dharmas that are the object (ālambana) of the mental consciousness (manovijñāna) are inner dharmas, for it has been said by the Buddha: “The mental consciousness arises in dependence on the object (ālambanam āśrityotpadate manovijñānam).” Here, except for feeling (vedanāṃ sthāpayitvā), the other mental dharmas (caitasika dharma) are inner dharmas, whereas the other formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) and the unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛtadharmas) are outer dharmas.

2. The Four Right Efforts

¹³¹ The five obstacles preventing entry into dhyāna. The Traité has spoken of them above (p. 1012-1020F). In the same way as the factors of enlightenment, these obstacles are inner or outer according to whether one examines them within oneself or in another.

¹³² Kośa, II, p. 178 and foll.: cf. the cittavippayutta of the Pāli scholasticism: Dhammasaṅgaṇī, p. 210, 254.

Right effort in itself develops four kinds of exertion (vīrya) in view of the path (mārga): it eliminates the two types of bad dharmas (akuśaladharmā), [namely, those that have not yet arisen and those that have already arisen], and it brings together the two types of good dharmas (kuśaladharmā), [namely, those that have not yet arisen and those that have already arisen.]

During the examination (anupaśyanā) characteristic of the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), when [the yogin] feels some laziness (kausīdya), when the five obstacles (pañcanīvaraṇa) and the other passions (kleśa) cloud the mind and he strays away from the five kinds of roots of good, faith, etc. (śraddhādhikuśalamūla), then he makes an effort (vyāyacchate) and develops exertion (vīryam ārabhate) for: 1) eliminating the bad dharmas that have already arisen (utpannānām akuśaladharmāṇām prahāṇāya); 2) preventing the arising of the bad dharmas that have not yet arisen (anutpannānām akuśalānām dharmāṇām anutpādāya); 3) making the good dharmas, faith, etc., that have not yet arisen, arise (anutpannānām śraddhādhikuśaladharmāṇām utpādāya); 4) developing the good dharmas that have already arisen (utpannānām kuśaladharmāṇām bhūyobhāvāya).¹³³ When these [four] exertions are abundant during the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), they take the name of right efforts (samyakpradhāna). [202c]

Of the seven categories of dharmas [auxiliary to enlightenment (bodhipakṣika)], why are these four called right efforts and the last eight, [namely, samyagdr̥ṣṭi, etc.] not described as right (samyak)?

Answer. – Because these four kinds of exertion (vīrya), of spiritual energy (cittābhyusāha) or efforts (ārambha) are easily damaged by error (bhrānti), they are called right efforts. Because the [eight] factors of the Path, [samyagdr̥ṣṭi, etc.] take pleasure in the Dharma and are easily damaged by falling into bad doctrines (mithyādharmā), they are called right Path.

[The right efforts] in themselves (svabhāva) are the four kinds of exertions (caturvidhavīrya). [The right efforts] by connection (saṃsarga) are the dharmas of the Path resulting from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), [dharmas other than the four right efforts] but having primarily the four kinds of exertion (caturvidhavīrya) in question. They are impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), with form (rūpin) or formless (arūpin), as has been said above (p. 1170F).

3. The Four Bases of Magical Power

When the four right efforts (samyakpradhāna) are practiced, the mind is slightly distracted (vikṣipta); this is why the concentrations (samādhi) are used to fix the mind: [concentrations of zeal (chanda), of exertion (vīrya), of the mind (citta) and of examination (mīmāṃsā). These concentrations are called bases of magical power (rddhipāda).

¹³³ Canonical formula already cited above, p. 1123F.

Thus, when good food (praṇūāhāra) is under-salted, it lacks flavor (rasa), but when salt (lavaṇa) is added, the taste is sufficient and is in accord with what is desired (yatheṣṭa). Or again, when a person who has two legs finds a good horse (aśva) or a good chariot (ratha), he comes to his destination as desired.

Similarly, when the yogin has obtained the true wisdoms that are the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) and these right exertions (samyagvīrya) that are the four right efforts (samyakpradhāna), his wisdom (prajñā) is increased (vardhate) by means of these exertions; however, the strength of his concentration (samādhibala) remains weak. But when he obtains the four kinds of concentration (caturvidhasamādhi) and therefore fixes his mind (cittaṃ pragr̥hṇati), the strength of his wisdom (prajñā) and concentration (samādhi) are equal (sama) and his vows (praṇidhāna) are realized. [These four concentrations] are called bases of magical power.

Question. – Concentration (samādhi) already was present in the four foundations of mindfulness and the four right efforts. Why not call them the bases of magical power?

Answer. – These practices do indeed contain [a certain measure] of concentration, but although wisdom (prajñā) and exertion (vīrya) are strong in them, concentration is weak. That is why the yogin did not realize his wishes (praṇidhāna) as he desired. [In the bases of magical power], there are four kinds of concentrations:

i) The concentration obtained by giving predominance to zeal (chandaṃ adhipatiṃ kṛtvā).¹³⁴

ii) The concentration obtained by giving predominance to exertion (vīryaṃ adhipatiṃ kṛtvā).

From these concentrations as causes and conditions there arise [the practices of] the Path, impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava).

iii) The concentration obtained by giving predominance to the mind (cittaṃ adhipatiṃ kṛtvā) iv) The concentration obtained by giving predominance to examination (mīmāṃsāṃ adhipatiṃ kṛtvā).

From these concentrations as causes and conditions there arise [practices of] the Path, impure or pure.

Together with the five good elements (kuśalaskandhasaṃsargāt) these practices are called [bases of] magical power by connection (saṃsargarddhipāda).

The four kinds of concentrations under the predominating influence of zeal (chanda), etc., are called [bases of] magical power in itself (svabhāvarddhipāda).¹³⁵

¹³⁴ Formulas appearing in the Vibhaṅga, p. 216, and Kośavyākhyā, p. 601-602; see above, p. 1125F.

¹³⁵ The four concentrations having zeal, exertion, the mind, examination a predominating respectively are the bases of magical power (see above, p. 382-383F).

Taken by themselves (svabhāva), they are of lower order: they are right views but are impure (sāsrava), having only meritorious value (puṇyabhāgīya) and bearing fruit only in this world (upadhivaipakaya); it is the right view of worldly people who see the truth but stay apart from the path traced by the Buddha.

For the four right efforts (samyakpradhāna) and the four bases of magical power (rddhipāda) see what was said in full detail in regard to the smṛtyupasthānas in themselves and as smṛtyupasthānas by connection (p. 1169F).

4. The Five Faculties

Here are the five faculties (pañcendriya):¹³⁶

1. Believing in the Path (mārga) and in the good dharmas adjuvant to the Path (mārgapākṣika kuśaladharmā) is the faculty of faith (śraddhendriya).
2. When the yogin practices the Path and the dharmas adjuvant to the Path and exerts himself without stopping, that is the faculty of exertion (vīryendriya).
3. When he thinks about the Path and the dharmas adjuvant to the Path and does not think of anything else, that is the faculty of memory (smṛtīndriya).
4. When he meditates attentively (ekacittena) and without being distracted (avikṣepam), that is the faculty of concentration (samādhīndriya).
5. When, in view of the Path and the dharmas adjuvant to the Path, he considers (anupaśyati) the sixteen aspects of the truths (ṣoḍaśākāra),¹³⁷ impermanence (anitya), etc., that is the faculty of wisdom (prajñēndriya).

5. The Five Strengths

When the five faculties have increased and are no longer troubled by the afflictions (kleśa), they take the name of strengths (bala).¹³⁸ See what has just been said about the five faculties.

On the other hand, together with the five good elements (the dharmakkhandha of the Dīgha, III, p. 229, 279, Itivuttaka, p. 107; the lokottaraskandha of the Dharmaguptaka, § 23; the asamasamāḥ skandhāḥ of the Mahāvīyut., no. 103-108) – namely, śīla, samādhi, prajñā, vimukti, vimuktijñānadarśana –, these four concentrations ‘by connection’ (samsarga) are the right views of the nobles (ārya), pure (anāsrava), supramundly (lokottara) and linked to the Path (mārgāṅga); this is the view found in the noble mind, purified, joined to the way, following the noble Path. See Majjhima, III, p. 72.

¹³⁶ For the Traité, the five indriyas concern the Path and the auxiliaries to enlightenment exclusively.

The canonical sources cited above (p. 1125F) are less precise: according to them, faith (śraddhā), rather, would have the Buddha as object.

On the order of the indriyas, cf. Kośa, VI, p. 287.

¹³⁷ See above, p. 641F.

The five faculties and the five strengths come under the aggregate of volition (saṃskāraskandha), are always associated (sadāsamprayukta), are mental events (caitasikadharmā) accompanying the mind (cittānuparivartin); they arise with the mind, endure with the mind and perish with the mind.

When one possesses them, the mind is in right concentration (samyaksamādhi); when one does not possess them, the mind falls into wrong concentrations (mithyāsamadhi).

6. The Seven Members of Enlightenment

On the seven members of enlightenment (sapta sambodhyaṅga), see the explanations above (p. 1149F). [203a]

Question. – You previously gave the meaning but you did not speak from the Abhidharma point of view.

Answer. – It is necessary here to repeat what was said above (p. 1170F) in regard to the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna).

The seven members of enlightenment are formless (arūpin), invisible (anidarśana), non-resistant (apratigha), pure (anāsrava), conditioned (saṃskṛta), resulting from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), included in the three times (triyadhrvasaṃgrhīta), included in name (nāmasaṃgrhīta), included in the outer bases of consciousness (bāhyāyatanaṃgrhīta) and not to be destroyed by seeing (na darśanena prahātavya), things to be cultivated (bhāvanādharmā) and non-defiled things (asaṃskliṣṭadharmā), being fruit (phala) and involving a fruit (saphala), being neither feeling (na vedanā) nor matter derived (bhautika, upādāya rūpa) from the four great elements, nor cause associated with existence (na bhavanasamprayuktahetu). Two sections of the good (kuśala) contain the seven members of enlightenment and the seven members of enlightenment contain two sections of the good. [The members of enlightenment] are dissociated from bad, indeterminate, impure dharmas and dharmas containing impurity (akuśala-avyākṛta-āsrava-sāsravadharma-viprayukta). Two sections of the anāsrava include the seven members of enlightenment and the seven members of enlightenment include two sections of the anāsrava.

These various things have been discussed fully in the Ts'ien-nan ‘The Thousand Apories’.¹³⁹

¹³⁸ There is only a difference in intensity between the five indriyas and the five balas: see above, p. 1127F; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 141, p. 726b13-20; Kośa, VI, p. 286.

¹³⁹ Prakaraṇapāda, T 1541, k. 10, p. 679c9 foll.; T 1542, k. 15, p. 753a. – Cf. Vibhāṅga, p. 232-234.

On the Chapter of the Thousand Apories, see above, p. 1171F, note 1.

7. The Eight Members of the Path

On the eight members of the noble Path (āryāṣṭaṅgamārga), see what has been said above (p. 1150F).

1. [The first member], right view (samyakdrṣṭi), is the wisdom mentioned in regard to the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna), the faculty of wisdom (prajñendriya), the strength of wisdom (prajñābala) and the member of enlightenment called discernment of dharmas (dharmapravicayasambodhyaṅga).

2. [The second member], right thought (samyaksaṃkalpa), is, at the time of contemplating the four truths (satyānupaśyanā), associated with a pure mind (anāsravacittasamprayukta): it is a reflection (tarka), an enquiry (vitarka), an understanding (avabodha), an examination (mīmāṃsa).

3. [The sixth member], right effort (samyagvyāyāma) has already been mentioned in regard to the four right efforts (samyakpradhāna), the faculty of exertion (vīryendriya), the strength of exertion (vīryabala) and the member of enlightenment called exertion (vīryasambodhyaṅga).

4. [The seventh member], right attentiveness (samyaksmṛti), has already been mentioned in regard to the faculty of attentiveness (smṛtīndriya), the strength of attentiveness (smṛtibala) and the member of enlightenment called attentiveness (smṛtisambodhyaṅga).

5. [The eighth member], right concentration (samyaksamādhi) has already been mentioned in regard to the bases of magical power (rddhipāda), the faculty of concentration (samādhīndriya), the strength of concentration (samādhībala) and the member of enlightenment called concentration (samādhisambodhyaṅga).

Now it is necessary to speak [of the three remaining members]: right speech (samyagvāc), right action (samyakkarmānta) and right livelihood (samyagājīva).

6. [The third member or samyagvāc]. – With the exception of the four bad ways of livelihood (mithyājīva),¹⁴⁰ fixing vocal actions (vākkarmaṣṭāṇa) and, by means of a pure wisdom (anāsravaprajñā), rejecting and eliminating bad vocal actions (vānmithyākarmaṇa).

7. [The fourth member or samyakkarmānta]. – For right action (samyakkarmānta), it is the same [allowing for a few minor variations].

8. [The fifth member or samyagājīva]. – By means of a pure wisdom (anāsravaprajñā), to reject and eliminate the five bad ways of livelihood is right livelihood (samyagājīva).

Question. – What are the five bad ways of livelihood (mithyājīva)?¹⁴¹ Answer. – a. Out of love for profit (lāhalobha), to manifest all kinds of wonders (āścarya) by cheating (kuhāna).

¹⁴⁰ These will be discussed in regard to the fifth member or samyagājīva.

¹⁴¹ The five bad ways of livelihood are formulated in sybilline terms which have severely tested the wisdom of translators. Besides, the texts show many variations:

b. Out of love for profit, to boast about one's own qualities (svaṅgalapanā).

c. Out of love for profit, to predict good luck (svasti) or bad luck (asvasti) to people.

d. Out of love for profit, to proclaim loudly (uccais) one's own power (prabhāva) in order to frighten people and make them respect oneself.

a. Pāli sources. – Majjhima, III, p. 75: Katamo ca bhikkhave micchā-ājīvo. Kuhanā, lapanā, nemittakatā, nippesikatā, lābhena lābhaṃ nijigimsanatā. – Transl. I. B. Horner, Middle Length Sayings, III, p. 118: 'Trickery, cajolery, insinuating, dissembling, rapacity for gain upon gain'. Scholarly notes justify this translation.

Dīgha, I, p. 8, 67; Anguttara, III, p. 111: Kuhakā ca honti, lapakā ca, nemittikā ca, nippesikā ca, lābhena ca lābhaṃ nijigimsitaro iti. – Transl. L. Renou, Canon bouddhique pāli, vol. I, fasc. 1, 1949, p. 8: 'They become swindlers, boasters, soothsayers, jugglers, seeking to gain profit upon profit.'

The Pāli commentaries pile synonym upon synonym and are not of much help: cf. Vibhaṅga, p. 352-353 (reproduced in Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 19); Sumaṅgalavilāsinī, I, p. 91-92: Papañcasūdanī, IV, p. 134; Manorathapūraṇī, III, p. 273, 412.

b. Sanskrit sources. – Koṣavyākhyā, p. 420: 1) kuhanā, 2) lapanā, 3) naimittikatā, 4) naiṣpeṣitā, 5) lābhena lābhāniścikīrṣā.

Bodh. bhūmi, p. 168: 1) kuhanā, 2) lapanā, 3) naimittikā, 4) naiṣpeṣikatā, 5) lābhena lābhaṃ niścikīrṣutā.

Abhidharmadīpa, p. 309: 1) kuhanā, 2) lapanā, 3) naimittikatā, 4) naiṣpeṣikatā, 5) lābhena lābhasya niścikīrṣatā.

Mahāvvyut., no. 2493-97: 1) kuhanā = ṇan pa, 2. lapanā = kha=gsag, 3. naiṣpeṣikatva = thob kyis hjal ba, thob cin hjal ba, 4) naimittikatva = gEog sloṅ, 5) lābhena lābhāniṣpādanatā = rñed pas eñed pa sgrub pa. – For the Chinese translations, see Hiuan-tsang (T 1579, k. 41, p. 518a7), preferable to the translations adopted by the editions of the Mahāvvyutpatti.

In the Lexicalisches annexed to his edition of the Bodh. bhūmi, p. 21-26, U. Wogihara has succeeded in defining the meaning of these five expressions. Edgerton's Hybrid Sanskrit Dictionary (p. 189, 461, 312, 313, 462) is mainly inspired by Wogihara.

The explanations given here by the Traité may be found mainly in the Abhidharmadīpa, p. 310:

Abhūtaḡaṇadarśanārtham ūryāpathavikalpakṛe caittaviṣeṣaḡ kuhanā. Lābhārtham eva ḡuṇapriyalapanakṛl lapanā. Upakaraṇārthitvanimittadarśanakṛc caittaviṣeṣo naimittikatā. Paraḡaṇavad doṣavacananiṣeṣanakṛd eva caitasiko naiṣpeṣikatā.

Labdhalābhakhyāpanenānyalābhāniścikīrṣanatā lābhena lābhasya niścikīrṣatā.

The five bad ways of livelihood are thus special mental events (caittaviṣeṣa). Kuhanā, cheating, resorts to various attitudes to show qualities that one does not have. Lapanā, boasting, consists of praising one's own qualities towards one's own interest. Naimittikatā, divination, under pretext of rendering service, to interpret favorable or unfavorable signs. Naiṣpeṣikatā, extortion, to snatch a favor by means of threats. Lābhena lābhāniścikīrṣatā, to try to grab new profit by virtue of a profit previously won.

e. Out of love for profit, to speak of offerings already obtained (labdhapūjā) in order to encourage [other] people [to give in their turn].

These eight right paths (samyagmārga) are arranged into three groups (skandha):

- a. Three of them, [right speech (samyagvāc), right action (samyakkarmānta) and right livelihood (samyagājīva)], make up the class of morality (śīlaskandha).
- b. Three others, [right effort (samyagvyāyāma), right mindfulness (samyaksmti) and right concentration (samyaksamādhi)], make up the class of concentration (samādhiskandha).
- c. Two, finally, [right view (samyagdr̥ṣṭi) and right thinking (samyaksamkalpa)], make up the class of wisdom (prajñāskandha).¹⁴²

The class of wisdom and the class of concentration are as above. Now we must talk about the class of morality.

The class of morality (śīlaskandha) has form (rūpasvabhāva), is invisible (anidarśana), non-resistant (apratigha), pure (anāsrava), conditioned (saṃskṛta), non-retribution (avipāka), the result of causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), included in the three times (tryadhvasaṃgrhīta), included in form (rūpasamgrhīta), not included in name (na nāmasaṃgrhīta), included in the outer bases of consciousness (bāhyāyatanaṃgrhīta), not to be destroyed by meditation (na bhāvanayā prahātavya) and not to be destroyed by seeing (na darśanena prahātavya), something to be cultivated (bhāvanādharmā) and something non-defiled (asaṃkliṣṭadharmā), being fruit (phala) and involving a fruit (saphala), not being either feeling (na vedanādharmā) nor derived from the four great elements (na bhautika), not something of subordinate rank (na sottaradharmā) nor a cause associated with existence (na bhavasamprayuktahetu).

One section of the good (kuśala) includes (saṃgrhīta) three [members of [203b] the] right path and these three [members of the right path] include a section of the good. The members are dissociated from the bad, indeterminate, impure or involving impurity dharmas (akuśala-avyākṛta-sāsrava-sāsravadharma-viprayukta).

One dharma of the anāsrava includes three [other members of] the right path, and these three members also include one dharma of the anāsrava.

These various explanations are presented in full in the Abhidharma.

8. Distribution of the Auxiliaries in the Stages¹⁴³

1. The thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment (bodhipakṣikadharmā) are all present in the stage of the first dhyāna (prathamadhyāna).
2. In the stage of the ānāgāmya [preliminary absorption of the first dhyāna], there are thirty-six auxiliaries, excluding the member of enlightenment called joy (prīṭisaṃbodhyaṅga).
3. In the second dhyāna (dvitīyadhyāna), there are also thirty-six auxiliaries, excluding [the member of the path] called right thinking (samyaksamkalpamārgaṅga).
4. In the intermediate dhyāna (dhyānāntara) [subdivision of the first dhyāna], in the third dhyāna (trītyadhyāna) and in the fourth dhyāna (caturthadhyāna), there are thirty-five auxiliaries, excluding the member of enlightenment called joy (prīṭisaṃbodhyaṅga) and excluding the [member of the path called] right thinking (samyaksamkalpamārgaṅga).
5. In the [first] three formless absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti), there are thirty-two auxiliaries, excluding the member of enlightenment called joy (prīṭisaṃbodhyaṅga) and [the members of the path (mārgaṅga) called] right thinking (samyaksamkalpa), right speech (samyagvāc), right action (samyakkarmānta) and right livelihood (samyagājīva).
6. In the summit of existence (bhavāgra) [or fourth formless absorption], there are twenty-two auxiliaries, excluding the seven members of enlightenment (saṃbodhyaṅga) and the eight members of the noble path (āryamārgaṅga).
7. In the desire realm (kāmadhātu), there are also twenty-eight auxiliaries [excluding the sambodhyaṅgas and the eight mārgaṅgas].

¹⁴³ These are the eleven stages (bhūmi) of birth (upapatti) and concentration (samādhi) accepted by the Vaibhāṣikas (Kośa, VI, p. 236; VII, p. 71), namely:

- 1) kāmadhātu
- 2) anāgāmya or preliminary absorption (sāmantaka) of the first dhyāna
- 3) first dhyāna
- 4) dhyānāntara, higher type of the first dhyāna
- 5-7) second, third and fourth dhyānas
- 8-11) the four ārūpyasamāpattis, formless absorptions, the fourth of which is also listed under the name of bhavāgra, summit of existence.

For further details, see above, p. 1027-1034F, and the note on p. 1035F.

In regard to the distribution of the auxiliaries among the eleven stages, the Traité adopts the viws here of the Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 96, p. 497c4-15, which will be taken up again in the Abhidharmamr̥ta, T 1553, k. 2, p. 977c21-26 (reconstr. Sastri, p. 117), Kośa, VI, p. 291-292 and Abhidharmadīpa, p. 365.

Third Section THE AUXILIARIES ACCORDING TO THE MAHĀYĀNA

Question. – What is the meaning (artha) of these thirty-seven auxiliaries as taught in the Mahāyāna?

I. THE FOUR FOUNDATIONS OF MINDFULNESS

Answer. – The bodhisattva-mahāsattva practices the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna).

1. Mindfulness of body

He contemplates his inner body as impermanent, suffering, like a sickness, like an ulcer (so 'dhyātmakāyāṃ anityato duḥkhato rogato gaṇḍataḥ samanupaśyati),¹⁴⁴ a mass of rotting flesh (read jou tsui), filled with impurities (aśuciparipūrṇa), oozing from nine gates (navadvāra)¹⁴⁵ and a veritable walking latrine. In the same way, he contemplates the repulsive nakedness of the body where there is not even one pure place.

This 'pile of bones, equipped with flesh and blood, wrapped with tendons' (asthisamkalikā samāśalohitā snāyusambandhā),¹⁴⁶ this leather bag, that has as causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) the impure actions (sāsravakarma) of earlier lives (pūrvajanman), is provided in this life (ihajanman) with baths (snāpana), flowers (puṣpa) perfumes (gandha), clothes (vastra), food (āhāra), beds and seats (śayasana), remedies and medicines (glānapratyayabhaisajya), etc. It is like a two-wheeled cart (dvicakra ratha) which, when drawn by the power of an ox (gobala), can move: the causes and conditions of the two lifetimes produce the 'cart' of the body and, pulled by this 'ox' which is the consciousness (vijñāna), it turns, goes forwards and backwards.

¹⁴⁴ Canonical reminiscence: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 500: Ayaṃ kāyo rūpī... aniccato dukkhato rogato gaṇḍato sallato aghato ābādhato parato palokato suññato anattato samanupassitabbo. Same wording in Majjhima, I, p. 435.

¹⁴⁶ Also a canonical expression: cf. Dīgha, II, p. 296; Majjhima, I, p. 58, 89; Anguttara, III, p. 324. For the Sanskrit correspondents, see Edgerton, Dictionary, p. 85 under asthi-śakatā.

This body formed by of the complex of the four great elements (caturmahābhūtasāmagrī) is not real (abhūta) and without substance (asāra), like a ball of foam (phenapiṇḍu).¹⁴⁷

This body is impermanent (anitya) and must perish after a time. The physical characteristics (kāyalakṣaṇa) are not found inside the body, nor outside, nor in between the two (na te 'dhyātmam na bahirdhā nobhayam antareṇopalabhyante).

The body itself does not know itself: it is ignorant (ajñā), inactive (akāraka), like the tiles (kaṭhalla) and stones (śilā) of a wall (kuḍya).

In this body there are no definite physical characteristics (kāyanimitta). There is no person who makes the body nor anyone who makes him make it. In this body there is no earlier term (pūrvānta) nor later term (aparānta) nor middle term (madhyānta).

Eighty thousand types of worms (kṛmikula),¹⁴⁸ innumerable sicknesses (vyādhi), hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsā), cold and heat (śītoṣṇa) and weaknesses always torment the body.

¹⁴⁷ The phenapiṇḍupamaṃ rūpaṃ of Saṃyutta, III, p. 142; see above, p. 370F.

¹⁴⁸ According to the Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 193-194, the body is inhabited by eighty families of worms (kikikula) located in the skin, hide, flesh, tendons, bones, marrow, and which feed there: "There they are born, live, die and fill their greater and lesser needs: the body is their maternity ward, their hospital, their cemetery, their latrine ditch and even dies under their rage." According to the same text, p. 213, the stomach itself is occupied by thirty-two types of worms, round worms, ribbon worms, thread worms, etc., ever in turmoil: when the body is on a light diet, the worms jump around crying and strike against the heart region; when the body is fed, they rush to seize the mouthfuls of food. – According to the Milindapañha, p. 100, these undesirable and undesired guests come into the body and multiply there by the power of bad actions.

The Mahāyāna texts go so far as to postulate the presence in the body of eighty-four thousand types of worms. The Udayanavatsarājaparipṛcchā, cited in the Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 81, actually says: Aśiṭiḥ krimikulasaḥsārāṇi yāni tiṣṭhanti antare.

The wise person puts up with their presence. According to the Ratnakūṭa (T 310, k. 114, p. 645b4-6), the forest-dwelling monk (aranyabhikṣu), when he is about to eat, has the following thought: "In this body there are at present 80,000 types of worms. When the worms get this food, they will all be safe; now I am going to attract these worms with this food." – According to the Avatamsaka (T 279, k. 21, p. 112c12-15: cf. T 278, k. 12, p. 476b12-15), at the time of the bodhisattva's meal, he has the following thought: "In my body there are 80,000 types of worms; they live in me; when my body is filled, they too are filled; when my body suffers from hunger, they too suffer from hunger. Now by taking this food and drink (pānabhojana), I hope that these beings may be replete. Therefore I am myself eating this food so as to make a gift to them; I do not desire the taste of it."

But the great Bodhisattva, the 'irreversible' bodhisattva (avinivartanīya or avaivartika) does not have to formulate such intentions, for one of his numerous privileges is to be completely free of worms. In the Aṣṭasahasrikā, p. 326, we read: Yāni khalu punar anyeṣāṃ sattvānām aśiṭiḥ kurmikulasahasrāṇi

The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who considers the body in this way knows that there is neither his own body (ātmakāya) nor the body of another (parakāya). There is neither master (īśvara) nor agent (kāraka) who makes this body. Empty of characteristics (lakṣaṇaśūnya), the body arises from unreal causes and conditions (abhūtahetupratyaya): this body that has but nominal existence (prajñaptisat) depends on previous actions (pūrvakarma) as causes and conditions.

The bodhisattva then says to himself: “I must not spare the life of the body. Why? The bodily characteristics do not unite and do not separate, they do not come and they do not go, they are not born and they are not destroyed; they do not rest upon anything.”

Pursuing the examination of the body, he says to himself: “Being without ‘I’ (anātman) and without ‘mine’ (anātmīya), this body is empty (śūnya). Being empty, it does not have any male (puruṣa) or female (strī) characteristics. Being without characteristics (animitta), it is not to be wished for (apraṇihita).” [203c]

Thinking thus, the bodhisattva enters into the gate of knowledge (jñānamukha) called ‘wishlessness’ (apraṇihita). He knows that the body is not to be considered in the sense that it arises only from a complex of engendering causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī). But these causes and conditions that produce the body also come from mistakes (bhrānti) and errors (viparyāsa). In these causes and conditions, the nature of cause and condition is also lacking, and the arising of causes and conditions is really a non-arising (anutpāda).

Reflecting thus, the bodhisattva knows that the body, from the beginning, is without the nature of arising (utpādalakṣaṇa). He knows that this body, without characteristics (animitta), is ungraspable (agrāhya). Since it is not born, it is without characteristics and, not having any characteristics, it is not born. Only stupid worldly people (bālaprthagjana) speak about the body.

When the bodhisattva considers the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of the body in this way, he eliminates all desire (rāga) and all attachments (saṅgacitta) and, always fixing his attention on the body, he pursues the examination of the body. That is what is called mindfulness of body (kāyaśmṛtyupasthāna) for the bodhisattva.

It is the same in regard to the consideration of the outer body (bahirdhākāya) and the consideration of the inner and outer body (adhyātmabahirdhākāya).

kāye saṁbhavati tāni tasya kāye sarveṇa sarvathā sarvaṃ na saṁbhavanti. tat kasya hetoḥ. tathā hi tasya tāni kuśalamūlāni sarvalokābhyugātāni bhavanti: “Moreover, these eighty thousand types of worms that are in the bodies of other beings are never found in his body. Why? Because for him these roots of good transcend the entire world.” This privilege of the avaivartika is mentioned in all the versions of the Prajñā: cf. Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 16, p. 339c27; Mahāprajñāpāramitā, T 220, k. 326, p. 666b4-5; k. 448, p. 261c26-28; k. 514, p. 627b13-14; k. 549, p. 826b10-11; k. 562, p. 901a16. Note also, that according to Taoist ideas, grain takes birth in the bodies of the worms which eat away at vitality. On this subject, see H. Maspero, Mélanges Posthumes, I, 1950, p. 98 seq.

2. Mindfulness of feeling

How does the bodhisattva consider feelings (vedanā)? He considers inner feeling (adhyātmavedanā). This feeling is of three kinds: unpleasant (duḥkha), pleasant (sukha) neither unpleasant nor pleasant (aduḥkhāsukha). These feelings do not come from anywhere and, once destroyed, do not go anywhere. They arise only from error (bhrānti), mistakes (viparyāsa) and thought-construction (vikalpa). They are fruit of retribution (vipākaphala), depending on causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) constituted by the actions of previous lifetimes (pūrvajankakarma).

In this way, the bodhisattva considers these feelings that are neither in the past (atīta) nor in the future (anāgata) nor in the present (pratyutpanna). He knows that these feelings are empty (śūnya), without ‘I’ (anātman) or ‘mine’ (anātmīya), impermanent (anitya) and changing (vipariṇāmadharman). Considering the feelings distributed in the three times (tryadhvan) as empty (śūnya), without characteristics (ānimitta) and unworthy of being considered (apraṇihita), he penetrates into the gates of deliverance (vimokṣamukha).¹⁴⁹

He also considers the arising (utpāda) and the cessation (nirodha) of feelings. He knows that feelings are not united, are not separated, do not arise and do not cease. Thus he penetrates into the gate of non-production (anutpādamukha).

He knows that feelings do not arise, are without characteristics (ānimitta) and, being without characteristics, are not born.

Knowing this, he is not attached to the objects (ālambana) of the mind. If he experiences an unpleasant feeling (duḥkha), pleasant feeling (sukha) or a neither unpleasant nor pleasant feeling (aduḥkhāsukha), his mind does not feel it (na vedayati), is not attached to it (nābhiniśīṣate), does not rest on it (nāśrayate).

Considering feelings in this way (etena paryāyena) is what is called mindfulness of feelings (vedanāśmṛtyupasthāna) for the bodhisattva.

It is the same in regard to the consideration of outer feeling (bahirdhāvedanā) and the consideration of both inner and outer feeling (adhyātmabahirdhāvedanā).

3. Mindfulness of mind

What is mindfulness of mind (cittasṁṛtyupasthāna) for the bodhisattva? The bodhisattva considers the inner mind (adhyātmacitta). This inner mind has three characteristics (lakṣaṇa): arising (utpāda), duration (sthiti) and cessation (bhaṅga). He has the following thought: “This mind comes from nowhere and once destroyed, does not go anywhere. It arises only from a complex of inner and outer causes and conditions (adhyātmabahirdhāhetupratyayasāmagrī).”

¹⁴⁹ The three samādhis which will be studied in the following chapter.

This mind has no fixed and real nature, has no real birth, duration or cessation (utpādashitibhaṅga); it does not occur in past (atīta), future (anāgata) or present (pratyutpanna) existence.

This mind is neither inner nor outer nor between the two (na tad adhyātmaṃ na bahirdhā nobhayam antareṇopalabhyate).

This mind is also without intrinsic nature (niḥsvabhāva) and without characteristics (nirmita) and there is nothing that arises or anything that makes it arise. Outwardly, there are various (nānāvidha) mixed (miśra) causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), namely, the six objects (viśaya); inwardly, there are erroneous notions (viparītasamjñā). But due to the succession of births and cessations (utpādanirodhaprabandha), the name of mind (citta) is habitually given to all of that.

The true nature of the mind (cittasya bhūṭalakṣaṇa) does not exist (nopalabhyate) in this mind. In its intrinsic nature (svabhāvena), the mind is not born (notpadyate) and does not cease (na nirudhyate). This mind is always [204a] luminous (prabhāsvara) but, because of adventitious passions (āgantuka kleśa), we [wrongly] speak of the soiled mind (upakliṣṭacitta).

The mind does not recognize itself. Why? Because this mind is empty of characteristics of mind (cittalakṣaṇaśūnya). From the beginning to the end, this mind has no real attributes.

This mind is not joined with nor separated from dharma. It has neither an anterior term (pūrvānta) nor a posterior term (aparānta) nor a middle term (madhyanta). It has neither color (rūpa), shape (saṃsthāna) nor resistance (pratigha). It arises only from mistakes (viparyāsa) and error (bhrānti).

This mind is empty (śūnya), without ‘I’ (anātman), without ‘mine’ (anātmīya), impermanent (anitya) and unreal (asat). That is a consideration in accordance with the mind.

Knowing that the nature of the mind is unborn is to enter into ‘the dharma that do not arise’ (anutpattikadharma). Why? Because this mind is without birth (utpāda), without intrinsic nature (svabhāva) and without characteristics (lakṣaṇa). The wise person (jñānin) can know it. And although the wise person considers the characteristics of birth (utpāda) and cessation (nirodha) of this mind, he will find no true birth, no true cessation. Not finding any defilement (saṃkleśa) or purification (vyāvan) in it, he discovers this luminosity of the mind (cittasya prabhāsvara), a luminosity by virtue of which the mind is not defiled by the adventitious passions (na khale āgantukair upakleśair upakliṣyate).¹⁵⁰

¹⁵⁰ Concerning the nature of the mind (citta), the general tendency of the Canon is clear. Mind (citta), manas and consciousness (viññāna) are synonymous. Vijñāna constitutes the fifth skandha and, like all the aggregates, it is transitory, suffering and impersonal.

However, we find, in the Canon, some passages that seem to attribute to the mind a more stable, almost transcendental, value. Actually, in Anguttara, I, p. 10 and in Atthasālinī, p. 140, we read: Pabassaram idaṃ bhikkhave cittaṃ tañ ca āgantukehi upakkileseshi upakkilīṭṭaṃ... tañ ca kho āgantukehi upakkileseshi vippamuttam: “This mind is luminous, but sometimes it is defiled by adventitious passions; sometimes it is free of these adventitious passions.”

This is how the bodhisattva considers the inner mind (ādhyātmacitta), and it is the same in regard to the outer mind (bahirdhācitta) and the both inner and outer mind (adhyātmabahirdhācitta).

4. Mindfulness of dharma

How does the bodhisattva practice mindfulness of dharma (dharmaśmṛtyupasthāna)? He considers that all dharma are neither on the inside nor on the outside nor in between (na te ‘dhyātmaṃ na bahirdhā nobhayam antareṇopalabhyante); they are not in the past (atīta) lifetime, the future (anāgata) lifetime, or the present (pratyutpanna) lifetime. They arise only from the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī) and wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi). There is no fixed reality; there is no dharma that is any dharma whatsoever.

In the dharma there is no characteristic of dharma and there is no dharma that unites or is separated. All dharma are non-existent like space (ākāśa); all dharma are deceptive like a magic show (māyā).¹⁵¹

Basing themselves on this passage, certain sects of the Lesser Vehicle say that the mind is originally and naturally luminous (cittaṃ prabhāsvaraṃ) but that it may be soiled (kliṣṭa) by the passions (kleśa) or liberated (vipramukta) from the passions. The latter are not the original nature of the mind and are described as adventitious (āgantuka).

Among the sects advocating this maximalist interpretation, one may cite the Mahāśāṃghika (cf. A. Bareau, Les Sectes bouddhiques, p. 67-68, no. 44), the Vibhajyavādin (ibid., p. 175, no. 23; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 27, p. 140b25-26), the practitioners of the Śāriputrābhīdharma (ibid., p. 194, no. 6; Śāriputrābhīdharma, T 1548, k. 27, p. 697b18) and the Andhaka (Kathāvatthu, p. 238-241).

But the major schools of the Lesser Vehicle resolutely rejected this interpretation. No, the mind is not naturally and originally pure; on the contrary, it is originally defiled by passion and action, and the efforts of the candidate for sainthood consist precisely of eliminating defiled minds (cf. Atthasālinī, p. 140, l. 24-29; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 27, p. 149b-c; Kośa, VI, p. 299; Nyāyānusaraśāstra, T 1562, k. 72, p. 731c).

For the Greater Vehicle in general and the Prajñāpāramitā in particular, the alleged luminous mind of which the Anguttara spoke is in reality a non-mind (cittaṃ acittam), the pure and simple non-existence of the mind (cittābhāvamātra): that which does not exist cannot be defiled nor purified (cf. Aṣṭasāhasrikā, p. 5-6; Pañcaviṃśatī, p. 121, l. 12-122, l. 11; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 495, l. 3-21; āloka, p. 38, l. 24-26; 40, l. 6; Suvikrāntavikrāmin, p. 85, l. 15-86, l. 6).

This is the position which the Traité is defending here, reserving itself to return to the subject later (k. 41, p. 363a20 seq).

For further details, see introduction to Vimalakīrti, p. 51-60.

¹⁵¹ These two examples are part of the stock phrases of the ten comparisons explained above, like space, p. 364-368F; like a magic show, p. 358-363F.

purity of nature (svabhāvaśuddhi) of dharmas¹⁵² has no contact with defilement (saṃkleśa). Dharmas are not felt (vedita) because feelings (vedanā) do not exist; dharmas are not cognized (jñāta) because the mind (citta) and mental events (caitasikadharma) are deceivers.

Considering things in this way, the bodhisattva sees neither identity (ekatva) nor difference (anyatvā) among dharmas. He considers that all dharmas are empty (śūnya) and without self (anātman). Thus, he has the following thought:

Coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), all dharmas have no intrinsic nature (svabhāva) and are empty of reality (tattvaśūnya). Being empty of reality, they have no characteristics (animitta). Not having characteristics, they are not to be taken into consideration (apraṇihita). Not being taken into consideration, one does not see any dharma that is born, that perishes or that lasts. In this wisdom (prajñā), the bodhisattva penetrates into the gateway of ‘conviction that dharmas do not arise’ (anutpattikadharmakṣānti).

From that time on, even if he notices birth (utpāda) or cessation (nirodha) among dharmas, he enters into the gateway of ‘signlessness’ (ānimitta). Why? Because all dharmas are without characteristics. That is what is understood by the wise person (jñānin).

Considering things in this way, he is not attached to objects of the mind (cittāmbana) and, while submitting (anugacchan) to the characteristics of dharmas (dharmalakṣaṇa), he does not think about the body (kāya) or about feeling (vedanā) or about the mind (citta) or about dharmas. He knows that these four things are without a basis (apratīṣṭhāna).¹⁵³

That is mindfulness of inner dharmas (adhyātmadharmā). It is the same for mindfulness of outer dharmas (bahirdhādharma) and mindfulness of both inner and outer dharmas (adhyātmabāhirdhādharma).

II. – III. THE FOUR RIGHT EFFORTS AND THE FOUR BASES OF MAGICAL POWER

The four right efforts (samyakpradhāna) and also the four bases of magical power (rddhipāda) should be analyzed in the same way and considered as empty (śūnya) and without basis (apratīṣṭhāna).

IV. THE FIVE FACULTIES

What are the five faculties (indriya) as practiced by the bodhisattva? The bodhisattva-mahāsattva considers (anupaśyati) and cultivates (bhāvayati) the five faculties.

¹⁵² We have just seen that this purity of nature is a pure and simple (cittabhāvamātra) non-existence.

¹⁵³ For the apratīṣṭhāna of all dharmas, see Vimalakīrti, p. 47-51, 269-271, 283.

1. The faculty of faith (śraddhendriya). – The bodhisattva believes that all dharmas arise from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), arise from mistakes (viparyāsa) and wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi), like a fire-brand brandished in a circle [204b] (alātrackara),¹⁵⁴ like a dream (svapna), like a magic show (māyā).

He believes that dharmas are impure (aśuddha), impermanent (anitya), suffering (duḥkha), without self (anātma), like a sickness (roga), like an ulcer (gaṇḍa), like a thorn (śaḥya), subject to deterioration and ruin.

He believes that all dharmas are non-existent (asat), like an empty fist deceiving little children (bālollāpanarikamuṣṭivat).¹⁵⁵

He believes that there are no dharmas in the past (atīta) or in the future (anāgata) or in the present (pratyutpanna), that they come from nowhere and, once destroyed, they go nowhere.

He believes that dharmas are empty (śūnya), without characteristics (ānimitta), not to be considered (apraṇihita), unborn (anutpanna) and non-destroyed (aniruddha). Despite this wishlessness (read wou-tso) and this signlessness, he believes [in the five pure elements or (anāsravaskandha): i) morality (śīla), ii) concentration (samādhi), iii) wisdom (prajñā), iv) deliverance (vimukti), v) knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarsana).

Because he has acquired this faculty of faith, the bodhisattva is non-regressing (avaivartika). Taking the faculty of faith as the major one, he skillfully becomes established in morality (śīla). When he is established in morality, his mind of faith is unmoving (acala) and firm. He believes with his whole mind (ekacittena). He depends on the retribution of the fruit of action (karmaphalavipāka), rejects wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi), no longer believes in the words of others (paravacana). He accepts only the Buddha’s teachings; he believes in the Community (saṃgha) and he becomes established in the true Path (mārga). He is of right mind (rjucitta), gentle (mṛdu) and patient (kṣamavat). His supernatural powers (abhijñā) are unhindered (apratigha), immobile (acala) and indestructible (akṣaya); he acquires mastery of powers (balavaśitā).

This is called the faculty of faith.

¹⁵⁴ For the alātacakra, see above, p. 372F, n. 1.

Suvikrāntavikrāmin, p. 92, l. 23: riktamuṣṭisamā hi sarvadharmā vaśikasvabhāvalakṣaṇatayā.

See also Mahāvuyut., no. 2831; Fo pen hing tsi king, T 190, k. 18, p. 737a4; Sūtra of the sermon given by Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja to king Udayana, T 1690, k. 1, p. 786b11; Traité, T 1509, k. 20, p. 211a5; l. 43, p. 375a14.

The Ratnakūṭā (T 310, k. 90, p. 519a7-8) explains the comparison: It is as if one were fooling a little child with an empty fist; one opens one’s hand, but there is nothing in the empty fist; then the child weeps and cries.

2. The faculty of exertion (vīryendriya). – Day and night (aharṇisam), the bodhisattva always develops exertion (vīrya). He rejects the five obstacles (pañcanivarāṇa) and protects the five faculties (pañcendriya). He wants to find, understand, practice, read, study and hear the profound teachings (gambhīradharma) of the sūtras.

When evil bad dharmas (pāpaka akuśala dharma) have arisen, he acts so as to destroy them quickly and, if they have not arisen, he acts so as to prevent them from arising. As for the good dharmas (kuśaladharma) that have not yet arisen, he acts so that they will arise and, if they have already arisen, he acts so as to develop them. He has no fondness for dharmas that are neither good nor bad (naivakuśalānākuśaladharma).

Dedicating equal exertion to good dharmas, he advances directly and straight to the point. He develops right exertion (samyagvīrya) and, due to his concentrated mind (samāhitacitta), the latter is called the faculty of exertion (vīryendriya).

3. The faculty of mindfulness (smṛtīndriya). – The bodhisattva is always attentive (smṛtimat) and reflective (samprajānat). Wishing to perfect generosity (dāna), morality (śīla), meditation (dhyāna), wisdom (prajñā) and deliverance (vimukti), wishing to purify bodily, vocal and mental actions (kāyavāñmanaskarman), he is ever attentive and reflective in his knowledge pertaining to the arising (utpāda), disappearance (vyaya) and duration-change (sthityanyathātva) of dharmas.

He reflects attentively [on the four noble truths] on suffering (duḥkha), its origin (samudaya), its cessation (nirodha) and the path (mārga) to its cessation.

He reflects attentively and analyzes the faculties (indriya), strengths (bala), the [members] of enlightenment (sambodhyaṅga) and the absorptions (samāpatti), deliverance (vimukti), arising (utpāda) and cessation (nirodha), entering and exit.

He reflects attentively on unborn (anutpanna), non-destroyed (aniruddha), ineffective (anabhisamkāra) and inexpressible (anabhilāpya) dharmas in order to attain the knowledge of non-production (anutpādajñāna) and to realize fully the teachings of the Buddha.

He reflects attentively and prevents the concepts of the śrāvakas from being introduced.

The bodhisattva always reflects and never forgets. Thanks to these very profound (gambhīra), pure (viśuddha) dharmas acquired by meditation and practice (bhāvanācāraprāpta), he attains this sovereign attentiveness (vibhūtasamṛti) called the faculty of mindfulness (smṛtīndriya).

4. The faculty of concentration (samādhīndriya). – Grasping well the characteristics (lakṣaṇa) of concentration, the bodhisattva is able to produce all kinds of dhyānas and absorptions (samāpatti).

He knows clearly the gates of concentration (samādhimukha); he knows how to enter into concentration (samādhīpraveśa), how to remain in concentration (samādhivihāra) and how to come out of concentration (samādhivyutthāna).

He is not attached to concentration (na samādhim abhinivīśate), does not savor it (nāsvate) and does not emphasize it (nāśrayate).¹⁵⁶ He knows well the object (ālambana) of the concentrations and the destruction of this object.¹⁵⁷

He also knows the objectless concentration (anālambanasamādhī). Without conforming to the words of another (paravacana), without conforming to any [204c] particular absorption, he practices his mastery (vaśita) of it and enters it and comes out of it without obstacle.

That is what is called the faculty of concentration (samādhīndriya).

5. The faculty of wisdom (prajñendriya). – In order to exhaust suffering (duḥkha), the bodhisattva is endowed with a noble wisdom (āryaprajñāsampanna), a wisdom that eliminates the dharmas and realizes nirvāṇa. With this wisdom, the bodhisattva considers the impermanence (anityatā) of the threefold world (traiḍhātuka) burning with the fire of the three rottennesses and the three poisons (viṣayatraya).¹⁵⁸

When this consideration is finished, the bodhisattva is detached from the threefold world by means of his wisdom and, for him, the threefold world is transformed into the gates of deliverance (vimokṣamukha), namely, emptiness (śūnyatā), wishlessness (apraṇihita) and signlessness (ānimitta). He seeks the Buddhadharma attentively as if his hair were on fire (ādīptaśira-upama).¹⁵⁹

Nothing can destroy this wisdom of the bodhisattva: it has no support (āśraya) in the threefold world, and his mind constantly avoids the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaḡaṇa) as he wishes (yatheṣṭam).

By the power of wisdom (prajñābala) the bodhisattva accumulates innumerable qualities (guṇa) and, without hesitation or difficulty, penetrates directly into the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. He has neither grief (daurmanasya) in saṃsāra nor joy (saumansaya) in nirvāṇa.

The possession of this sovereign wisdom (vibhūtaprajñā) is what is called the faculty of wisdom (prajñendriya).

¹⁵⁷ On the object of the dhyānas and samāpattis, see p. 1040F and, for further details, Kośa, VIII, p. 176-177.

¹⁵⁸ An implicit reference to the Fire Sermon spoken by the Buddha at Gayaśīrṣa (Vinaya, I, p. 34; Catuspariśad, p. 322): Sarvaṃ bhikṣava ādīptam... Kenādīptam? Rāgāgninā dveṣāgninā mohāgninādīptam.

As for the three (or five?) decays (chouai), they have been discussed above, p. 834F.

¹⁵⁹ The expression in the Sanskrit texts is usually ādīptaśiraścailopama ‘like someone whose head or clothes are on fire’: cf. Gaṇḍavyūha, p. 493, l. 2; Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 54, l. 3-4; Mahāvvyutpatti, no. 1802.

The Pāli texts resort preferentially to a periphrasis: Seyyathāpi bhikkhave āditacelo vā āditasīso vā, tass’ eva celassa vā sīsassa vā nibbāpanāya adhimattaṃ chandaṃ ca vāyamaṇi ca ussāhaṇi ca ussojhiṇi ca appaṭivāṇiṇi ca satini ca sampapajāṇiṇi ca kareyya: cf. Anguttara, II, p. 93; III, p. 307; IV, p. 320; V, p. 98; Samyutta, V, p. 440.

[Altruism in the practice of the faculties].¹⁶⁰ – The bodhisattva in possession of the five faculties understands well (prajānāti) the various faculties of beings.

He understands the faculties of beings with desire (sarāga) or without desire (vīṭarāga), hateful (sadveṣa) or without hatred (vīṭadveṣa), stupid (samoha) or without stupidity (vīṭamoha).¹⁶¹

He understands the faculties of beings destined to fall into the bad destinies (durgati), destined to be reborn among humans (manuṣya) or destined to be reborn among the gods (deva).

He understands the beings of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya) or of sharp faculties (tīkṣṇendriya). He understands beings of superior (agra), medium (madhya) or lower (avara) faculties.

He understands the faculties of guilty (sāpattika) or faultless (anāpattika) beings, rebellious or docile.

He understands the faculties of beings who are always reborn in the desire realm (kāmadhātu), in the form realm (rūpadhātu) or in the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu).

He understands the faculties of beings of coarse (sthūla) or fine (sūkṣma) roots of good (kuśaladharma).

He understands the faculties of beings predestined to salvation (samyaktvaniyata), predestined to ruin (mithyātvaniyata) or without predestination (aniyata).¹⁶²

He understands the faculties of careless or impetuous people. He understands the faculties of beings bearing the burden (bhārasaha).¹⁶³

He understands the faculties of miserly (matsarin) or generous (tyāgavat) people, respectful people or disrespectful people, people of pure morality (viśuddhaśīla) or of impure morality (aviśuddhaśīla), angry (vyāpanna) or patient (kṣamin) people, energetic (vīryavat) or lazy (kuṣīda) people, people of distracted ¹⁶⁰ Whereas the śrāvaka practices the bodhipakṣikas in his own interest, the bodhisattva practices them for the benefit of others: this is an essential difference.

¹⁶¹ Common canonical locutions: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 59.

¹⁶² These are the three categories of beings (sattvarāśi): 1) samyaktvaniyatarāśi, those who have entered onto the Path and will quickly reach nirvāṇa; 2) mithyāniyatarāśi, those who, having committed grave sins, will definitely go to the bad destinies and who, coming out of these bad destinies, will go into the third rāśi; 3) aniyatarāśi, those who do not belong to either the first or the second rāśi and may enter either the first or the second.

These three rāśi are mentioned in Dīgha, III, p. 217; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 13, p. 614b24; k. 27, p. 698c; Kathāvatthu, II, p. 611; Dhammasaṅgani, p. 186; Nettippakaraṇa, p. 96; Mahāvastu, III, p. 318; Lalitavistara, p. 5400; Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 23, p. 384a26-27.

According to the Sukhāvativyūha, p. 44, the last two rāśi are absent in Amitābha's paradise.

In the later sources, the system of the rāśi is mixed with that of the gotras 'race, family'; certain eternal or acquired mental dispositions that cause a person to obtain nirvāṇa: on this subject, see Vimalakīrti, appendix, p. 425-430.

¹⁶³ On the 'burden', see above, p. 215-216F.

mind (vikṣiptacitta) or of concentrated mind (saṃgrhātacitta), stupid people (mūḍhā) or wise people (prajāñāvat), fearless (nirbhāya) or fearful (sabhaya) people, prideful people (abhimānika) or people without pride (nirabhimāna), people of right conduct (samyakpratipanna) or of wrong conduct (mithyāpratipanna), controlling their senses (guptendriya) or not controlling their senses.

He understands the faculties of people who seek the path of the śrāvakas, that of the pratyekabuddhas, or that of the Buddhas.

In this knowledge of the faculties of beings, the bodhisattva shows his mastery (vaśita), skillfulness (upāya) and power (bala): this is what is called the faculty of wisdom (jñānendriya).

V. THE FIVE POWERS

When the bodhisattva has progressed in the practice of the five faculties (indriya), he is able to destroy the afflictions (kleśa), save beings and acquire the [205a] conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti): this is what is called the five powers or strengths (bala).

Moreover, as the god Māra and heretics (tīrthika) are unable to destroy them, they are called powers or strengths.

VI. THE SEVEN FACTORS OF ENLIGHTENMENT

Here are the seven factors of enlightenment (saṃbodhyaṅga):

1. The bodhisattva no longer thinks about or reflects on any dharma: this is the factor of enlightenment called attentiveness (smṛtiṣaṃbodhyaṅga).
2. Looking among the dharmas for good (kuśala), bad (akuśala) or neutral dharmas (avyākṛta), the bodhisattva finds nothing: this is the factor of enlightenment called discernment of dharmas (dharmapra vicayasam bodhyaṅga).
3. Without entering into the threefold world (trai dhātuka), the bodhisattva reduces the characteristic traits (lakṣaṇa) of all worlds into pieces: this is the factor of enlightenment called exertion (vīryasam bodhyaṅga).
4. In regard to all the formations (saṃskāra), the bodhisattva produces no attachment (abhiniveśa) or pleasure (sukha) and, as all signs of grief (daurmanasya) and joy (prīti) have been overcome in him, this is the factor of enlightenment called joy (prītiṣaṃbodhyaṅga).
5. In all dharmas, there is nothing but an object of mind (cittā lambana): this is the factor of enlightenment called relaxation (praśrabdhisam bodhyaṅga).

6. The bodhisattva knows that all dharmas, which have as their characteristic being always concentrated (sadāsamāhita), are not [sometimes] scattered (vikṣipta) and [sometimes] concentrated (samāhita): this is the factor of enlightenment called concentration (samādhisaṃbodhyaṅga).

7. The bodhisattva is not attached to any dharma (na dharmam abhiniviśate), does not rest there (nāśrayate) and no longer sees them (na paśyati): this mind of equanimity (upekṣacitta) is the factor of enlightenment called equanimity (upekṣāsaṃbodhyaṅga).

This is how the bodhisattva considers the seven factors of enlightenment as empty (śūnya).

Question. – Why explain these seven factors of enlightenment so briefly (saṃkṣepeṇa)?

Answer. – Of these seven factors of enlightenment, [four, namely] attentiveness (smṛti), wisdom (prajñā), exertion (vīrya) and concentration (samādhi) have been fully explained above (p. 1149F). Now we must speak of the three others.

1. The bodhisattva who practices the factor of enlightenment called joy (prīṭisambodhyaṅga) considers this joy as unreal (abhūta). Why? This joy arises from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya). These are the formations (saṃskāra), conditioned dharmas (read: yeou tso fa: saṃskṛtadharma), impermanent (anitya) dharmas that produce (read cheng in place of k'o) attachment (abhiniveśa). But if the thing that produces attachment is impermanent (anityalakṣaṇa), once it has disappeared, it arouses grief (daurmanasya). Worldly people (prthagjana) are attached to it out of error (viparyāsa), but if they know that dharmas are empty of reality (tatvaśūnya), they correct themselves at once and say: “I made a mistake (bhrānti).”

It is like a man in the darkness (andhakāra) tormented by hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsāpīḍita) who has swallowed impure things; then, by the light of day, he re-examines the things and finally understands his mistake.

Considering things in this way, the bodhisattva puts his joy (prīti) into real wisdom (bhūtaprajñā): this is true joy (bhūtaprīti).

2. Having acquired this true joy, first he eliminates unwholesome physical states (kāyadauṣṭhulya), then he eliminates unwholesome mental states (cittadauṣṭhulya), and finally he eliminates all characteristics of dharmas (dharmalakṣaṇa). Thus he acquires well-being that fills the body and the mind and that constitutes the factor of enlightenment called relaxation (praśrabdhisambodhyaṅga).

3. Since he has attained joy (prīti) and relaxation (praśrabdhi), he disregards any form of examination (anupaśyanā), namely, examination of impermanence (anityānupaśyanā), examination of suffering (duḥkhānupaśyanā), examination of emptiness and non-self (śūnyānāmānupaśyanā), examination of arising and cessation (utpādanirodhānupaśyanā), examination of existence (sadanupaśyanā), examination of non-existence (asadanupaśyanā), examination of what is neither existence nor non-existence (naivasannāsadanupaśyanā). The bodhisattva abandons all futile proliferation (prapañca) of this kind completely. Why? Because absence of nature, absence of object, non-activity, absence of futile discursiveness, perpetual pacification are the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas.

If the bodhisattva did not practice this equanimity (upekṣā), there would still be arguments (raṇa). Indeed, those who hold the existent (sat) to be true consider the non-existent to be false (moha); those who hold the non-existent (asat) to be true consider the existent (sat) to be false; and those who hold to be true what is neither existent nor non-existent (naivasannāsat) consider as false that which is both existent and non-existent (sadasat). They like what they believe to be true (satya), they hate what they believe to be false (moha), and this gives rise to grief (daurmanasya) and joy (prīti). Why not disregard all that?

When the bodhisattva has attained this [real] joy (prīti), this relaxation (praśrabdhi) and this equanimity (upekṣā), the seven factors of enlightenment are complete (paripūrṇa).

VII. THE EIGHT MEMBERS OF THE PATH

As for the eight members of the noble Path (āryamārgaṅga), [the first] or right view (samyagdrṣṭi), [the sixth] or right effort (samyagvyāyāma), [the seventh] or right mindfulness (samyaksmṛti) and [the eighth] or right concentration (samyaksamādhi) have already been explained above (p. 1181F). Now we must [205b] speak of right thought (samyaksamkalpa).

[Second member]: right thought (samyaksamkalpa). – In the course of right thinking, the bodhisattva who is established in the emptiness (śūnya) and non-existence (anupalabdhi) of dharmas examines the characteristics of right thought (samyaksamkalpalakṣaṇa). He knows that all thoughts (saṃkalpa) are false conceptions (mithyāsaṃkalpa), up to and including those concerning nirvāṇa and the Buddha. Why? The cessation of all kinds of conceptions (sarvasaṃkalpaprabhedhanirodha) is called right thought. All types of conceptions come from falsities, errors (bhrānti) and mistakes (viparyāsa): this is why they differ. But the characteristics of the conceptions are all non-existent, and the bodhisattva established in this right thinking (samyaksamkalpa) no longer sees what is correct (samyak) and what is wrong (mithyā) and bypasses (atīkrāmati) all kinds of thinking (sarvasaṃkalpaprabhedha): this is right thinking. For him, all types of conceptions are the same (sama) and, because they are the same, his mind does not become attached to them. This is what is called the right thinking of the bodhisattva.

[Third member]: right speech (samyagvāc). – The bodhisattva knows that all words (vāc) come from error (bhrānti), falsities, mistakes (viparyāsa), imaginings that seize the characteristics (nimittoḍgrahaṇavikalpa). Then the bodhisattva reflects in this way: In speech, the characteristics (lakṣaṇa) of speech do not exist and all vocal actions (vākkarman) have ceased (niruddha). Understanding the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of words is right speech (samyagvāc).

Words come from nowhere and, once they have ceased, they go nowhere. The bodhisattva who is practicing right speech, in everything he says, holds to the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa). Thus the sūtras say that, established in right speech, the bodhisattva is able to accomplish pure vocal action

(pariśuddhavākkarman). Understanding the true nature of all words, the bodhisattva, whatever he may say, does not fall into unwholesome words (mithyāvāc).¹⁶⁴

[Fourth member]: right action (samyakkarmānta). – The bodhisattva knows that all actions (karman) are false, erroneous, unreal, having non-activity as nature (anabhisamskāralakṣaṇa). Why? Because there is not a single action that possesses definite nature.

Question. – If all actions are empty (śūnya), why did the Buddha say that generosity (dāna), etc., is a good action (kuśalakarman), murder (prāṇātīpāta), etc., a bad action (akuśalakarman), and other things, gestures (ceṣṭa), are neutral actions (avyākṛtakarman)?¹⁶⁵

Answer. – If there is not even one single kind of action, why should there be three? How is that? When the time of the movement has already been accomplished (gamanakāle gate), there is no motor activity (gamikriyā). When the time of the movement has not yet been accomplished (agate, i.e., future), there is no motor activity either. When the time of the movement is present (pratyutpanna), there is no motor activity either.¹⁶⁶

Question. – In the seat of the movement already accomplished (gate sthāne) there can be neither [motor activity] nor can there be any motor activity in the seat of the movement not yet accomplished (agate sthāne); but in the seat of present movement (gamyamāne sthāne), there must be movement.¹⁶⁷

Answer. – In the seat of present movement there is no movement. Why? Because the seat of present movement (gamyamāna) does not exist (nopalabhyate) without a motor activity (gamikriyā). If the seat of the present movement could exist without a motor activity then it ought to involve movement; but that is not the case. Without a present seat of movement, there is no motor activity and without motor activity there is no seat of present movement. Since this is a case of co-existent conditions (sahabhūprataya), we ¹⁶⁶ Almost textual citation from Madh. kārīkā, II, 1 (p. 92):

*Gataṃ na gamyate tāvad agataṃ naiva gamyate /
gatāgatavinirmuktaṃ gamyamānaṃ na gamyate //*

Transl. J. May, p. 52: “Accomplished movement does not involve movement; no more does unaccomplished movement. A present movement independent of the other two is unintelligible.”

¹⁶⁷ Objection formulated in Madh. kārīkā, II, 2 (p.93):

Ceṣṭā yatra gatis tatra gamyamāne ca sā yataḥ / na gate nāgate ceṣṭā ganyamāne gatis tataḥ //

Transl. J. May, p. 55: “Since there is movement wherever there is gesture and there is gesture in present movement, in contrast to movements [already] accomplished and not [yet] accomplished, there is thus movement in present movement.”

cannot say that the seat of present movement involves movement (gamyamānaṃ gamyate iti nopadyate).

Furthermore, if the seat of present movement had motor activity (gamikriyā), there should be a seat of present movement outside of the motor [205c] activity, and there should be a motor activity outside of the seat of present movement.¹⁶⁸

Question. – If that is so, what would be the error (doṣa)?¹⁶⁹

Answer. – There would be two motor activities (gamikriyā) at the same time (samakāla) and, if there were two motor activities, there would be two agents of movement (dvau gantārau). Why? Because movement does not exist without an agent of movement (gantāraṃ hi tiraskṛtya gamanaṃ nopapadyate). Without agent (gantṛ), the seat of the present movement (gamyamāna) does not exist and, since there is no seat of the present movement, neither is there any agent of movement (gantṛ).¹⁷⁰ Furthermore, this non-agent itself does not move either (agantā naiva gacchati) and, outside of agent and non-agent, there cannot be a ‘third’ to move (nāsty anyo gantur agentuś cakaścīt tṛtīyo gaccheta).¹⁷¹

¹⁶⁸ The answer to the objection is a paraphrase of Madh. kārīkā, II, 3-4 (p. 94-95):

*Gamyamānasya gamanaṃ kathaṃ nāipapatsyate / gamyamānaṃ vigamanaṃ yadā naivopapadyate //
Gamyamānasya gamanaṃ yasya tasya prasajyate /
rte gater gamyamānaṃ hi gamyate //*

Transl. J. May, p. 55-57: “How will movement be applied [as predicated] to present movement, since a present movement without [inherent] movement is completely irrational? – He for whom present movement possesses movement incurs the necessary consequence of a present movement without [inherent] movement: indeed, present movement involves movement.”

¹⁶⁹ If the present movement were distinct from the inherent movement.

¹⁷⁰ Madh. kārīkā, II, 5-7 (p. 95-97):

*Gamyamānasya gamane prasaktaṃ gamanadvayam /
yena tad gamyamānaṃ ca yac cātra gamanaṃ punaḥ // Dvau gantārau prasajyete prasakte gamanadvaye /
gantāraṃ hi tiraskṛtya gamanaṃ nopapadyate //
Gantāraṃ cet tiraskṛtya gamanaṃ nopapadyate / gamane ‘sati gantātha kuta eva bhaviṣyati //*

Transl. J. May, p. 58-60: “If the present movement possesses movement, the existence of two movements will result: one by which it is the present movement, the other contained in this [present movement]. – The necessary consequence of twofold movement involves that of a twofold agent of movement. Indeed, without agent, movement is illogical. – If the movement without agent of movement is illogical, how would the agent exist in turn in the absence of the movement?”

¹⁷¹ Madh. kārīkā, II, 8 (p. 97):

*Gantā na gacchati tāvad agentā naiva gacchati /
anyo gantur agentuś ca kas tṛtīyo gacchati //*

Question. – It is right that the non-agent does not move (agantā na gacchatīti yujyate). But why does the agent not move?

Answer. – Without motor activity, the agent does not exist (gamikriyāṃ tiraskṛtya, gantā nopapadyate),¹⁷² and without agent, motor does not exist (gantāraṃ tiraskṛtya, gamikriyā nopapadyate).

This emptiness of all action (sarvakarmaśūnyatā) is called right action (samyakkarmānta). The bodhisattvas who penetrate into the equality of all actions (sarvakarmasamatā) do not consider bad action (mithyākarmaṇ) as bad and do not consider right action (samyakkarmānta) as good (kuśala). Without activity (anabhisamkāra), they do not perform right actions and they do not commit bad actions. That is true wisdom (bhūtaprajñā); that is right action.

Moreover, among the dharmas, none is right (samyak) and none is wrong (mithyā). The bodhisattvas know actions in accordance with the truth and, knowing in accordance with the truth, they do not undertake anything and do not stop anything. Such wise people always have right actions and never have bad actions. In the bodhisattva this is what is called right action (samyakkarmānta).

[Fifth member]: right livelihood (samyagājīva). – All foods (bhojana), all means of subsistence (jīvita-pariṣkāra) are right (samyak) and are not bad (mithyā). Established in a knowledge free of futile proliferation (niṣprapañcājñāna), the bodhisattva does not choose right livelihood (samyagājīva) and does not reject wrong livelihood (mithyājīva). He does not depend on either the right law (samyagdharma) or the wrong law (mithyādharmā), but he remains always in pure knowledge (viśuddhajñāna). Penetrating thus into right living which is equality (samatā), he does not see life and does not see non-life. To practice this true wisdom (bhūtaprajñā) is what is called right livelihood (samyagājīva) [in the bodhisattva].

The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who conceives the thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment (saptatrimśad bodhipakṣikadharmā) in this way surpasses the levels (bhūmi) of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, penetrates into the state of bodhisattva (bodhisattvānyāma) and gradually (kramaṇa) realizes the knowledge of things in all their aspects (sarvākārajnatā).¹⁷³

Transl. J. May, p. 60: “The agent of movement does not move; neither does the agent; and what ‘third’ other than agent and non-agent would be able to move?”

¹⁷² Madh. kārikā, II, 9 (p. 98):

*Gantā tāvad gacchatīti katham evopapatsyate /
gamanena vinā gantā yadā naivopapadyate //*

Transl. – The objection: “The agent itself, at least, moves”, is not logical whereas in the absence of movement, the agent is completely illogical.”

On the problem of movement closely linked with that of action, there are useful notes and a complete bibliography in J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 51-77.

CHAPTER XXXII: THE THREE CONCENTRATIONS AND THE FOUR TRANCES

First Section THE EIGHT CLASSES OF SUPPLEMENTARY DHARMAS (p. 1209F)

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The thirty-seven auxiliaries (bodhipākṣikadharmā) are not the only ones imposed on the bodhisattva; an infinite number of other dharmas equally conducive to the Path must also be completely fulfilled (paripūritavya) or cultivated (bhāvītavya) by him.

Having mentioned the seven classes of bodhipākṣika, the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra is now going to point out eight new classes of dharmas conducive to the Path and the Trailé will study them in detail in the next three chapters.

Chapter XXXII will deal with the first two groups: the three meditative stabilizations (samādhi) and the four trances (dhyāna).

Chapter XXXIII will deal with the third and fourth group: the four immeasurables (apramāna) and the four formless absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti).

Chapter XXXIV will deal with the next four groups: the eight liberations (vimokṣa), the eight spheres of mastery (abhibhāvāyatana), the ten spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana) and the nine successive absorptions (anupūrvasamāpatti).

Except for the three meditative stabilizations (samādhi) which, as gates of liberation (vimokṣamukha), constitute the goal of the Path, the other classes are lower than the seven classes of bodhipākṣika dharmas discussed in the preceding chapter. In general, it may be said that they prepare for and facilitate the practice of the bodhipākṣikas.

From the Abhidharma point of view, the seven classes of bodhipākṣikas have an objective value in that they are based on the fourth noble truth, that of the Path, and in that they share its efficacy. On the other hand, except for the three meditative stabilizations, the classes of supplementary dharmas in question in the following are subjective practices having no other purpose than the relaxing of the ascetic's mind and making it capable of traveling on the Path.

[206a] Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 19, l. 15-18); Śatasāhasrikā, p. 57, l. 10-58, l. 9) - [The bodhisattva-mahāsattva must completely fulfill]:¹⁷⁴

1. the meditative stabilization of emptiness (śūnyatāsamādhi), the samādhi of signlessness (ānimittasamādhi), the samādhi of wishlessness (apraṇihitasamādhi),
2. the four trances (catvāri dhyānāni),
3. the four immeasurables (catvāry apramāṇāni),
4. the four formless absorptions (cataśra ārūpyasamāpattayah),
5. the eight liberations (aṣṭau vimokṣāḥ),
6. the eight spheres of mastery (aṣṭāv abhībhvāyatanāni),
7. the nine successive absorptions (navānupūrvasamāpattayāḥ),
8. the ten spheres of totality (daśa kṛtsnāyatanāni).

Śāstra. – Question. – After the thirty-seven auxiliaries (pakṣa), why does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] still speak of these eight classes of dharmas?

Answer. –

1. [The samādhis]. – The thirty-seven auxiliaries are the path (mārga) leading to nirvāṇa. When one follows this path, one reaches the city of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇagara). The city of nirvāṇa has three gates (dvāra), emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita). Thus, after having spoken about the path [in chapter XXXI], it is necessary to speak of the gates that lead into it.

2. [Dhyānas and ārūpyasamāpattis]. – The four trances (dhyāna), etc., are dharmas helping to open these gates.

Moreover, the thirty-seven auxiliaries are higher and admirable things, but the mind is distracted (vikṣipta) in the desire realm (kāmadhātu); then on what levels (bhūmi) and on what means (upāya) will the yogin depend in order to obtain them? He will depend on the trances (dhyāna) of the form realm (rūpadhātu) and on the absorptions (samāpatti) of the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu).

3. [Apramāṇas, vimokṣas, abhībhvāyatanas, navānupūrvasamāpattis and kṛtsnāyatanas]. – In the four immeasurables (apramāṇa), the eight liberations (vimokṣa), the eight spheres of mastery (abhībhvāyātana), the nine successive absorptions (anupūrvavīhārasamāpatti) and the ten spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyātana), the yogin is testing his mind to see whether it is flexible (mṛdu), powerful (vibhu) and docile (yatheṣṭa). It is like the nomad (sārthavāha) who tests his horse (aśva) to see whether it is supple and docile and who, only after that, goes into battle.

It is the same for the ten spheres of totality: the yogin contemplates (anupaśyati) and seizes (udgrhṇāti) a blue color (nīlavarna), big (apramāṇa) or small (parīta); then he looks at objects wanting them to be all blue, or else all yellow (pīta), all red (lohita), all white (avadāta).

Furthermore, in the eight spheres of mastery (abhībhvāyātana), he rules as sovereign (abhībhu) over objects (ālambana).

In the first and the last liberation (vimokṣa), he considers the body as disgusting (aśubha), but in the third liberation, on the other hand, he considers it as fine (śubha).

In the four immeasurables (apramāṇa), by means of loving-kindness (maitrī), he sees¹⁷⁵ all beings as happy (sukhita); by means of compassion, he sees (karuṇā) all beings as suffering (duḥkhita); by means of joy (muditā), he sees all beings as rejoicing (mudita); then, with equanimity (upekṣā), setting aside the [preceding] three feelings, he sees beings quite simply without feeling aversion (pratigha) or affection (anunaya) for them.

[Subjective or objective consideration]. – Furthermore, there are two types of consideration (pratyavekṣā): i) the subjective consideration (adhimutipratyavekṣa); ii) the objective consideration (bhūtapratyavekṣā).

The objective consideration is the thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment (bodhipāṅśikadharmas). But as this objective consideration is difficult to acquire (durlabha), it is necessary to follow it up with the subjective consideration. The mind, in the course of the latter,¹⁷⁶ becomes supple and so it becomes easy to obtain the objective consideration. By using the objective consideration, the three gates of nirvāṇa are successfully opened.

Second Section THE THREE MEDITATIVE STABILIZATIONS (p. 1213F)

PRELIMINARY NOTE

Here the Traité returns to a subject already touched upon above, p. 321-323F. It concerns the three meditative stabilizations on emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita).

The canonical sources present them under various names:

¹⁷⁴ These eight classes of supplementary dharmas must be ‘completely fulfilled’ (pūrayitavya) according to the Śatasāhasrikā, or ‘cultivated’ (bhāvitavya) according to the Pañcaviṃśati, but they cannot be ‘realized’ (sākṣātkartavya) by the bodhisattva, for then they would contribute to ushering him into nirvāṇa straight away, preventing him therefore from continuing his salvific activity in saṃsāra.

¹⁷⁵ Or more correctly, ‘wants to see’, for it is a matter of purely subjective considerations serving to purify the ascetic’s mind, but not exerting any influence on the happiness or misfortune of beings.

¹⁷⁶ In the course of the subjective consideration relating to the seven classes of supplementary dharmas.

1. The three samādhis, or concentrations: Vinaya, III, p. 93; Dīgha, III, p. 219; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 360; Anguttara, I, p. 299; Tch'ang-a-han, T 1, k. 8, p. 50b1-2; k. 9, p. 53a23-24; k. 10, p. 59c5-6; Tseng-yi-a-han, T 125, k. 16, p. 630b4; k. 39, p. 761a5-6.

2. The three vimokṣa, liberations, or vimokṣamukhas, gates of liberation: Paṭisambhidā, II, p. 35; Atthasālinī, p. 223; Visuddhimagga, ed. E. Warren, p.564-565.

3. The three sparśas or contacts which the ascetic experiences on coming out of the absorption of cessation: Majjhima, I, p. 302.

4. For at least two of them, the cetovimukti or liberations of mind: Majjhima, I, p. 297; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 296; Tsa-a-han, T 99, k. 21, p. 149c13-14. Their importance cannot be overestimated: they are the dharmas to be cultivated in order to understand and destroy the three poisons of rāga, dveṣa and moha (Anguttara, I, p. 299); they are the path of the asaṃskṛta or of nirvāṇa (Saṃyutta, IV, p. 360. 303; Tch'ang-a-han, T 1, k. 10, p. 50c5-6), the gates of nirvāṇa (Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 136, l. 13).

But satisfactory definitions are rare in the early sources. The clearest are in the Ekottara (Tseng-yi a-han, T 125, k. 16, p. 630b), the original Sanskrit of which is reproduced in the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 208 (cf. T 223, k. 5, p. 254c14-18) and Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1440 (cf. T 220, k. 415, p. 80a18-28): Katame trayāḥ samaādhayaḥ śūnyatānimitāpranīhitaḥ ... ayam ucyate 'pranīhitasamādhīḥ.

Transl. – What are the three concentrations? Those of emptiness, signlessness and wishlessness. What is the concentration of emptiness? It is the position of a mind that considers all dharmas as empty of inherent nature, the gate of liberation “Emptiness”.

What is the concentration of signlessness? It is the position of a mind that considers all dharmas as being without characteristics, the gate of liberation “Signlessness”.

What is the concentration of wishlessness? It is the position of a mind that considers all dharmas as unworthy of being considered, the gate of liberation “Wishlessness”. – Var. – It is the position of a mind that makes no effort (or no longer has any contention) by saying to itself that all dharmas are unworthy of it.

The Pāli Abhidhamma gives only a relatively modest place to the three samādhis (cf. Paṭisambhidā, II, p. 35, 48; Dhammasaṅgaṇī, p. 70-73; Atthasālinī, p. 223; Nettippakaraṇa, p. 90. 119, 126; Milinda, p. 413; Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 564-565).

On the other hand, the Abhidharma of the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikas gives them a important role. Among the numerous sources, there are Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 104, p. 538a-541c), Abhidharmāmṛta (T 1553, k. 2, p. 975c1-9); Reconstruction by bhikṣu Sastri, p. 90), Kośa (VIII, p. 184-192), Abhidharmadīpa (p. 424), etc.

For these sources, the three samādhis are really wisdoms, but samādhis so perfect that they occur only in a concentrated mind: this is why they are called samādhī.

Actually, they penetrate to the very depths of the four noble truths of which they represent the sixteen aspects (ākāra): this is why, in the pure (anāsrava) state, they constitute the three gates of liberation (vimokṣamukha). According to whether they are mundane (laukika), i.e., still attached to the threefold world, or supramundane (lokottara), they appear in eleven or nine levels (bhūmi).

The entire system is summarized admirably by Ghoṣaka in his Abhidharmāmṛta (l.c.):

“The three samādhis are śūnyatā-, apranīhita- and ānimittasamādhī. It is because the mind takes the Anāsrava as object that they are called samādhī.

When concentrated, the ascetic sees the five aggregates of attachment (upādānaskandha) as empty (śūnya), without ‘me’ (anātman) or ‘mine’ (anātmīya): this is śūnyatāsamādhī.

Having entered into this samādhī, he no longer wishes for desire (rāga), hate (dveṣa), ignorance (moha) or rebirth (punarbhava): this is apranīhitasamādhī.

There is a samādhī the object (ālambana) of which is free of ten characteristics (nimitta). What are these ten? The five objects, substance, etc. (rūpādipañcaviṣaya), maleness (puruṣa), femaleness (strī), birth (jāti), old age (jarā) and impermanence (anityatā). This is ānimittasamādhī.

Śūnyatāsamādhī has two aspects (ākāra), emptiness (śūnya) and non-self (anātman).

Apranīhitasamādhī has ten aspects: impermanence (anitya), suffering (duḥkha), and [the eight] aspects [of the truth] of the origin (samudaya) and [of the truth] of the Path (mārga).

Ānimittasamādhī has the four aspects [of the truth] of cessation (nirodha) of suffering.”

Having described the Sārvāstivādin system objectively, the Traité will explain the Madhyamaka point of view of the three samādhis.

They must be interpreted not only from the viewpoint of the non-existence of beings (pudgalanairtmya) as do the śrāvakas, but also from the twofold non-existence of beings and of things (pudgaladharmanairātmya) as the Mahāyānists interpret them.

By practicing the three samādhis, the bodhisattva takes into account that beings and things are empty (śūnya) of inherent nature and of characteristics, that this very emptiness is not a substantial mark (nimitta) and that consequently any aspiration for the world of existence or non-existence is irrational.

The three samādhis are identical because they have as their sole object the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) which is nothing other than what is. When the śrāvakas speak of the emptiness of things, they hold it to be a real nature; on the other hand, the bodhisattva is forbidden to hypostatize this emptiness and to make a thing out of it.

The true nature of things constitutes the single object of the three samādhis, but it is not a reality; it is only a method of purifying the mind which, freed of illusions, notices that there is nothing to hypostatize, nothing to characterize and nothing to hope for. The result is that the world of becoming exists only in our imagination and that, according to the time-honored expression, samsāra is identical with nirvāṇa.

The Traité, as we shall see, in all of this and in the notes, limits itself to condensing the teachings of the old Mahāyānasūtras.

I. THE THREE MEDITATIVE STABILIZATIONS ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA

1. Definitions of the Three Meditative Stabilizations

a. Śūnyatāsamādhi.

Question. – What is the gate of nirvāṇa called emptiness (śūnyatā)?

Answer. – It considers dharmas as empty (śūnya), without ‘me’ (ātman) or ‘mine’ (ātmīya). Dharmas being the result of a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagryutpanna), there is neither agent (kāraka) nor patient [206b] (French, sic) (vedaka)¹⁷⁷. This is what is called the gate of emptiness. For more on this gate of emptiness, see what has been said in the chapters on patience (p. 912-926F) and wisdom (p. 1104-1106F)

b. Ānimittasamādhi.

Knowing that there is neither ‘me’ nor ‘mine’, why do beings become attached mentally (cittēnābhiniśānte) to dharmas? The yogin reflects and says to himself: “Dharmas being the outcome of causes and conditions, there is no real dharma (bhūta-dharma); there are only characteristics (nimitta)¹⁷⁸ and beings, seizing these characteristics, become attached to ‘me’ and ‘mine’. Now I must see if these characteristics have a perceptible reality or not.” Having examined them and considered them, he determines that they are all non-existent (anupalabdha). Whether it is a matter of the male characteristic (puruṣanimitta) or of the female characteristic (strīnimitta), the characteristics of identity or difference (ekatvānyatananimitta), etc., the reality of these characteristics does not exist (nopalabhyate). Why? Being without me and mine, all dharmas are empty and, being empty, they are neither male nor female. As for the identity and difference, these are names (nāman) valid only in the hypothesis of ‘me’ and ‘mine’. This is why male and female, identity and difference, etc., are really non-existent.

Furthermore, when the four great elements (mahābhūta) and derived matter (upādāyarūpa) limit [the element] space (ākāśa), we say there is a body (kāya). Then, within a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī) with the inner and outer bases of consciousness (ādhyātmikabāhyāyatana), there arises the consciousness element (vijñānadhātu) and the body, making use of this grouping of elements (dhātusāmagrī), performs various activities; it speaks, it sits down, it arises, it goes and it comes. This grouping of six elements, which is empty [of intrinsic nature], is improperly qualified as a man or improperly qualified as a woman.¹⁷⁹

¹⁷⁷ Monier Williams: vedaka = making known, announcing, proclaiming, restoring to consciousness

If each of these six elements were male, there would have to be six men, for it is impossible that one equals six or that six equals one. But in the earth element (prthivīdhātu) [entering into the composition of the body], there is neither male nor female characteristic, and it is the same for the other elements, water, fire, wind, space and consciousness (vijñānadhātu). If these characteristics do not exist in each [of the six elements] taken separately, neither do they exist in the grouping of these six elements. Similarly, if six dogs (kukkura), taken separately, cannot give birth to a lion (siṃha), neither can they do so taken together, for that is not their nature.

Question. – Why would there not be male and female? Although the individuals (puruṣa) are not different, the parts of the body (kāyāvayava) themselves differ and there are sexual distinctions.¹⁸⁰ The body cannot exist independently of the body parts and the body parts themselves cannot exist independently of the body. If we see the foot, which is part of the body, we know that there is a whole (avayavin) called body. The body parts, foot, etc., are different from the body, and it is the body that has the male or female characteristics.

Answer. – The individual has already been refuted above (p. 736F) and I [Kumārajīva] have also refuted the characteristics (nimitta) of the body. Now I must repeat myself.

If there were a whole (avayavin) called body (kāya), all the parts of the body would exist in each part (avayava) of this body; each of the parts would exist in every part. If the body existed fully in all of the parts, the foot (pāda) would exist in the head (śiras). Why? Because in the head there is an entire body. If ¹⁷⁹ The human being consists of six elements (dhātu) – earth, water, fire, wind, space and consciousness – but, whether they are taken separately or together, they do not constitute any difference in sex.

The analysis of the human being into six elements is of canonical origin: cf. Majjhima, III, p. 239: Chadhāturo ayaṃ, bhikkhu, puriso to iti kho pan' etaṃ vuttaṃ. Kiñ c' etaṃ pañicca vuttaṃ? Paṭhavīdhātu āpodhātu tejodhātu vāyodhātu ākāśadhātu viññāṇadhātu.

For these six elements, see also Anguttara, I, p. 176; Vibhaṅga, p. 82-85; T'ch'ang a han, T 1, k. 8, p. 52a6-7; T'chong a han, T 26, k. 3, p. 435c21-22; K. 7, p. 468a27-28; k. 21, p. 562c17-19; k. 42, p. 690b27-28; k. 47, p. 723b20-21; k. 49, p. 732c28-29; Tsa a han, T 99, k. 9, p. 60c28-29 (cf. E. Waldschmidt, Das Upasenāsūtra, Nach. Göttingen, 1957, No. 2, p. 38, ; 11-12); Tsa a han, T 99, k. 17, p. 119a3; k. 37, p. 269c20-21; k. 43, p. 315b16; Tseng yi a han, Y 125, k. 29, p. 710b14-15; Piṭāputrasam., ama, T 320, k. 16, p. 964b21-22, the original Sanskrit of which is cited in Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 244, and Pañjikā, p. 508. – See also Madh. avatāra, p. 262 (tr. L. de La Vallée Poussin, Muséon, 1911, p. 307-308); Garbhābakraṅtisūtra cited in Kośa, I, p. 66.

¹⁸⁰ The problem of the whole and its parts (avayavin, avayava), which opposes the Buddhists and the Vaiśeṣikas, is treated fully in the Kośa, III, p. 210-214.

each part of the body were in all the parts, there would be no difference between the body and its parts, the whole (avayavin) following the parts (avayava).

Question. – If the parts of the body, the foot, etc., were different from the body, the error (doṣa) that you mention would exist. But here the parts of the body, the foot, etc., are not different from the whole, i.e., the body. Therefore there is no error.

Answer. – If the parts of the body were not different from the whole, then the head would be the foot. Why? Because both of them, as body, would not differ. [206c]

Moreover, the parts of the body are many, whereas the whole is just one. It is impossible that a multiplicity should make a unit and that a unit should make a multiplicity.

Besides, although it is true that the fruit (phala) does not exist when the cause (hetu) does not exist, it is not true that the cause does not exist when the fruit does not exist. If, [as you claim], the parts of the body are not different from the whole, the cause would not exist when the fruit does not exist. Why? Because cause and fruit would be identical.

The body does not exist (nopalabhyate) whether you look for it in identity (ekatva) or in difference (anyatva) and, as the body does not exist, on what basis (sthāna) would the male or female characteristics reside? If the latter exist, they are either bodily or different from the body. But the body does not exist. If they occur in some dharma other than the body, since this other dharma is non-material (arūpa), there would be no difference between male and female. It is simply a matter of a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī) in the course of two successive existences and we speak of male and female out of mental error (viparīṭacitta). Thus it is said:

Lower you head or raise it up,

Bend (samiñhite) or stretch (prasārite),

Stand up (sthite), go forth (pratikrānte) or return (abhikrānte),

Look straight ahead (ālokite) or to the side (vilokite),

Speak or babble:

In all of that, there is nothing true.

It is because the wind moves the vijñāna

That these activities take place.

But this vijñāna is of temporary nature (kṣayadharman)

And it exists no longer from one moment to the next moment.

The distinction

Between male and female

Comes from my mind.

It is out of lack of wisdom

That I see them wrongly exist,

Structures of bones tied one to another,

Without skin or flesh,

Impulses in movement,

Like a mannequin!

No reality on the inside

Outwardly called a man.

Like a foreign coin thrown into the water

Or a jungle fire devouring a bamboo forest,

Sounds issue forth out of it

As a result of a complex of causes and conditions.

For other similar characteristics, see above (p. 1095-1106F). This is the gate of signlessness (ānimittadvāra).

c. Apraṇihitasamādhi.

There is wishlessness (apraṇihita) when, having knowledge of the non-existence of characteristics, there is no longer any reaction.¹⁸¹ This is the gate of wishlessness (apraṇihitadvāra).

2. Nature of the Three Concentrations

Question. – But it is by means of wisdom that these three things contemplate śūnyatā, ānimitta and apraṇihita respectively. If these are wisdoms, why call them concentrations (samādhi)?

Answer. – If these three kinds of wisdoms were not in meditative stabilization, they would be wild wisdoms (unmattaprajñā); many people would fall into pernicious doubts (mithyāśaṅkhā) and do nothing further. But when these wisdoms are in concentration, they are able to destroy all the defilements (kleśa) and find the true nature (bhūtaadharma) of dharmas.

¹⁸¹ Or any effort (abhisamskāra).

Furthermore, they are dharma of the Path (mārga), different from the world and in opposition to the world (lokaviruddha). The saints (ārya) who are in these meditative stabilizations find the true nature and preach it; and this is not the language of a wild mind.

Finally, the other trances (dhyāna) and absorptions (samāpatti in which these three things do not occur, are not called meditative stabilizations (samādhi).¹⁸² Why? Because one can stray away from them, lose them and fall back into saṃsāra. This is what the Buddha said:

The person who observes pure morality

Is called a monk (bhikṣu).

The person who contemplates emptiness (śūnyatā)

Is called an ecstatic (dhyāyin).

The mindful (smṛtimat), vigorous (ātāpin), energetic (vīryavat) person

Is called the real yogin.

The foremost of all happiness (sukha)

Is cutting desires (tṛṣṇā) and destroying madness.

Rejecting the group of the five aggregates (skandha) and the dharma of the Path

Is eternal happiness, arriving at nirvāṇa.¹⁸³

It follows from these stanzas that the Buddha calls the concentration the three gates of liberation (vimokṣamukha). [207a]

Question. – Why are they called gates of liberation?

Answer. – When they are practiced, liberation (vimokṣa) is attained and one reaches nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning (nirupadhiṣeṣanirvāṇa); this is why they are called gates of liberation. Nirvāṇa without residue of conditioning is true liberation for in it one finds liberation from physical and mental suffering (kāyamānasikaduḥkha). Nirvāṇa with residual conditioning (sopadhiṣeṣanirvāṇa) is the gate to it ¹⁸² Among the innumerable samādhis, those of śūnyatā, etc., are the only true ones: this idea has already been developed above, p. 324-325F.

¹⁸³ A new translation of two stanzas already cited above, p. 325F. These are two stanzas of the Udānavarga, XXXII, 81 and 82 of the Sanskrit edition (F. Bernhard, p. 458-459), XXXII, 78 and 79 of the Tibetan edition (H. Beckh, p. 142).

“The person who possesses the precepts is a bhikṣu; he who is [in the concentration of] emptiness is an ecstatic; he who is in constancy is a yogin; that is the happiness of extinction.

Actually the bhikṣu who endures pleasure and displeasure, whose bed and seat are isolated (prāntīśayanāsana), who is settled in purity who is based in mindfulness (apramāda), will uproot the perverse tendency of the desire for existence.

and, although these three concentrations are not nirvāṇa [proper], they are the cause (hetu) of nirvāṇa and that is why they are called nirvāṇa. In the world, it is common usage to designate the cause by the effect and the effect by the cause.

Śūnyatā, ānimitta and apraṇihita are concentrations (samādhi) by nature (svabhāva). The mind and mental events associated with these concentrations (samādhisaṃprayukta-cittacaittasikadharma), bodily actions (kāyakarman) and vocal actions (vākkarman) that arise following them, the formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviṇṇayakasaṃskāra) that come forth, form a complex (sāmagrī) called concentration. Thus, when the king (rājan) arrives, with him, of necessity, come the prime minister (mahāmātya) and some soldiers (sainika).¹⁸⁴ Here concentration (samādhi) is like the king, wisdom (prajñā) is like the prime minister, and the other dharma are like the soldiers. Even if these other dharma are not mentioned, they must necessarily be present. Why? Concentration does not arise by itself; it is unable to have all the activity by itself. The other dharma arise along with it, endure with it, perish with it, and collaborate with it in realizing the good (hita).

3. Aspects of the Three Concentrations¹⁸⁵

¹⁸⁴ Same comparison above, p. 135F.

¹⁸⁵ The three samādhis are the gates of liberation because they penetrate the sixteen aspects of the four noble truths. These sixteen aspects have already been considered during the preparatory path (prayogamārga) by the practice of the four roots of good ‘leading to penetration’ (nirvedhabhāgīya), heat (uṣmagata), etc. (cf. Kośa, VI, p. 163). But the three samādhis are alone in penetrating them completely.

The Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 104, p. 538c7-10), the Abhidharmāmṛta (T 1553, k. 2, p. 975c1-9; Reconstruction by bhikṣu Sastri, p. 90); Kośa (VIII, p. 188-190) and the Abhidharmadīpa (p. 424) distribute the aspects understood by the three samādhis in the following way:

Śūnyatāsamādhi perceives emptiness (śūnya) and non-self (anātman) as constituting the 3rd and 4th aspects respectively of duḥkhasatya.

Ānimittasamādhi perceives the four aspects of nirodhasatya.

Apraṇihitasamādhi perceives impermanence and suffering constituting respectively the 1st and 2nd aspect of duḥkhasatya plus the four aspects of samudayasatya plus the four aspects of mārgasatya: in all, ten aspects.

The Traité refers quite often to the theory of the sixteen aspects: cf. k. 11, p. 138a7-10 (above, p. 641F); k. 17, p. 186c28 (above, p. 1036F); k. 19, p. 200a14 and 202c24; k. 23, p. 233b2; k. 29, p. 274a22; k. 54, p. 444a15; k. 63, p. 505a17-18; k. 83, p. 641a16.

A phrase often repeated in the early scriptures (Majjhima, I, p. 435, 500; Anguttara, II, p. 128; IV, p. 422-424) may be thought of as a rough draft of the theory of the sixteen aspects: Dhamme aniccato dukkhato rogato gaṇḍato sallato aghato ābādhato parato palokato suññato anattato samanupassati: “He considers the dharma as impermanent, suffering, like a sickness, an ulcer, a dart, a misfortune, a torment, a strange object, a decay, empty and without self.” In the Pāli Abhidhamma, e.g.,

A. The meditative stabilization on emptiness (śūnyatāsamādhi) has two aspects (ākāra):

- 1) Because it considers (samanupaśyati) the five aggregates of attachment (pañca upādānaskandha) as having neither sameness (ekatva) nor difference (anyatva), it is ‘empty’ (śūnya).
- 2) Because it considers the ‘me’ (ātman) and the ‘mine’ (ātmīya) as non-existent (anupalabdha), it is ‘without self’ (anātmaka).

B. The meditative stabilization of signlessness (ānimittasamādhi) has four aspects:

- 1) Because it considers nirvāṇa as the cessation of all types of suffering (nānāvīdhaduḥkhanirodha), it is ‘cessation’ (nirodha).
- 2) Because it considers it as the extinctions of the fires of the threefold poison (triviṣa) and the other defilements (kleśa), it is ‘peace’ (śanta).
- 3) Because it considers it as the foremost of all dharmas, it is ‘excellent’ (praṇita).
- 4) Because it considers it as separated from the world (lokaviṣaṃyukta), it is ‘exit’ (niḥsaraṇa).

C. The meditative stabilization of wishlessness (apraṇihitasamādhi) has two aspects:

- 1) Because it considers the five aggregates of attachment (pañcopādānaskandha) as coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), it is ‘impermanent’ (anitya).
- 2) Because it considers them as the torments of the body and mind (kāyikamānasikaviheṭhana), it is ‘suffering’ (duḥkha).

Next, insofar as it considers the causes (hetu) of the five skandhas of attachment (upādānaskandha), it has four more aspects:

- 3) Because the complex of defilements and impure actions (kleśasāsravakarmasāmagrī) produces a fruit of suffering (duḥkḥaphala), it is ‘origin’ (samudaya).
- 4) Because the six causes (hetu)¹⁸⁶ produce a fruit of suffering (duḥkḥaphala), it is ‘cause’ (hetu).
- 5) Because the four conditions (prataya)¹⁸⁷ produce a fruit of suffering (duḥkḥaphala), it is ‘condition’ (prataya).

in the Paṭisambhidā, I, p. 118, there are analyses growing out of the four noble truths. But the specification of the sixteen aspects (Mahāvīyut., no. 1189-1205) is an innovation of the Sarvāstivādins.

The definitions proposed by their scholars are rather different and are worthy of detailed study: the Kośa gives no less than three different explanations; the Abhidharmamṛta (T 1553, k. 1, p. 973a1-9; Reconstruction by bhikṣu Sastri, p. 83), the Abhidharmadīpa (p. 329), the Kośakārikābhāṣya by Saṃghabhadra (T 1563, k. 35, p. 950c27-951a12) have also their individual interpretations.

¹⁸⁶ See above, p. 386F, 1038F.

¹⁸⁷ See also p. 386F and 1038F.

- 6) Because a certain number of similar causes and conditions [follow one another] so as to produce this fruit, it is ‘stream’ (prabhava).

Finally, insofar as it considers the aggregates of detachment (anupādānaskandha), it has four more aspects:

- 7) Because the eight members of the noble [path (āryamārgāṅga) can lead to nirvāṇa, it is ‘path’ (mārga).
- 8) Because [this path] is free of errors (viparyāsa), it is ‘reasonable’ or ‘practical’ (nyāya).
- 9) Because all saintly people (āryapudgala) make use of this path, it is ‘path’.
- 10) Because the defilements (kleśa) that depend on thirst (tṛṣṇāpatita) and those that depend on wrong views (dṛṣṭipatita)¹⁸⁸ do not obscure this path, it is ‘definitive exit’ (nairyāṇika).

4. Distribution of the Three Concentrations in the Levels.¹⁸⁹

The three gates of liberation (vimokṣamukha) occur in nine levels (bhūmi):

- 1) – 4) the four trances (dhyāna),
- 5) the level of anāgamya [the preparatory trance of the first dhyāna]
- 6) the dhyānāntara [the intermediate trance, subdivision of the first dhyāna]
- 7) – 9) the [first]three formless (ārūpya) absorptions, because the three gates of liberation are essentially pure (anāsravasvabhāva).

Some say that the three gates of liberation (vimokṣamukha) are absolutely pure (atyantam anāsrava), whereas the three concentrations (samādhi) are sometimes impure (sāsrava), sometimes pure (anāsrava). For those who say this, the concentrations occur in eleven levels:

- 1)- 6) the six bhumis [namely, the four dhyānas, the anāgamya and the dhyānāntara].
- 7) – 9) the [first] three ārūpya.
- 10) the desire realm (kāmadhātu).
- 11) the sphere of the summit of existence (bhāvagra or 4th ārūpya).

When the three samādhis are impure (sāsrava), they are linked (baddha) to these eleven levels. When they are pure (anāsrava), they are not linked to but are associated with the organ (or dominant faculty) of ¹⁸⁸ Two classes of passions already noted above, p. 424F.

satisfaction (saumanasyendriya), the organ of pleasure (sukhendriya) and the organ of equanimity (upekṣendriya).¹⁹⁰

Beginners (ādikārmika) in the practice of the three concentrations are in [207b] the desire realm (kāmadhātu), the advanced (pariṇippanna) are in the form realm (rūpadhātu) or the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu). See what has been set forth fully in the Abhidharma on all of those, whether they are advanced or non-advanced, practiced or non-practiced.

II. THE THREE CONCENTRATIONS ACCORDING TO THE MAHĀYĀNA

1. Profound Meaning of the Three Concentrations

a. Śūnyatāsamādhī.

Furthermore, there are two ways of understanding emptiness according to whether one considers all dharmas as empty of existence (sattvaśūnya) or empty of dharmas (dharmāśūnya).¹⁹¹

Emptiness of existence (sattvaśūnyatā) is what we have just explained [according to the Abhidharma system]. The emptiness of dharmas (dharmāśūnya) is the fact that all dharmas are empty of intrinsic nature (svalakṣaṇaśūnyatā), as the Buddha said to Subhūti:

“Form (rūpa) is empty of the nature of form (rūpatvā), and feelings (vedanā), concepts (saṃjñā), volitional formations (saṃskāra) and consciousnesses (viññāna) are empty of the natures of [feeling, concept, volitional formation] and consciousness.”¹⁹²

Question. – One can think about the emptiness of beings (sattvaśūnyatā) and the non-emptiness of things (dharmāṇām aśūnyatā). It is inconceivable that dharmas are empty of intrinsic nature (svalakṣaṇaśūnya). Why? If dharmas were empty of intrinsic nature, they would be without arising (anutpanna) or cessation (aniruddha). Since there would be neither arising nor cessation, there would be no sin (āpatti) or merit (puṇya). If there is no sin or merit, why still practice on the Path?

Answer. – It is as a result of the emptiness of dharmas (dharmāśūnyatā) that there is sin and merit. Without this emptiness of dharmas, there would be neither sin nor merit. Why? If dharmas really had an intrinsic nature (svabhāva), they would be indestructible (avināśa), their intrinsic nature and their characteristic (lakṣaṇa) not coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya). If they do come from causes and conditions, then it is only that they are formations (saṃskāra) [i.e., conditioned dharmas, saṃskṛtadharma].

¹⁹⁰ Three organs appearing in the list of 22 indriyas which will be discussed below, p. 1494F.

¹⁹¹ See the lengthy study dedicated to the two emptinesses above, p. 1078-1095F.

¹⁹² Pañcaviṃśati, p. 128, l. 10-12 (T 123, k. 3, p. 235a11-12; k. 9., p. 288b10; k. 16, p. 337b4; k. 21, p. 372c11-12, 3373c3-4), Śatasāhasrikā, p. 554, l. 6-18: Rūpaṃ rūpatvena śūnyam, vedanā yāvād vijñānam vijñānatvena śūnyam.

It is essential that the intrinsic nature of dharmas be conditioned (saṃskṛta) in order to be capable of being destroyed.

You will say that the intrinsic nature of dharmas is capable of being created (krta) and destroyed (niruddha) but that is not correct (ayukta). [By definition], the intrinsic nature is an unconditioned dharma (asaṃskṛtadharma) and exists independently of causes and conditions. Dharmas existing by themselves (svabhāvena) are without arising (anutpāda) since they exist in themselves before arising.¹⁹³ Being without arising (utpāda), they are without cessation (nirodha). Since arising and cessation do not take place, there is neither sin (āpatti) nor merit (puṇya). If there is no sin or merit, why still practice on the Path?

If beings had a true intrinsic nature (bhūtasvabhāva), they would be incapable of doing evil and incapable of doing good since they would be fixed (niyata) in their intrinsic nature. Such people would misunderstand the value of merit and would ruin [the law] of retribution of action (karmavipāka).

There is no nature of emptiness (śūnyatālakṣaṇa) in the emptiness of dharmas (śūnyatālakṣaṇa).¹⁹⁴ It is because you assume an emptiness of dharmas and you become attached to it that you raise these objections.

¹⁹³ Dharmas existing in themselves and by themselves would be unchanging, without arising and without cessation by definition.

In the present passage, the Traité seems to draw inspiration from the Ratnakūṭa in the Kāśyapaparivarta, § 63-65, p. 94-97 (transl. F. Weller, p. 101 and n.) cited in the original Sanskrit with some variants in Madh. vṛtti, p. 248-249; Ratnagotravibhāga, p. 28, l. 11-13; Laṅkāvatāra, p. 146, l. 12-13: Yan na śūnyatayā dharmān śūnyān karoti; api tu dharmā ... yasya khalu punaḥ śūnyatataiva dṛṣṭis tam aham acikitsyam iti vadāmi.

Transl. – It is not by means of emptiness that dharmas are made to be empty, but dharmas are by themselves empty. It is not by means of signlessness that dharmas are made to be without characteristics, but dharmas are by themselves without characteristics. It is not by means of wishlessness that dharmas are made to be not taken into consideration, but dharmas by themselves are not to be taken into consideration. That very consideration, O Kāśyapa, is called the Middle Way, the real consideration of dharmas. Indeed, O Kāśyapa, those who, by grasping an emptiness, take refuge in emptiness, I declare them to be completely lost for my teaching. Moreover, O Kāśyapa, a view of the self as high as Sumeru is worth more than a view of emptiness in those who adhere to it wrongly. Why? Emptiness, O Kāśyapa, is the way to escape from all kinds of false views; on the other hand, the person who has this very emptiness as a belief, I declare him to be incurable. Suppose, O Kāśyapa, there is a sick man and a physician gives him medicine, but this medicine, after having eliminated all the guilty humors of this illness, penetrates into his belly and does not come out. What do you think, O Kāśyapa; will this man be freed of his illness? – Certainly not, O Blessed One; his sickness will become greater if this medicine, having eliminated all the guilty humors, should penetrate into his belly and not come out. – The Blessed One said: In the same way, O Kāśyapa, emptiness is the means of escaping from all the wrong views; on the other hand, the person who holds this very emptiness as a belief, I declare him to be incurable.

The image of wrong view of the self ‘high as Sumeru’ and the example of the medicine not eliminated are used again in Vimalakīrti, p. 291, 339.

In the Wou chang yi king, T 669, k. 1, p. 471b8-10, the Buddha says to Ānanda: “He who produces the view of emptiness (śūnyatādr̥ṣṭi), I declare him to be incurable (acikitsya). If a person is attached to a view of the self (pudgaladr̥ṣṭi) as high as Sumeru, I am not surprised by that and I do not condemn him. But if a fool (abhimānika) is attached to a view of emptiness (śūnyatādr̥ṣṭi) as minute as the sixtieth part of a single hair, that I cannot allow.”

In this regard, a passage from the Bodh. bhūmi, p. 46-47, should be cited, hostile as it is toward the Mādhyamika doctrines: Idaṃ ca saṃdhyāyoktaṃ Bhagavatā. Varam ihaikatyasya pudgaladr̥ṣṭir na tv evaikatyaśya durgrhītā evaṃbhūtaṃ vastu apavadamānaḥ pranaṣṭo bhavaty asmād dharmavinayāt. Transl. – “It is with this intention that the Bhagavat said: ‘The view of the self in an absolute individualist is better than emptiness wrongly understood in an absolute nihilist [in this case, a Mādhyamika]. Why? A person who believes in the self is mistaken only on [the nature of] the knowable, but does not deny the [existence] of the knowable. This is why he will not be reborn in the bad destinies; he does not criticize and does not deceive his neighbor, the believer, who is seeking to free himself from suffering, but to establish him [on the other hand] in the Dharma and the Truth; furthermore, he does not slacken in observing the rules. On the contrary, by means of emptiness completely misunderstood, the person is mistaken about the reality of the knowable and even rejects it entirely. This is why he will be reborn in the bad destinies; he destroys his neighbor, the believer, who is seeking to free himself from suffering and, further, he slackens in his observation of the rules. By rejecting reality as it is, he separates himself from our teachings.”

By thus attacking the person who misunderstands emptiness, the Bodh. bhūmi manifestly quarrels with the Mādhyamika whom it wrongly confuses with the nihilist. But the Traité has already given the answer (p. 1090-1094F): “The nihilist denies the things that he sees; the Mādhyamika-Śūnyavādin denies nothing because there is nothing and he sees nothing.” See also Madh. vṛtti, p. 159-160, with the translation and note of J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 122-124. The Bodhisambhāraśāstra (T 1660, k. 6, 539c25-28), the author of which may have been Nāgārjuna and commentator the bhikṣu Lśvara, continues the Mādhyamika position in the following way:

“We resort to emptiness in order to stamp out the great mass of ignorance (mahāvidyāskandha), but the wise man does not act by basing himself on emptiness. If he acts by basing himself on emptiness, it is in order to combat and refute those who are difficult to convert and who profess the wrong view of the self (satkāyadr̥ṣṭi), for those who are prey to wrong views (dṛṣṭicarita) can escape from them only by emptiness. But those who are attached to the view of emptiness (śūnyatādr̥ṣṭyabhinivīṣṭa) are incurable.”

The emptiness of dharma was preached by the Buddha with the feeling of compassion (karuṇācitta) in order to cut through the fetters of thirst (tr̥ṣṇāsaṃyojana) and destroy wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi).

Furthermore, the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharma destroys suffering (duḥkha): it is the true domain (bhūtāvacara) of holy individuals (āryapudgala). If the emptiness of dharma (dharmasūnyatā) had an intrinsic nature (svabhāva), [i.e., existed by itself], how could we say, in speaking of the emptiness of dharma, that they are substantially empty? But if the emptiness of dharma is without intrinsic nature, what objection do you have?

When we contemplate the emptiness of dharma in the light of the twofold emptiness [of beings and of dharma], the mind is separated from all the dharma: we know that the world (loka) is false and deceptive like a magic show (māyā). That is the contemplation on emptiness.

b. Signlessness.

When the yogin has understood (udgrhṇāti) the empty nature (śūnyalakṣaṇa) of dharma, he produces the fetters of pride, etc. (abhimānādisaṃyojana) by that very fact, and he says: “I have understood the true nature of dharma.” It is then that he must practice the gate of signlessness (ānimittadvāra) in order to destroy his grasping onto the empty nature (śūnyanimittodgrahaṇa).

c. Wishlessness.

When the yogin gives himself up to futile proliferation (prapañca) in regard to signlessness (ānimitta), when he is about to imagine something as desirable, when he becomes attached (abhinivīṣate) to

The last word in this matter remains with Śāntideva whose three well-known stanzas, IX, v. 33-35) cut through the problem:

*Śūnyatāvāsanādāhānād dhīyate bhāvavāsanā / kiṃcin nāstīti cābhyāsāt sāpi paścāt prahīyate // 33 //
Yadā na labhyate bhāvo yo nāstīti prakalpyate / tadā nirāśrayo ‘bhāvaḥ kathaṃ tiṣṭhen mateḥ puraḥ // 34 //
Yadā na bhāvo nābhāvo mateḥ saṃtiṣṭhate puraḥ / tadānyagatyabhāvena nirālabhā praśāmyati // 35 //*

Transl. by L. de La Vallée Poussin. – When one assumes the idea of emptiness, when one is saturated with it, the idea of existence disappears; and later, by the habit of this mind that ‘nothing exists’, the idea of emptiness itself is eliminated.

Indeed, when one no longer perceives [as a consequence of the elimination of the idea of existence] an existence that one is able to deny, how then would the non-existence henceforth deprived of support arise to the mind?

And when neither existence nor non-existence present themselves to the mind, then the mind is pacified, no longer having any form [to affirm or deny], which are these two modes of action.

- According to Tāranātha (p. 165), Śāntideva, in the middle of stanza 35, rose up into the air and disappeared, but these words came to the ears of the monks who were able to concentrate until the end of the Bodhicaryāvatāra.

signlessness, then he must say to himself: “I am wrong. Why find characteristics, why grasp characteristics, why give myself up to futile proliferation about empty dharmas without characteristics? [207c] Now is the time to be based in emptiness and signlessness in order to control the body (kāya), speech (vāc) and mind (manas). One should not have praṇidhāna, ‘desire for’. One should consider this nature of wishlessness (apraṇihitalakṣaṇa) to destroy the three poisons (triviṣa). One should not be producing actions, bodily, vocal or mental. One should not be seeking rebirth in the threefold world (trailokya).” By reflecting in this way, the yogin enters into apraṇihitavimokṣamukha.

2. Sameness of the Three Concentrations

These three gates of liberation (vimokṣamukha) in the Mahāyāna are one and the same thing: it is as a result of the way they are practiced that we speak of three things.¹⁹⁵

Considering the emptiness of dharmas is called śūnyatā. When there is no place to grasp characteristics in this emptiness, this śūnyatā changes its name and is called ānimitta. When there is no place in the presence of this signlessness to experience ‘desire for’ or rebirth in the threefold world, this ānimitta changes its name and is called apraṇihita.

It is like a city with three gates. A single person cannot simultaneously enter by the three gates. If he enters, it is by going through one single gate.

Here the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas is the City of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇagara). This City has three gates, Śūnyatā, Ānimitta and Apraṇihita.

¹⁹⁵ However, even in the Lesser Vehicle, there was a suspicion of the identity of three samādhis also called vimokṣamukha and cetovimukti. On this subject, see Saṃyutta, IV, p. 296-297; Tsa a han, T 99, k. 21, p. 149c: Ya cāyaṃ āvuso appamāṇā cetovimutti yā ca ākiñcāñña cetovimutti ... ekaṭṭhā, byañjanam eva nānaṃ.

Transl. – “In regard to the mind-liberations called Immeasurable, Nothing-at-all, Emptiness and Signlessness respectively, there is, O venerable One, a way of teaching in which these dharmas are at the same time of different meaning and of different words, and there is also a way of teaching according to which these dharmas are of the same meaning and different words.”

Developing the second point, the text explains that the Immeasurable, the Nothing-at-all, the Emptiness and the Signlessness are alike empty of desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and ignorance (moha), the three bad roots (akuśalamūla) that create standards (pramāṇakaraṇa) [Fr., measures, p. 1230F, n.] constitute obstructions (kiṃcana) and produce signs (nimittakaraṇa). The result is that in their unchangeable (akopya) form, the four mind-liberations are one and the same thing under different names. – For detail see translation and notes of I. B. Horner, Middle Length Sayings, p. 358, 260.

If a person enters the śūnyatā gate, does not hypostatize this śūnyatā and no longer grasps at characteristics (nimitta), this person penetrates directly [into the City of nirvāṇa] and, with his end attained, has no need of the other gates.

But if he enters the śūnyatā gate, grasps at its characteristic and hypostatizes śūnyatā, the śūnyatā is not a gate for this person: the path of entry is closed to him. And so in order to avoid the characteristic of śūnyatā, he makes use of the ānimitta gate.

If his mind becomes attached to the characteristics of ānimitta and he gives himself up to futile chatter (prapañca), then he stops grasping the characteristics of ānimitta and goes through the apraṇihita gate.

3. Single Object of the Three Concentrations

In the system of the Abhidharma, the emptiness gate of liberation (śūnyatāvimokṣamukha) has as its object (ālambate) the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya) and comprises (saṃgrhṇati) the five skandhas.¹⁹⁶ The signlessness gate of liberation (ānimittavimokṣamukha) has as its object a single dharma, the pratisaṃkhyānirodha [or disjunction from impure dharmas obtained by understanding the truths].¹⁹⁷ The wishlessness gate of liberation (apraṇihitavimokṣamukha) has as its object three truths [a part of the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya), the truth of the origin of suffering (saṃudayasatya) and the truth of the cessation of suffering (nirodhasatya)]; it comprises five aggregates (skandha).

In the Mahāyāna, these three gates of liberation (vimokṣamukha) pertain to the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. By means of these three gates of liberation, the ascetic sees that saṃsāra and nirvāṇa are the same Why? Because nirvāṇa is empty (śūnya), without characteristics (ānimitta), not worthy of being taken into consideration (apraṇihita), and saṃsāra likewise.

Question. – If the Sūtra says that nirvāṇa has only one gate,¹⁹⁸ why is it a matter of three gates here?

Answer. – I have already said above that, although the dharma is single, its meaning (artha) is threefold.

Furthermore, beings to be converted (vineya) are of three kinds: those who abound in craving (trṣṇābahula), those who abound in wrong views (dṛṣṭibahula) and those in whom craving and wrong views are equal.

To those who abound in wrong views, the śūnyatāvimokṣamukha is preached. In this way they will see that all dharmas are impermanent (anitya), suffering (duḥkha), the result of causes and conditions ¹⁹⁶ Whoever enters into samādhi necessarily possesses the four formless aggregates depending on mind and mental events, namely, saṃjñā, vedanā, saṃskāra and vijñāna, plus the ‘discipline (saṃvara) of concentration’ which is rūpa. Cf. Kośa, VI, p. 107, 170; VIII, p. 128 and n. 4.

¹⁹⁷ For more details, see Kośa, VIII, p. 190.

¹⁹⁸ The single gate of Immortality (ekaṃ amatadvāram) mentioned in the Sūtras: Majjhima, I, p. 353; Aṅguttara, V, p. 346.

(hetupratyaya), have no intrinsic nature (svabhāva); not having intrinsic nature, they are empty (śūnya). By means of this emptiness, wrong views (dṛṣṭi) are stopped.

To those who abound in craving, the apraṇihitavimokṣamukha is preached. In this way they will see that all dharmas are impermanent, suffering, the result of causes and conditions. Having seen in this way, they will be mentally detached from thirst and will enter into the Path.

To those in whom craving and wrong views are balanced, the ānimittavimokṣamukha is preached. Learning that the characteristics of male and female do not exist, they will cut through craving. Learning that the characteristics of sameness (ekatva) and difference (anyata) do not exist, they will cut through wrong views.

Sometimes the Buddha preaches two gates of liberation at the same time, sometimes he preaches three at the same time. Since the bodhisattvas must [208a] always exert themselves in knowing all the paths, he preaches the three gates to them.

We could say yet other things, but the question of the three gates of liberation is treated here in summary (saṃkṣepeṇa).

Third section THE FOUR TRANCES (p. 1233F)

I. THE FOUR TRANCES ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA

The four dhyānas are of two types: i) śuddhaka, pure in the mundane order of purity; ii) anāsrava, pure in the supramundane order of purity.¹⁹⁹

What is called dhyāna śuddhaka? The five impure but good aggregates (sāsravakuśāla).²⁰⁰

What is called dhyāna anāsrava? The five pure aggregates (anāsrava).²⁰¹

¹⁹⁹ See above, p.1027F and n. 3; 1038F; 1042F and n. 4. Cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 144-146.

²⁰¹ The five anāsravaskandha, also called dharmaskandha or lokottaraskandha: morality (śīla), concentration (saṃādhi), wisdom (prajñā), liberation (vimukti), wisdom and vision of liberation (vimuktijñānadarśana): cf. Dīgha, III, p. 279; Majjhima, I, p. 145, 214, 217; Samyutta, I, p. 99-100, 139; V, p. 162; Anguttara, I, p. 162; III, p. 134, 271; V, p. 16; Itivuttaka, p. 107-108; Kośa, VI, p. 297 n.; Kośavyākhyā, p. 607.

The bodily and vocal actions (kāyavakkarman) contained in the four dhyānas are material dharmas (rūpa); the rest are non-material (arūpa). All of them are invisible (anidarśana), without resistance (apratigha), sometimes sāsrava, sometimes anāsrava. Those that are sāsrava are the five kuśāla-sāsrava skandhas; those that are anāsrava are the five anāsrava skandhas. The sāsrava belong to the desire realm (kāmadhātuvacara); the anāsrava do not belong to any realm.

The dhyānas include bodily actions (kāyakarman), vocal actions (vākkarman) and formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) that are neither mind (citta) nor mental events (caitasika dharma), nor associated with the mind (cittasaṃprayukta).

The dhyānas also contain the feeling aggregate (vedanāskandha), the discrimination aggregate (saṃjñāskandha) and the volition aggregate (saṃskāraskandha) associated with it. The mental events (caitasika dharma) also are associated with the mind (cittasaṃprayukta).

The dhyānas include mind (citta and manas), and consciousness (viññāna): this is only mind.

In the dhyānas, there are:

- 1) things accompanying the mind (cittānuparivartin) and non-associated with feeling (na vedanāsaṃprayukta).
- 2) things associated with feeling (vedanāsaṃprayukta) and not accompanying mind (na cittaparivartin).
- 3) things accompanying mind (cittānuparivartin) and associated with feeling (vedanāsaṃprayukta).
- 4) things not accompanying mind (na cittānuparivartin) and non-associated with feeling (na vedanāsaṃprayukta).

There are things accompanying mind and non-associated with feeling. Actually, the four dhyānas contain:

- a. bodily actions (kāyakarman) and vocal actions (vākkarman).
- b. formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) but accompanying mind (cittānuparivartin).
- c. feelings (vedanā).

There are things associated with feeling and not accompanying mind. As a result, the four dhyānas contain mind (citta and manas) and consciousness (viññāna).

There are things accompanying mind and associated with feeling. Actually, the four dhyānas contain:

- a. the aggregate of discrimination (saṃjñāsaṃskāra)
- b. the ‘associated’ aggregate of volition (saṃprayukta saṃskāraskandha)

There are things not accompanying the mind and non-associated with feeling. Actually, with the exception of the formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) but accompanying the mind (cittānuparivartin) – formations contained in the four dhyānas -, these are all the other formations dissociated from the mind (cittaprayuktasaṃskāra) and associated with the discrimination aggregate (saṃjñāskandhasamprayukta).

Of the four dhyānas, the [last] three are not endowed with investigation (na vitārkaṇuparivartin) and are not associated with analysis (na vicārasamprayukta).

In the first dhyāna, there are:

- 1) things accompanying investigation (vitarkānuparivartin) but non-associated with analysis (na vicārasamprayukta)
- 2) things associated with analysis (vicārasamprayukta) but not accompanying investigation (na vitarkānuparivartin)
- 3) things accompanying investigation (vitarkānuparivartin) and associated with analysis (vicārasamprayukta)
- 4) things not accompanying investigation (na vitarkānuparivartin) and non-associated with analysis (na vicārasamprayukta).

There are things accompanying analysis but non-associated with investigation. Actually, the first dhyāna contains:

- a. bodily actions (kāyakarman) and vocal actions (vākkarman)
- b. formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) and accompanying investigation (vitarkānuparivartin)
- c. analysis (vicāra).

There are things associated with analysis, but not accompanying investigation, namely, investigation (vitarka)

There are things accompanying investigation and associated with analysis, namely, the mind (citta) and mental events (caitasika dharma) associated with investigation (vitarka) and analysis (vicāra).

There are things not accompanying investigation and non-associated with analysis. Actually, with the exception of the formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) that accompany investigation (vitarkānuparivartin), they are all the other formations dissociated from mind.

The four dhyānas are all causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) and constitute all the causes and conditions.

In the first of the four dhyānas, there are:

1) things that follow upon an antecedent (samanantara) and constitute an antecedent condition (samanantarapratyaya),

2) things that follow upon an antecedent and constitute an antecedent condition,

3) things that do not follow upon an antecedent and do not constitute an antecedent condition.

There are things that follow upon an antecedent, but do not constitute [208b] an antecedent condition. This is the mind (citta) and mental events (caitasika dharma) called 'to arise in a future existence'.

There are things that follow upon an antecedent and constitute an antecedent condition. This is the past (atīta) and present (pratyutpanna) mind.

There are things that do not follow upon an antecedent and that do not constitute an antecedent condition. Actually, with the exception of mind and mental events that will arise in a future existence, these are the other minds and mental events of the future, physical and mental actions dissociated from the mind.

It is the same for the second and third dhyānas.

In the fourth dhyāna, there are:

1) Things that follow an antecedent but that do not constitute an antecedent condition. These are:

- a. The mind and mental events called 'to arise in a future existence'
- b. The absorption of non-discrimination (asaṃjñīsamāpatti), arisen or to arise

2) Things that follow upon an antecedent and that constitute an antecedent condition. This is the past and present mind and mental events.

3) Things that do not follow upon an antecedent and that do not constitute an antecedent condition. These are:

- a. With the exception of the mind and mental events called 'to arise in a future existence', all the other minds and mental events of the future.
- b. With the exception of the formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra) and following upon an antecedent, all the other formations dissociated from the mind.
- c. Bodily and vocal actions.

The four dhyānas include bodily actions (kāyakarman), vocal actions (vākkarman) and formations dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayuktasaṃskāra); some constitute conditions (pratyaya) and do not have conditions. Others both have conditions and constitute conditions.²⁰²

These four dhyānas are also dominating conditions (adhipatipratyaya) and constitute dominating conditions.²⁰³ All this is fully explained in the Abhidharmavibhāga.

²⁰² This subject is treated in detail above, p. 1038-1040F.

II. THE FOUR TRANCES ACCORDING TO THE MAHĀYĀNA (p. 1237F)

The bodhisattva possesses the skillful means of trance (dhyānipāya),²⁰⁴ the characteristics of trance (dhyānanimitta)²⁰⁵ and the factors of trance (dhyānāṅga).²⁰⁶ This has all been fully explained already in the context of the dhyānapāramitā (p. 1043-1057F).

Question. – In the present Prajñāpāramitāpadeśa,²⁰⁷ you speak only of dharmas empty of characteristics (lakṣaṇaśūnya); then how is the bodhisattva able to produce trance (dhyāna) or absorption (samāpatti) on empty dharmas?

Answer. – The bodhisattva knows that the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) and the five obstacles (pañcanivarāṇa) are the result of causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) without intrinsic nature (niḥsvabhāva), empty (śūnya) and non-existent (anupalabdha). Thus it is very easy for him to reject them. But under the influence of errors (viparyāsa), beings are attached to ordinary pleasures and are guilty of abandoning the profound and wonderful happiness of dhyāna.

The bodhisattva experiences great compassion (mahākaruṇā) for these beings and practices (bhāvayati) trance and concentration:

1) Being attached to the object of mind (cittāmbana), he avoids the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa), rejects the five obstacles (pañcanivarāṇa) and enters into the first dhyāna which is great joy (mahāprīti).

2) Suppressing investigation (vitarka) and analysis (vicāra) and concentrating his mind, he penetrates deeply into inner peace (adhyātmasamprasāda), obtains a subtle and wonderful joy (prīti) and enters into the second dhyāna.

²⁰⁴ The bodhisattva uses the dhyānas as salvific skillful means (upāya) to convert beings: this perfection of trance (dhyānapāramitā) has been the object of a description in 18 points above (p. 1043-1057F).

²⁰⁵ These nimittas are 23 in number: see above, p. 1038F.

²⁰⁶ These aṅgas are 28 in number:

First dhyāna: vitarka, vicāra, prīti, sukha, samādhi.

Second dhyāna: adhyātmasamprasāda, prīti, sukha, samādhi.

Third dhyāna: upekṣā, smṛti, saṃprajanya, sukha, samādhi.

Fourth dhyāna: upekṣā, upekṣapariśuddhi, smṛtipariśuddhi, samādhi.

For details, see Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 80, p. 412a21-412b3; Kośa, VIII, p. 147;

Abhidharmadīpa, p. 407-409. Cf. Viuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 71.

²⁰⁷ The seven Chinese characters Pan-jo-po-lo-mo-louen-yi appearing here remove any doubt about the exact title of the present work, [Mahā]Prajñāpāramitopadeśa and not [Mahā]Prajñāpāramitāśāstra.

See above the Introduction to the present volume.

3) Because this profound joy is distracting to concentrations, the bodhisattva avoids all joy, obtains a complete happiness (sukha) and enters into the third dhyāna.

4) Destroying all suffering and all happiness, rejecting all sadness (daurmanasya) and all satisfaction (saumanasya) as well as inhalation and exhalation (ānāpāna), he adorns himself with a pure and subtle equanimity (upekṣā) and enters into the fourth dhyāna.²⁰⁸

This bodhisattva knows well that dharmas are empty (śūnya) and without characteristics (animitta), but as beings themselves do not know it, he resorts to the signs of dhyāna (dhyānanimitta) in order to convert them.

If the emptiness of dharmas (dharmasūnyatā) truly existed in itself, we would not call it emptiness and it would not be necessary to abandon the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) to obtain dhyāna since, existing substantially, this emptiness would involve neither abandoning (tyāga) nor acquiring (lābha). [208c] But the empty nature of dharmas also being non-existent, you cannot raise the objection [that you have just brought up] by saying: “How can the bodhisattva produce trance on empty dharmas?”

²⁰⁸ Here the Traité, taking a few liberties, reproduces the canonical definitions of the four dhyānas, the original formulation of which in Pāli and in Sanskrit has been cited above (p. 1024F, n.). This formula is commented on word by word in Vibhāṅga, p. 256-261, Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 112-115, 126-137, etc.

It is to this information that the great exegetists of the 4th century turned: the five hundred arhats of Kāśmīr who compiled the Mahāvibhāṣa (T 1545, k. 85, p. 442a1-8) and, as we will see, the author or authors of the Traité.

2) When Devadatta asked the Buddha to retire and to entrust the community to him, the Buddha refused curtly and treated his cousin as a mūḍha ‘fool’”, śava ‘corpse, and kheṭṭāsika ‘eater of spit’. Those who recalled the kiss exchanged between Devadatta and Ajātaśatru could not help but see an allusion to this repugnant action. This is why the translators of the afore-mentioned sources translated kheṭṭāsika as follows:

a. Tan t'o ‘eater of spit’ (Sarv. Vin., T 1435, k. 36, p. 258b7),

b. Che t'o tchō, ‘eater of spit’ (Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1450, k. 13, p. 169b26).

c. Che jen t'o tchō, ‘eater of human spit’ (Mahāvibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 85, p. 442a6-7).

d. Seou t'o jen, ‘swallower of spit’ (Traité, T 1509, k. 26, p. 252c3).

If the Buddha treated Devadatta as a swallower of spit, it is because the latter had taken Ajātaśatru’s spit, and the Buddha spoke only the truth.

Now in the Majjhima, I, p. 395, the Buddha said: Yaṇ ca kho Tathāgato vMacam jānmati bhūtaṃ... tatra kālaṇṇā Tathāgato hoti tassā vācāya veyyākaraṇāya: “Every word that the Buddha knows to be true, he waits for the opportunity to utter it”, and that whether it is unpleasant or pleasant for others.

In this case, the Buddha was completely right in calling Devadatta kheṭṭāsika and the accusation against the Buddha does not hold. In the words of the 14th āveṇikadharmā, every word of the Buddha is preceded by knowledge and accompanied by knowledge.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva practices dhyaṇa without being attached to grasping characteristics (animittodgrahṇabhiniveśāt). And in the same way that a man swallows medicine (bhaiṣajya) to eliminate sickness (vyādhi) and not because of its taste, so the bodhisattva practices dhyaṇa for the purification of morality (śīlavīśodhana) and the perfecting of wisdom (prajñāsampādana).

In each dhyaṇa, the bodhisattva cultivates great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī). In dhyaṇa, the contemplation of emptiness (śūnyatāsamanupaśyanā) does not take place. Since it is a matter [of overcoming] the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa), gross errors and mistakes (viparyāsa), it is necessary to resort to subtle (sūkṣma) but false (vitatha) subterfuges to destroy them, in the same way that a poison (viṣa) is required in order to destroy other poisons.

CHAPTER XXXIII: THE FOUR IMMEASURABLES AND THE FOUR FORMLESS ABSORPTIONS(p. 1239f)

First Section THE FOUR IMMEASURABLES

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The third class of supplementary dharma recommended by the Prajñāpāramitā for the bodhisattva is made up of the four immeasurables: loving kindness (maitrī or maitrā), compassion (karuṇā), joy (muditā) and equanimity (upekṣā). These are the four limitless ones (apramāṇa), the four liberations of the mind (cetovimukti) or the four abodes of Brahmā (brahmavihāra). This last term is by far the most frequent in the post-canonical Sanskrit texts and in the Mahāyāna sūtras and śāstras.

A stock phrase endlessly repeated in the Tripiṭaka defines the four immeasurables. The Pāli wording shows almost no variation: Dīgha, I, p. 250-251; II, p. 186-187, 242, 250; III, p. 49-50, 78, 223-224; Majjhima, I, p. 38, 27., 283, 297, 335, 351, 369-370; II, p. 76, 195; III, p. 146; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 196, 322, 351-356; V, p. 115-116; Anguttara, I, p. 183, 192, 196; II, p. 128-130, 184; III, p. 225; IV, p. 390; V, p. 299-301, 344-345. - On the other hand, the Sanskrit wording, imperfectly reproduced in the Prajñāpāramitā editions, has many variants: Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 350; Mahāvastu, III, p. 213; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 181; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1444; Daśabhūmika, o. 34; Mahāvvyut., no. 1504-1509.

Pāli: So mettāsahagatena cetaasā skañ disaṃ pharitvā viharati, thatā duriyam Upekkāsahagatena cetasā - pe – pharitvā viharati.

Sanskrit: Sa maitrīśahagatena cettena vipulena mahadgatenādvayenāpramāṇenāvairēṇā-sapatnenāvyāvadhyaena ... spharitvopasampadya viharati.

Transl. of the Pāli. - He abides, having encompassed the first region with a mind associated with loving-kindness. In the same way, he abides, having encompassed the second, the third and the fourth region, the zenith, the nadir, the [four] intermediate regions. Having encompassed the entire world everywhere and in every way with a mind associated with loving-kindness, with an extended mind, a grand immense mind free of enmity, free of malice, he abides.

He does the same with a mind associated with compassion, with a mind associated with joy and with a mind associated with equanimity.

In the chapters dedicated to the immeasurables, the Abhidharmas comment at greater or lesser length on this canonical formula. For the Pāli Abhidhamma, see Vibhaṅga, chap. XIII, p. 272-284; Atthaālinī, p. 192-197; Vidhuddhimagga, ed. Warren, chap. IX, p. 244-270 (transl. Nanamoli, p. 321-353); Vimyyimaggā, transl. Ehara, p. 181-197. For the Sanskrit Abhidharma, see Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 81-83, p. 420b-431b; Abhidharmāmṛta, T 1553, k. 2, p. 975c9-22 (reconstruction by Sastri, p. 99-100); Kośa, VIII, p. 196-203; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 79, p. 768c-771a; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 427-429.

Here, contrary to its custom, the Traité avoids its usual method of first explaining the Sarvāstivādin theories and then opposing them with the Mahāyāna point of view, perhaps because the two Vehicles are in agreement on an essential point: in the meditation on loving-kindness, etc., nobody receives, nobody is satisfied and, nevertheless, merit arises in the mind of the benevolent one by the very power of his benevolence (Kośa, IV, p. 245). The four immeasurables are purely platonic wishes: it is not enough to wish (adhimuc-) that beings be happy, free of suffering or full of joy for this wish to be realized.

There are, however, three differences between the Hinayāna and Mahāyāna conceptions on this subject.

First a difference in intention. The śrāvaka practices the immeasurables in his own interest, to purify his own mind. The bodhisattva has in mind only the interests of others which he realizes indirectly. By practicing the immeasurables, he personally gains merit which he then can apply to the welfare and happiness of all beings.

Next, there are differences in domain or object. The śrāvaka brings the immeasurables to bear upon the beings of kāmadhātu who alone are able to call forth the feelings of loving-kindness, compassion, joy or equanimity in him. The bodhisattva puts no limits on his feelings and includes in them all beings of the three worlds (kāma-, rūpa- and ārūpyadhātu) distributed in the numberless universes of the ten directions.

Further, the bodhisattva never loses sight of the twofold emptiness of beings and things that forms the very basis of his philosophical outlook. His feelings are brought to bear upon beings, things and even, by a supreme paradox, on nothing whatsoever. Although he has beings in mind, he does not forget that these do not exist; although he has things in mind, he remembers that they come from a complex of causes and conditions and are empty of intrinsic nature and of characteristics; although he has nothing in view, he keeps from hypostatizing this true nature of things which dissolves into a pure and simple non-existence.

To my [Lamotte] knowledge, the distinction between loving-kindness that has beings as object, things as object, or not having any object is a Mahāyanist invention. In the following pages, the Traité does not fail to exploit it.

I. DEFINITION OF THE IMMEASURABLES (p. 1242F)

The four immeasurable feelings (apramāṇacitta) are loving-kindness (maitrī), compassion (karuṇā), joy (muditā) and equanimity (upekṣā).

Maitrī is to think about beings with love and always to seek for the safety (yogaśema) and happy things (sukhvastu) in order to bring them good.

Karuṇā is to think with compassion of beings who are suffering in the five destinies (gati) all sorts of bodily suffering (kāyikaduḥkha) and mental suffering (caitasikaduḥkha).

Muditā is to wish that beings obtain joy as a result of happiness (sukha).

Upekṣā is to abandon the three previous feelings and think of beings without either aversion (pratigha) or fondness (anunaya).

Maitrī is practiced to remove²⁰⁹ hostility (vyāpāda) toward beings.

Karuṇā is practiced to remove harm (vihiṃsā) toward beings.

Muditā is practiced to remove dissatisfaction (arati) toward beings.

Upekṣā is practiced to remove sensual attachment (kāmarāga) and hostility (vyāpāda) toward others.²¹⁰

Question. –The four immeasurables (apramāṇa), [the four formless absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti), the eight liberations (vimokṣa), the eight masteries (abhibhāvāyatana), the nine successive absorptions (anupūrvasamāpatti) and finally the ten spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana) are already contained in the four trances (dhyāna). Why speak of them separately here?

The corresponding Sanskrit phrases are cited in the Abhidharmadīpa, p. 442, l. 3-6: Maitrī āsevītā bhāvitā bahulīkṛtā vyāpādaprahāṇāya saṃvartate, karuṇā vihiṃsāprahāṇāya, aratīprahāṇāya muditā, kāmarāgavyāpādaprahāṇāyopekṣā.

See also Kośa, VIII, p. 196; Kośavyākhyā, p. 686, l. 6-8; Lalitavistara, p. 442, l. 3-5; Sūtrālamkāra, p. 181, l. 10-11; Bodh, bhūmi, p. 98, l. 18-19, p. 204, l. 24.

Answer. – Although all these things are contained in the four dhyānas, if they are not mentioned separately by name, their particular virtues (guṇa) would not be known. It is like precious objects in a sack; if you do not open the sack to take them out, nobody can know about them.

1) For those who want to obtain great merit (mahāpunya),²¹¹ one should talk about the four immeasurables (apramāṇa).

2) In order to inspire disgust for visibles (rūpanirveda), like spending time in prison (kāragrha), one should talk about the four formless absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti).

3) To those who cannot obtain mastery (abhibhava) over objects (ālambana) so as to see objects at will (yatheṣṭam), one should speak about the eight masteries (abhibhvātana).

4) To those who take blocked paths (pratiṣiddhamārga) and do not succeed in freeing the obstacles, one should speak of the eight liberations (vimokṣa).

5) To untamed minds (adāntacitta) that cannot merge from one trance (dhyāna) in order to enter into the others successively, one should speak of the nine successive absorptions (anupūrvasamāpatti).

6) To those who do not possess complete illumination (kṛtsnāvbhāsa) on all objects (ālambana) in order to liberate them at will, one should speak of the ten totalities (kṛtsnāyatana).

When one thinks about the beings of the ten directions, wishing them to obtain happiness, a mental event (caitasika dharma) occurs called maitrī. The aggregates associated with this maitrī, feelings (vedanā), concepts (saṃjñā), formations (saṃkāra) and consciousnesses (viññāna), give rise to bodily actions (kāyakarman), vocal actions (vākkarman) and formations dissociated from the mind (cittaprayuktasaṃskāra): the group of these dharmas (dharmasāmagrī) is called maitrī. Since they are loving-kindness or arise with loving-kindness as dominant (adhipatī), these dharmas are given the name of maitrī. In the same way, all [209a] minds (citta) and all mental events (caitasika dharma), although they are all causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) of future actions, are called cetana because, among their activities (kriyā), “thinking” (cetana) is the strongest.²¹²

It is the same for karuṇā, muditā and upekṣā.

²¹² All bodily or vocal actions derived from loving-kindness are called maitrī in the same way that bodily or vocal actions derived from ‘thinking’, i.e., from volition (etanā), are themselves volition. This is why the Buddha said in the Anguttara, III, p. 415: Cetanāhaṃ bhikkhave kammaṃ vadāmi; cetayitvā kammaṃ karoti kāyena vācāya manasā: “I say, O monks, that action is volition: it is after having wished that one acts with body, speech and mind.”

On this subject, see Tchong a han, T 26, k. 27, p. 600a24; Kathāvatthu, p. 393; Atthasālinī, p. 88; Kośa, IV, p. 1-2; Karmasiddhiprakāraṇa, MCB, IV, p. 152, 207-208; Madh, vṛtti, p. 305-306.

This maitrī occurs in the form realm (rūpadhātu);²¹³ it is impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), to be destroyed (prahātavya) or not to be destroyed (na prahātavya). It also occurs in the [four] root trances (mauladhyanā) and again in the dhyānāntara [variation of the first dhyāna].²¹⁴ Associated with the three sovereign organs (indriya), it excludes the faculty of unpleasantness (duḥkhendriya) and the faculty of dissatisfaction (daurmānasyendriya).²¹⁵ This is all explained in detail in the Abhidharma.

When maitrī still grasps (udgrhṇāti) the nature of the beings [towards whom the loving-kindness is expressed], it is impure (sāsrava); when, after having understood the nature of beings, it enters into the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas, it is pure (anāsrava). This is why the Wou-tsin-yi p'ou-sa-wen (Akṣayamatibodhisattvapariṣecchā)²¹⁶ says:

²¹³ This is then a maitrī in the non-concentrated state, in kāmadhātu.

²¹⁴ Cf. Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 81, p. 421a1-6: “The four apramāṇas occur in kāmadhātu. As for the levels (bhūmi), maitrī, karuṇā and upekṣā occur in seven levels: kāmadhātu, the four dhyānas, the anāgāmya and the dhyānāntara. Some say that they occur in ten levels: the four dhyānas, four sāmantakas, the dhyānāntara and kāmadhātu. The āpramāṇa of muditā occurs in three levels: kāmadhātu, first and second dhyānas. Other teachers say that the first and second dhyānas do not have the apramāṇa of karuṇā. Why? Because the first and second dhyānas have a strong feeling of joy.”

Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 453, l. 12-18: Prathamadvitīyādhyānayor muditā, saumamasyatvāt. Anyāni trīṇy apramāṇāni ṣaṣṭu bhūmiṣu: anāgāmye, dhyānāntare, dhyāneṣu ca, saprayogamaulagrahaṇāt. Keci punaḥ anāgāmyaṃ hitvā pannācāv etānīcchanti. Daśasv ity apare, kāmadhātuṃ sāmāntakāni ca prakṣīpya samāhitāsamāhitamaulaprayogagrahaṇāt. – “Muditā is of the first and second dhyāna, for it is satisfaction [and satisfaction is absent in the other dhyānas]. The other three apramāṇas occur in six levels: anāgāmya, dhyānāntara and the [four] dhyānas, thus including the root dhyānas with their preparatory stages. However, some teachers, excluding anāgāmya, distribute these apramāṇas into five levels. Still others, into ten levels by adding [to the six] the [four] sāmantakas [of the higher dhyānas] and attributing [the apramāṇas] to both the state of non-concentration and that of concentration, to the preparatory states as well as to the main dhyānas.”

²¹⁵ Of the twenty-two indriyas of which the Sūtra speaks, five are faculties of feeling (vedanendriya). Maitrī is associated with the feeling of pleasure (sukhendriya), the faculty of satisfaction (saumanasyendriya), and the feeling of equanimity (upekṣendriya). On the other hand, it is without the feeling of displeasure (suhkchendriya) and the feeling of dissatisfaction (daurmānasyendriya).

For these five indriyas, see Saṃyutta, V, p. 209; Kośa, II, p. 112-15.

²¹⁶ The Akṣayamatibodhisattvapariṣecchā, which will be cited again below, p. 1272F and which is mentioned in the Mahāvvyut., no. 1400, forms the 45th section of the Chinese Ratnakūṭa and the 44th section of the Tibetan Ratnakūṭa:

1) Wou-tsin-houei p'ou-sa houei, T 310, k. 115, p. 648a-650b, translated by Bodhiruci (Dharmaruci) between 693 and 727 AD.

2) Blo-gros-mi-zad-pas Œus pa, OKC, no. 760 (44), translated and revised by Śurendrabodhi and Ye-śes-sde.

“There are three kinds of maitrī: i) that which has beings as object (sattvālabhana), ii) that which has things as object (dharmālabhana), iii) that which has no object (anālabhana).²¹⁷ “

II. ASPECTS OF THE IMMEASURABLES

1. Loving-kindness, compassion and joy

Question. – What are the aspects (ākāra) of these four immeasurables (apramāṇa)?

Answer. – As the Buddha said everywhere in the sūtras: “With a mind associated with loving-kindness (maitrīśahagatena citta), free of enmity (avaireṇa), free of hostility (anupanāhena), free of rivalry (asapatnena), free of malice (avyāvādhya), extended (vipulena), expanded (mahadgatena), immense (apramāṇena) and well cultivated (subhāvitena), the bhikṣu intentionally includes in this mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcittena) the beings of universes in the eastern direction (pūrvā diś), then he intentionally includes in this mind of loving-kindness the beings of the universes of the ten directions: those of the south (dakṣiṇā), the west (paścimā), the north (uttarā), of the four intermediate directions (vidiś), of the zenith (upariṣṭāt) and the nadir (adhastāt). And in the same way, he includes them by means

But the passage cited here does not belong to the Akṣayamatibodhisattvapariṣṭhā: it comes from the Akṣayamatiniṛdeśasūtra or simply Akṣayamatisūtra, of which there are two Chinese translations and one Tibetan translation:

1) A-tch 'a-mo p'ou-sa king, T 403, translated by Dharmarakṣa between 265 and 313.

2) Wou-tsin-yi p'ou-sa p'in, translated by Dharmakṣema between 414 and 421 and later incorporated in the Mahāsaṃnipāta where it forms the 12th section (T 397, k. 27-30, p. 184-213).

3) Blo-gros-mi-zad-pas bstan-pa, OKC, no. 842, anonymously translated.

This sūtra, under the name Akṣayamatisūtra, is cited in the Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 11, 21, 33, 34, 117, 119, 158, 167, 183, 190, 212, 233, 236, 271, 278, 285, 287, 316; in the Pañjikā, p. 81, 86, 118, 173, 522, 527; and the Traité will refer to it later (k. 53, p. 442a2), calling it A-tch 'a-mo king. It is also cited under the name Akṣayamatiniṛdeśasūtra in the Pañjikā, p. 20, and the Mahāvvyut., no. 1344.

²¹⁷ Akṣayamatiniṛdeśa, T 403, k. 4, p. 500a13-17; T 397, k. 29, p. 200a15-18. The original Sanskrit is cited in Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 212: Sā [maitrī] trividhākṣayamatisūtre 'bhihitā: sattvārambaṇā maitrī prathamacittotpādikānāṃ bodhisattvānāṃ; dharmārambaṇā caryāpratipannānāṃ bodhisattvānāṃ; anārambaṇā maitrī anupatikkadharmakṣātipratilabdhanāṃ bodhisattvānāṃ iti. – “In the Akṣayamatisūtra, this loving-kindness is threefold: that which has beings as object belongs to the bodhisattvas who have just produced the mind of bodhi; that which has dharmas as object belongs to bodhisattvas cultivating the practices; that which has no object belongs to the bodhisattva having the conviction that dharmas do not arise.”

As we will see later, p. 1251F, this threefold maitrī is mentioned frequently in the Mahāyāna sūtras and śāstras.

of a mind associated with compassion (karuṇāśahagatena), associated with joy (muditāśahagatena) and associated with equanimity (upekṣāśahagatena citta).²¹⁸

a. maitrīśahagatena citta.

“With a mind associated with loving-kindness.” – Maitrī is a mental event (caitasika dharma) capable of counteracting the corruptions (kaṣāya) contained in the mind, namely, hatred (dveṣa), hostility (upanāha), avarice (mātsarya), lust (rāga), and the other passions (kleśa). Thus, when the purifying pearl (maṇi) is placed in dirty water, it becomes clear.

b. avaireṇānupanāhena citta.

“With a mind free of enmity and free of hostility.” – Let us suppose that, with or without reason, one hates someone. If one wants to insult him, curse him, strike him or rob him, this is enmity (vaira). If one waits for the proper moment and, given the chance, one torments him with all one’s strength, this is hostility (upanāha). Since maitrī counteracts both these things, it is said to be free of enmity and hostility.²¹⁹

c. asapatnenāvyāvādhya citta.

“With a mind free of rivalry and free of malice.” – Hostility (upanāha) is rivalry (sapatnatā). The first offensive movement (āghāta) is of hostility (upanāha). In time, hostility becomes rivalry (sapatnatā). When one inflicts torment (vyābādha) by means of physical and vocal actions (kāyavākkarman), this is malice (vyāvādhya).

Furthermore, the fetter ‘hostility’ (pratighaṣaṇyojana) is called enmity (vaira). When enmity increases, is prolonged and becomes attached to but not yet fixed (niyata) in the mind, it takes the name of hostility (upanāha) and also rivalry (sapatnatā). When the mind is determined and no longer has any scruples, this is called malice (vyāvādhya).²²⁰

Because the power of maitrīcitta rejects, abandons and leaves behind these three things, it is said to be ‘free of enmity, free of hostility, free of rivalry and free of malice’. The Buddha praised maitrīcitta in regard to this fourfold exemption.²²¹

²¹⁸ Here the Traité reproduces, with a few liberties, the canonical stock phrase cited above, p. 1239F, with references. Like the Kośa, VIII, p. 199, and the Visuddhimagga, p. 255, it is careful to state that the apramāṇas include not the directions but the beings in these regions. It insists on the voluntary nature of their action, for the ascetic voluntarily (adhimucaya) and in contradiction to the actual fact that the ascetic sees beings as happy, unhappy, joyful: see Kośa, IV, p. 245; VIII, p. 198-199.

²¹⁹ According to the Visuddhimagga, p. 256, the mind is without enmity (avera) inasmuch as it destroys malice and hostility (byāpādapaccatthikappahānena)

²²¹ Notably in the Mettasutta of the Suttanipāta, p. 26, v. 149-151:

Mātā yathā niyaṃ puttam

All beings fear suffering and are attached to happiness. Enmity is cause and condition for suffering, and maitrī is cause and condition for happiness. Beings who hear it said that this concentration of loving-kindness (maitrīsamādhi) can chase away suffering and bring happiness become mindful (smṛtimat), brave (ātāpin) and full of energy (vīryavat) to practice this meditative stabilization, and this is why they are ‘without enmity, without hostility, without rivalry and without malice.’

d. vipulena, mahadgatenāpramāṇena cittena.

“With a vast, expanded, immense mind”.²²² – This mind is single, but as its magnitude differs, there are three attributive adjectives used.

This mind is vast (vipula) when it includes one single region, extended [209b] (mahadgata) when it goes far and high, immense (apramāṇa) when it includes the nadir (adhastād diś) and the other nine regions.

Furthermore, if it is low (avara), maitrī is called vast (vipula); middling (madhya), it is called extended (mahadgata); higher (agra), it is called immense (apramāṇa).

*āyusā ekaputtam anurakkhe /

*Mettañ ca sabbalokasmiṃ mānasam bhāvaye aparimāṇam /

Tiṭṭhaṃ caraṃ nisinno vā sayāno vā yāvat’ assa vigatamiddho / etaṃ satim adhiṭṭheyya, brahman etaṃ vihāraṃ idha-m-āhu //

Transl. - “As a mother, during her entire life, protects her own son, her only son, so should everyone nourish an immense friendliness for all beings.

Let him nourish an immense friendliness and loving-kindness for the entire world, above, below and across, free of any obstacle, enmity or rivalry.

Standing, walking, sitting or lying down, as long as he is awake, let him be filled with this feeling, for this, they say, is the abode of the Brahmā gods.”

²²² Cf. Visuddhimagga, p. 256: Vipulenā ti attha ca pharaṇavasena vipulatā daṭṭhabbā. Bhūmivasena pana etaṃ mahagataṃ. Paṇṇavasena ca appamāṇasattārammaṇavasena ca appamāṇam: “By vast here we should understand its amplitude as inclusion. It is also expanded in regard to the levels in which it is applicable [from kāmādhātu up to rūpadhātu included]. It is immense in regard to its competence and to the fact that it has innumerable beings as object.”

Furthermore, if it bears upon the beings of the four main directions (diś), maitrī is called vast (vipula); if it bears upon the beings of the four intermediate directions (vidiś), it is said to be extended (mahadgata); if it bears upon the beings of the zenith and the nadir, It is said to be immense (apramāṇa).

Furthermore, if it destroys²²³ the minds of enmity (vairacitta), maitrī is called vast (vipula); if it destroys the minds of rivalry (sapatnacitta), it is called extended (mahadgata); if it destroys the minds of malice (vyāvadyacitta) it is called immense (apramāṇa).

Furthermore, all the defiled minds (kliṣṭajñāna) cultivated by vile individuals giving rise to evil things are called vile (hīna). The most vile of them are enmity (vaira), rivalry (sapatnatā) and malice (vyāvadya). Since maitrī destroys these vile minds, it is called vast (vipula), extended (mahadgata) and immense (apramāṇa). Why? Because great causes and conditions are necessary to destroy vile things. The ‘vast’ mind (vipulacitta) that fears sin (āpatti), that fears falling into hell, eliminates the bad dharmas from the mind; the ‘extended’ mind (mahadgatacitta) that believes in the retribution of merits (puṇyavipāka) eliminates the bad thoughts; the ‘immense’ mind (apramāṇacitta) that wants to attain nirvāṇa eliminates the bad thoughts.

Furthermore, when the yogin observes the purity of the discipline (śīlavīśuddhī), this is a ‘vast’ mind; when he is endowed with trance and absorption (dhyānasamāpattisaṃpanna), this is an ‘extended’ mind ; when he is endowed with wisdom (prajñāsaṃpanna), this is an ‘immense’ mind.

When the yogin, by means of this mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta), thinks about the noble people (āryapudgala) who have found the Path, this is an ‘immense’ mind because he is using immense means to distinguish these noble people. When he thinks about the noble abodes (āvāsa) of gods and men, this is an ‘extended’ mind. When he thinks about lower beings (hīnasattva) and the three unfortunate (durgati) destinies, this is a ‘vast’ mind.

When he thinks with loving-kindness about a being that is dear to him (priyasattva) and he extends this thought [to all dear beings], this is a ‘vast’ mind. When he thinks with loving-kindness about people who are indifferent to him (madhyastha puruṣa), this is an ‘extended’ mind. When he thinks with loving-kindness about his enemies (vaira) and thus his merits (guṇa) are many, this is an ‘immense’ mind.²²⁴

²²³ In fact, it does not destroy the passions; it removes them and undermines them.

²²⁴ Maitrī should be practiced gradually in this way to include with all beings, friends, neutrals and enemies, in the same loving-kindness. This is called ‘breaking the barriers (sīmasambheda)’. Cf. Visuddhimagga, p. 246: Bhikkhunā... sīmasambhedaṃ katthkāmena... atippiyasahāyake, atippiyasahāyakato majjhatte, majjhataṭṭha veripuggate mettā bhāvetabbā. Bhāventena ca ekekasmiṃ koṭṭāse muduṃ kammaniyaṃ cittaṃ katvā tadanantare tadanantare upasaṃharitabbam: “The monk who wishes to break the barriers should cultivate loving-kindness toward a very dear friend, then toward a neutral person as though he were very dear, then toward an enemy as though he were neutral. While he is doing this, in each case he should make his mind soft and gentle before going on to the next one.”

For the way in which beginners (ādikarmika) should practice loving-kindness, see also Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 82, p. 421c15-22; Kośa, VIII, p. 201-202.

The mind that bears upon a limited object is called ‘vast’; that which bears upon a small object is called ‘extended’; that which bears upon immensity is called ‘immense’.

This is the meaning of these distinctions.

e. subhāvitena cittena.

By a ‘well-cultivated’ mind is meant a strong (dr̥ḍha) mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta). The mind is not yet ‘well-cultivated’ when one is just beginning to acquire it. In order that it be ‘well-cultivated’, it is not enough to practice it just toward fond people, or toward good people, or toward those who do good to us, or toward beings of a single direction; following long practice, it is necessary to acquire deep affection for and love equally and without any difference the three types of beings, friends (priyapudgala), enemies (vairipudgala) and neutrals (madhyastha), to look upon beings in the five destinies (pañcagati) and the ten directions with the same loving-kindness as one regards one’s mother, father, older brother, younger brother, older sister, younger sister, one’s son, nephew, one’s friend; one should always look for good things to procure their welfare (hita) and safety (yogaḥsema); finally, one should include the beings of the ten directions in this loving-kindness.

2. The three kinds of loving-kindness²²⁵

Mahāyāna Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra (T 374, k. 15, p. 452c; T 375, k. 14, p. 694c): O son of noble family, there are four other brahmanical conducts: maitrī, karuṇā, muditā and upekṣā. – The bodhisattva Kāśyapa said to the Buddha: O Bhagavat, if one practices maitrī well, one destroys malice (vyāpāda), and if one practices karuṇācitta, one also destroys malice. Then why speak of four apramāṇa cittas? By examining the meaning, there should be three. Bhagavat, there are three kinds of maitrī: 1) that which has beings as object (sattvāḷambana); 2) that which has things as object (dharmāḷambana); 3) that which has no object (anāḷambana). It is the same for karuṇā, muditā and upekṣā. Consequently, the apramāṇas should be three in number and not four. The maitrī that has beings as object is concerned with the five skandhas and wishes to bring them happiness: we say that it has beings as object. The one that has things as object is concerned with the things that are necessary to beings and brings them to beings: we say that it has things as object. The one that has no object concerns the Tathāgata: we say that it has no object. In general, maitrī concerns poor beings (daridrasattva), but the Tathāgata, the great Teacher, is always free of poverty and enjoys absolute happiness (paramasukha). Thus, although it concerns beings, maitrī does not concern the Buddha. It is the same for the maitrī that concerns objects. O Bhagavat, the maitrī that has all beings as object concerns, for example, a father, mother, wife, son, relative; consequently we say that it has beings as object. The maitrī that has things as object does not see the father, mother, wife, son, relative; it sees all the things that result from causes and conditions (pratītyotpanna): we say that it has things as object. The maitrī that has no object is based upon neither the characteristic of a thing (dharmanimitta) nor the characteristic of a being (sattvanimitta): we say that it has no object. It is the same for the minds of karuṇā, muditā and upekṣā. Therefore the apramāṇas should be three and not four.

Buddhabhūmisūtraśāstra, T 1530, k. 5, p. 314b8-13: There are three kinds of maitrī: 1) that which has beings as object (sattvāḷambana); 2) that which has things as object (dharmāḷambana); 3) that which has no object (anāḷambana).

Bodhisattvas at the stage of those who have just produced bodhi mind (prathamacittotpādikāvasthā) practice mainly the maitrī that has beings as object. This is most frequently impure (sāsrava) for its realm (gocara) is purely conventional (saṃvṛtisat) things.

Bodhisattvas at the stage of those who are cultivating the practices (caryāpratipannāvasthā) mainly practice the maitrī that has things as object. This one also is impure (sāsrava) most frequently, for its realm (gocara) is the Mahāyāna teachings.

Bodhisattvas who have acquired the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣāntipratilabdha) practice maitrī mainly without object. Even though it has an object, the fundamental element (dharmadhātu), it is, like the dharmas of retribution (vipākadharmas), eye, etc., without thought-construction (vikalpa), makes no effort (prayoga) and functions spontaneously (svarasēṇa pravartate). This is why it is called ‘great maitrī without object’ (anāḷambana), associated with the knowledge of equality (śamatāñjānasamprayukta). Another meaning: as it bears upon the fundamental element (dharmadhātu) only and is always without thought-construction (vikalpa), as it does not bear upon either beings or things, it is called the maitrī without object.

The Sūtrāḷamkāra, p. 121, also mentions these three kinds of apramāṇa. Those that have no object, it says, concern suchness (tathatā): they are without object insofar as they are without thought-construction (te hy avuḥkapatvād anāḷambanāḥ).

Bodh. bhūmi, p. 241-242 (T 1579, k. 44, p. 535c7-18). Transl. – In short, the bodhisattva develops the four apramāṇas in three ways: those having beings as object, those having things as object and those having no object.

The bodhisattva arranges beings into three groups, happy, unhappy and neither unhappy nor happy, but all aspiring to happiness; he conceives towards them loving-kindness accompanied by the great resolve to procure happiness for them. Having included the ten directions in this mind of loving-kindness, he dwells with the aspiration (adhimokṣa = adhimuktisaṃjñā: cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 199) that this is about beings.

Then, no longer having the notion of things, the bodhisattva cultivates this loving-kindness by intentionally considering this metaphor of beings in what are just things. This is the maitrī of bodhisattvas having things as object.

Finally, the bodhisattva cultivates this loving-kindness by not even imagining things. This is the bodhisattva’s maitrī without object.

It is the same for karuṇā, muditā and upekṣā.

1) The mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta) of which we have just spoken is that which has beings as object (sattvālabhana). It is found mainly among worldly people (prthagjana) practicing the trances or in adepts on the path of practice (śaikṣa) who have not yet destroyed the impurities (akṣīṇasrava).

2) There are those who practice a loving-kindness that has things as object (dharmālabhana); these are the arhats who have destroyed the impurities [209c] (kṣīṇāsra), the pratyekabuddhas and the Buddhas. Having destroyed the concept of self (ātmasamjñā) and eliminated notions of identity and difference (ekatvānyatvasamjñā), these holy individuals (āryapudgala) consider only the objects of enjoyment (kāmaguṇa) continually (prābandika) coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya). When they think about beings with loving-kindness, they think only of the emptiness (śūnya) coming continually from causes and conditions together. The ‘being’ is the five [empty] skandhas. When they think with loving-kindness, they are thinking about these five skandhas. But beings themselves ignore this emptiness of things (dharmasūnyatā) and, with their whole heart, always want to find happiness (sukha). The holy individuals (āryapudgala) of whom we are speaking take pity on them and make them find happiness as they wish, but only from the conventional point of view (samvṛtita). This is what is called loving-kindness having things as object (dharmālabhana).

3) As for the loving-kindness that has no object (anālabhana), this is the one that only the Buddhas possess. Why? The mind of the Buddhas does not rest on the conditioned (samskṛta) or on the unconditioned (asamskṛta); it does not rest on the past (atīta), the future (anāgata) or the present (pratyutpanna). The Buddhas know that all objects (ālambana) are not real, are erroneous and deceptive: this is why their mind is without object (anālamabana). Beings do not know the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of things; they wander through the five destinies (pañcagati), their minds are attached (abhinivīṣate) to things, they make distinctions, take [certain things] and reject other things. And so the Buddhas use the wisdom (prajñā) of the true nature of things and make beings obtain it: this is the loving-kindness ‘without object’.

It is as if one gave material (vasu) objects to a needy person (daridra), precious things of gold or silver (suvārṇarūpyamayaratnadravya) and [finally] the precious wish-fulfilling gem: it is the same for the

It may be noted that the sources cited here have adapted the theory of the three kinds of maitrī to the ultimate point of their philosophy. Thus the Mahāyana Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra which accepts the innateness of buddha-nature in all beings makes the Tathāgata the object of the maitrī called ‘without object’. For the Buddhahūmisūtra, the Sūtrālamkāra and the Bodhi, bhūmi, which come under the idealist school of the Vijñānavādins, the object of the maitrī ‘without object’ is the fundamental element (dharmadhātū), suchness (tathatā), a mind where subject and object of consciousness are mixed, or rather, a mind where there is neither subject nor object.

The Traité, which represents pure Madhyamaka, clearly cannot go along with the conclusions of monist Buddhism or of idealist Buddhism. For the Traité, the object of maitrī ‘without object’ is the true nature of things (dharmāṇām bhūtalakṣaṇam), i.e., pure and simple non-existence as has been explained.

loving-kindness that has beings as object, the loving-kindness that has things as object and the loving-kindness without object, respectively.²²⁶

This briefly (samkṣepeṇa) defines the meaning of the mind of loving-kindness. It is the same for the mind of compassion (karuṇācitta): the ascetic includes with compassion the suffering of beings of the ten directions and reflects as follows: “Beings are in misery; they should not endure all these sufferings.” Then “with a mind free of enmity (avaira), free of hostility (anupanāha), free of rivalry (asapatna), free of malice (avyāvadhyā),” etc., “he includes the ten directions.”

3. The subjective nature of loving-kindness

Question. – There are three kinds of beings: i) those who experience happiness (sukhita), such as the gods and a small portion of humans (manuṣyāṇām prabheda); ii) those who undergo suffering (duḥkhita), such as the beings of the three unfortunate destinies (durgati) and a small portion of humans; iii) those who experience neither suffering nor happiness (aduḥkhāsukhita), such as a small portion of beings in the five destinies. How do those who practice loving-kindness see all beings as experiencing happiness, and those who practice compassion see all beings as undergoing suffering?

Answer. - When the yogin wants to use the infinite feeling of loving-kindness, first he makes the following vow (praṇidhāna): “I wish that beings may experience all kinds of happiness.”²²⁷ Having in this way grasped (udgrhya) the character of the happy man (sukhitanimitta), he concentrates his mind (cittam pragrṇhāti) and enters into dhyāna. This nature increases gradually (krameṇa vardhate) and then the yogin sees all beings as experiencing happiness.

Thus, when one is making fire by friction (mathana), first the flame takes fire on the soft grass (mṛdutrṇa) and dried cow dung (śuṣkagomaya) and, as the strength of the fire increases, it is able to consume big pieces of moist wood (sasnehakāṣṭha).²²⁸ It is the same for the concentration of loving-kindness (maitrīsamādhi): at the beginning, when one make the vows for loving-kindness (maitrīpraṇidhāna), one applies them only to one’s friends (mitra); but when the mind of loving-kindness has grown, enemies (amitra) and relatives (bandhu) become mixed up and one sees them all as experiencing happiness: this is because the dhyānas or samāpattis of loving-kindness have grown (vardhita) and are becoming complete (sampanna).

²²⁸ Cf. Majjhima, I, p. 240: Api nu ... puriso allaṃ ... kaṭṭhaṃ sasnehaṃ udake nikkhittam uttarāraṇiṃ ādāya abhimanthento aggaṃ abhinibbatteyya tejo pātukareyyāti. – “A man who rubs a soaking wet piece of wood with a fire stick, would he be able to produce fire and create heat?”

It is the same for the minds of compassion (karuṇā), joy (muditā) and equanimity (upekṣā).

4. Object and merit of equanimity

Question. – In the course of the mind of compassion (karuṇācitta), one takes hold of the character of the unhappy man (duḥkhanimittam udgrhṇāti); in the course of the mind of joy (muditā) one takes hold of the character of the joyful man (muditānimitta). What character does one take hold of in the course of the mind of equanimity (upekṣanimitta)? [210a]

Answer. – One takes hold of the character of the neither unhappy nor happy man (aduḥkhāsukhita). When this mind has increased gradually, the yogin sees the entire world as being neither unhappy nor happy.

Question. – The first three minds – loving-kindness, compassion and joy – are certainly meritorious (punya). But what benefit (arthakriyā) can there be in the mind of equanimity bearing on beings who are neither unhappy nor happy?

Answer. – The yogin thinks thus: “When they lose their happiness (sukha), beings encounter suffering (duḥkha), and in the time of suffering, they are unhappy (duḥkhita). Finding a state without either suffering or happiness would be safety for them (yogakṣema).” This is how [the mind of equanimity] presents a benefit (arthakriyā).²²⁹

When the yogin practices the minds of loving-kindness (maitrī) and joy, it may happen that a feeling of attachment (abhiśvaṅgacitta) arises in him; when he practices the mind of compassion (karuṇā), it may happen that a feeling of sadness (daurmansayacitta) arises in him. His mind is distracted (vikṣipta) by this attachment or this sadness. Then he enters into the mind of equanimity (upekṣacitta) and drives away (apanayati) this attachment and this sadness. Since attachment and sadness are eliminated, there is a ‘mind of equanimity’.

5. Differences between loving-kindness and joy

Question. – We can ascertain the differences (viśeṣa) that exist between the mind of compassion (karuṇācitta) and the mind of equanimity (upekṣacitta). [But the differences are less evident between the other two.] The mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta) wishes that all beings be happy (sukhita) and the mind of joy (muditācitta) wishes that all beings be joyful (muditā). What difference is there between happiness (sukha) and joy (muditā)?

²²⁹ An advantage for the person who is practicing it, but not for the person who is the object of it.

Answer. – Happiness is bodily happiness (kāyika sukha); joy is mental happiness (caitasika sukha).

We call happiness the happiness associated with the first five consciousnesses (pañcavijñānasamprayutasukha);²³⁰ we call joy the happiness associated with the mental consciousness (manovijñānasamprayuktasukha).

We call happiness the happiness that arises in regard to the first five [external] bases of consciousness (pañcāyatana);²³¹ we call joy the happiness that arises in regard to the base made up of mental objects (dharmāyatana).

First the yogin formulates vows of happiness (sukhapraṇidhāna) that beings find this happiness and that, after this happiness, they find joy (muditā). Thus, when someone has pity on a needy person, first he gives him a precious thing (ratnadraya): that is ‘happiness’; next, he invites the poor person to trade it for money so that he can enjoy the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa): that is ‘joy’.

Furthermore, we call happiness the happiness of the desire realm (kāmadhātusukha) which one is wishing for beings; we call joy the happiness of the form realm (rūpadhātusukha) which one is wishing for beings.

Furthermore, we call happiness: i) the happiness associated with the five consciousnesses (pañcavijñānasamprayuktasukha) in the desire realm (kāmadhātu); ii) the happiness associated with the three consciousnesses (trivijñānasamprayuktasukha) in the first dhyāna; iii) all the happiness in the third dhyāna.²³² – We call joy: i) the happiness associated with the mental consciousness (manovijñānasamprayuktasukha) in the desire realm (kāmadhātu) and the first dhyāna; ii) all the happiness in the second dhyāna.

We call happiness coarse (audārika) happiness; we call joy subtle (sūkṣma) happiness.

‘Happiness’ refers to the time of the cause (hetukāla); ‘joy’ refers to the time of the fruit (phalakāla). When one is beginning to find happiness, that is called ‘happiness’; when the joyful mind arises within (adhyātman) and the signs of happiness appear outwardly (bahīrdā) by way of singing, dancing and leaping about, that is called ‘joy’. Thus when one starts to swallow a medicine (bhaiṣajya), it is happiness, but when the medicine has penetrated the whole body, that is joy.

Question. – If that is so, why not combine these two minds into one single immeasurable (apramāṇa)? Why, on the contrary, distinguish two different things?

Answer. – At the start, the yogin’s mind is not concentrated (pragrūṭa) and as he cannot love beings deeply, that gives him happiness only; but when he has concentrated his mind and loves beings deeply, that gives him joy. This is why he is first happy and, only after that, is he joyful.

²³⁰ Eye, ear, nose, tongue and body consciousnesses.

²³¹ Color, sound, smell, taste and tangible.

²³² On the nature of sukha in the kāmadhātu and the first three dhyānas, see Kośa, VIII, p. 150-151.

Question. – If that is so, why does [the sūtra]²³³ not mention loving-kindness (maitrī) and joy (muditā) one after the other [but interposes compassion]?

Answer. – When the mind of loving-kindness is being practiced, one loves beings as one's son and one wishes to bring them happiness. But having emerged from the concentration of loving-kindness, one sees beings undergoing all kinds of suffering. Then, producing a mind of deep love, one has compassion for [210b] beings and makes them obtain deep happiness.²³⁴

Just as parents who love their son at all times, nevertheless redouble their affection for him when he falls sick, so the bodhisattvas who have entered into minds of compassion (karuṇācitta), considering the sufferings of beings, develop a feeling of pity (anukampācitta) and grant them profound happiness. This is why the mind of compassion takes an intermediate place [between the mind of loving-kindness and the mind of joy].

6. Reasons for practicing equanimity

Question. – If one loves beings so deeply, why practice the mind of equanimity (upekṣācitta) in addition?

Answer. – The yogin sees things in the following way: he never abandons beings and he thinks only of abandoning the three minds [of loving-kindness, compassion and joy]. Why? First of all, to put an end to other dharmas.²³⁵

Then, by the mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta), he wished that beings be happy, but he did not succeed in making them happy. By the mind of compassion (karuṇācitta), he wished that beings could escape from suffering, but he did not succeed in making them free of suffering. When he practiced the mind of joy (muditācitta) he did not succeed in causing them to experience great joy either. All of that was mere mental activity (manakāra) without any real reality (bhūtārtha). And so, wishing to make beings find the real truth, the yogin makes the resolve (cittam utpādayate) to become Buddha. He practices the six perfections (pāramitā) and perfects within himself the attributes of Buddha so that beings may find true happiness. This is why the yogin abandons the three minds [of loving-kindness, compassion and joy] so as to enter into the mind of equanimity (upekṣācitta).²³⁶

Finally, the minds of loving-kindness, compassion and joy are minds of love so deep that it is hard to abandon beings. [On the other hand], if one enters into the mind of equanimity, it is easy to separate from them.

²³³ The canonical expression for the four apramāṇas is cited above, p. 1239–40F.

²³⁴ Psychologically, joy (muditā) follows after compassion (karuṇā); we should note that beings are unhappy before wishing to be joyful.

²³⁵ By practicing equanimity (upekṣā), the yogin removes sensual attachment (kāmarāga) and hostility (vyāpāda) towards beings: see above, p. 1242F.

²³⁶ This mind of equanimity is indispensable to becoming Buddha.

7. Limit to the salvific action of the immeasurables

Question. – The bodhisattva, who has finally become Buddha after having practiced the six perfections cannot do anything further so that beings may escape from suffering and find happiness. Then why do you limit yourself to saying that the three minds [of loving-kindness, compassion and joy] are mental activity arising in the mind and without any real truth? [Why not say that also of the mind of equanimity]?

Answer. – It is true that the bodhisattva, having become Buddha, cannot do anything to make beings find happiness, but when he is still bodhisattva, he makes the great vows (mahāpraṇidhānāny utpādayati); as a result of these great vows, he gains great merit (mahāpuṇya) and, as the reward of this great merit, he is able to do great good for worldly people (prthagjana).

When the śrāvakas practice the four immeasurables (apramāṇa), it is to tame themselves (āmadamanāya), for their own welfare (svahitāya), and they think about beings in vain.²³⁷ The bodhisattvas, however, practice the mind of loving-kindness so that beings may escape from suffering and find happiness. As a result of this mind of loving-kindness, they themselves gain merit and teach others how to gain merit. Gathering the ripened fruits (vipākaphala) of their merit, these bodhisattvas sometimes become noble cakravartin kings, rich in kind deeds; sometimes also they leave home (pravrajanti), practice the dhyānas, guide beings and teach them how to practice the dhyānas to be reborn in pure universes (śuddhalokadhātu) and there enjoy the happiness. Finally, when they become Buddha, they enter into nirvāṇa without residue (nirupadhiśeṣanirvāṇa) with immeasurable and incalculable beings (apramāṇāsamkhyeyasatva). Compared to the mind of emptiness (śūnyatācitta), their vows (praṇidhāna) are much more salutary, and still other things, including their relics (śarīra), are very beneficial.

Furthermore, if a single bodhisattva completely saved all beings, the other bodhisattvas would have no one to save. From then on, there would be no more future (anāgate) Buddhas, the lineage of the Buddhas (buddhavaṃśa) would be interrupted (samucchinna) and other faults of the same kind would ensue. This [210c] is why a single Buddha does not save all beings without exception.

Finally, what is called the nature of beings (sattvasvabhāva) is only a product of error (mohaja): it is not a real thing (bhūta) nor is it determinate (niyata). If all the Buddhas of the three times and the ten directions went to look for a being, they would find none. Then how would they save all completely?

8. Is the idea of salvation is purely conventional?

²³⁷ In the sense that beings will derive no benefit, for the vows formulated by the śrāvakas profit only themselves.

Question. – If [the beings] who are empty [of intrinsic nature] cannot all be saved (trāta), a small number of beings will be equally empty. Then how do [the Buddhas] save a small number of them?

Answer. – I have just said that if the Buddhas of the three times and the ten directions went to look for beings, they would find not a single one and, consequently, that there is no one to save. If you object: “Why do they not save them all?”, you fall into a questionable position (nigrahassthāna), a position from which you cannot extricate yourself. And if you object: “Since the categories of few and many do not apply to beings, how could the Buddhas save a small number of them?”, you fall into an even more questionable position.

Furthermore, from the absolute point of view (paramārtha), the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of things, there are no beings (sattva) and there is no salvation (trāṇa). It is merely conventionally that we affirm the existence of salvation. As for you, you seek the absolute (paramārtha) in the conventional (saṃvṛti), which is inadmissible (nopapadyate). It is as if you were looking for a precious pearl (maṇiratna) in a brick or a stone: never would you find it there.

Furthermore, all the qualities acquired by the Buddhas in the interval of time between their first production of the mind of awakening (prathamacittotpāda) until the disappearance of the Holy Dharma (saddharmavipralopa), all these qualities are formations (saṃskāra), limited (saparyanta), measurable (sapramāṇa), having a beginning (ādi) and an end (paryavasāna). This is why the number of beings to be converted (vaineayasattva) must also be measurable. It is not possible, with measurable qualities, fruits of retribution [of a given number] of causes and conditions, to completely save beings without number in their totality.

It is like a strong man (balavān puruṣaḥ): no matter how powerful his bow (dhanus) and no matter how far his arrow (iṣu) can fly, it will necessarily finally fall down. Or it is like the great fire (mahāgni) at the end of the kalpa (kalpasamvartana)²³⁸ that burns the trisāhasralokadhātu: its brilliance (arcis) is immense, but although it burns for a long time, it is finally extinguished. It is the same for the bodhisattva become Buddha. From his first production of the mind of awakening, he holds the bow of exertion (vīryadhanus) in his hand, wields the arrow of wisdom (prajñeṣu), penetrates deeply into the Buddhadharma and accomplishes the great deeds of the Buddhas (buddhakārya), but he also must end up becoming extinguished. When the bodhisattva has won the knowledge of dharmas in all their aspects (sarvakārajñāna), his body emits rays (raśmi) that light up innumerable universes (apramāṇalokadhātu); each of these rays creates numberless bodies (apramāṇakāya) that save numberless beings (apramāṇasattva) in the ten directions by metamorphosis (nirmīte). After his nirvāṇa, the eighty-four thousand articles of the Dharma that he has taught (caturśīṣasahasra dharmaskandha) and his relics (śarīra) convert (paripācayanti) beings. But, like the fire at the end of the kalpa, having shone for a long time, he too must become extinguished.

²³⁸ Cf. Kośa, III, p. 184, 209-210.

Question. – You yourself say that these rays create innumerable bodies by metamorphosis that save the innumerable beings of the ten directions. Why did you sometimes say that, due to measurable causes and conditions, the number of beings to be converted should also be measurable?

Answer. – There are two kinds of immeasurable (apramāṇa):²³⁹

1) The true immeasurable (bhūtāpamāṇa) which cannot be measured by any holy individual (āryapudgala). Space (ākāśa), nirvāṇa and the true nature of being (sattvabhāva) cannot be measured [in any way].

2) Measurable things (prameyadhama) which only weak people are incapable of measuring; for example, the weight (gurutva) of Mount Sumeru, or the number of drops of water (bindu) in the great ocean (mahāsamudra). The Buddhas and bodhisattvas know these things, but they are unknown to gods and humans.

It is the same for the number of beings to be converted (vinītasattva) by [211a] the Buddhas; the Buddhas know it, but as it is not within your range, it is described as immeasurable.

Finally, dharmas, coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī), have no intrinsic nature (niḥsvabhāva). Since their intrinsic nature does not exist, they are eternally empty (śūnya) and, in this eternal emptiness, the being does not exist (sattva nopalabhyate). Thus the Buddha said:

When I was seated on the sphere of enlightenment,²⁴⁰

My wisdom was non-existent.

Like the empty fist that deceives little children,²⁴¹

I have saved the entire world.

The true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of things

Is the mark of beings (sattvanimitta).

But to seize the mark of beings

Is to stray far from the true Path.

Always thinking about the eternally empty,

²³⁹ The same distinction is made above, p. 152F, 393F, 451F.

²⁴⁰ The bodhimaṇḍa, in its proper sense, the diamond seat (vajrāsana) at Gayā where Śākyamuni reached supreme enlightenment; in the figurative sense, the spiritual presence of the Dharma or of the dharmakāya of the Buddhas which is independent of any material localization: cf. Vimalakīrti, p. 199-200, note.

A person does not follow the Path.
He invents imaginary characteristics
For dharmas that are without birth or cessation.

Imaginings, reflections, concepts
Are the net of Māra (mārajāla).
Not moving, not standing still
That is really the seal of the Dharma (dharmamudrā).

9. Differences between ‘happiness’ and ‘compassion’

Question. – If ‘happiness’ (sukha) is subdivided into two parts, the mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta) and the mind of joy (muditācitta), why is not the mind of compassion (karuṇācitta) that contemplates suffering (duḥkha) considered to be of two parts?

Answer. – Happiness (sukha), loved by everyone, is important (guru); this is why it is divided into two parts, [loving-kindness and joy]. On the other hand, suffering (duḥkha), which nobody loves, which nobody commemorates, is not divided into two parts.

Furthermore, when happiness is experienced, the mind is soft (mṛdu); but when suffering is endured, the mind is hard (dr̥ḍha).

[The story of Vītaśoka]. – When Wei-t’o-chou (Vītaśoka), the younger brother of King Aśoka, was king of Jambudvīpa for seven days, he was permitted to indulge in the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) on a grand scale. At the end of the seven days, king Aśoka asked him: “As king of Jambudvīpa, did you experience happiness (sukha) and joy (muditā)?” Vītaśoka answered: “I saw nothing, heard nothing, noticed nothing. Why? Because each morning, some caṇḍālas rang a bell and shouted: “Of the seven days [that you have been granted], so many have already gone by, and at the end of the seven days, you will die.” Hearing this proclamation, although I was king of Jambudvīpa and loaded down with the five objects of enjoyment, my sorrow (daurmanasya) and my suffering (duḥkha) were so great that I heard nothing and saw nothing.”²⁴²

²⁴² The story of Vītaśoka, also called Vigataśoka, Sudatta or Sugātra, is told fully in Aśokavadāna, T 2042, K. 2, p. 106a-107c (transl. Przyluski, Aśoka, p. 270-280); Aśokasūtra, T 2043, k. 3, p. 141b-44a; Divyāvadāna, p. 419-429 (transl. Burnouf, Introduction, p. 370-379); Tchou yao king, T 212, k. 6, p. 641a-c (transl. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 297-302); Fen pie kong tō louen, T 1507, k. 3, p. 39c. – Vītaśoka, the younger brother of king Aśoka, had faith in heretical doctrines and jeered at the disciples of the Buddha whose easy life he begrudged. In order to convert him to the Holy Dharma, Aśoka resorted

From that, we know that the power of suffering is strong whereas that of happiness is weak. When a person who experiences happiness throughout his body is stabbed some place, all his happiness disappears and he feels nothing but the pain of his wound. The power of happiness (sukhabala) is so weak that two parts²⁴³ are needed to make it strong; that of suffering (duḥkhabala) is so strong that it needs only one part.

III. FRUITS OF THE IMMEASURABLES

Question. – What fruits of retribution (vipālapala)²⁴⁴ does the person who is practicing the four immeasurables (apramāṇa) receive?

to a trick. While the king was bathing, his ministers, in connivance with him, invited Vītaśoka to try on the royal crown which the chances of succession might someday lead him to wear. Vītaśoka was ready for the experiment and, mounting the throne, he donned the crown. Suddenly the king came out of his bathroom and, seeing his brother seated on the throne, pretended to be indignant. He treated him as an usurper and sent him to the caṇḍālas, ordering him to be put to death. However, in order to permit him to repent, he allowed Vītaśoka to reign effectively for seven days after which he would be executed. Thus Vītaśoka enjoyed all the royal prerogatives, but each morning, the caṇḍālas, counting off the days remaining to him, reminded him of his forthcoming death. When the seventh day had passed, Vītaśoka was led into the presence of his brother the king. Aśoka questioned him about his impressions during the days of his reign. Vītaśoka answered: “All the sense pleasures with which I was loaded were spoiled by the perspective of my imminent death. Tormented by the fever of death, I remained sleepless for the entire time.” Embracing his brother, Aśoka said to him: “I will not put you to death; I wanted you to have faith in the Buddha’s Dharma and explain how his disciples, while abstaining from the arduous practices imposed on the Brahmins, turn away from sense objects, the complete vanity of which they calculate.” Convinced by this experience, Vītaśoka became a śramaṇa.

In the Ceylonese tradition, the hero of this story is Tissa-kumāra, brother of Aśoka and his vice-regent (Mahāvamsa, V, v. 151-60); for Hiuan-tsang, it was Mahendra (the Maninda of the Pāli sources), wrongly presented as the king’s brother, whereas he was his son (Si-yu-ki, T 2087, k. 8, p. 912a; transl. Watters, II, p. 93-94).

²⁴³ Namely, happiness (sukha) and joy (muditā).

²⁴⁴ In order to understand the discussion that will follow, one should recall the distribution of gods in the three worlds, a distribution discussed among scholars (cf. Kośa, III, p. 2-4, note) but which the Traité has already presented above, p. 517F, 519F, 954F:

1) Kāmadhātu is the abode of six groups of gods: i) Caturmahārājika, ii) Trāyastriṃśa, iii) Yāma, iv) Tuṣita, v) Brahmaloка, vi) Paramitavaśavartin.

2) Rūpadhātu, also called Brahmaloка, world of the Brahmā gods, with its four dhyaṇas, is the abode of seventeen groups of gods.

First dhyaṇa: i) Brahmakāyika, ii) Brahmapurohita, iii) Mahābrahman.

Second dhyāna: i) Parittābha, ii) Apramāṇābha, iii) Ābhāsvara.

Third dhyāna: i) Parittaśubha, ii) Apramāṇaśubha, iii) Śubhākṛtsna.

Fourth dhyāna: i) Anabhakra, ii) Punyaprasava, iii) Bṛhatphala, and the five Śuddhāvāsikas, iv) Avṛha, v) Atapa, vi) Sudṛṣa, vii) Sudarśana, viii) Akaṇiṣṭha.

3) Ārūpyadhātu, formless realm, has no abodes: it is inhabited, one might say, by formless beings belonging to four spheres: i) ākāśanantyāyatana, ii) vijñānānantyāyatana, iii) ākīṃcanyāyatana, iv) naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana.

In principle, the ascetic who has practiced the apramāṇas is reborn in the two higher realms, rūpadhātu and ārūpyadhātu, but the exact place is disputed by scholars because the canonical sources give the impression of being contradictory. Here, without any pretense of being complete, is a series of canonical topics that are under discussion:

1) Anguttara, IV, p. 150; V, p. 342 (T 125, k. 47, p. 806a26; Vinaya, V, p. 140; Paṭisambhidā, II, p. 130; Milindapaṇha, p. 198; Visuddhimagga, p. 253, 258-260. – If he does not penetrate any higher, the person who practices mairī gains Brahmaloṇa (uttariṃ appatvivijjhanto brahmalokūpago hoti). ‘If he does not penetrate any higher’ means: if he is incapable of attaining the state of arhat (arahattaṃ adhigantum asakkonto).

2) Dīgha, I, p. 251; Majjhima, II, p. 195 (T 26, k. 6, p. 458b1); Majjhima, II, p. 207, 208. – The practice of mairī, of karuṇā, of muditā or of upekṣā is the path leading to rebirth in the company of the Brahmā gods (Brahmānaṃ saṃvayātāya maggo).

3) Anguttara, II, p. 130. – The good man who practices mairī, karuṇā, muditā or upekṣā, when his body dissolves after death, is reborn in the company of the Śuddhāvāsa gods (kāyassa bhedaṃ paramaṃ Śuddhāvāsānaṃ devānaṃ saṃvayātāya uppatijati). These gods constitute the five classes of Brahmā gods occupying the summit of the 4th dhyāna in rūpadhātu.

4) Tseng yi a han (T 125, k. 21, p. 656b1-9); Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 82, p. 425c13-23); Nyāyānusāra (T 1562, k. 44, p. 594c3-6); Kośa, IV, p. 250; Kośavyākhyā, p. 438 (Sanskrit original). – The person who practices the apramāṇas is one of the four individuals ‘who gain brahmic merit’ (brāhmaṇaṃ puṇyaṃ prasavanti).

According to Anguttara, V, p. 76, the holder of brahmic merit ‘rejoices in the heavens for a kalpa’ (kappaṃ saggamhi modati), and according to Kośa (III, p. 174; IV, p. 251), the gods whose lifespan is one kalpa are the Brahmāpurohitas forming the second group of gods of the first dhyāna.

Therefore the person who, having loving-kindness, gains a brahmic merit and is reborn among the Brahmāpurihitas.

5) Anguttara, II, p. 129. – The person who practices mairī is reborn in the company of the Brahmākāyikas whose lifespan is one kalpa. The person who practices karuṇā is reborn among the Ābhāsvara whose lifespan is two kalpas. – The person who practices muditā is reborn among the Śubhākṛtsnas whose lifespan is four kalpas. – The person who practices upekṣā is reborn among the Bṛhatphalas whose lifespan is five hundred kalpas.

[But the sources do not agree on the lifespan of the various classes of gods: c. W. Kirfel, Die Kosmographie der Inder, 1920, p. 194; add Vibhāṅga, p. 424-425; Kośa, III, p. 173-174].

Answer. – The Buddha said: “He who enters into the concentration of loving-kindness (mairīsamādhi) receives, at the present, five benefits (anuśamsa): i) he is not burned if he enters fire (agni); ii) he does not die if he swallows poison (viṣa); iii) the soldier’s sword (śastra) does not wound him; iv) he will not die a violent death (asaṃmūḍhaḥ kālaṃ karoti); v) the good gods protect him (devatā rakṣanti). Having been of benefit to innumerable beings (apramāṇasattva), he receives immense merit (apramāṇapunya). By virtue of this immeasurable mind of impure order (sāsravāpamāṇacitta) that has beings as object (sattvālambaṇa), he is reborn in a pure place (śuddhasthāna), namely, the form realm (rūpadhātu).²⁴⁵

Warren, p. 269. – The person who practices mairī ends up at best in the Śubhas (according to the Chinese versions, in the Śubhākṛtsnas). – The person who practices karuṇā ends up at best in the ākāśanantyāyatanas. – The person who practices muditā ends up at best in the vijñānānantyāyatanas. – the person who practices upekṣā ends up at best in the ākīṃcanyāyatanas.

The Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikas have expended a wealth of ingenuity in order to harmonize all these discrepancies. The Traité has not ignored them, but, refusing to enter into these subtleties, it concludes that the apramāṇas, dealing with all the beings of the ten regions without exception, receive their reward in ārūpyadhātu as well as in the rūpadhātu of the Brahmā gods.

Anguttara, V, p. 342 (Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 47, p. 806a17-806b3; Che yi siang sseu nien jou lai, T 861a23-b-7): Mettāya cetovimuttiya āsevītāya... ekādasānisamsā pātikanikhā... Sukkhaṃ supati, sukkaṃ paṭibujjhati, na pāpakaṃ supinaṃ passati, manussāsaṃ piyo hoti, amanussānaṃ piyo hoti, devatā rakkhanti, nāssa aggi vā viṣaṃ vā satthaṃ vā kamati, tuvaṭṭaṃ cittaṃ samādhiyati, mukavaṇṇo vippasīdati, asaṃmūḍho kālaṃ karoti, uttariṃ appatvivijjhanto brahmalokūpago hoti.

Transl. – If the liberation of the mind consisting of loving-kindness is observed and cultivated, eleven benefits are in store: 1) The benevolent person sleeps happily; 2) he awakes happy; 3) he has no bad dreams; 4) he is dear to humans; 5) he is dear to non-humans; 6) the gods protect him; 7) fire, poison and the knife do not harm him; 8) his mind becomes concentrated quickly; 9) his face is serene; 10) he dies without worry; 11) if he goes no higher, [after death] he wins the world of the Brahmā gods.

The reservation uttariṃ appatvivijjhanto ‘if he does not penetrate any higher’, i.e., ‘if he is incapable of attaining the state of arhat’ (arahattaṃ adhigantum asakkonto) is necessary as it permits one to understand that loving-kindness can, by way of exception, accede to the supreme fruit of the religious life. But judging from the Chinese versions, this reservation does not appear in the Sanskrit āgamas.

The sūtra on the eleven benefits of mairī is fully commented on, with supporting stories, in Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 258-260. See also Manorathapūraṇi, V, p. 82-84.

Question. – Why did the Buddha say that the reward (vipāka) for loving-kindness is to be reborn in the Brahmā heavens?²⁴⁶ [211b]

Answer. – Because the Brahmadevas are venerated by beings, everyone has heard of them and everyone knows them.

The Buddha lived in the Indian kingdoms where there were always many brahmins in whose religion virtuous men were all reborn among the Brahmadevas.²⁴⁷ When they learn that the devotees of loving-kindness (maitrīcārīn) are reborn among the Brahmadevas, beings have great faith (śraddhā) and are ready to practice loving-kindness. This is why the Buddha said that devotees of loving-kindness are reborn among the Brahmadevas.

Furthermore, the gods who have cut through sexual desire (rāga) are all called Brahmā, and it is said that these Brahmās dwell in the form realm (rūpadhātu). And so the fact of having cut through sexual desire is called brahmacarya ‘celibacy’ and those who have cut through are called brāhmaṇas.

When the Buddha speaks here of the ‘Brahmā heavens’, he means not only the four dhyānas [of rūpadhātu, inhabited by the Brahmadevas] but also the four ārūpyasamāpattis [formless absorptions of ārūpyadhātu, inhabited by the formless deities]. Investigation (vitarka) and analysis (vicāra), [which are eliminated in the dhyānas of ārūpyadhātu], are so difficult to destroy that the Buddha does not speak here about the levels higher than these dhyānas [namely, the four ārūpyasamāpattis]. In the same way, when he spoke about the discipline of speech (vāksamvara) which is part of the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla) of the upāsaka, the Buddha mentioned only one [abstention], the abstention from lying (mṛṣāvādavairamaṇa), but he implied the other three abstentions [regarding slander (paṣūṇyavāda), harmful speech (pāruṣyavāda) and idle chatter (saṃbhinnapralāpa)].²⁴⁸

Question. – So loving-kindness brings the five benefits (anuśamsa) in question; but why did the Buddha say nothing about the benefits brought by compassion, joy and equanimity?

Answer. – Refer to the above comparison (upamāna): by speaking of one single thing, the Buddha intends the other three. This applies here also. What the Buddha said about loving-kindness is equally true for compassion, joy and equanimity.

Furthermore, loving-kindness is the immeasurable par excellence. Loving-kindness is like the king (rājan); the other three immeasurables that accompany it are like the people (jana). Why? First, the yogin, by the mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta), wants beings to find happiness (sukha). Seeing that there are some ²⁴⁶ Anguttara, III, p. 225: So ime cattāro brahmavihāre bhāvetvā kāyassa bhedā parammaraṇā sugatīm brahmalokaṃ upapajjati. – See also Dīgha, I, p. 251; Majjhima, II, p. 195, 207-208, where the practice of the apramānas is given as the path leading to rebirth in the company of the Brahmā gods: ayaṃ pi kho Brahāṇaṃ saṃvayātāya maggo.

²⁴⁷ This comment which is evidently addressed to Chinese readers is not attributable to the author of the Traité, Nāgārjuna or others; it is probably a gloss of the translator Kumārajīva.

²⁴⁸ In regard to the fivefold morality (pañcaśīla), it is enough to say ‘lying’ and by that to include the other three misdeeds of speech: see above, p. 820F.

who do not find happiness, he produces the mind of compassion (karuṇācitta). Wanting beings who are free from painful thoughts to find the joy of the Dharma, he produces the mind of joy (muditācitta). Feeling neither aversion (pratigha) nor fondness (anunaya) nor sorrow (daurmanasya) towards these three things, he produces the mind of equanimity (upekṣācitta).

Finally, it is loving-kindness that gives happiness (sukha) to beings.

Moreover, in the Tseng yi a han (Ekottarāgama), the Buddha spoke about the mind of compassion (karuṇācitta) ‘endowed with the five benefits (anuśamsa)’.²⁴⁹

In many places in the Mahāyānasūtras, he spoke about the benefits it presents. Thus, in the Wang-ming p’ou-sa king (Jālinīprabhadhisattvasūtra or Viśeṣacintibrahmapariṣcchā),²⁵⁰ he said: “The bodhisattva practices the thirty-two kinds of compassion (karuṇā) among beings. The former increase gradually and change into great compassion (mahākaruṇā). Great compassion is the root of the qualities (guṇamūla) of all the Buddhas and bodhisattvas; it is the mother (matr) of Prajñāpāramitā and the grandmother (mahāmātr) of the Buddhas. By means of great compassion, the bodhisattva attains Prajñāpāramitā and, having acquired Prajñāpāramitā, he becomes Buddha.”²⁵¹ He praises great compassion in every way.

²⁴⁹ Unidentified passage.

²⁵⁰ A sūtra in which the brahmarājan Viśeṣacintin, the bodhisattva Jālinīprabha and the bodhisattva Mañjuśrī appear. The Traité cites it impartially under the name of Jālinīprabhadhisattvasūtra (k. 20, p. 211b19; k. 22, p. 227b4; k. 28, p. 267a16) or under the name of Tch’e sin king = Viśeṣacintisūtra (k. 27, p. 257b2; k. 29, p. 275a18; k. 32, p. 279c9; k. 66, p. 524a24; k. 77, p. 604a23; k. 81, p. 631a18). The Mahāvīyutpatti mentions the bodhisattva Jālinīprabha (no. 705) and a Brahnaviśeṣacintipariṣcchā (no. 1367).

The Viśeṣabrahmapariṣcchā is known to us by three Chinese versions and one Tibetan version:

1) Tch’e-sin fan-t’ien so wen king (T585) by Dharmarakṣa; translated the 10th day of the 3rd month of the 7th T’ai-k’ang year (April 20, 286): cf. K’ai yuan mou lou, T 2154, k. 2, p. 494a26.

2) Sseu-yi fan-t’ien so wen king (T 586) by Kumārajīva; translated at Tch’ang-ngan, in the garden of Siao-yao, the 1st day of the 12th month of the 14th hong-che year (January 9, 403): cf. Li ti san pao ki, T 2034, k. 8, p. 77c12. Seng-jouei wrote the preface.

It is not a matter of the thirty-two kinds of mahākaruṇā but of the thirty-two reasons impelling the Tathāgata to practice. Here is the first: Nairātmyāḥ sarve dharmāḥ sattvāś ca nairātmyaṃ nādhimucyante. atas tathāgatasya sattveṣu mahākaruṇotpadyate: “All dharmas are without self and yet

Also in other places, he praises the mind of joy (muditācitta) and the mind of equanimity (upekṣācitta), but as loving-kindness and compassion are very important, the Buddha praises their advantages (anuśaṃsa) by preference: loving-kindness because of its qualities (guṇa) is difficult to get, and compassion realizes great deeds.

Question. – However, in explaining the benefits (anuśaṃsa) of the four immeasurables (apramāṇa) the Buddha said: “The mind of loving-kindness, properly observed, properly developed, ends up at best [in a rebirth] among the Śubhakraṣṇa gods (maitrīcittam āsevitaṃ subhāvitaṃ Śubhakraṣṇebhya devebhyah saṃvartate). – The mind of compassion (karuṇācitta), properly observed, properly developed, leads at best to the sphere [of the infinity] of space (ākāśānāntyaṭyatana). – The mind of joy (muditācitta), properly observed, properly developed, ends up at best in the sphere [of the infinity] of consciousness (vijñānānāntyaṭyatana). – The mind of equanimity (upekṣācitta), properly observed, properly developed, leads at best to the sphere of nothing at all (ākīṃcayāyatana).”²⁵² beings do not believe in non-self; this is why great compassion for beings arises in the Tathāgata”; and so on.

The great compassion of the Tathāgata will be the subject of chapter XLII.

²⁵² An extract from the Haliddavasanasutta of Saṃyutta, V, p. 119-121 (Tsa a han, T 99, no. 743, k. 27, p. 197c11-13). – Some bhikṣus were paying a morning visit to the Parivrājaka heretics established at Haliddavasana, a Koliya village. The latter stated that they taught the same ‘liberations of mind’ (cetovimutti), i.e., the same apramāṇas, as the Buddha, and asked the bhikṣus how the Buddha’s teaching differed from their own. The bhikṣus, unable to answer, came to consult the Buddha, and this is what he told them:

Subhāparamāhaṃ, bhikkhave, mettaṃ cetovimuttiṃ vadāmi... Ākāśānañcāyanāparamāhaṃ, bhikkhave, karuṇaṃ cetovimuttiṃ vadāmi... Viññāṇāmañcātāranāparamāhāṃ, bhikkhave, cetovimuttiṃ vadāmi... Ākiñcāññāyanāparamāhaṃ, bhikkhave, upekkhāṃ cetovimuttiṃ vadāmi. – “I state, O monks, that the liberation of mind which is loving-kindness has the Śibha [in the Chinese versions, the heaven of the Śubhakraṣṇas] as supreme as supreme goal. That which has compassion has the sphere of infinity of space as its supreme goal. That which is joy has the sphere of infinity of consciousness as supreme goal. That which is equanimity has the sphere of nothing at all as supreme goal.”

Among the four ultimate goals, only the first, namely the heaven of the Śubhakraṣṇas belongs to the form realm (rūpadhātu), also called the world of the Brahmās (brahmaloka). The other three belong to the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu).

The Haliddavasanasutta is the only sūtra where rebirth in the formless realm is promised to those who practice the apramāṇas. Everywhere else the Buddha affirmed that adepts of the apramāṇas “are reborn in the Brahmāloka”, i.e., in the form realm.

These contradictory teachings naturally struck the old exegetists, and both Sanskrit and Pāli scholars have brooded over the Haliddavasanasutta. See especially Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 269; Comm. of Saṃyutta, III, p. 172; Vimuttimagga, tr. Ehara, p. 195; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 83, p. 430c22-24; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 79, p. 770c3-8.

[The three spheres in question belong to the ārūpyadhātu and not to rūpadhātu which forms the Brahmāloka.] Why then did the Buddha say above [211c] (p. 1267F) that the fruit of retribution of loving-kindness [and the other immeasurables ‘is rebirth in the Brahmā heavens’?

Answer. – 1. The teaching of the Buddhas is inconceivable (acintya).²⁵³ He speaks in this way in order to conform to the needs of those to be converted (vainevasattvānuvartanā).

2. Furthermore, when one emerges from the concentration of loving-kindness (maitrīsamādhi), it is easy to be led to the third dhyāna [the summit of which the Śubhakraṣṇa gods occupy]. – On emerging from the concentration of compassion (karuṇāsamādhi), it is easy to enter into the ākāśānāntyaṭyatana. – On emerging from the concentration of joy (muditāsamādhi), it is easy to enter the vijñānānāntyaṭyatana. – On emerging from the concentration of equanimity (upekṣāsamādhi), it is easy to enter into the ākīṃcayāyatana.

3. Furthermore, by means of the mind of loving-kindness, the yogin wishes that all beings may find happiness (sukha) and, as a reward for this thought, he himself finds happiness. In the threefold world (trāidhātuka), the Śubhakraṣṇa gods are the happiest.²⁵⁴ This is why the Buddha says that ‘the mind of loving-kindness’ leads at best to rebirth among the Śubhakraṣṇa gods. – By means of the mind of compassion, the yogin sees beings who are old, sick, weak, tormented and suffering. A feeling of pity (anukampaācitta) arises in him and he wonders how he can liberate these beings from suffering (duḥkha): actually, if one eliminates the internal suffering (ādhyātmikaduḥkha), the external sufferings (bāhyaduḥkha) go away and if one eliminates the external suffering, the internal suffering goes away. The yogin then says: Those who have a body (dehin) necessarily encounter suffering; only those who have no body meet up with no suffering. And yet the ākāśa excludes all form (rūpa) and, [by that very fact, escapes from suffering]. This is why the Buddha said that [the mind of compassion] ends up at best in the ākāśānāntyaṭyatana. – By means of the mind of joy, the yogin wants to bring beings the spiritual happiness (vijñānasukha) called ‘joy’. In this spiritual happiness, the mind (citta), freed from the body (kāya), is like a bird (paṇḍin) that has escaped from its cage (pañjara).²⁵⁵ In the ākāśānāntyaṭyatana, the mind, although free of the body, was still attached to space (ākāśa). The vijñānānāntyaṭyatana is immense (apramāṇa): it is consciousness in all the phenomena, and this consciousness enjoys unlimited sovereignty (aiśvarya). This is why the Buddha said that joy ends up at best in the vijñānānāntyaṭyatana. – By means of the mind of equanimity, the yogin remains neutral (upekṣante) to the suffering (duḥkha) and the happiness (sukha) of beings and, since he ignores suffering or happiness, he attains true equanimity (bhūtopekṣādharmā), namely, the ākīṃcayāyatana. This is why the Buddha said that the mind of equanimity ends up at best in the ākīṃcayāyatana.

These four immeasurables are acquired only by the noble individuals (āryapudgala) and not by the worldly people (prthagjana).

²⁵³ Anguttara, II, p. 80: Buddhānaṃ, bhikkhave, budhavisayo acinteyyo na cintetabho yaṃ cintento ummādassa vigātassa bhāgī assa.

²⁵⁴ See above, p. 499F, 504F.

²⁵⁵ Similar considerations have been developed above, p. 1032F.

4. Finally, the Buddha knew that, in future times (anāgate 'dhvani), because they were of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya), his disciples would become attached to dharmas by way of making distinctions (vikalpa) and would wrongly say about the four immeasurables: “The four limitless ones, having beings as their object (ālambana), are exclusively impure (sāsrava), concern the desire realm (kāmadhātu) exclusively and do not exist in the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu).”²⁵⁶

In order to destroy the wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) of these people, the Buddha said that the four immeasurables also concern the ārūpyadhātu. And since the Buddha considers these four immeasurables as concerning all the beings of the ten directions, they must also have the ārūpyadhātu as object.

Thus it is said in the Wou-tsin-yi p'ou-sa wen (Akṣayamatipariṣcchā): “Loving-kindness is of three kinds: i) that which has beings as object (sattvālambana); ii) that which has things as object (dharmālambana); iii) that which has no object (anālambana).” The śāstra explains: “That which has beings as object is impure (sāsrava); that which has no object is pure (anāsrava); and that which has things as object is sometimes impure and sometimes pure.”²⁵⁷

All this is a summary of the four immeasurables.

²⁵⁶ Here the Traité counters the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika theses according to which the apramāṇas have beings as object (apramāṇāḥ sattvālambanāḥ) and, more precisely, that their domain is the beings of the desire realm (kāmasattvās tu gocaraḥ): cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 199; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 429. The Mahāyānasūtras and particularly the Akṣayamatīnirdeśa, cited here for the second time, state that they also can have things as object and even no object.

Second Section THE FOUR FORMLESS ABSORPTIONS (p. 1274F)

I. THE FORMLESS ABSORPTIONS ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA

The four formless absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti) are: i) the sphere of infinity of space (ākāśānantyāyatana), ii) the sphere of infinity of consciousness (viññānānantyāyatana), iii) the sphere of nothing at all (ākīṃcanyāyatana), iv) the sphere of neither-discrimination-nor-non-discrimination (naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana).

1. Defiled absorptions, acquired by birth, acquired by effort.

These four formless absorptions are each of three kinds: stained (samala), acquired by birth (upapattiprātilambhika) or acquired by effort (prāyogika).²⁵⁸ [212a]

1) The thirty-one bad propensities (anuśaya) contained in the four ārūpyas²⁵⁹ and the formations associated with the mind (cittasamprayuktasaṃskāra) arising within these propensities are stained (samala).

2) Acquired by birth (upapattiprātilambhika). – Those who have practiced the four immaterial absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti) are reborn by virtue of ripening of these actions (karmavipāka) in the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu) and obtain four clear (vispaṣṭa) and morally undefined (avyākṛta) skandhas.²⁶⁰

²⁶⁰ Whereas the dhyānas are accompanied by the five skandhas, the samāpattis have only four, because all rūpa (dhyānasamvara, anāravasaṃvara) is absent there (anuparivartakarūpābhāvāt). This is why the four samāpattis as well as the preliminary absorptions (sāmantaka) of the three higher samāpattis are called vibhūtarūpasamjñā ‘having overcome the notion of form’. The samantaka of the first samāpatti, the ākāśānantyāyatana, is not given this name because the notion of rūpa is not completely overcome. It

3) Acquired by effort (prāyogika). – Examining the grossness (audārya) and harmfulness of form (rūpa), the cause of old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi), death (maraṇa) and all kinds of suffering, the yogin considers it ‘as a sickness, as an ulcer, as a poisoned arrow’ (rogato gaṇdatah śalyatah samanupaśyati).²⁶¹ He tells himself that all of it is deception (vañcana) and falsehood (mṛṣāvāda) that he must avoid. Having reflected in this way, he overcomes all notion of matter, he destroys all notion of resistance, he forgets all notion of multiplicity and penetrates into the absorption of infinity of space (sa sarvaśo rūpasamjñānām samatikramāt pratighasamjñānām astamgamān nānātvamjñānām amanasikārād ākāśānatyāyatanasamāpattiṃ praviśati).²⁶²

2. Process of access to the absorptions

Question. – How can these three kinds of notions [of matter, resistance, multiplicity] be destroyed?

Answer. – These three kinds of notions (samjñā), all coming from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī), are without intrinsic nature (niḥsvabhāva) and, since their intrinsic self nature does not exist, they are all deceptions, non-realities, easily destroyed.

Furthermore, [the yogin says to himself], distinctions (vikalpa) regarding form are eliminated little by little (bhāgaśaḥ) and finally no longer exist. This is why, if they do not exist later, neither do they exist now. Under the influence of error (viparyāsa), beings seize the characteristics of identity (ekatva) and difference (anyatva) in composite matter, and their minds become attached to the nature of matter. As for me, I must not imitate these fools; I must seek the true reality (bhūtavastu) in which there is neither identity nor difference.

Furthermore, the yogin reflects thus:²⁶³

1) When I rejected and avoided dharmas, I obtained considerable benefits. First I abandoned my wealth, my wife and children; I left home and found the pure discipline (viśuddhaśīla); my mind is secure (yogaḥṣema); I have no more fear.

2) Putting away desires (kāma), evil and wicked dharmas (pāpā akuśala dharmāḥ), I obtained the first dhyāna. joy and happiness (prītisukha), the result of detachment (vivekaja),

3) By suppressing enquiry and analysis (vitarkavicārāṇām vyutpaśamā), by inner purification (adhyātmaṃ samprasādāt), I obtained the second dhyāna where there is great joy and happiness (mahāprītisukha).

is actually in this samantaka that the ascetic overcomes the notion of matter (rūpasamjñānām atikrāmati) and connected notions. See Kośa, VIII, p. 134-135; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 412.

²⁶¹ Cf. Majjhima, I, 436, 500; Anguttara, IV, 422-423: So yad eva tattha hoti... te dhamme aniccato dukkhato rogato gaṇdato sallato aghato ābādhatto parato palokato suññato anattato samanupassati.

²⁶² The overcoming of these notions takes place in the preliminary (sāmantaka) of the first ārūpyasamāpatti.

²⁶³ Here the Traité repeats the old canonical phrases already quoted above, p. 1025, n.

4) By renouncing joy (prīter virāgāt), I found myself in the third dhyāna which is by far the happiest.

5) Suppressing this happiness (sukhasya prahāṇāt), I obtained the fourth dhyāna, purified by renunciation and reflection.

6) Now I abandon these four dhyānas, for it is still necessary to obtain the wonderful absorptions (samāpatti).

This is why the yogin ‘transcends the notion of matter (rūpasamjñānām atikrāmati), destroys the notion of resistance (pratighasamjñānām nirodhayati) and no longer thinks about the notion of multiplicity (nānātvamjñānām na manasikaroti)’.

3. Transcending ideas

The Buddha spoke of three kinds of form (rūpa): “1) There is form that is visible and resistant (asti rūpaṃ sanidarśanam sapratigham); 2) There is invisible resistant form (asti rūpaṃ anidarśanam sapratigham); 3) There is invisible non-resistant form (asti rūpaṃ anidarśanam apratigham).”²⁶⁴

When the yogin ‘transcends the notion of matter (rūpasamjñā)’, this concerns visible resistant form (sanidarśana-sapatigha); when he ‘destroys the notion of resistance (pratisamjñā)’, this concerns invisible resistant form (anidarśana-sapatigha); when he ‘no longer thinks about the notion of multiplicity (nānātvamjñā)’ this concerns invisible non-resistant form (anidarśanāprtigha).

Furthermore, by the destruction of visibles seen by the eye (cakṣus), the yogin ‘transcends matter’; by the destruction of the ear (śrotra) and sounds (śabda), the nose (ghrāṇa) and smells (gandha), the tongue (jihvā) and tastes (rasa), the body (kāya) and tangibles (spraśavya), he ‘transcends the notion of resistance’. In regard to other forms and many varieties not described as form, we speak of ‘the notion of multiplicity’.²⁶⁵

²⁶⁴ Rūpasamgrahasūtra cited in Kośavyākhyā, p. 352; Pāli correspondent, Dīgha, III, p. 217; Vibhaṅga, p. 13, 72, 89; Dhammasaṅgaṇī, p. 125, 146-147, 244-245.

²⁶⁵ An obscure and possibly corrupt passage. For the Kośavyākhyā, the rūpasanidarśana-sapatigha is the rūpa to be cognized by the eye consciousness; the rūpa anidarśana-sapatigha is the eye, etc. and also the nine material bases of consciousness; the rūpa anidarśana-apratigha is the avijñapti.

For the Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 273-274, the rūpasamjñās are the dhyānas of subtle form mentioned here under the name of ‘notion’, and things that are their object (rūpasaññānaṃ ti saññāśīṣeṇa vuttarūpavacarajjhānānañ c’eva tadārammaṇānaṃ ca). The pratighasamjñās are the notions of resistance coming from the contact between the physical bases of consciousness, eye, etc., and their respective objects, color, etc. (cakkhādīnaṃ vatthūnāṃ rūpādīnaṃ ārammaṇāṇ ca paṭighātena samuppannā paṭighasaññā). The nānātvamjñās are the notions that function with variety as their domain (nānatte vā gocare pavattā saññā) or that are varied themselves (nānattā vā saññā). The Visuddhimagga is here inspired by the Vibhaṅga, p. 261-262.

Seeing this, the yogin eliminates the defilements (saṃkleśa) of the form realm (rūpadhātu) and obtains the ākāśānantyaĀtana. In regard to the causes and methods of obtaining the other three ārūpyas, refer to what was said in the chapter on the Dhyānapāramitā (p. 1032-1034F).

4. Moral qualities of the absorptions

Of the four formless (ārūpya) [absorptions], one, namely, the [212b] naivasamjñānā-samjñāyatana, is always impure (sāsrava).²⁶⁶ For the other three, one can single out: the ākāśānantyaīyatana is sometimes impure (sāsrava) and sometimes pure (anāsrava). If it is impure, this ākāśāyatana contains four impure aggregates (sāsravaskandha); if it is pure, it contains four pure aggregates. It is the same for the vijñānānantyaīyatana and the ākimcanyāyatana.

All these absorptions are conditioned (saṃskṛta) and good (kuśala). If it is impure, the ākāśāyatana involves retribution (saṃvāpa) and is morally indeterminate (avyākṛta); if it is pure, it does not involve retribution (avivāpa). It is the same for the vijñānāyatana and the ākimcanyāyatana.

If it is good, the naivasamjñānā-samjñāyatana involves retribution and is morally indeterminate, but [in itself] it does not involve retribution.²⁶⁷

II. THE FORMLESS ABSORPTIONS ACCORDING TO THE MAHĀYĀNA

Question. – What do these four absorptions consist of in the Mahāyāna? [213b]

Answer. – In the Mahāyāna, these four formless absorptions are modes of wisdom (prajñākāra) connected with the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas.

Question. – What is the true nature of dharmas?

Answer. – It is the fact that dharmas are empty of intrinsic nature (svabhāvaśūnya).

Question. – We accept that material dharmas (rūpidharma) composed of and coming from various causes and conditions are empty; but why would non-material dharmas be empty?

Answer. – If the coarse (audārika) substances (rūpa), seen by the eye and heard by the ear, can be accepted as empty, then why would non-material invisible, non-resistant (apratigha), experiencing neither suffering nor happiness, not be empty?

²⁶⁶ In this āyatana, also called the bhavāgra ‘Summit of existence’, awareness is so weak that in it one cannot meditate on the Path: cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 145.

²⁶⁷ Here the Traité continues with a series of technical considerations which I [Lamotte] do not translate. The reader may find a similar set of analyses in the Vibhaṅga, p. 269-271.

Furthermore, material dharmas that can be analyzed as far as their subtle atoms (paramāṇu) are scattered, perish and return to the void. [But the non-material dharmas are still less consistent]: these minds (citta) and mental events (caitasikadharma) do not exist (nopalabhyante) for a month (māsa), a fortnight (parvan), an hour (muhūrta), a minute (lava) or even a single second (kṣaṇa).²⁶⁸

This is the significance of the four formless absorptions and all of this summarizes (saṃkṣepataḥ) the four immeasurables.

²⁶⁸ Cf. Anguttara, I, p. 10: Nāhaṃ, bhikkave, aññaṃ ekadhammaṃ pi samanupassāmi yaṃ lahu-parivattaṃ yathayidaṃ cittaṃ: “I do not see, O monks, a single other dharma the transformation of which is as brief as the mind.” This may be compared to the river that never stops: “There is no khana, laya, or muhutta when the river stops” (Anguttara, IV, p. 137).

According to the Atthasālonī, p. 60: Yāva paṇ’ uppannaṃ rūpaṃ tiṭṭhati tāva soḷassa ciitāni uppañjitvā bhijjanti: “Sixteen moments of mind arise and perish during the time a material dharma lasts.”

CHAPTER XXXIV: LIBERATIONS, MASTERIES, TOTALITIES, SUCCESSIVE ABSORPTIONS (p. 1281F)

First Section LIBERATIONS, MASTERIES AND TOTALITIES

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth classes of supplementary dharmas recommended for bodhisattvas by the Prajñāpāramitā include:

- 1) Eight liberations: Sanskrit aṣṭau vimokṣāḥ; Pāli aṭṭa vimokkhā (& vimokkhā); Tibetan ṃam par thar ba brgyad; Chinese pa pei chō or pa kiai t'ouo.
- 2) Eight spheres of mastery: Sanskrit aṣṭāv abhībhvāyatana; Pāli aṭṭha abhīhāyatāni; Tibetan gzil gyis gnon paḥi skye mched brgyad; Chinese pa tch'ou tch'ou (or jou) or pa cheng tch'ou.
- 3) Ten spheres of totality: Sanskrit daśa kṛtsnāyatanāni; Pāli dasa kaṣiṇāyatanāni; Chinese che yi tsie tch'ou (or jou) or che pien tch'ou (or jou).

These three lists intersect one another and are partially mingled so that it is useful to study them at the same time.

I. CANONICAL DEFINITIONS OF THE THREE LISTS

I. THE EIGHT VIMOKṢAS. – Pāli formula in Dīgha, II, p. 70-71; 111-112; III, p. 261-262; Majjhima, II, p. 12-13; Anguttara, IV, p. 306; Vibhaṅga, p. 342. – Sanskrit formula in Daśottarasūtra, p. 92-94; Kośavyākhyā, p. 688; Daśasāhasrikā, p. 98; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1445; Mahāvvyut., no. 1510-1518.

Pāli: Aṭṭh vimokkhā: 1. rūpī rūpāni passati: ayaṃ ... viharati: ayaṃ aṭṭhamo vimukho.

Sanskrit: Aṣṭau vimokṣāḥ: 1. rūpī rūpāṇī paśyaty ayaṃ ... viharaty ayaṃ aṣṭamo vimokṣa iti.

Transl. of the Sanskrit. – The eight liberations:

- 1) Being [in the sphere of subtle form], he sees visibles; this is the first vimokṣa.
- 2) Not having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles; this is the second vimokṣa.
- 3) Producing the pleasant vimokṣa, he abides in this absorption; this is the third vimokṣa.

4) By means of complete transcendence of notions of form, disappearance of notions of resistance, rejection of notions of multiplicity, he thinks: “Space is infinite” and he penetrates into the sphere of infinity of space and abides there in the manner of the gods attached to this sphere; this is the fourth vimokṣa.

5) Further, having completely transcended the sphere of infinity of space, he thinks: “Consciousness is infinite”, he penetrates into the sphere of infinity of consciousness and abides there in the manner of the gods attached to this sphere; this is the fifth vimokṣa.

6) Further, having completely transcended the sphere of infinity of consciousness, he thinks: “Nothing exists”, he penetrates into the sphere of nothing at all and abides there in the manner of the gods who are attached to it; this is the sixth vimokṣa.

7) Further, having completely transcended the sphere of nothing at all, he penetrates into the sphere of neither identification nor non-identification and abides there in the manner of the gods who are attached to it; this is the seventh vimokṣa.

8) Further, having completely transcended the sphere of neither identification nor non-identification, the cessation of notions and sensations being realized, he penetrates into it and abides there; this is the eighth vimokṣa.

2. THE EIGHT ABHIBHVĀYATANAS. - Pāli formula in Dīgha II, p. 110-111; III p. 260-261; Majjhima, II, p. 13-14; Anguttara, IV, p. 305-306; V, p. 61-62. –

Pāli: Aṭṭha abhībhvāyatanāni: 1. ajjhattaṃ rūpaṇṇī eko bahiddhā ... evaṃsaṇṇī hoti. idaṃ aṭṭhamam abhībhvāyatanam.

Sanskrit formula in Daśottarasūtra, p. 95-97; Kośavyākhyā, p. 690-691; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 431-432; Daśasāhasrikā, p. 101-102; Mahāvvyut., no. 1520-1527. Sanskrit: Aṣṭāv abhībhvāyatanāni: 1. adhyatmaṃ rūpasamjñā bahirdhā ... ca bhavati. idaṃ aṣṭamam abhībhvāyatanam.

Transl. of the Sanskrit. – The eight spheres of mastery:

- 1) Having the notion of inner visibles, he sees narrow outer visibles, beautiful or ugly, and he cognizes these visibles by mastering them, he sees them by mastering them and he is aware of them; this is the first abhībhu.
- 2) Having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles very extensive (var. very enlarged), beautiful or ugly, and these visibles (etc., as in 1); this is the second abhībhu. outer visibles.
- 3) Not having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer narrow visibles, and these visibles (etc. as in 1); this is the fourth abhībhu.
- 4) Not having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer extensive (var. very enlarged) visibles, beautiful or ugly, and these visible (etc. as in 1); this is the fourth abhībhu.

5) Not having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles blue, blue in color, blue in aspect, blue in luster. Just like the flax flower or like fine blue Benares muslin, blue in color, blue in aspect, blue in luster, in the same way, without having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles blue, blue in color, blue in aspect, blue in luster, and he cognizes them by mastering them, he sees them by mastering them and he is aware of them; this is the fifth abhibhu.

6) Not having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles yellow, yellow in color, yellow in aspect, yellow in luster. Just like the karnikāra flower (Pterospermum acerifolium) or like fine yellow Benares muslin, yellow in color, yellow in aspect, yellow in luster, in the same way, without having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles yellow (etc., as in 5); this is the sixth abhibhu.

7) Not having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles red, red in color, red in aspect, red in luster. Just like the bandhujīvaka flower (Pentapetes phoenicea) or fine red Benares muslin, red in color, red in aspect, red in luster, in the same way, without having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles red, (etc. as in 5); this is the seventh abhibhu.

8) Not having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles white, white in color, white in aspect, white in luster. Just like the planet Venus or fine white Benares muslin, white in color, white in aspect, white in luster, in the same way, not having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles white (etc. as in 5); this is the eighth abhinhu.

3. THE TEN KṚTSNĀYATANAS.- Pāli formula in Dīgha, III, p. 268; Majjhima, II, p. 14-15; Anguttara, V, p. 46, 60: Daśa kaṣiṇāyatanāni: 1. paṭhavikaṣiṇaṃ eko sañjānati ... adho tiriyaṃ advayaṃ appamāṇaṃ.

Sanskrit formula in Mahāvvyut., no. 1528-1540: Daśa kṛtsnāyatanāni: 1. pṛthivīkṛtsnāyatanam. ... 10. vijñānakṛtsāyatanam.

Transl. of the Sanskrit. – The ten spheres of totality: 1) Totality of earth; 2) totality of water; 3) totality of fire; 4) totality of wind; 5) totality of blue; 6) totality of yellow; 7) totality of red; 8) totality of white; 9) totality of space; 10) totality of consciousness. This totality of earth, water, fire, wind, blue, yellow, red and white, he recognizes them above, below, on the side, without duality and limitless.

The last two kaṣinas are sometimes omitted in the lists of the Paṭisambhidā (I, p. 49, 143-144, 149-150) or replaced by the āloka- and the paricchin’ ākāsa- in the Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 89.

The kṛtsnas are not objective observations but ‘voluntary seeings’: adhimuktimanasikāra (Kośa, II, p. 325). This is well-explained in the Daśasāhasrikā, p. 102: Sarvadhātūn pṛthivīdhātāv adhimucya sarvaṃ api pṛthivīdhātur evaikaadhātur bhavati: “When one ‘wills’ all the elements into the element earth, everything becomes a single element, namely, the ‘earth’ element. In the same way, when one ‘wills’ all the elements into the element water, fire, wind, blue, yellow, red, white, space or consciousness.” And the Daśasāhasrikā concludes: “We call sphere of totality the fact [that as a result of ‘voluntary seeing’] everything becomes a single element: earth, water, etc.”

II. KAṢINA IN PĀLI SCHOLASTICISM

Of the three classes of supplementary dharmas, the ten kaṣinas have captured the attention of Pāli scholasticism: cf. Paṭisambhidā, I p. 6, 95; Dhammasaṅgaṇi, p. 42; Nettipakaraṇa, p. 89. 112: and especially Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 96-144 (transl. Nanamoli, p. 122-184) which describes fully the process of the earth kaṣiṇa. As in the subsequent seven, it is a process of autosuggestion to reach the dhyānas. Here is a brief summary of the stages of the mental operation:

1) Creation of the sign (nimitta). – If he is specially endowed, the monk chooses as visible sign a ploughed earth surface (kasitaṭṭhāna) or a threshing area (khalaṃaṇḍala). Most frequently, on the advice of a teacher, he makes an earthen disc (matṭikaṃaṇḍala) of dark color, without the intrusion of blue, yellow, red or white color that could cause confusion with the other kaṣiṇas and thus contaminate the earth kaṣiṇa. Whether or not this disc is transportable, it should be set up on a pedestal in an isolated place and the ascetic sits down at the appropriate distance to see it well.

2) Appearance of the sign of learning (uggahanimitta). – Having vowed to eliminate sense desires that are so unpleasant (appaṣāḍā kāmā), the monk looks calmly at the earth disc without resting on its color (varṇa) or its nature (lakṣhaṇa) but by fixing his mind on the nominal concept (paññattidhamma) of ‘earth’ the different names of which he recites mentally: paṭhavī, mahī, medinī, bhūmi, etc. Sometimes with his eyes open and sometimes with his eyes closed (kālena ummīlevā kālena nimīlevā), the monk contemplates this semi-abstract, semi-concrete image until he sees it as clearly with his eyes shut as with his eyes open. It is at this moment that the sign of learning (uggahanimitta) is produced. The monk then leaves his seat and goes back into the monastery still keeping clearly in his mind this sign of learning and recovering it each time that he loses it.

3) Appearance of the counter-sign (paṭibhāganimitta). – There comes the time when the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa) to the jhāna (see above, p. 1012-1020F) disappear and when the factors (aṅga) of the jhāna (see above, p. 1237F) manifest. In the first case, the ascetic enters into the samadhi of approach (upacārasamādhī); in the second case, he enters into the mental stabilization of absorption (appanāsamādhī). But the entry into samadhi coincides with the appearance of the counter-sign (paṭibhāganimitta):

“The difference between the sign of learning (uggahanimitta) and the counter-sign is the following: In the sign of learning, any defect (dosa) of the kaṣiṇa (intrusion of foreign colors?) is evident; but the counter-sign, the sign of learning having come to an end, is somehow removed from it and appears purer, a hundred times purer, a thousand times purer than it, like a glass removed from its case, like a well-polished pearly shell, like the disc of the moon coming out from behind a cloud. This counter-sign has neither color (varṇa) nor shape (saṇṭhana), for if it had any, it would be cognizable by the eye, coarse, susceptible of being grasped and marked by the three characteristics [impermanence, suffering and selflessness?]. But it is not like that. It is just a way of representation, a state of awareness belonging solely to the holder of the stabilization. Starting from the moment when it is produced, the obstacles [to the jhāna] are weakened, but the negative emotions (kilesa) remain and the mind is stabilized in the samadhi of approach (upacārasamādhi).” In the samādhi of approach (appanāsamadhi) which follows, the factors of the samādhi appear and grow.

4) Protection of the counter-sign (paṭighātanimittarakkhaṇa) and attainment of the jhānas. – The ascetic should keep the counter-sign as if it were his most precious treasure and, to this end, take great care of his dwelling (āvāsa), his domain (gocāra), his words (bhassa), the people (puggala) he meets, his food (bhojana), the atmosphere (utu) and the postures (iriyāpatha) he takes. Thus, thanks to the earth kaṣiṇa, he attains the first dhyāna and abides there.

5) Extension of the counter-sign (paṭighātanimittavaḍḍhana). – In the course of the concentrations of approach and of absorption, the ascetic should gradually extend the counter-sign by noting its progress: one span, two spans and finally the outer limit of the cosmic sphere.

6) Acquisition of the spheres of mastery (abhibhāyatanaṭṭilabdha). – This complete mastery over the sign assures the ascetic a complete mastery over things and gives him magical powers. This is how the earth kaṣiṇa allows him to multiply himself when he is one, etc. (cf. above, p. 382F, n. 2).

The other nine kaṣiṇas progress in the same way as the earth kaṣiṇa. Here it is sufficient to determine their respective ‘signs’ and to specify the type of ‘mastery’ they will exert upon things.

In the water kaṣiṇa, the sign of learning is moving (calamāna) and the counter-sign is inert (nippariṭṭhanda), like a crystal fan held in the air or like a crystal mirror. It brings the following powers: plunging into the earth and emerging from it, bringing rain-storms, creating rivers and seas, shaking the earth, mountains, palaces, etc.

In the fire kaṣiṇa, the sign of learning is like a spark of fire that becomes detached and falls; the counter-sign is motionless (niccala) like a piece of red wool held up in the air. Thanks to this practice, the ascetic can emit smoke and flames, cause a rain of ash, extinguish one fire by means of another, burn whatever he wishes, create lights that allow him to see objects visible to the divine eye and, at the moment of his parinirvāṇa, burn his body by the fire element.

In the wind kaṣiṇa, the sign of learning appears in movement (cala) like an eddy of hot steam coming out of a pot of rice-gruel; the counter-sign is calm (sannisinna) and motionless (acala). From this kaṣiṇa come the powers of walking with the speed of wind and causing wind storms.

The four color kaṣiṇas use as signs of learning a blue, yellow, red or white flower or cloth. Their counter-sign appears like a crystal fan. They permit the ascetic to create colored objects and particularly to reach the 5th to the 8th abhibhāyatana (spheres of mastery of colors) as well as the 3rd vimokha, namely the subhaviṃokha or pleasant liberation.

The kaṣiṇa of light (āloka) and that of limited space (paricchinṇākāśa) have as their respective counter-signs a mass of light (ālokapuṇṇa) and the circle of space (ākāśamaṇḍala). Thanks to the first, the ascetic is able to create luminous forms, to banish languor and torpor and chase away shadows; by means of the second he is able to discover whatever is hidden, create empty spaces in the earth and rocks and occupy them, pass through walls at will, etc.

III. VIMOKṢA, ABHIBHU AND KṚTSNA ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA

These technical procedures aimed at complete detachment from the things of the threefold world are fully studied by the Abhidharma of the Sarvastivādins and related texts: Jñānaprasthāna, T 1544, k. 18, p. 1013 seq.; Saṃgītiparyāya, T 1536, k. 18-20, p. 443a26- 446a18, 447a25-452c11; Saṃyuktābhidharmasāra, T 1552, k. 7, p. 96b-929a; Abhidharmāmṛta, T 1553, k. 2, p. 976117-b16 (reconstruction by Sastri, p. 103-107); Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 84-85, p. 434b15- 442b14; Kośa, VIII, p. 203-218; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 80, p. 771b-775a; Abhidhamadīpa, p. 429-432; Satyasiddhiśāstra, T 1646, k. 12-13, p. 5339a16-340b16, 346b14-c22; Abhidharmasamuccahaya (of the Vijñānavādins), T 1605, k. 7, p. 680c23-691a22 (reconstructed by Pradhan, p. 95-96).

Here is a summary of the Abhidharma scholasticism.

In general, the vimokṣas are the gateway into the abhibhus, which in turn are the gateway into the kṛtsnas. The vimokṣas are ‘complete emancipation’ (vimokṣamātra) from the object. The abhibhus exert a twofold mastery (abhibhavana) over the object, entailing the view of the object as one wishes it (yatheṣṭam adhimokṣaḥ) and the absence of the negative emotion provoked by the object (kleśānutpatti). The kṛtsnas embrace the object without a gap and in its totality (nirantarakṛtsnaspharaṇa). All are derived from the dhyānas and the samāpattis.

A. Vimokṣas 1-3, eight abhibhus and kṛtsnas 1-8.

1) In nature they are the five skandhas and they have as object the visibles of kāmadhātu.

2) Vimokṣas 1-2 and abhibhus 1-4 are contemplations of the horrible (aśubhabhāvana), i.e., of the decomposing corpse, and are practiced in the 1st and 2nd dhyānas. When practiced in the first, they counteract attachment to color (varṇarāga) of kāmadhātu; when practiced in the second, they counteract attachment to color of the first dhyāna.

3) In vimokṣas 1 and abhibhus 1-2, the ascetic still has the notion of inner visibles, those of his own body; in vimokṣa 2 and abhibhus 3-4, he no longer has them. But in all cases, he contemplates unpleasant outer visibles (amanojñā), less numerous (parīṭa) in abhibhus 1 and 3, numerous (mahodgata or paramāna) in abhibhus 2 and 4.

4) Vimokṣa 3, abhibhus 5-8 and kṛtsnas 1-8 are contemplations on the beautiful (śubhabhāvana) and are practiced exclusively in the 4th dhyāna. No longer having the notion of inner visibles, the ascetic contemplates the outer pleasant visibles (manojñā) of kāmadhātu: in vimokṣa 3, the beautiful (śubha) in general, which he actualizes (kāyena sākṣīdātkaṛoti); in abhibhuṣ 5-8 and kṛtsnas 5-8, the four pure colors (blue, yellow, red and white); in kṛtsnas 1-4, the four great elements (earth, water, fire and wind).

B. Vimokṣas 4-7 and kṛtsnas 8-10.

1) Being formless, in nature they are the four skandhas with the exception of rūpaskandha and are practiced in the formless absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti): vimokṣa 4 and kṛtsna 9 and the ākāśānāntyāyatana; vimokṣa 5 and kṛtsna 10 in the vijñānānāntyāyatana; vimokṣa 6 in the ākīṃcanāyatana; vimokṣa 7 in the naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana.

2) For object they have the suffering of their own level and a higher level (svabhūmyūrdhva bhūmikāṃ duḥkham), the cause and cessation of this suffering (taddhetunirodhau), the Path relative to the totality of the anvaya jñāna (sarvānvaya jñānapakṣomārgaḥ), the apratisaṃkhyānirodha and the ākāśa.

C. Eighth vimokṣa.

This is the absorption of cessation of concepts and feelings (saṃjñāveditanirodhasamāpatti), [a dharma] which stops the mind and mental events.

The qualities that constitute class A are acquired only by humans; those of classes B and C are acquired by beings of the threefold world. All these qualities may have as support (āśraya) the mental series of a worldly person (prthagjana) or a saint (ārya), except the last one, the nirodhavimokṣa, which can be produced only by the saint.

1. The Eight Liberations (p. 1291F)

A. General definition

The eight liberations (aṣṭau vimokṣāḥ): [k. 21, p. 215a]

1) Having [the notion] of inner visibles, he also sees outer visibles, this is the first vimokṣa (adhyātmaṃ rūpasamjñī bahirdhā rūpāṇi paśyaty ayaṃ prathamō vimokṣaḥ).²⁶⁹

2) Not having [the notion] of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles, this is the second vimokṣa (adhyātmaṃ arūpasamjñī bahirdhā rūpāṇi paśyaty ayaṃ dvitīyo vimokṣaḥ).

3) He physically actualizes the pleasant vimokṣa, this is the third vimokṣa (śubhaṃ vimokṣaṃ kāyena sākṣīdātkaṛoty ayaṃ tṛtīyo vimokṣaḥ).

²⁶⁹ In place of the canonical phrase rūpī rūpāṇi paśyati, the Traité substitutes this new wording borrowed from the definition of the first abhibhu. Harivarman does the same in his Satyasiddhiśāstra, T 1646, k. 12, p. 339a17.

4-8) – The four formless absorptions (catasra ārūpyasamāpattayah) and the absorption of cessation of concept and feeling (saṃjñāveditanirodhasamāpatti) are the [last] five vimokṣas.

In all, eight vimokṣas. They ‘turn the back’ (pei) on the five objects of enjoyment (kāmaguṇa) and [they ‘reject’ (chō)] or eliminate the mind of attachment (saṅgacitta) towards them; this is why they are called ‘turning the mind and rejecting’ (pei-chō, in Sanskrit vi-mokṣa).²⁷⁰

B. The first two vimokṣas

The yogin has not destroyed inner and outer visibles: he has not suppressed the notion of both [his own] inner and outer visibles (rūpasamjñā) and he sees these visibles with a feeling of horror (aśubhacitta).²⁷¹ This is the first vimokṣa.

The yogin has destroyed the inner visibles and suppressed the notion of inner visibles (adhyātmaṃ rūpasamjñā), but he has not destroyed outer visibles nor suppressed the notion of outer visibles (bahirdhā rūpasamjñā) and it is with a feeling of horror that he sees outer visibles: this is the second vimokṣa.

These two vimokṣas both contemplate the horrible (aśubha): the first contemplates inner as well as outer visibles; the second does not see inner visibles and sees only outer visibles. Why is that?

Beings (sattva) have two kinds of behavior (pratipad).²⁷² sensualism (trṣṇācarita) and rationalism (dṛṣṭicarita). The sensualists (trṣṇābahula) are attached to happiness (sukharakta) and are bound (baddha) by outer fetters (bāhyasaṃyojana). The rationalists (dṛṣṭibahula) are strongly attached to the view of the individual (satkāyadṛṣṭi), etc., and are bound by inner fetters (adhyātmasaṃyojana). This is why the sensualists [usefully] contemplate the horrors of outer visibles (bāhyarūpāśubha), whereas the rationalists [usefully] contemplate the horrors (aśubha) and corruption (vikāra) of their own body.

Furthermore, at the beginning of the practice, the yogin’s mind lacks sharpness (asūkṣma) and at the start it is difficult for him to fix his mind on a single point [viz., outer visibles]. That is why he disciplines his mind and tames it by gradual practice (kramābhyāsa) consisting of the [simultaneous] consideration of both outer and inner visibles. Then he can destroy the notion of inner visibles and see only outer visibles Question. – If the yogin no longer has the notion of inner visibles, why can he see outer visibles?

²⁷⁰ This paragraph is undoubtedly a note by Kumārajīva aimed at justifying the translation of vimokṣa by the Chinese characters pei-chō.

For the Indian exegesis, see Athasālīnī, p. 191-192: Āraṃmane adhimuccanaṭṭhena paccanīkadhammehi vimuccanaṭṭhena vimokkha ti vuttaṃ; Kośavyākhyā, p. 689: sarvasaṃskṛtavaimukhyād vimokṣaḥ, samāpattyaṅvaraṇavimokṣaṇād vimokṣa iti.

²⁷¹ Actually, during the first two vimokṣas, the ascetic cultivates the nine notions regarding the decomposing corpse, notions that will be the subject of the next chapter.

²⁷² For these two kinds of behavior, see Nettippakaraṇa, p. 7, 109; Kośa, IV, p. 174, 208; V, p. 82; Kośavyākhyā, p. 427.

Answer. – This is a matter of a subjective method (adhimuktimārga)²⁷³ and not an objective method (bhūtamārga). The yogin thinks about his future corpse burned by the fire (vidagdhaka), devoured by insects (vikhādītaka), buried in the ground and completely decomposed. Or, if he considers it at present, he analyzes this body down to the subtle atoms (paramāṇu), all non-existent. This is how ‘he sees outer visibles, not having the notion of inner visibles’.

Question. – In the [first] two abhībhvāyatanas, the yogin sees inner and outer visibles; in the [last] six abhībhvāyatanas he sees only outer outer visibles. In the first vimokṣa, he sees inner and outer visibles; in the second vimokṣa, he sees only outer visibles. Why does he destroy only the concept of inner visibles and not destroy the outer visibles?

Answer. – When the yogin sees with his eyes this body marked with the marks of death (marāṇanimitta), he grasps the future characteristics of death; as for the actual body, in it he sees, to a lesser degree, the disappearance (nīrodhalakṣaṇa) of the outer four great elements (mahābhūta). Therefore, since [215b] it is difficult for him to see that they do not exist, the [Sūtra] does not speak of the destruction of the visibles. Besides, at the time when the yogin will have transcended the form realm (rūpadhātu)²⁷⁴, he will no longer see outer visibles.

C. The third vimokṣa

“He actualizes the pleasant vimokṣa” (śubhaṃ, vimokṣaṃ kāyena sāṅgātkaṇṭhī). – This is a pleasant meditation in regard to unpleasant things (aśubheṣu śubhabhāvanā), as is said about the eight abhībhāyatanas.

The first eight kṛtsnāyatanas contemplate, in the pure state (śuddha);²⁷⁵ 1) earth (prthivī), 2) water (ap), 3) fire (tejas), 4) wind (vāyu), and also 5) blue (nīla), 6) yellow (pīṭa), 7) red (lohita), 8) white (avadāta).

The [fifth] sees visibles as blue (rūpāṇi nīlāṇi) like the blue lotus flower (nīlotpalapuṣpa), like the kin-ting-chan,²⁷⁶ like the flax flower (umakapuṣpa) or like fine Benares muslin (saṃpannaṃ vā vārāṇaseyaṃ vastram). It is the same for the visions of yellow (pīṭa), red (lohita) and white (avadāta), each according to its respective color. The entire thing is called ‘the pleasant vimokṣa’.

Question. – If all of that is the pleasant vimokṣa, it should not be necessary to speak of the kṛtsnāyatanas [under the pain of repeating oneself].

²⁷³ An adhimuktimanasikāra or adhimuktisaṃjñāna or ‘voluntary seeing’ of the object; see Kośa, VIII, p. 198-199 and notes.

²⁷⁴ I.e., in the five vimokṣas and the two kṛtsnas called ārūpya.

²⁷⁵ This detail is necessary because, in the course of the first eight kṛtsnas, the yogin contemplates the four great elements and the four colors in their most pure form, without the intrusion of foreign elements or colors. This is what the Visuddhimagga calls the ‘counter-sign’ (paṭihāganimitta) of the object: see above, p. 1287F.

²⁷⁶ This must be a flower or a blue metal. However, there is a mountain in Kiang-Si with this name.

Answer. – The vimokṣas are the initial practice (prathamacaryā); the abhībhvāyatanas are the intermediate practice (madhyamacaryā) and the kṛtsnāyatanas are the long-standing practice.²⁷⁷

The meditation of the horrible (aśubhabhāvatana) is of two types: i) unpleasant (aśubha); ii) pleasant (śubha). The [first] two vimokṣas and the [first] four abhībhvāyatanas are of the unpleasant type. One vimokṣa, [i.e., the third], the [last] four abhībhvāyatanas and the [first] eight kṛtsnāyatanas are of the pleasant type.

Question. – When the yogin takes as pleasant (śubha) that which is unpleasant (aśubha), he is making a mistake (viparyāsa).²⁷⁸ Then why is the meditation that he practices in the course of the pleasant vimokṣa not erroneous?

Answer. – The error is in seeing wrongly as pleasant a woman’s beauty which is unpleasant, but the meditation practiced during the pleasant vimokṣa is not a mistake due to the extension (viśālatva) of all true blue color, [etc].

Moreover, in order to tame the mind (cittadamanārtham), the pleasant meditation presupposes a lengthy practice of the meditation on the horrible (aśubhabhāvatana) and on mental revulsion (cittanirveda): this is why practicing the pleasant meditation is not a mistake and there is no desire (lobha) in it.²⁷⁹

Moreover, the yogin begins by contemplating the horrors of the body and fixes his mind on all the inner and outer horrors in bodily things. Then he feels revulsion (nirveda): [his negative emotions], lust (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and stupidity (moha) decrease; he becomes frightened and understands: “I do not possess these characteristics as a person at all: it is the body that is like that. Then why am I attached to it?”

He concentrates his mind and really meditates so as not to commit mistakes. As soon as his mind becomes disciplined and gentle, he avoids thinking of the horrors of the body, such as skin (tvac), flesh (māṃsa), blood (lohita) and marrow (asthimajjan): for him there are only white bones (śvetāsthika) and he fixes his mind on the skeleton (kaṅkāla). If his mind wanders outward, he concentrates and gathers it back. Concentrating his mind deeply, he sees the diffused light of the white bones (śvetāsthika) like a conch-shell (śaṅkha),²⁸⁰ like shells (kapardaka), lighting up inner and outer things. This is the gateway of the pleasant vimokṣa.

Then, noting the disappearance of the skeleton, the yogin sees only the light of the bones (asthiprabhā) and grasps the characteristics (nimitta) of outer and inner visibles. For example:

1) diamond (vajra), pearl (maṇi), precious golden and silver objects (hemarajataratnavastu),²⁸¹

²⁷⁷ Cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 215.

²⁷⁸ The third of the four errors consisting of taking what is impure to be pure (aśucau śucir iti viparyāsaḥ).

²⁷⁹ The third vimokṣa is the root of good, alobha: cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 206; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 430.

²⁸⁰ Cf. the aṭṭikāni satāni saikhavaṇṇūpanibhāni about which the canonical sources speak: Dīgha, II, p. 297; Majjhima, I, p. 58, 59; III, p. 93; Anguttara, III, p. 324.

²⁸¹ The contemplation of these precious objects is not mentioned in the traditional list of the kṛtsnas.

- 2) very pure (supariśuddha) earth (prthivī):²⁸² [first kṛtsna],
- 3) pure water (ap): [second kṛtsna],
- 4) pure fire (tejas) without smoke (dhūma) or kindling (indhana): [third kṛtsna],
- 5) pure wind (vāyu), without dust (rajas): [fourth kṛtsna],
- 6) blue visibles (rūpāṇi nīlāni), like the kin-ising-chan: [fifth abhibhu and fifth kṛtsna],
- 7) yellow visibles (rūpāṇi pītāni), like the ginger flower (campakapuṣpa): [sixth abhibhu and sixth kṛtsna],
- 8) red visibles (rūpāṇi lohitaṇi), like the flower of the red lotus (padmapuṣpa): [seventh abhibhu and seventh kṛtsna]. 9) white visibles (rūpāṇy avadātāni), like white snow (hima): [eighth abhibhu and eighth kṛtsna].

Grasping these characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇan), the yogin fixes his mind on the pleasant meditation (śubhabhāvana) on the pure light (pariśuddhaprabhā) belonging to each of these visibles. Then the yogin experiences joy (prīti) and happiness (sukha) filling his entire body (kāya): this is what is called the pleasant vimokṣa (śubha vimokṣa). Since it has pleasant things as object (ālambana), it is called ‘pleasant’ vimokṣa. Since the ascetic experiences this [215c] happiness in his whole body, it is said that the yogin ‘actualizes it physically’ (kāyena sāṅsātkaroti). Having obtained this mental happiness (cittasukha), the yogin ‘turns his back and rejects’ (vi-muc) the five objects of enjoyment (kāmaguṇa) and is henceforth without joy (prīti) or happiness (sukha):²⁸³ this is indeed a vimokṣa.

As the yogin has not yet destroyed the impurities (akṣīṇāsrava), it happens that, from time to time, passionate thoughts (saṃyojanacitta) arise in him and he becomes attached (anusajate) to pleasant visibles (śubharūpa). Then he vigorously (ātāpin) and energetically (vīryavat) cuts this attachment (tam āsaṅgaṃ samucchinatti). Actually, this pleasant meditation is a result of his mind. And just as a master magician (māyākāra), in the face of objects that he has created magically, knows that they come from him, so the yogin is no longer attached (āsaṅga) and no longer pursues objects (ālambana). Then the vimokṣa ‘liberation’ changes its name and is called ‘sphere of mastery over the object’ abhibhvĀtana.

Although the yogin thus masters (abhibhavati) the pleasant meditation (śubhabhāvana), he is still incapable of extending it (vistārayitum). Then he returns to grasp the pleasant characteristics (śubhanimitta):

²⁸² Cf. the first eight counter-signs (paṭibhāganimitta) defined by the Visuddhimagga in the chapters on the kasīnas (above, p. 1288F)

²⁸³ This is explained by the fact that the third vimokṣa and consequently the eight abhibhus and the first eight kṛtsnas are practiced in the fourth dhyāna where there is no longer any happiness or suffering, neither joy nor sadness: see above, p. 1031-1032F.

The expression kāyena sāṅsātkṛtvā is absent in the Pāli canonical sources and is used by the Sanskrit sources only in regard to the fourth and eighth vimokṣa. This is due to their excellence (prādhānya) and because they are in the final stages of rūpadhātu and ārūyadhātu respectively: cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 210-211; Kośavyākhyā, p. 690.

a. Using the power of the vimokṣas and the power of the abhibhvāyatanas, he grasps the nature of pleasant earth (śubhaprthivī) and gradually extends it (kraṃeṇa vistārayati) to all the empty space (ākāśa) of the ten directions. He does the same with water (ap), fire (tejas) and wind (vāyu).²⁸⁴

b. He grasps the nature of blue (nīlanimitta) and gradually extends it to all the space of the ten directions. He does the same with yellow (pīta), red (lohita) and white (avadāta).²⁸⁵

Now the abhibhvāyatanas are transformed and become the kṛtsnāyatanas ‘spheres of totality of the object’.

These three, [namely the vimokṣas, the abhibhvāyatanas and the kṛtsnāyatanas], are one and the same thing (ekārtha), with three name-changes.

Question. – The [first] three vimokṣas, the eight abhibhvātanas and the ten kṛtsnāyatanas are either objective considerations (bhūtapratyavekṣā) or subjective considerations (adhimuktipratyavekṣā).

If they are objective considerations, since the body still contains skin (tvac) and flesh (māṃsa), how can one see only white bones (śvetasthika) in it? Besides, the body is constituted by an assemblage of thirty-six substances (ṣaṭtrimṣad dhātusāmagrī),²⁸⁶ why distinguish them and consider them separately? The four great elements (mahābhūta) [entering into the constitution of the body] each have their own nature (svalakṣaṇa);²⁸⁷ why exclude three of them [water, fire and wind] and consider just the earth element ²⁸⁴ In the course of kṛtsnas 1 to 4.

²⁸⁵ In the course of kṛtsnas 5 to 8.

²⁸⁶ In the Sanskrit sources of both the Lesser and the Greater Vehicles, physical substances are 26 in number (cf. Tseng yi a han, T 125, p. 687b9; k. 27, p. 712b7; k. 49, p. 815c5; Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā, T 201, k. 5, p. 285b1; Po yü king, T 209, k. 4, p. 555b15; Tch’ou yao king, k. 212, k. 1, p. 612b17; k. 5, p. 632c22; k. 17, p. 699c7; k. 26, p. 749c16). They are listed, with many faulty readings, in the Sanskrit editions of the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 205, l. 16-19 (T 223, k. 5, p. 253c26-29) and the Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1431, l. 9-13 (T 220, k. 53, p. 298b26-28).

The Pāli suttas list 31 (Dīgha, II, p. 293; III, p. 104; Majjhima, I, p. 57; III, p. 90; Samyutta, IV, p. 111; V, p. 278; Anguttara, III, p. 323; V, p. 109). The Visuddhimagga gives their number as 32 and discusses them at length. Here is the latter list with corresponding terms in Pāli and Sanskrit:

1) Hair of the head (kesa, keśa); 2) hairs (loma, roman). 3) nails (nakha); 4) teeth (dānta); 5) skin (taca, tvac); 6) flesh (maṃsa, māṃsa); 7) tendons (nhāru, snāyu); 8) bone (aṭṭhi, asthi); 9) marrow (aṭṭhimīṇja, asthimajjan); 10) kidneys (vakka, vṛkka); 11) heart (hadaya, hṛdaya); 12) liver (yakana, yakṛt); 13) pleura (kilamaka, kloman); 14) spleen (pihaka, plīhan); 15) lungs (papphāsa, pupphusa); 16) intestines (anta, antra); 17) mesentery (antagiṇa, antraguṇa); 18) stomach (usatiya, udara); 19) excrement (karīsa, kariṣa); 20) brain (matthaluṅga, mastuluṅga); 21) bile (pitta); 22) phlegm (samha, śleṣman); 23) pus (pubba, pūya); 24) blood (lohita); 25) sweat (seda, sveda); 26) fat (meda or medas); 27) tears (assu, asru); 28) suint (vasā); 29) saliva (khela, kheṭa); 30) snot (siṅghāṇikā, saṅghāṇaka); 31) synovial fluid (lasikā); 32) urine (mutta, mūtra).

²⁸⁷ The nature of the four great elements is, respectively, solidity (khakkhatatva), moistness or fluidity (dravatya), warmth (uṣṇatva) and movement (īraṇatva).

(prthivīmahābhūta)?²⁸⁸ The four colors are not blue (nīla) exclusively; why then practice meditation just on blue (nīlabhāvāna)?²⁸⁹

Answer. – [In these considerations] there is an objective consideration (bhūtapratyavekṣā) as well as a subjective consideration (adhimuktipratyavekṣā).

Bodily characteristics (kāyanimitta), objectively, are unpleasant (aśubha): that is an objective consideration. Among outer things (bāhyadharmā), there are all kinds of colors of pleasant nature (śubhalakṣaṇa): this is also an objective consideration. The pleasant (śubha) and the unpleasant (aśubha) come within objective considerations.

On the other hand, when one takes the small number of pleasant things and extends it to consider everything as pleasant,²⁹⁰ when one chooses the single element water and extends it to see everything as water,²⁹¹ when one chooses the small amount of blue that exists and extends it to see everything as blue²⁹² and so on, those are subjective considerations that are not objective.

D. Vimokṣas four to seven

The four formless vimokṣas (ārūpyavimokṣa) are similar to meditations practiced in the four formless absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti).²⁹³ The person who wants to acquire these vimokṣas first enters into the formless absorptions: the latter are the gateway into these vimokṣas, for the sphere of the infinity of space (ākāśānāntāyātana) ‘turns the back on and rejects’ material objects (rūpyālabhāna).

Question. – If it is the same for the formless absorptions, how do [the formless vimokṣas] differ?

Answer. – The worldly person (prthagjana) who acquires the formless absorptions is arūpin [‘without form’ or without the concept of form]. But when the saint (āryapudgala) with high resolve (adhyāśaya) acquires these formless absorptions, [he is arūpin] absolutely and without regression: that is why it is called vimokṣa.

It is the same for the other vimokṣas coming within the spheres of infinity of consciousness (vijñānānāntāyātana), nothing at all (ākīṃcanyāyātana) and neither identification nor non-identification (naivasamjñānāśamjñāyātana).

E. The eighth vimokṣa

²⁸⁸ This is done in the first kṛtsna.

²⁸⁹ This is done in the fifth abhibhu and the fifth kṛtsna.

²⁹⁰ In the course of the third vimokṣa.

²⁹¹ In the course of the second kṛtsna.

²⁹² In the course of the fifth abhibhu and the fifth kṛtsna.

²⁹³ See above, p. 1274F seq.

Turning the back on and suppressing feelings (vedita) and concepts (saṃjñā) as well as all mind (citta) and all mental events (caitasikadharmā) is what is called ‘liberation consisting of the cessation of feeling and concept’ (saṃjñāveditanirodhavimokṣa).

Question. – Why is the absorption of non-identification (asaṃjñāsamāpatti) not a vimokṣa?²⁹⁴

Answer. – Because when beings with wrong view (mithyādarśin) who do not discern the defects (doṣa) of dharmas enter into the absorption [216a] [of non-identification], they identify it with nirvāṇa and when they emerge from of this absorption, they feel regret (vipratīṣāra) and fall back into their wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi). This is why the absorption [of non-identification] is not a vimokṣa.

On the other hand, by the cessation of feeling and concept that suppresses all distraction (vikṣiptacitta), the yogin penetrates into a nirvāṇa-like²⁹⁵ cessation (nirodha). Since he acquires it by attaching to it [just] his body, the Sūtra says that he ‘actualizes it physically’ (kāyena sāṅgātkaroti).

2. The Eight Masteries

A. General definition

The eight spheres of mastery (aṣṭāv abhībhvāyātanaṇi):

1) Having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles, few in number, beautiful or ugly, and he cognizes these visibles by mastering them, he sees them by mastering them; this is the first abhibhu (adhyātmam rūpasamjñī habirdhā rūpaṇi paśyati parūtāni suvarṇadurvarṇāni, tāni khalu rūpāṇy abhībhūya jñāty abhībhūya paśyatīdaṃ prathamam abhībhvāyatanam).

2) Having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles, numerous, beautiful or ugly, and he cognizes these visibles by mastering them, he sees them by mastering them; this is the second abhibhu (adhyātmam rūpasamjñī nahirdhā rūpaṇi paśyati adhimātrāṇi suvarṇadurvarṇāni, tāni khalu rūpāṇy abhībhūya jñāty abhībhūya paśyatīdaṃ dvitīyam abhībhvāyatanam).

3-4) It is the same for the third and fourth abhibhāyātana, with the only difference that, not having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles (adyātmam arūpasamjñī bahirdhā rūpaṇi paśyati).

5-6) [In these āyatanas], not having the notion of inner visibles, the yogin sees outer visibles blue, yellow, red or white (adhyātmam arūpasamjñī bahirdhā rūpaṇi paśyati nīlapītalohitāvadātāni).

These are the eight abhibhāyatanas.

²⁹⁴ The yogin who has entered into cessation is dr̥ṣṭadharmanirvāṇaprāpta: in the present lifetime (dr̥ṣṭe janmani) is in the nirvāṇa with residue of conditioning (sopadhīṣeṣanirvāṇastha).

²⁹⁵ The absorption of non-identification is practiced by worldly people (prthagjana) who identify non-identification with true liberation. The saints (ārya) do not practice it; they reserve their efforts for the absorption of cessation which they consider to be the peaceful absorption: cf. Kośa, II, p. 201-214.

B. The first abhībhu

“Having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles “ (adhyātmaṃ rūpasamjñī bahirdhā rūpāni paśyati): himself unhurt, he sees outer objects (bāhyāḷambana).

“He sees few of them” (parītāni): being rare, these objects are said to be ‘few in number’. The path of seeing not being developed in him, the yogin sees objects few in number for, if he saw a large number of them, he would grasp them with difficulty. In the same way, when deer run about in confusion, one cannot see them from far away.

“He sees the beautiful or ugly” (suvarṇadurvarṇāni). At the start of the practice, the yogin fixes his mind on an object (ālam, bana), the space between the eyebrows, the forehead or the end of the nose. With the notion of unpleasant inner visibles (adhyātmaṃ aśubhasamjñī) and the notion of unpleasant things in his own body, the yogin sees outer visibles which sometimes will be beautiful (suvarṇāni) by virtue of the retribution for good actions (kuśalakarmavipāka), sometimes ugly (durvarṇāni) by virtue of retribution for bad actions (akuśalakarmavipāka).

Furthermore, when the yogin, following the instructions of his teacher, grasps and sees all kinds of unpleasant things (nānāvidhāny aśubhāni) in outer objects (bāhyāḷambana), this is a matter of ‘ugly visibles’ (durvarṇāni rūpāṇī). But sometimes when, by loss of attentiveness (smṛtiḥāni), the yogin conceives a pleasant notion (śubhasamjñā) and sees pleasant visibles (śubhāni rūpāṇī), this is then a matter of ‘beautiful visibles’ (suvarṇāni rūpāṇī).

Furthermore, when the yogin by himself fixes his mind on a given place, he sees two kinds of visibles (dvividhāni rūpāṇī) inherent in the desire realm (kāmadhātu): i) the visibles that give rise to lust (rāga), ii) the visibles that give rise to hatred (dveṣa). Those that give rise to lust are pleasant visibles (śubhāni rūpāṇī) described here as beautiful (suvarṇāni); those that give rise to hatred are unpleasant visibles (aśubhāni rūpāṇī) described here as ugly (durvarṇāni).

The yogin is master (vaśavartin) over these objects (āḷambana):²⁹⁶ “He cognizes them by mastering them, he sees them by mastering them” (abhibhūya jñāty abhibhūya paśyati). Faced with beautiful visibles ²⁹⁶ Although the vimokṣas liberate from the object, the abhibhus exert a real mastery (aiśvarya) over it. According to the Kośa, VIII, p. 213, this domination (abhibhavana) over the object is twofold: i) yatheṣṭam adhimokṣaḥ: the voluntary seeing of the object as one wants it to be; ii) kleśānupatti: the absence of negative emotion evoked by the object. Here the Traité particularly stresses this second point: the ascetic in possession of the abhibhus no longer feels any lust (rāga) for pleasant objects or any hatred (dveṣa) toward unpleasant objects.

But the abhibhus still allow one to see the object as one wishes it to be. Indeed, “when the mind is absorbed, very pure, very clean, stainless, free of impurities, supple, ready to act, the ascetic can direct his mind (cittaṃ abhinīharati) to the supernatural powers (abhijñā) and especially toward magical power (ṛddhi)” (Dīgha, I, p. 77). Then he can, at will, transform the great elements and the colors so as to see them as he wishes. See Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 142-143. Thus, the contemplation on yellow can (abhirūpa) capable of generating lust (rāga), the yogin feels no lust; faced with ugly visibles capable of generating hatred (dveṣa), he feels no hatred. He sees only that visibles coming from the four great elements (mahābhūta) and from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī) are lacking in substance (asāra) like a water bubble (budbuda).²⁹⁷ That is how it is for beautiful and ugly visibles.

In this abhibhvāyatana, the yogin stays on the threshold of the [meditation] on the horrible (aśubhabhāvana). When the fetters of lust, hate, etc. (rāgadveṣādīsamyojana) occur, he does not follow them: that is the sphere of mastery [of the object] for he masters the mistake that consists of taking as pure that which is impure (aśucau śucir iti viparyāsa) and the other defilements (kleśa).

Question. – While having the notion of inner visibles (adhyātmaṃ rūpasamjñā), how does the yogin see outer visibles (bahirdhā rūpāni paśyati)?

Answer. – The eight abhibhvāyatanas can be attained (prāpti) by ascetics who have entered deeply into concentration and whose mind is disciplined and softened. Sometimes the yogin sees the horrible (aśubha) of his own body and [216b] also sees the horrors of outer visibles.

The contemplation of the horrible (aśubhabhāvana) is of two types: i) that which contemplates all kinds of impurities (nānāvidhāśuci), such as the thirty-six bodily substances (dravya), etc.; ii) that which, disregarding in one’s own body as in others’ bodies, the skin (tvac), flesh (māṃsa) and the five internal organs,²⁹⁸ contemplates only the white bones (śvetāsthika), like a conch-shell (śaṅkha), like snow (hima). The sight of the thirty-six bodily substances is called ‘ugly’ (durvarṇa); the sight of the conch or snow is called “beautiful” (suvarṇa).

C. The second abhībhu

At the time he is contemplating inner and outer [visibles], the yogin is distracted (vikṣiptacitta) and only with difficulty can he enter into dhyāna. Then he excludes notions of his own body (ādhyatmikasaṃjñā) and considers only outer visibles (bāhyarūpa). As is said in the Abhidharma, the yogin who possesses vimokṣa contemplates and sees the dead body: after death, the latter is picked up and taken to the charnel-ground (śmaśāna) where, burned by fire (vidagdḥaka) and devoured by insects (vikhāditaka), it have the effect of creating yellow forms (pīṭakarūpanimmāṇaṃ), the volition that something be golden (suvaṇṇan ti adhimucanā), etc. This creative power of ‘volitional seeing’ (adhimokṣa) is mentioned in the canonical sources, e.g., Saṃyutta, I, p. 116: Ākaṅkhamāno Bhagavā Himavantam pabbatarājaṃ suvaṇṇaṃ tv eva adhimucceyya, suvaṇṇaṇ ca pabbat’ assā ti.

²⁹⁷ See above, p. 359, n.

²⁹⁸ A typically Chinese expression appearing in the canonical versions, although the Indian originals show no trace of it: cf. Fo pan ni yuan king, T 5, k. 1, p. 163c15; k. 2, [171a16; Fo k’ai kiai, T 20, p. 262a3; Hong chouei, T 33, [817b3; Ni-li, T 86, p. 908b15; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 25, p. 6587b12; k. 51, p. 828c18. The five viscera are the kidneys, the heart, the liver, the lungs and the spleen. The Commentary to the Viḥaṅga, p. 249, also speaks of the vakkapañcaka “the five [constituents of the body] starting with the kidneys.”

disintegrates. From then on, the yogin sees only the insects and the fire, but does not see the body: this is why the Sūtra says that “not having the notion of inner visibles, he sees outer visibles” (adhyātmam ārūpasamjñī bahirdhā rūpāṇi paśyati).

In accordance with instructions, the yogin perceives and looks at the body as a skeleton (kaṅkāla). When his mind is distracted outwardly, he brings it back and concentrates on the skeleton as object. Why is that? At the beginning of the practice, this person was unable to see subtle objects (sūkṣmāḷambana), and that is why the sūtra said [in regard to the first abhibhu that the yogin sees only] visibles “few in number” (rūpāṇi parītāni). But now, this yogin, whose path of seeing is developing, deepening and broadening, uses this skeleton in order to see Jambudvīpa as skeletons everywhere, and this is why the Sūtra says here that he sees ‘numerous visibles’ (rūpāṇy adhimatrāṇi).

Then he concentrates his mind again and no longer sees a single skeleton; this is why the sūtra says that “he cognizes visibles by mastering them and sees visibles by mastering them” (tāni khalu rūpāṇy abhibhūya jānāty abhibhūya paśyati).

And since, the yogin is able at will (yatheṣṭam) to master the concept of man and woman (puruṣastrīsamjñā) and the concept of beauty (śucisamjñā) in regard to the five objects of enjoyment (kāmaguṇa), that is indeed a ‘sphere of mastering the object’ (abhibhvāyatana).

Thus a strong man (balavat) mounted on his horse who captures the enemy is able to destroy them is said to ‘master’ them and, as he is also able to control his horse, he ‘masters’ it. It is the same for the yogin: in the meditation on the horrible (aśubhabhāvana), he is able to do a lot with just a little, and do a little with a lot: that is an abhibhvāyatana. He is also able to destroy his enemies, the five objects of enjoyment (kāmaguṇa); that also is an abhibhvāyatana. When without destroying inwardly [the notion] of his own body, the yogin sees visibles outwardly, numerous or few in number, beautiful or ugly, that is a matter of the first and second abhibhvāyatanas.

D. The third and fourth abhibhus

When, no longer having the notion of visibles concerning his own body, the yogin sees visibles outwardly, numerous or few, beautiful or ugly, that is the third and fourth abhibhu.

E. The four last abhibhus

When, having concentrated his mind, the yogin deeply penetrates into the absorptions (samāpatti), suppresses [the concept] of inner body (adhyāyama), sees outer objects perfectly pure (bāhyapariśuddhāḷambana), blue (nīla) and blue in color (nīlavarṇa), yellow (pīta) and yellow in color (pītavarṇa), red (lohitā) and red in color (lohitavarṇa), white (avadāta) and white in color (avadātarṇa), this is a matter of the last four abhibhvāyatanas.

Question. –What is the difference between the last four abhibhvāyatanas and the last four kṛtsnāyatanas of color, blue, etc., that are part of the ten kṛtsnāyatanas?

Answer. – The kṛtsnāyatana of blue grasps absolutely everything as blue; the corresponding abhibhvāyatana sees a large number or a small number of objects only as blue, at will (yatheṣṭam), without, however, eliminating foreign thoughts. Seeing and mastering these objects, it is called abhibhvāyatana.

Thus, for example, whereas the noble cakravartin king totally dominates the four continents (cāturdvīpaka), the king of Jambudvīpa dominates only a single continent. In the same way, whereas the kṛtsnāyatanas totally dominate all objects, the abhibhvāyatanas see only a small number of visibles and dominate them but are unable to include all objects.

This is a summary (saṃkṣepena) explanation of the eight abhibhvāyatanas.

3. The Ten Totalities

[216c] As for the ten kṛtsnāyatanas ‘spheres of totality of the object’, we have already spoken of them in regard to the vimokṣas and the abhibhvāyatanas. They are called ‘spheres of totality’ because they embrace their object in its totality (āḷambanakṛtsnaspharaṇāt).²⁹⁹

Question. – [Of the four formless spheres (ārūpyāyatana), only the first two, ākāśānāntyāyatana ‘sphere of infinite space’ and vijñānānātyāyatana ‘sphere of infinite consciousness’, are kṛtsnāyatanas. Why are [the other two formless spheres], namely, ākīṃcanāyatana ‘sphere of nothing at all’ and naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana ‘sphere of neither identification nor non-identification’] not kṛtsnāyatanas as well?

Answer. – The kṛtsnāyatanas are subjective views (adhimokṣamanasikāra) and, of the formless spheres, only two, those of infinity of space and infinity of consciousness, lend themselves of subjective extensions.

“Safety (yogaḥṣema), happiness (sukha), vastness (viśāla), immensity (apramāṇa) and infinity (ananta), the sphere of space”, said the Buddha. – Throughout all the kṛtsnāyatanas there is a consciousness (vijñāna) capable of quickly bearing upon all things and, faced with these dharmas, one determines the presence of consciousness. This is why the two spheres (āyatana) [of space and consciousness] constitute the kṛtsnāyatana.

On the other hand, in the sphere of nothing at all (ākīṃcanyāyatana), there is no substance (dhātu) capable of being extended; there is no happiness (sukha) there and, in regard to nothing-at-all, the Buddha said nothing about infinity, immensity.

²⁹⁹ Cf. Kośavyākhyā, p. 692: Nirantarakṛtsnasspharaṇād iti nirantaram kṛtsnānāṃ prthivyādīnam spharaṇād vyāpanāt kṛtsnāyatanaṇīty ucyante. – Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 85, p. 40b18-23: They are called kṛtsnāyatana for two reasons: i) because they are without intervals (nirantara) and ii) because they are extended (viśāla). Because deliberate reflection (adhimokṣamanasikāra) bears uniquely on blue, etc., without being mixed with another object, they are ‘without interval’; because deliberate reflection on all of blue, etc., is of infinite scope (gocara), they are ‘extended’. The Bhadanta says: Because their object (āḷambana) is vast and extended, because there are no intervals-gaps, they are called kṛtsnāyatanas.

In the sphere of neither identification nor non-identification (naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana), the mind is dull (mṛdu) and it is hard for it to grasp a concept (nimittodgrahaṇa) and extend it to infinity, as is the case for the kṛtsnas].

Furthermore, the ākāśāyatana is close to the form realm (rūpadātu) and it can still be concerned with visibles (rūpa). The vijñānāyatana also can be concerned with visible objects. Besides, coming out of the vijñānāyatana, one can leap into the fourth dhyāna and, on coming out of the fourth dhyāna, one is able to leap into the vijñānāyatana.³⁰⁰ On the contrary, the ākīṃcanāyatana and the naivasamjñāyatana [as the higher spheres of the ārūpyadhātu] are very distant in formlessness: this is why they are not kṛtsnāyatanas.

4. Objects and Distribution of the Vimokṣas, Abhibhus and Kṣtsnas

Every utilization of these three types of dharma realizes a mastery over the object (ālambanābhibhavana).

1) The kṛtsnāyatanas are impure (sāsrava).

The first three vimokṣas, the seventh and eighth vimokṣas are impure. The others are sometimes impure (sāsrava), sometimes pure (anāsrava).³⁰¹

2) The first two vimokṣas and the first four abhibhāvāyatanas are contained (saṃgrhīta) in the first and second dhyānas.

The śubhāvīmokṣa (3rd vimokṣa), the last four abhibhāvāyatanas and the first eight kṛtsnāyatanas are contained in the fourth dhyāna.³⁰²

³⁰⁰ A possibility that may be verified during the vyutkrāntakasamāpatti or the 'absorption of the leap': see above, p. 1048F, and, for detailed description, see Hobogirin, IV, p. 353-360, article Chṣṣṣ by J. May.

³⁰¹ We may recall that the absorption of worldly order practiced by ordinary people (prthagjana) is śuddhaka, i.e., kuśala sāsrava 'good but mixed with impurities'. The absorption of supraworldly order practiced as Path by the saints (ārya) who have seen the Buddhist truths is anāsrava 'free of impurities'. See above, p. 1027F, 1035-36F, and Kośa, VIII, p. 145, n.

³⁰² Thus the eight vimokṣas are distributed over eleven levels: cf. Kośavyākhyā, p. 689: "These vimokṣas occur in the other eleven levels, except for the seven threshold absorptions, viz., 1) the desire realm, 2-3) the anāgāmya and the dhyānāntara. 4-11) the eight levels made up of the [four] dhyānas and the [four] samāpattis." – See also Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 84, p. 434c-435a: The first two vimokṣas occur in the first two dhyānas, the anāgāmya and the dhyānāntara... The third vimokṣa occurs in the fourth dhyāna... The fourth vimokṣa is in the ākāśānāntāyātana... The fifth vimokṣa is in the vijñānānāntāyātana... The sixth vimokṣa is in the ākāśānāntāyātana... The seventh vimokṣa is in the naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana... The Vimokṣa of saṃjñāveditanirodha also.

Why are there no vimokṣas in the third dhyāna? On this point see Kośa, VIII, p. 209.

3) The first two kṛtsnāyatanas are called ākāśāyatana. The ākāśāyatana contains the vijñānāyatana.³⁰³ The vijñānāyatana contains the first three vimokṣas, the eight abhibhāvāyatanas and the [first] eight kṛtsnāyatanas, all of which have as object (ālambana) the visibles of the desire realm (kāmadhāturūpa).

The four next vimokṣas (nos. 4-7) have as object the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu), the marvelous qualities of pure dharma (anāsravadharma) and the good (kuśala: read chan instead of jo) in [the four] fundamental [absorptions] (maulasamāpatti), because the fundamental formless absorptions (ārūpyamaulasamāpatti) do not concern the levels lower than them.

The absorption of the cessation of concepts and feeling (saṃjñāveditanirodhasamāpatti) constituting the eighth vimokṣa, being neither mind (citta) nor mental event (caitasikadharma), has no object (anālambana).

The seventh vimokṣa, namely, the absorption of neither identification nor non-identification (naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana) alone has as its object the four formless aggregates (ārūpyaskandha) and the pure dharma (anāsravadharma).³⁰⁴

Second Section THE NINE SUCCESSIVE ABSORPTIONS (p. 1308F)

PRELIMINARY NOTE

Designated by the name anupūrvavihāra (Dīgha, III, p. 265; Anguttara, IV, p. 410), anupūrvva-samāpatti (Divya, p. 95), anupūrvva-vihāra-samāpatti (Saṃyutta, II, p. 216; Anguttara, IV, p. 410; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 19; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 58, 1445; Vibhaṅga, p. 343; Mahāvvyut., no. 1498), anupūrvva-samādhi-samāpatti (Dharmasaṃgraha, §82), the nine successive absorptions are the four dhyānas of the rūpadhātu, the four samāpattis of ther ārūpya, plus the saṃjñāveditanirodhasamāpatti.

To define them, the Pāli and Sanskrit texts (df. Dīgha, III, p. 265-266; Anguttara, IV, p. 410-414; Śatsāhasrikā, p. 1445-1446) repeat the words of the old Dhyānasūtra, the text of which has been given above, p. 1024F. Dīgha, III, p. 266, and Anguttara, IV, p. 410-414, explain that these nine absorptions are acquired by nine successive cessations (nirodha) eliminating in turn: 1) bad desires (kāma), 2) investigation and analysis (vitarkavicāra), 3) joy (prīti), 4) inhalation and exhalation (āśvāsapraśvāsa) or indifference and happiness (upekṣāsukha), 5) the concept of substance (rūpasamjñā), 6) the notion of infinite space (ākāśānanatāyātana), 7) the concept of infinite consciousness (vijñānānāntāyātana), 8) the concept of nothing at all (ākīṃcanyāyatana), 9) the concept of neither identification nor non-identification (naivasamjñānāsamjñāyatana) and finally, all concept (saṃjñā) and sensation (vedanā).

³⁰³ This passage is obscure; there is possibly a gap.

³⁰⁴ The object of the vimokṣas, etc., is treated in the same manner in Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 84, p. 435a16-28; Kośa, VIII, p. 208-209.

The nine successive absorptions (anupūrvasamāpatti):

Emerging from of the first dhyāna, the yogin then [directly] enters into the second dhyāna in such a way that there is no other intervening mind, whether good (kuśala) or defiled (saṃkliṣṭa). [From the dhyāna into the samāpatti], the yogin continues in this way until the absorption of cessation of concept and feeling (saṃjñāvedītanīrodhasamāpatti).

Question. – But other things can still follow one another [directly]. Why would just the nine absorptions be successive?

Answer. – There are always foreign minds that happen to be interpolated among the other qualities (guṇa); this is why they are not successive. But here, lofty resolve (adhyāśaya) and wisdom (prajñā) are sharp (tīkṣṇa); the yogin puts his own mind to the test and, coming out of the first dhyāna, he enters directly into the second in such a way that no other mind intervenes. In these very qualities, the mind is supple (mṛduka) and easily cuts through desire (īṣṇā): this is why the minds succeed one another.

Of these successive absorptions, two are impure (sāsrava) and the other [217a] seven are sometimes impure and sometimes pure (anāsrava). On the other hand, the dhyānantara ‘variation of the first dhyāna’ and the anāgamya ‘threshold absorption of the first dhyāna’ are without stability (asāra).³⁰⁵

Moreover, [the successive absorptions] are acquired by the āryas only, and their great benefits are not found in the samānantaka ‘threshold absorptions’: this is why the latter are not ‘successive’ (anupūrvā).

The eight vimokṣas, the eight abhībhāvāyatanas, the ten kṛtsnāyatanas and the nine anupūrvasamāpattis have been explained in brief (samāsatas) according to the śrāvaka system.

³⁰⁵ For detail, see Kośa, VIII, p. 178-181.

CHAPTER XXXV: THE NINE HORRIBLE NOTIONS (p. 1311F)

PRELIMINARY NOTE

By Navasaṃjñā, the Traité means the nine notions of the horrible (navāśubhasaṃjñā) cultivated by the ascetic in the course of the contemplation of the decomposing corpse.

I. ĀSUBHĀ IN THE CANONICAL TEXTS

The Pāli canon contains three suttas entitled Asubha: Samyutta, V, p. 132; Aṅguttara, II, p. 150-152; Itivuttaka, p. 80-81.

Āsubhā or aśubhasaṃjñā also appears in the canonical lists:

1. List of three dharmas: Anguttara, III, p. 446.
2. List of four saṃjñās: Anguttara, IV, p. 353, 358; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 10, p. 492b23-25.
3. Lists of five saṃjñās: i) Anguttara, II, p. 150, 151, 55, 156; III, p. 83, 142-143; ii) Anguttara, III, p. 79, 277.
4. Lists of seven saṃjñās: i) Dīgha, II, p. 79; III, p. 253; Anguttara, IV, p. 24, 148; ii) Anguttara, IV, p. 46, 148; iii) Tch’ang a han, T 1, k. 2, p. 11c26-29.
3. Lists of nine saṃjñās: i) Dīgha, III, p. 289-290; Anguttara, IV, p. 387, 465; ii) Tch’ang a han, T 1, k. 9, p. 56c22-24.
4. Lists of ten saṃjñās: i) Dīgha, III, p. 291; Samyutta, V, p. 132-133; Anguttara, V, p. 105, 309; ii) Anguttara, V, p. 109.
5. List of twenty saṃjñās: Anguttara, I, p. 41-42.

But aśubha is a complex entity since it concerns the various stages of decomposition of the corpse. However, the canonical sources mention only a few without enumerating them.

Among the most frequently mentioned stages of decomposition mentioned are the corpse reduced to bones (aṭṭhika), rotten (puḷuvaka), turning blueish (vinīlika), torn apart (vicchiddaka), bloated (uddhumātaka), and a few others, but the description is not systematic: cf. Anguttara, I, p. 42; II, p. 17; V, p. 310; Tsa a han, & 99, k. 31, p. 221b27-28; Tseng yi a han, Y 125, k. 42, p. 781a19-21; k. 44, p. 789b2-5.

There is an almost complete list in a Sanskrit sūtra cited in the Kośavyākhyā, p. 55, l. 1-2: i) vinīlaka, ii) vipīyaka, iii) vyādhmātka, iv) vipaṭumaka, v) vilohitaka, vi) vikhāditaka, vii) vikṣiptaka, viii) asthi, ix) asthisamkalikā.

II. THE TEN ASUBHASAÑÑĀ IN THE PĀLI ABHIDHAMMA

The Abhidhamma, its commentaries and related treatises fix the number of asubhasaññās at ten and cite them in the following order:

i) Bloated corpse (uddhumātaka), ii) blueish (vinīlaka), iii) rotten (vipubbaka), iv) torn apart (vicchiddaka), v) devoured (vikkhhāyitaka), vi) scattered (vikkhittaka), vii) chopped up and scattered (hatavikkhittaka), viii) bloody (lohitaka), ix) infested with worms (puḷuvaka), x) reduced to bone (aṭṭhika).

These terms are cited and commented upon in Dhammasaṅgani, p. 55 (tr. Rhys Davids, p. 63 and n. 3); Atthasālinī, p. 197-198 (tr. Tin, p. 264-267); Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 89, 145-146 (tr. Nanamoli, p. 185-186); Vimuttimagga, tr. Ehara, p. 132-139. The Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 146-158 (tr. Nanamoli, p. 186-200) deals at great length with the manner of practicing the first asubhabhāvana. As in the kasinas, the ascetic must apprehend a twofold sign, the sign of learning (uggahanimitta) and the counter-sign (paṭibhāganimitta). To this end, he goes to a charnel-ground and contemplates with extreme attentiveness the ten stages of decomposing corpses, the bloated corpse, etc. The pertinent uggahanimitta appears to him as a unit (paripuṇṇa). See two fine articles in Ceylon Encyclopedia, II, p. 270-281.

III. THE NINE ASUBHASAṂJÑĀS IN THE SANSKRIT ABHIDHARMA

The Sanskrit Abhidharma and, following it, the Mahāyāna sūtras and śāstras, list only nine notions of the horrible, but rarely cite them in the same order and not always in full. Descriptions will be found in Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 40, p. 205a-210a; Kośa, VI, p. 148-153; VIII, p. 197, 205; Kośavyākhyā, p. 526-537; Nyāyānusāra, Y 1562, k. 59, p. 671a; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 372.

The Traité, being a Prajñāpāramitā commentary, cites lists of the nine notions found in this literature. Unfortunately, the Sanskrit editions available to us are rather defective. Edgerton (Dictionary, s.v. aśubha) has tried to correct them. Perhaps it is more useful to reproduce here the texts of the editions, simply noting the variants:

Pañcaviṃśati, p. 19, l. 19-20, l. 2; p. 165, l. 7: i) ādhmātaka, ii) vidhūta (var. vipaṭumaka), iii) vipīyaka (var. vipūryaka), iv) vilohitaka, v) vinīlaka, vi) vikhāditaka, vii) vikṣiptaka, viii) vidagdha, ix) asthi-saṃjñā.

Śatasāhasrikā, p. 59, l. 2-18: i) dhyātaka, ii) vipadāka, iii) vipūtika, iv) vilohitaka, v) vinīlaka, vi) vikhāditaka, vii) vikṣiptaka, viii) asthi, ix) vidagdha-saṃjñā.

Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1258, l. 6-8 (very defective text): i) vyāgatika, ii) niruttamaka, iii) vipūtika, iv) vilohataka, v) vinīlaka, vi) vivādaka, vii) vikṣiptaka, viii) asmi, ix) vidagnaka.

- 1) that of the bloated corpse (vyādhmātakasamjñā),
- 2) that of the torn-up corpse (vidhūtakasamjñā),
- 3) that of the bloody corpse (vilohitakasamjñā),

First Section THE NINE NOTIONS ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA

I. THE POSITION OF THE NINE NOTIONS

Question. – It is necessary first to have cultivated these nine notions and be free from desire in order to then attain the dhyānas. Why does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] speak of the nine notions here after having dealt with the dhyānas and the absorptions (samāpatti)?

Answer. – First the Sūtra spoke about the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) which is [the dhyānas and the samāpattis] in order to encourage the yogin's heart. Although the nine notions are horrible (aśubha), the person who wants to obtain their fruit of retribution must have practiced them previously.

II. HOW TO MEDITATE ON THE NINE NOTIONS

Question. – How does the yogin meditate on these nine things, the bloated corpse (vyādhmātaka), etc?

1. Reflection on death

Answer. – First the yogin observes pure discipline (śīlasuddhi) in order to have no regrets (kaukr̥tya), and thus he will easily find the meditation subjects (bhāvanadharmā) to destroy the enemies (amitra) that are the negative emotions, lust, etc. (rāgādīkleśa).

He thinks about a man on the very day of his death: the words of farewell that he speaks, the outbreath (apāna) which does not return and, immediately afterwards, his death. The family is in turmoil: they weep and invoke the heavens saying: “Just a moment ago he passed away; his breath is no more, his body is cold, he is no longer conscious.”

Death is a great calamity; it is impossible to avoid it. It is like the fire at the end of the kalpa (kalpoddāha) from which there is no escape. Thus it is said:

When death comes, neither rich nor poor,

Neither benefactors nor criminals,

Neither nobles nor lowly people

Neither old nor young can escape it.

There are no prayers that can save you,

There are no tricks by which you can escape,

There are no stratagems to free you,

There is no way to avoid it.

Death is the place where one leaves one's attachments forever; it is hated by all, but no matter how much one hates it, no one can escape it. The yogin says: “Soon my body will be like this, no different from a piece of wood or stone. Therefore, from now on I must not covet the five objects of enjoyment (kāmaguṇa) and I must not think of the coming of death like oxen and sheep. Even when these animals see a dead animal, they leap about and squeal without taking anything into account. I, who possess a human body and differentiate between beautiful and ugly, must seek the ambrosia (amṛta) of immortality.” Thus it is said:

Having the six faculties (ṣaḍindriya), the human being is complete,

His knowledge is clear and his vision is keen,

But he does not seek the Dharma of the Path;

It is in vain that he has received body and knowledge.

All animals also are able to free themselves

From the objects of enjoyment (kāmaguṇa)

[217b]But they do not know how to cultivate

The good in view of the Path.

The person who has acquired a human body

But who only devotes himself to licentiousness

And does not know how to develop the good practices,

How is he different from the animals?

The beings in the three unfortunate destinies (durgati)

Are incapable of accomplishing the deeds of the Path.

The person who has obtained a human body

Must look after his own interests.

2. Vyādmātakasaṃjñā

The yogin goes to a dead body (mṛtaśarīra) and sees this corpse bloated (vyādhmātaka) like a leather bag blown up by the wind and quite different from what it was originally. He feels disgust (nirveda) and fear of it and says to himself: “My body too will be like that and will not escape this end. In this body a sovereign consciousness governed it, saw, heard, spoke, committed wrong deeds (āpatti), won merits (puṇya) and used it as it pleased: where has it gone? Now I see only an empty house (śūnyagrha). This body had fine features (lakṣaṇa): a fine waist, nice shoulders, long eyes, a straight nose, a smooth forehead, arched eyebrows, and all these beautiful things troubled men’s hearts; now I see only a swollen thing: where has its beauty gone? The characteristics of man or woman (puruṣastrīnimita), they too, are unrecognizable.”

Having made this meditation, the yogin condemns any attachment to lust (rāgādhyavasāna). Indeed, this bloated sack of rotten excrement is detestable; how could it evoke any lust?

3. Vidhūtakaṣaṃjñā

With the heat of the wind, the corpse gets bloated and lies on the ground, split open and broken up (vidhūtaka). The five viscera ooze forth excrement (viṣ), urine (mūtra), pus (pīya) and blood (śoṇita) and a repugnant liquid appears.

The yogin grasps this ‘notion of the torn-up corpse’ (vidhūtakaṣaṃjñā) and compares his own body to it, saying to himself: “I too, in the same way, contain all these horrible things; how am I any different? I was very foolish to allow myself to be seduced by this fine skin, a simple sack of excrement. Like moths (adhipātika) flying into the fire,³⁰⁷ I coveted bright colors without knowing that they burn the body. At last I have seen this split and torn corpse in which the male and female characteristics (puruṣastrīnimita) have disappeared. Everything that I was attached to is nothing but that.”

4. Vilohitakaṣaṃjñā

When the corpse is torn up, a ‘jumble of flesh and blood’ (māmsavilohitaka) spreads out.

5. Vinīlakaṣaṃjñā

³⁰⁷ See also below, k. 37, p. 333b17. This is a canonical comparison: cf. Udāna, p. 72: Patanti pajjotam iv’adhipātā, diṭṭhe sute iti h’eke nivīṭṭhā: “Like moths that fall into the flame of a lamp, some people become attached to what they see and hear.”

Sometimes the yogin sees some ‘blueish’ (vinīlaka), yellowish, reddish or even, under the sun’s heat, blackish, spots on the corpse of a flogged man. Grasping all these signs, the yogin contemplates them and says to himself: “Then how is the purity and beauty of the red and white colors to which I am attached different from these?”

6. Vipūyakaṣaṃjñā

The yogin soon sees these blueish, yellowish, reddish and blackish spots which the birds and beasts have not devoured or buried or hidden, putrefy; all kinds of worms develop in it. Seeing all of that, the yogin says to himself: “Once this corpse had lovely colors; the body was smeared with fine makeup, dressed in superb garments and adorned with flowers. Today it is no more than a rotten mass, torn up and ‘putrid’ (vipūyaka): that is its real constitution; the former adornments were nothing but deceptions.”

7. Vikhāditaṣaṃjñā

If the corpse has not been burned or buried but abandoned in a deserted place (kāntāra), it is ‘devoured’ (vikhādita) by the birds and beasts. The crows (kāka) tear out the eyes; the dogs (śvan) share its hands and feet amongst themselves; the jackals (śṛgāla) and wolves (vrka) tear up the belly, and the corpse is completely torn to pieces.³⁰⁸

8. Vikṣiptakaṣaṃjñā

The pieces lying on the ground are more or less complete. Seeing that, the yogin feels disgust (nirveda) and says to himself: “This body, when it was not yet torn to pieces (vidhūtaka), was an object of attachment for people; now that it is torn to pieces and ‘scattered’ (vikṣiptaka), it no longer has its original characteristics and only the pieces are seen: the place where the birds and beasts have devoured is appalling.”

9. Asthisamjñā

³⁰⁸ Cf. Majjima, I, p. 58: Sarīraṃ sīvathikāya chaḍḍitaṃ kākehi vā khajjamānaṃ kulalehi vā khajjamānaṃ gijjhehi vā khajjamānaṃ supāṇehi vā khajjamānaṃ sigālehi vā khajjamānaṃ vividehi vā pāṇakajātehi khajjamānaṃ.

When the birds and animals have gone, when the wind has blown it about and the sun has heated it up, the tendons (snāyu) become detached and the bones (asthi) are scattered, each in a different place. The yogin says to himself: “Once I saw the bodily elements, the combination (sāmagrī) of which formed a body and I was able to distinguish a man or a woman. Now that the corpse has been scattered in different places, the whole body has disappeared and the body itself no longer exists. It is completely different from what it was originally. Where is that which I once loved?”

The body is now white bones (śvetāsthika) scattered in various places. When the birds and beasts have devoured the corpse, there is nothing but bones. When one contemplates this skeleton (asthisamkhalikā), there is the ‘notion of the corpse reduced to bones’ (asthisamjñā).

There are two kinds of skeletons (asthisamkhalikā): i) the skeleton in which the tendons and bones are still attached (snāyvasthisambandha); ii) the skeleton in which the tendons and bones are separated (apagatāsthināyusambandha).³⁰⁹ The skeleton in which the tendons and bones are still attached already excludes the notions of male or female (puruṣastrī), of tall or short (dīrghahrasva), of fine colors, of slenderness and gentleness (sūkṣmaślakṣaṇa). That in which the tendons and bones are separated excludes the original notion (maulasamjñā) of human being (sattva).

Furthermore, there are two kinds of bones (asthi): i) beautiful (śubha) bones, and ii) ugly (aśubha) bones. The beautiful bones are those that are always white, free of blood (lohita) and fat (vasā), the color of which is like white snow. The ugly bones are those where the bloody (vilohitaka) and greasy remains have not yet disappeared.

10. Vidagdhakasamjñā

The yogin goes to a charnel-ground (śmaśāna) and sees that sometimes piles of grass and wood have been collected and that corpses are being burned. The belly bursts open, the eyes pop out, the skin burns and becomes blackened; it is truly dreadful. In a moment (muhūrta), the corpse becomes ashes (bhasman). The yogin grasps this ‘notion of the burned corpse’ (vidagdhakasamjñā) and says to himself: “Before he died, he bathed this body in perfumes and gave himself up to the five objects of enjoyment (kāmaguṇa); now it is burned in the fire, it is worse than if he had suffered the soldier’s sword (śastra). Immediately after death, this corpse still resembled a man, but as soon as it is burned, its original marks (maulanimitta) have all disappeared. All physical (dehin) beings end up in impermanence (anityatā). I too will be like that.”

³⁰⁹ Cf. Dīgha, II, p. 296; Majjhima, I, p. 58, 89; III, p. 92; Saṃyutta, II, p. 255; Anguttara, III, p. 324:

Sarīraṃ sīvathikāya chaḍḍitaṃ, aṭṭhikasāṅkhalikaṃ samamsalohitaṃ nahārusambandhaṃ, aṭṭhikasāṅkhalikaṃ nimmaṃsaṃ lohitamakkhitaṃ nahārusambandhaṃ, aṭṭhikasāṅkhalikaṃ apagatamaṃsalohitaṃ nahārusambandhaṃ, aṭṭhikāni apagatasambadhāni.

These nine notions destroy the negative emotions (kleśa) and are very powerful in destroying lust (rāgaprahāṇāya). It was to destroy lust that [the Buddha] preached the nine notions.³¹⁰

III. CONNECTION BETWEEN THE NINE AND THE TEN NOTIONS

Question. – What do the ten notions (daśasamjñā)³¹¹ beginning with the notion of impermanence (anityasamjñā) destroy?

Answer. – They also serve to destroy the three poisons (triviṣa), lust (rāga), etc.

Question. – If that is so, how do these two groups differ?

Answer. – 1) The nine notions prevent those who have not attained the dhyānas and the samāpattis from being enveloped (praticchanna) by lust (rāga). The ten notions remove and destroy the three poisons, lust, etc.

2) The nine notions are like the enemy who puts [the three negative emotions] in chains. The ten notions are like the enemy who kills them.

3) The nine notions are a beginner’s practice (pūrvāśikṣā). The ten notions are a perfected practice (sampannaśikṣā).

4) Of the ten notions, [the seventh], that of the horrible (aśubhasamjñā), includes (samgrhṇāti) the nine notions [called ‘of the horrible’].

Some say that, of the ten notions, [the seventh, the fourth and the fifth], namely, the notion of impurity (aśucisamjñā), the notion of the loathsome nature of food (āhāre pratikūlasamjñā) and the notion of displeasure in regard to the world (sarvaloke ’nabhiratisamjñā), include the nine notions.

Others say that the ten and the nine notions are equally detachment (vairāgya) and, together, nirvāṇa.³¹² Why?

³¹⁰ The Buddha said in several places (Anguttara, III, p. 446; IV, p. 353, 358) that the horrible should be cultivated in order to destroy lust (aśubhā bhāvetabbā rāgassa pahāṇāya). The fact remains that the horrible does not destroy the negative emotions but merely weakens them (Kośavyākhyā, p. 526: Nāśubhayā kleśaprahāṇaṃ viṣkaṃbhaṇamātraṃ tu bhavati), for, as an act of attention on an imaginary object (adhimuktimanasikāra), it is impure (sāsrava) and only meditations that entail the view of the sixteen aspects of the noble truths cut through the negative emotions. Cf. Kośa, VI, p. 150; Satyasiddhiśāstra, T 1646, k. 16, p. 367b1-2.

³¹¹ These ten notions will be the subject of chapter XXXVII.

³¹² In regard to the five or the seven notions, the Buddha said (Anguttara, III, p. 79, 80; IV, p. 46, 48-51): Imā kho bhikkhave saññā bhāvitā bahukikatā mahaoohalā honti mahānisaṃsā aamatohadhā

1. When the first signs of death appear, in the time it takes to say it, one is dead already. The body swells up, putrefies, breaks apart, is scattered and everything changes; this is impermanence, anityatā, [the first of the ten notions]. [218a]

2. One was attached to this body but when impermanence has destroyed it, it is dukkha, suffering, [the second of the ten notions].

3. Being impermanence and suffering, it cannot be independent (svatantra): thus it is anātman, non-self, [the third of the ten notion].

4. Being impure (āsuci), impermanent (anitya), suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anātman), it is anabhirata, an object of displeasure, [the fifth of the ten notions]. This is the meditation on the body (kāyabhāvana).

5. When food (āhāra) is in the mouth (mukha), the cervical saliva (siṅghāṇaka) runs down and, together with the mucus (kheṭa), becomes flavor (rasa), but swallowing (abhyavahāra) is no different from vomiting (vāntikṛta), and penetrates the stomach (udara): hence āhāre pratikūlasaṃjñā, the notion of the repugnant nature of food, [the fourth of the ten notions].

6. When the yogin makes use of the nine notions [of the horrible] to meditate on the impermanent (anitya), changing (vipariṇāmadharman) body that perishes from moment to moment (kṣaṇaniruddha), there is maraṇasaṃjñā, the notion of death, [the sixth of the ten notions].

7. When the yogin uses the nine notions to become disgusted with the joys of the world (lokanirvedāya) and knows that suppression of the negative emotions (kleśaprahāna) is salvation (yogaḥṣema) and peace (kṣānti), there is prahāṇasaṃjñā, the notion of cutting, [the eighth of the ten notions].

8. When the yogin uses the nine notions to oppose the negative emotions (kleśapratishedhāya), there is vairāgyasaṃjñā, the notion of detachment, [the ninth of the ten notions].

9. When, by using the nine notions, the yogin becomes disgusted with the world (lokanirvinna) and knows that the destruction of the five aggregates (pañcaskandhanirodha) and the fact that they will not re-arise (apunarbhava) constitutes abiding (vihāra) and salvation (yogaḥṣema), there is nirodhasaṃjñā, the notion of suppression,³¹³ [the tenth of the ten notions].

5) Moreover, the nine notions are the cause (hetu), while the ten notions are the fruit (phala). This is why the [Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] speaks of the nine notions first and then the ten notions.

amatapariyosānā: “These notions have great results if they are cultivated and gathered, they present great benefits, they plunge one into immortality, they lead to immortality.”

³¹³ Cf. Saṃyutta, V, p. 133: Nirodhasaññā bhikkhave bhāvitā bahulikā mahato atthāya saṃvattati, mahato yogakkhemāya saṃvattati, mahato samvegāya saṃvattati, mahato phāsuvihārāya saṃvattati: “The notion of destruction, if cultivated and increased, leads to great benefit, to great security, to great discipline, to comfortable abiding.”

6) Finally, the nine notions are the outer gate (bāhyadvāra) while the ten notions are the inner gate (ādhyātmikadvāra). This is why the sūtras speak of the two gates of the immortal (amṛtadvāra), i.e., that of meditation on the horrible (aśubhabhāvana) and that of attention to the breath (ānāpānasmṛti).³¹⁴

IV. RESULTS OF THE NINE NOTIONS

1. Rejection of the seven types of lust

These nine notions [of the horrible] eliminate the seven types of lust (saptavidha rāga) in people.³¹⁵

1) There are people who are attached to colors (varṇa), red (lohita), white (avadāta), reddish-white (śvetarakta), yellow (pīṭa), black (kṛṣṇa).

³¹⁴ Cf. Itivuttaka, p. 80: Asubhānupassī bhikkhave kāyasmim viharatha ... vitakkāsyā vighātapakkkhā te na honti. “Remain, O monks, in the contemplation of the horrible in the body and let the attention to the breath be inwardly well established in you... If you remain contemplating the horrible in the body, the perverse tendencies to beauty will be suppressed and if attention to the breath is inwardly well established in you, the perverse troublesome tendencies to think of outer things will no longer exist.”

This is why, in the words of the Kośa, VI, p. 148-149 and of the Nyāyānusāra (T 1562, k.59, p. 671a), “Entry into bhāvanā occurs by contemplation of the horrible or attention to the breathing” (tatrāvatāro ‘śubhayā cānāpānasmṛtena ca). Those of passionate nature (rāgādhika) enter by way of aśubha which is directed outwardly (bahirmukha); those who are of rational nature (vitarkādhika), by way of ānāpānasmṛti which, not being directed outwards, cuts vitarka.

³¹⁵ Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 40, p. 207c10-13: “Although aśubhabhāvanā concerns only visibles (rūpa), it counteracts lust (rāga) in regard to the six sense objects. Thus, those who are prey to lust for visibles (rūpa) eliminate the latter by practicing aśubhabhāvanā; those who are prey to lust for sounds (śabda) eliminate the latter by practicing aśubhabhāvanā, etc.”

Kośa, VI, p. 149; Kośavyākhyā, p. 526; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 59, p. 671a18-20: The nine notions are in opposition to fourfold rāga: lust for colors (varṇa), shapes (saṃsthāna), touch (sparsa) and honors (upacāra).

Here the Traité departs from classic scholasticism: for it, the nine notions are horrors opposed to the seven kinds of rāga: lust for colors (varṇa), shapes (saṃsthāna), postures (īryāpatha), fine language (vāda), pleasant touch (sparsa), of all five at once, and finally of the human appearance. Undoubtedly the Traité was inspired by the Tch'an yao king ‘Summary sūtra on the dhyānas’ (T 609), wrongly thought to be an anonymous translation by the Han, where these kinds of lust are mentioned (k. 1, p. 237c19-21).

The same classification of rāga is adopted by Kumārajīva in his Tch'an fa yao kiai ‘Summary explanation of the dhyāna method’ (T 616, k. 1, p. 286b16-18), an original work that he composed between 402 and 405, during which time he was busy with his translation of the Traité. On this subject, see P. Demiéville, La Yogācārabhūmi de Saṅgarakṣa, p. 354.

2) There are people who are not attached to colors but who are attached only to shapes (saṃsthāna), delicate skin, tapered fingers, expressive eyes, arched eyebrows.

3) There are people who are not attached to either colors or shapes, but who are attached only to postures (īryāpatha), ways of entering, of stopping, sitting, rising, walking, standing, bowing, raising or lowering the head, raising the eyebrows, winking the eye, approaching, holding an object in the hand.

4) There are people who are not attached to colors or shapes or postures, but who are only attached to language, soft sounds, elegant words, speech appropriate to the circumstance, replying to a thought, honoring orders, capable of moving people's hearts.

5) There are people who are not attached to colors or shapes or positions or soft sounds, but who are only attached to fine smooth [furs], gentle to the skin, softening the flesh, refreshing the body in the heat and warming it in the cold.

6) There are people who are attached to all five things listed above at once.

7) There are people who are not attached to these five things but who are only attached to the human appearance, male or female. Even if they were to enjoy the five lusts (kāma) mentioned above, when they come to lose the loved person, they refuse to separate from them and they renounce the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) so esteemed by the world so as to follow their loved one in death.

[But the nine notions of the horrible reject these seven kinds of lust]:

1. The notion of death (maraṇasaṃjñā) eliminates lust for postures (īryāpatharāga) and lust for fine language (vādarāga) in particular.

2. The notion of the bloated corpse (vyādhmātakaṣaṃjñā), the notion of the torn-up corpse (vidhūtakaṣaṃjñā) and the notion of the scattered corpse eliminate lust for shapes (saṃsthānarāga) in particular.

3. The notion of the bloody corpse (vilohitakaṣaṃjñā), the notion of the blueish corpse (vinīlakaṣaṃjñā) and the notion of the rotting corpse (vipūyakaṣaṃjñā) eliminate the lust for colors (varṇarāga) in particular.

4. The notion of the corpse reduced to bones (asthisamjñā) and the notion of the burned corpse (vidagdhakaṣaṃjñā) eliminate the lust for fine and gentle touch (sūkṣmaślakṣṇaspraṣṭavayarāga) in particular.³¹⁶

Thus the nine notions eliminate these various lusts and also lust for the loved person. But it is the notion of the devoured corpse (vikhāditaṣaṃjñā), the notion of the burned corpse (vidagdhakaṣaṃjñā) and the notion of the corpse reduced to bones (asthisamjñā) that preferentially eliminate lust for an individual because it is hard to see how a person can be attached to devoured, scattered or white bony remains (śvatāsthika).

³¹⁶ 'Soft' is one of the eleven kinds of touch: cf. Kośa, I, p. 18.

2. Diminishing of hatred and delusion

By means of the meditation on the nine notions, the minds of lust [218b] (rāga) are eliminated, but hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha) are also decreased. If one is attached to the body, it is because of delusion (moha), an error consisting of taking what is impure to be pure (āśucau śucir iti viparyāsaḥ).³¹⁷ But now, with the help of the nine notions [of the horrible], the interior of the body is analyzed and the [impure] nature of the body is seen. From now on, error (mohacitta) decreases; as error decreases, lust (rāga) diminishes and, as lust diminishes, hatred (dveṣa) also decreases. It is because a person loves their own body that they experience hatred [when the latter is menaced]. But now that the yogin has contemplated the impurities (āśuci) of his own body and is disgusted (nirvinna) by them, he no longer loves his own body and, not loving his own body, he does not have hatred [when the latter is menaced].

3. Realization of great benefits

As the threefold poison (triviṣa) [of lust, hate and delusion] decreases, the entire mountain of the ninety-eight perverted tendencies (anuśaya) is shaken and the yogin gradually (kramaśas) progresses towards Bodhi. Finally, by the diamond-like concentration (vajropamasamādhi),³¹⁸ he breaks the mountain of the fetters (saṃyojana) to pieces.

Although the nine notions are meditations on the horrible (āsubhabhāvanā), one depends on them to realize great benefits (mahānuśaṃsa). Similarly, when a repulsive corpse is floating in the sea, the shipwrecked sailor clings to it to save himself from the waves.

V. NATURE, OBJECT AND DISTRIBUTION OF THE NINE NOTIONS

Question. – What is the intrinsic nature (svabhāva) of these nine notions, what is their object (ālambana) and where are they contained (saṃgrhāta)?³¹⁹

³¹⁷ The third of the four errors.

³¹⁸ See above, p. 242F and note, 940F, 986F, 1068F.

³¹⁹ These questions are dealt with in detail in Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 40, p. 206c; Kośa, VI, p. 152; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, K. 59, p. 672b. Āsubhā has as its nature the absence of desire (alobha). The ascetic can produce it in ten levels: kāmādhātu, dhyānantara, the four dhyānas and their four respective sāmāntakas. The object of āsubhā is the visible – color and shape – in the realm of rūpadhātu. Only men produce it. For its aspect (ākāra) it has the horrible and therefore does not show the sixteen aspects of the noble truths, impermanence, etc. As it is the act of attentiveness on an imaginary object (adhimuktimanasikāra), it is impure (sāsrava). Finally, it may be acquired either by detachment

Answer. – As their nature, they have the grasping of characteristics (nimittodgrahaṇa); they are contained in the aggregate of form (rūpaskandha).

They are also contained in a small part of the foundation of mindfulness on the body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna),³²⁰ in the desire realm (kāmadhātu) or also in the first, second and fourth dhyāna.

The person who has not yet renounced desire (avītarāga) and who has a distracted mind (vikṣiptacitta) belongs to the domain of the desire realm (kāmadhātvavacara); the person who has renounced desire (vītarāga) belongs to the domain of the form realm (rūpadhātvavacara).

Eight notions, those of the bloated corpse (vyādmātaka), etc., are contained in kāmadhātu and the first and second dhyānas. The notion of pure bone (asthisamjñā) is contained in kāmadhātu, the first second and fourth dhyānas. As there is a great deal of happiness (sukha) in the third dhyāna, this one is exempt from the notion of horror.

VI. THE PLACE OF THE NINE NOTIONS IN THE DHARMAS OF THE PATH

These nine notions open the gate of the foundation of mindfulness on the body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna). Mindfulness of the body opens the gate of the other three foundations of mindfulness. The four foundations of mindfulness open the gate of the thirty-seven auxiliaries to enlightenment (bodhipāṅśhika dharma). The thirty-seven auxiliaries to enlightenment open the gate to the city of nirvāṇa.³²¹ Entering into nirvāṇa, the suffering of sadness, sorrow, etc. (śokadaurmanasyādiduḥkha) are eliminated and, as the process of interdependency of the five aggregates (pañcaskandhapartītyasamutpāda) has been destroyed, one enjoys the eternal bliss of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇanītyasukha).

(vairagya) or by practice (prayoga). The Kośakārikā, VI, II, condenses all this into one line: alobho daśabhūh kāmadṛśyālamkā nṛjāśubhā.

³²⁰ This is why the meditation on the horrible is found in the sūtras dedicated to the smṛtyupasthānas, e.g., Majjhima, I, p. 58.

³²¹ On the city of nirvāṇa, see above, p. 1150F, 1231F.

Second Section THE NINE NOTIONS ACCORDING TO THE MAHĀYANA (p. 1327F)

Question. –The śrāvaka who meditates [on the nine notions] in this way experiences disgust (nirveda) and wants to enter nirvāṇa quickly. But the bodhisattva has compassion for all beings; he gathers all the attributes of the Buddha, saves all beings and does not seek to enter nirvāṇa quickly. Then, by meditating on these nine notions, why does he not fall into the class of an adept of the first two Vehicles, [i.e., that of the śrāvakas and of the pratyekabuddhas]?

Answer. – The bodhisattva feels compassion for beings. He knows that, because of the three poisons (triviṣa) [passion, aggression and ignorance], beings experience mental and physical suffering (caitasikakāyikaduḥkha) in the present lifetime (iha janmani) and in the future lifetime (paratra). The three poisons are not destroyed by themselves, and there is no other way to destroy them than to contemplate the inner and outer physical characteristics (ādhyātmikabāhyakāyanimitta) to which one is attached [but that are repulsive]. The three poisons are destroyed only after this contemplation. That is why the bodhisattva who wants to destroy the poison of lust (rāgaviṣa) contemplates the nine notions [so as to teach them to beings]. The bodhisattva is like a person who, out of compassion for the ill, gathers all the medicines (bhaiṣajya) to cure them. To beings who love colors (varṇarakta), the bodhisattva preaches the notion of the blueish corpse (vinīlakasamjñā) and, according to that to which they are attached, he explains the other notions [of the horrible] of which we have spoken above. This is how the bodhisattva practices the meditation on the horrible (aśubhabhāvanā). [218c]

Furthermore, the bodhisattva who is practicing these nine notions with a mind of great compassion (mahākaruṇacitta) has the following thought: “Not completely possessing all the attributes of the Buddha, I do not enter into nirvāṇa: this would be using only one gate of the Dharma (ekadharmadvāra); but I should not keep to a single gate, I should use all the gates of the Dharma.” This is why the bodhisattva practices the nine notions without any restriction.

When the bodhisattva practices these nine notions, it may happen that thoughts of disgust (nirvedacitta) rise up in him and he may say: “This horrible body is hateful and miserable: I want to enter nirvāṇa.” Then the bodhisattva has the following thought: “The Buddhas of the ten directions have said that all dharmas are empty of nature (lakṣaṇaśūnya). But in emptiness, there is no impermanence (anītya): then how (kaḥ punarvādah) could there be impurities (aśuci)? This meditation on the horrible is practiced only to destroy the error consisting of taking [what is impure] to be pure (aśucau iti viparyāsaḥ). These horrors (aśubha) that come from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī) are without any intrinsic nature (niḥsvabhāva) and all end up in emptiness. And so I cannot cling (udgrah-) to these horrors (aśubhadharma) that come from a complex of causes and conditions and are without intrinsic nature to allow me to enter into nirvāṇa.”

[Āsvādasūtra] – Moreover, it is said in a sūtra: “If there were no satisfaction (āsvāda) derived from the visible (rūpa), beings would not be attached to the visible; but because there is satisfaction deriving from the visible, beings are attached to the visible. If there were no defects (ādīnava) in the visible, beings would not be revolted by the visible; but because there are defects in the visible people are revolted by the visible. If there were no exit (nihsaraṇa) from the visible, beings would not come out of the visible; but because there is an exit from the visible, beings come out of the visible.”³²²

Therefore satisfaction (āsvāda) is the cause and condition of pure notions (śubhasaṃjñā). This is why the bodhisattva does not pay attention to the horrible and abstains from entering nirvāṇa prematurely.³²³

This ends the explanations of the nine notions.

³²² Assādasutta, no. 3, in Saṃyutta, p. 29-30. Tsa a han, T 99, no. 13, k. 1, p. 2b15-c10): No cedam bhikkhave rūpassa assādo abhavissa ... rūpassa nissaraṇaṃ, tasmā sattā rūpasmā nissaranti.

³²³ By considering pleasant visibles and then determining their defects (ādīnava), the bodhisattva accounts for the fact that they are completely empty (śūnya), without nature and, from the point of view of the true nature of things, unworthy of acceptance or rejection. The meditation on the horrible thus leaves him quite cold and in no way encourages him to hasten into nirvāṇa, as is the case for the śrāvaka. Personally, he does not believe in these horrors, but he preaches them to those whom he judges to be too attached to visibles. Briefly, preaching the horrible is one of the skillful means (upāya) used by the bodhisattva to ripen beings.

CHAPTER XXXVI: THE EIGHT RECOLLECTIONS (p. 1329F)

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The tenth class of supplementary dharma to be fulfilled (paripūrayitavya) by the bodhisattva is made up of the eight recollections (anusmṛti, in Pāli, anussati).

I. LISTS OF RECOLLECTIONS

The lists of anussati and anusmṛti presented by the Pāli Nikāyas and the Sanskrit Āgamas respectively coincide general and here only the first will be mentioned:

A. THREE ANUSSATI in Dīgha, III, p. 5; Saṃyutta, I, p. 219-220; IV, p.304; Anguttara, I, p. 222:

1) Buddha;- 2) Dhamma;- 3) Sangha-anussati.

B. FOUR SOTAPATTIYANGA, practically identical with the anussati, by means of which the noble disciples (ariyasāvaka), inspired by perfect faith (aveccappasādena samannāgata), give evidence of their respect for the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Sangha and the Discipline (Śīla) of the saints. – Cf. Dīgha, II, p. 93-94; III, p. 227; Saṃyutta, II, p. 69-70; V, p. 343, 365, 386-387; Anguttara, II, p. 56; III, p. 212-213; IV, p. 416-407; V, p. 183-184.

C. FIVE ANUSSATI in Anguttara, I, p. 207-211: 1) Buddha;- 2) Dhamma;- 3) Sangha;- 4) Śīla;- 5) Devatā-anussati.

The six and the ten anussati are mentioned in the Paṭisambhidā, I, on p. 28 and 95 respectively. They are commented on at length in Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 189-243 (transl. Nanamoli, p. 204-320).

II. CANONICAL DEFINITIONS OF THE SIX ANUSMṚTI

1. Buddhānusmṛti

Pāli formula: Anguttara, III, p. 285; V, p. 329: Idha ariyasāvako Tathāgataṃ anussarati ... devamanussānaṃ buddho bhagavā ti.

Sanskrit formula: passim. Iti hi sa Bhagavān tathāgato 'rhān ...śāstā devamanuṣyānaṃ buddho bhagavān.

Transl. – First the holy disciple recollects the Tathāgata, saying: Yes, this Blessed One, fully and completely enlightened, endowed with knowledge and practice, well-come, knower of the world, supreme leader of men to be tamed, instructor of gods and men, the awakened one, the blessed one, is worthy of homage.

2. Dharmānusmṛti

Pāli formula: Anguttara, III, p. 285; V, p. 329: Puna ca paraṃ ariyadhammaṃ anussarati ... paccattaṃ veditabbo viññuhī ti.

Sanskrit formula: Mahāvastu, III, p. 200, 1.9-11; Mahāvvyut., no. 1291-1297: Svākyāto Bhagavato dharmah sāmḍrṣṭiko ... pratyātmavedanīyo vijñaiḥ.

Transl. – Then the holy disciple recollects the Dharma, saying: The Dharma has been well enunciated by the Blessed One: it receives its retribution in the present lifetime; it is without frenzy; it is independent of time; it leads to the good place; it says “Come and see”; it is cognizable inwardly by the wise.

The present translation departs somewhat from the Pāli commentaries: see Manorathapūraṇī, II, p. 256, 333.

3. Samghānusmṛti

Pāli formula: Anguttara, III, p. 186; V, p. 330: Puna ca paraṃ ariyasāvako saṅghaṃ ... anuttaraṃ puññakkhettaṃ lokassā ti.

Sanskrit formula reconstituted by the help of the Mahāvvyut., no. 1119, 11220, 1121, 1122, 1772, 1773: Supratipanno Bhagavataḥ śravakaṃgaḥ ... 'nuttaraṃ puṇyakṣetraṃ lokasya.

Transl. – Then the holy disciple recollects the Community, saying: Of good conduct is the Community of the Blessed One's disciples; of logical conduct is the Community of the disciples of the Blessed One; of correct conduct is the Community of disciples of the Blessed One, namely, the four pairs of individuals, the eight classes of individuals. This Community of disciples of the Blessed One is worthy of sacrifice, is worthy of offerings, is worthy of alms, is worthy of being greeted with joined palms: this is the best field of merit for the world.

4. Śīlānusmṛti

Pāli formula: Anguttara, III, p. 286; V, p. 330: Puna ca paraṃ ariyasāvako attano sīlāni ... aparāmaṭṭhāni samādhisaṃvattanikāni.

Sanskrit formula reconstituted according to the Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, p. 132 and the Mahāvvyut., no. 1619, 1621, 1622-27: Śīlāny akhaṇḍāny acchidrāny ... vijñaprasāstāny agarhitāni vijñaiḥ.

Transl. of the Pāli. – Furthermore, the holy disciple recollects the correct precepts unbroken, without cracks, unstained, without spots, liberating, praised by the wise, free of thoughtless attachment [to his own benefit], leading to meditative stabilization.

Transl. of the Sanskrit. – Precepts without breakage, without cracks, without stains, without spots, liberating, without attachment [to one's own benefit], well achieved, well taken up, praised by the wise, not blamed by the wise.

5. Tyāgānusmṛti

Pāli formula: Anguttara, III, p. 287; V, 331: Puna ca paraṃ ariyasāvako attano cāgaṃ ... yācayogo dānasamvibhāgarato ti.

Transl. – Furthermore, the holy disciple recollects his own renunciation (i.e., his own generosity), saying: This is a gain for me, this is a great gain for me, for me in the midst of people who are prey to avarice, to living at home, my mind free of the stain of greed, giving freely, my hand extended, happy to give gifts, accessible to requests, happy to distribute gifts.

6. Devatānusmṛti

Pāli formula: Anguttara, III, p. 287; V, p. 331-332: Puna ca paraṃ ariyasāvako devatānussatiṃ bhāveti ... mayham pi tathārūpā paññā samvijjati ti.

Transl. - Furthermore, the holy disciple practices the recollection of the deities, saying: There are the Caturmahārājika, Trāyastriṃśa, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmānaratin, Paranirmitavaśavartin gods. There are the Brahmakāyika gods and the higher gods. It is because they were endowed with such faith, such discipline, such generosity and such wisdom that these deities, having left this world, have been reborn there [in their paradise]. This same faith, this same discipline, this same learning, this same generosity and this same wisdom is in me as well.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 20, l. 2-5; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 59, l. 20-60, l. 15). – [The following should be cultivated (bhāvitavyā) by the bodhisattva]:

- 1) recollection of the Buddha (buddhānusmṛti),
- 2) recollection of the Dharma (dharmānusmṛti),
- 3) recollection of the Community (saṃghānusmṛti),
- 4) recollection of discipline (śīlānusmṛti),
- 5) recollection of abandonment (tyāgānusmṛti),
- 6) recollection of the deities (devatānusmṛti),
- 7) recollection of inhalation and exhalation (ānāpānasmṛti),
- 8) recollection of death (maraṇānusmṛti).

First Section POSITION AND RESULTS OF THE RECOLLECTIONS (p. 1335F)

I. POSITION OF THE RECOLLECTIONS IN THE PRAJÑĀPĀRAMITĀ

Question. – Why do the eight recollections follow the nine notions [of the horrible] [in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra]?

Answer. – In a forest (araṇya), an empty house (śūnyāgāra), a charnel-ground (śmaśāna), a mountain (giri), a woods (vana) or a desert (kāntāra), the disciples of the Buddha who are meditating properly on the nine notions and who are practicing the meditation on the inner and outer horrors (adhyātmabahirdhāśubhahāvanā) feel disgust for the body and say to themselves: “Why do we carry around this vile and horrible sack of excrement (viṣ) and urine (mūtra)?” They are pained and frightened by it. Also there is wicked Māra (Māra pāpīyat) who plays all kinds of evil tricks on them and who comes to frighten them in hopes of making them regress. This is why the Buddha, [in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra], continues by explaining the eight recollections.

[Dhvajāgrasūtra].³²⁴ – Thus, in a sūtra, the Buddha said to the bhikṣus: When you are meditating in a forest, an empty house, a charnel-ground, a mountain, a woods or a desert, and you experience fear (bhaya), trembling (chambhitatva) or exasperation (romaharṣa), then recollect the Buddha, thinking: [219a] Yes, he is the Tathāgata ‘thus come’, Arhat ‘worthy of homage’, Samyakṣambuddha ‘completely and fully enlightened’, [Vidyācaraṇasaṃpanna ‘endowed with knowledge and practice’, Sugata ‘well-come’, Lokavid ‘knower of the world’, Anuttaraḥ puruṣadamyasārathiḥ ‘supreme leader of beings to be tamed’, 324 The Sūtra on the “Top of the Standard” is well known. At Śrāvastī in the Jetavana in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada, the Buddha advised the monks who were afraid of solitude to recollect the Buddha, the Dharma or the Saṃgha, a recollection the nature of which could dispel their fear. For this purpose, he related to them how once the god Śakra advised his devas who were in battle against the Asuras to think of his standard or that of Iśāna or Varuṇa in order to conquer their fears.

The sūtra in question is known in several versions in Sanskrit, Pāli, Chinese and Tibetan. They have been studied by E. Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke buddh. Sūtras, p. 43-54:

A. Dhvajāgrasūtra, restored on the basis of manuscripts from Central Asia by E. Waldschmidt, Kleine Brāhmī-Schriftrolle, Nachrichten der Akad. der Wissenschaften in Göttingen, 1959, no. 1, p. 8-18.

B. Tch'ouang king, in Tsa a han, T 99, no. 981, k. 35, p. 255a25-b14.

C. Mdo chen po rgyal mtshan dam pa (Dhvajāgranāmamahāsūtra), OKC no. 959 (Tib. Trip., vol. 38, p.285-5-1 to 285-3-5).

D. Dhvajaggasutta, in Saṃyutta, I, p. 218-220.

E. Kao tch'ouang king, in Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 14, p. 615a6-b6.

The Sūtra of the “Top of the Standard” should be compared and, on occasion, completed by another sūtra the title of which is poorly defined. Coming from the land of the Vṛji, the Buddha stayed at Vaiśālī at the Markaṭahrada, in the Kūṭāgāraśālā. Invited by some embarking merchants who were fearful of the dangers of the journey, he advised them also to recollect the Buddha, the Dharma or the Saṃgha in order to conquer their fears. To this end, he reminded them of the advice once given by Śakra to his devas. This sūtra, a simple variant of the preceding one, is attested by a Chinese version and a Tibetan version:

F. P'i chō li kou k'o king “Sūtra of the Vaiśālī merchants”, in Tsa a han, T 99, no. 980, k. 35, p. 254c2-255a24.

G. Mdo chen po rgyal mtshan mchog (Dhvajāgranamamahāsūtra), OKC no. 958 (Tib. Trip., vol. 38, p. 283-2-3 to 284-5-1).

In sources A, B, C, F, G, the advice addressed by the Buddha to his monks precedes the recommendations once given by Śakra to the devas; in sources D and E, it is the reverse.

The version of the Dhvajāgrasūtra given here by the Traité is very close to sources A and B, but slightly more developed.

Śāstā devamanuṣyāṇām ‘teacher of gods and men’, Buddha ‘awakened’ and Bhagavat ‘blessed’. Your fears will immediately disappear.³²⁵

If you do not recollect the Buddha, you should recollect the Dharma saying: The Dharma of the Buddha is pure (pariśuddha), skillfully announced, well said (svākhyāta), receiving its retribution in the present lifetime (sāmdrṣṭika), offering itself to be shared (veditavyo vijñāih). If you recollect the Dharma thus, your fear will immediately disappear.

If you do not recollect the Dharma, you should recollect the Saṃgha, saying: The Community of disciples of the Buddha (buddhaśrāvakaṣaṃgha) cultivates the proper path (rjupratipanna) and acts in accordance with the instructions (sāmīcipratipanna). In this Community, there are arhats and candidates for the fruit of arhat (arhatphalapatipannaka) and so on, down to srotaāpannas and candidates for the fruit of srotaāpanna (srotaāpannaphalapatipannaka): thus four pairs of individuals (catvāri puruṣayugāni) or eight classes of individuals (aṣṭau puruṣapudgalāḥ). This Community of disciples of the Buddha is worthy of offerings (dakṣiṇīya), worthy of being greeted with joined palms (añjalikaraṇīya), venerated (arcanīya), saluted and welcomed: for the world, it is the supreme field of merit (anuttaraṃ puṇyakṣetraṃ lokasya). If you commemorate the Community thus, your fears will immediately disappear.

The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: In the struggle against the asuras, in the midst of a great battle (saṃgāma), Devendra said to his army of devas: When you are struggling against the asuras and you feel afraid, recollect my standard made of seven jewels (mama saptaratnamayo dhvajah samanasmartavyah) and immediately your fear will disappear. If you do not recollect my standard, recollect the precious standard of devaputra Yi-chō-na (Iśāna) [Kumārajīva’s note: the devaputra who is on the left of Indra-Śakra]. At once your fear will disappear. If you do not recollect the precious standard of Iśāna, recollect the standard of devaputra P'o-leou-na (Varuṇa) [Kumārajīva’s note: the devaputra to the right of Indra]. At once your fear will disappear.

From that we know that [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] continues its account here by speaking of the eight recollections as the means to drive away fear.

II. ALL THE RECOLLECTIONS DRIVE AWAY FEAR

Question. – But the [Dhvajāgra]-sūtra mentions only three recollections, [those of the Buddha, the Dharma and the Saṃgha] as the means to drive away fear. Are the other five recollections also able to drive away fear?

325 In the Pāli sutta, Śakra advises the devas to look at his own standard and, that lacking, that of the Prajāpati gods, Varuṇa and Iśāna. In sources E, F, G and here in the Traité, only his own standard and that of Iśāna and Varuṇa are mentioned. Indra, Soma, Varuṇa, Iśāna, Prajāpti, Brahmā, Mahārddhi and Yama are deities invoked by the Brahmins.

Answer. – 1-2) If the bhikṣu thinks about his own virtues of abandonment (tyāga) and discipline (śīla), his fear also disappears. Actually, immoral (duḥśīla) beings fear falling into hell (niraya) and misers (matsarin) fear being reborn among the hungry ghosts (preta) or among poor people (daridra). The bhikṣu himself remembers that he has pure morality (pariśuddhaśīla) and generosity-abandonment (tyāga). If he recollects his pure discipline or his own abandonment, his mind is joyful and he says to himself: “As long as my life (āyus) is not exhausted (kṣīṇa), I will still increase my virtues (guṇa) and, at the end of my life, I will not be afraid of falling into the unfortunate destinies (durgati).” This is why the recollection of discipline (śīlānasmṛti) and the recollection of renunciation (tyāgānasmṛti) can also prevent fear from arising.

3) The bhikṣu remembers that the higher heavens (uttamasvarga) are the fruits of retribution (vipākaphala) resulting from abandonment (tyāga) and discipline (śīla) and that if the deities (devatā) have taken rebirth there, it is precisely because of these merits (puṇya). “I too”, he says to himself, “possess these merits.” This is why the recollection of the deities (devatānasmṛti) also can prevent fear from arising.

4) When the bhikṣu recollects the sixteen ways of breathing (ānāpāna),³²⁶ even the subtle discursiveness (sūkṣmavitarka) disappears; then what can be said (kaḥ punar vādah) of the coarse thoughts (audārikavitarka) [such as fear]?

5) In the recollection of death (marāṇānasmṛti), the bhikṣu says to himself: “The group of the five aggregates (pañcaskandhakāya) arises and perishes in a moment and, from its very birth, it is always associated with death. At this moment, why should I fear death particularly?”

The Buddha did not speak about these five recollections [in the Dhvajāgrasūtra]; nevertheless, they too can drive away fear. Why [did the Buddha not speak of them]? When we think about the qualities (guṇa) of [219b] another, [be they those of the Buddha, the Dharma and the Community], it is difficult to drive away fear. On the other hand, when we think of our own qualities, [those of discipline, generosity, etc.], it is easy to drive away fear. This is why the Buddha did not speak of them [in the Dhvajāgrasūtra].

Second Section THE EIGHT RECOLLECTIONS ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA (p. 1340F)

I. RECOLLECTION OF THE BUDDHA

1. The ten names³²⁷

³²⁶ See above, p. 641-642F.

³²⁷ These ten traditional names (adhivacana) have been studied above, p. 126-144F. Here the Traité adds some new explanations.

Question. - How does one recollect the Buddha?

Answer. –

[1. Tathāgata.] – The yogin thinks of the Buddha one-pointedly (ekacittena): The Buddha has acquired right knowledge (yathābhūtajñāna); he is endowed with great loving-kindness and great compassion (mahāmaitrīmahākaruṇāsamanvāgata). This is why his words (āgata) are infallible (aviparīta): whether they are coarse (audārika) or subtle (sūkṣma), numerous (bahula) or few (alpa), profound (gambhīra) or superficial, there is nothing false in them. Since all his words (āgata) are true (tathā), the Buddha is called TATHĀGATA ‘of true speech’.³²⁸

Past (atīta), future (anāgata) or present (pratyutpanna), the Buddhas of the ten directions feel great compassion (mahākaruṇā) for beings, practice the six perfections (pāramitā) and discover the [true] nature of dharmas: they have reached (āgata) the anuttarasamyaksambodhi. The present Buddha too has arrived (āgata) there in the same way (tathā): this is why he is called TATHĀGATA ‘thus come’.

The body of the Buddhas of the ten directions in the three worlds emits great rays (raśmī) that illumine the ten directions and drive away the shadows (tamas); from their minds there come rays of knowledge that destroy the shadows of ignorance (avidyā) in beings; their virtues (guṇa) and their glory (yaśas) also fill the ten directions: they have gone to nirvāṇa. The present Buddha has also gone (gata) in the same way (tathā): this is why he is called TATHĀGATA ‘thus gone’.

[2. Arhat.] – Because he possesses such qualities (guṇa), the Buddha is entitled (arhati) to the supreme worship (pūjaviśeṣa) of all gods and men: this is why he is called ARHAT ‘entitled to’.

[3. Samyaksambuddha.] – Some ask why only the Buddha “speaks in accordance with the truth” and “has gone” in the same way [as his predecessors] and is “entitled to” supreme worship. It is that the Buddha has obtained samyak-saṃ-bodhi ‘complete perfect enlightenment’: samyak ‘perfect’ insofar as it accords with the immovable indestructible nature (acalākaṣasalakṣaṇa) of all dharmas; saṃ ‘complete’ because, instead of concerning merely one or two dharmas, it completely cognizes all dharmas without exception. This is why the Buddha is called SAMYAKSAMBUDDHA ‘fully and perfectly enlightened’.

[4. Vidyācaraṇasaṃpanna.] – This samyaksambodhi has not been obtained without cause (ahetu) or without condition (apratyaya). Here it is by depending on the perfection (sampad) of knowledge (jñāna) and moral discipline (śīlasaṃvara) that the Buddha has obtained samyaksambodhi.

By knowledge (jñāna) we mean the sciences (vidyā) that the bodhisattva possesses from the time of the first production of the mind of Bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) until reaching the diamond-like samādhi (vajropamasamādhi). Moral discipline (śīlasaṃvara) is the fact that for the bodhisattva, from the first production of the mind of Bodhi until the diamond-like samādhi, his bodily actions (kāyakaṛman) and his vocal actions (vākkarman) are pure (viśuddha) and accomplished as he wishes (yatheṣṭam).

³²⁸ This etymology is valid only in the hypothesis that ‘Tathāgata’ is an erroneous reading for ‘Tathāgata’: cf. Sumaṅgala, p. 66: Evaṃ tathavāditāya Tathāgato. Api ca āgadanam āgato vacanam ti attho. Tatho aviparīto āgato assāti da-kārassa ta-kāraṃ katvā Tathāgat ti.

This is why the Buddha is called VIDYĀCARAṆASAMPANNA ‘endowed with sciences and practices’.

[5. Sugata]. – Going along with this twofold course [of sciences and practices], the Buddha makes good progress (sugati), like a chariot (ratha) that runs well when it has two wheels (cakra). Since the Buddha also goes in this way to the place (sthāna) where the earlier Buddhas have gone (gata), he is called SUGATA ‘well-gone’.

[6. *Loka*vid]. – If someone tells us that the Buddha, using his own qualities (svagūṇa), does not know certain things, for example, the ātman, etc., we answer: It is because he knows the world (loka), the origin of the world (lokasamudaya), the cessation of the world (lokanirodha) and the path that leads to the cessation of the world (lokanirodhagāminīpratipad)³²⁹ that the Buddha is called LOKAVID ‘knower of the world’.

[7. *Anuttara*ḥ *puruṣadamyasārathi*ḥ]. – Knowing the world, the Buddha tames (damayati) beings, and of all the kinds of teachers (ācārya), he is truly [219c] without superior (anuttara): this is why he is called ANUTTARAḤ PURUṢADAMYASĀRATHIḤ ‘supreme leader of those beings to be tamed who are humans’.

[8. Śāstā devamanyuṣyāṇām]. – By means of the three kinds of paths, the Buddha is able to destroy the threefold poison (triviṣa) and make beings travel on the paths of the Three Vehicles (yānatrāya): this is why he is called ŚĀSTĀ DEVAMANUṢYĀÑĀM ‘teacher of gods and men’.

[9. Buddha]. – If someone asks us how the Buddha, who is able to assure his own good (svahita) without limit, is able to assure the good of others (parahita), we answer: Being endowed with omniscience (sarvajñānasamanvāgata), the Buddha cognizes clearly and fully the past (atīta), the future (anāgata) and the present (pratyutpanna), perishable things and imperishable things (kṣarākṣara), moveable things and immoveable things (calācala), the whole world: this is why he is called BUDDHA.

[10. Bhagavat]. – The Buddha who possesses these nine kinds of names (adhivacana) has great glory (mahāyaśas)³³⁰ filling the ten directions: this is why he is called BHAGAVAT ‘the blessed one’.

In the sŪtras, the Buddha himself said that it is necessary to recollect him under these ten names (adhivaraṇa).

2. The miracles of his birth

Furthermore, all the various qualities (guṇa) are found in full in the Buddha:

³²⁹ Anguttara, II, p. 23: Loko bhikkhave Tathāgatena abhisambuddho ... lokasamudayo ... lokanirodha ... lokanirodhagāminī paṭipadā Tathāgatena abhisambuddhā.

³³⁰ Among the six meanings of the word bhaga, the Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 174, l. 25, also mentions that of glory (yaśas).

1) The Buddha is of the lineage of Mo-ho-san-mo-t'o (Mahāsammata), the noble cakravartin king who ruled at the beginning of the kalpa.³³¹ He was born among the Che tseu (Śākya), a wise and powerful family in Yen-fou-t'i (Jambudvīpa) in the clan (gotra) of the noble Kiao-t'an (Gautama).

2) At the time of his birth, rays (raśmi) illumined the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu. Brahmā Devarāja held a precious parasol (ratnacchattra) and Śakra Devendra received him on celestial precious garments (divyaratnavastra).³³² The nāgarāja A-na-p'o-ta-to (Anavatapta) and the nāgarāja P'o-k'ie-to [read So-k'ie-lo (Sāgara)] bathed him with warm perfumed water.³³³

³³¹ He was of the solar race and appears in most of the genealogies of the Buddha: cf. Dīpavaṃsa, III, v. 3; Mahāvamsa, II, v. 1; Mahāvastu, I, p. 348,4.

³³² According to the old canonical tradition (Dīgha, II, p. 14; Sanskrit Mahāvadāna, p. 88; Majjhima, III, p. 122), it is the custom that the Bodhisattva, issuing forth from his mother's womb, is first received by the gods and then by men; before he touches the earth, the four devaputras take him and present him to his mother. - According to the Nidānakathā (Jātaka, I, p. 52-53) the four Mahābrahmās of pure mind received the Bodhisattva on a golden net (suvannjāla), the four heavenly Maharājas on antelope skins (ajinappaveni), and finally humans on a roll of fine linen cloth (dukūlacumbāṭaka). - According to the Lalitavistara, p. 83, Śakra Devendra and Brahmā Sahāpati covered him with a heavenly garment made of Benares cloth (divyakāśikavastra). This last version, the most common in the literature, is adopted here by the Traité.

³³³ Although the Bodhisattva came from his mother's womb completely clean, he underwent the traditional bathing ceremony of the newborn. But as Foucher, La Vie du Buddha, p. 49-50, comments, the tradition of the bath is very variable:

1) Two currents of water (vāridhāra), one cold, the other warm, fell like rain from heaven to bathe the Bodhisattva and his mother: cf. Dīgha, II, p. 15; Majjhima, III, p. 123; Sanskrit Mahāvadāna, p. 91; Nidānakathā in Jātaka, I, p. 53, l. 5-7; Mahāvastu, I, p. 222, l. 12; II, p. 24, l. 20.

2) Two currents of water (vāridhāra), arising from the earth, filled two pools (udapāna) to bathe the infant, like a golden statue: cf. Mahāvastu, I, p. 220, l. 19-221, l. 2; II, p. 23, l. 4-7.

3) The nāgarājas Nanda and Upananda, appearing half-way from the sky, created two currents of water (vāridhāra), cold and warm, and bathed the Bodhisattva. Śakra, Brahmā, the Lokapālas and many other devaputras bathed the Bodhisattva with all kinds of scented water: cf. Lalita, p. 83, l. 21-84, l. 3.

4) Remaining in the sky, Brahmā and Śakra bathed the leader par excellence with pure scented water. Also the nāga kings (uragarāja) remaining in the sky made two currents of water flow, cold and warm. A hundred thousand gods bathed the Leader par excellence with scented water: cf. Lalita, p. 93, l. 1-5.

5) The nāgarājas bathed the Bodhisattva with two kinds of scented water, one cold, the other warm. In front of his mother there arose a large pool for her to wash in: cf. Mūlasarv. Vin, T 1450,k. 2, p. 108a20-23.

Folklore and carved monuments reflect the uncertainties of the literary tradition.

At the moment of his birth, the earth trembled in six ways (ṣaḍvikāram akampata). The Bodhisattva took seven steps (sapta padāni vikramate) calmly like the king of the elephants and, having regarded the four directions (caturdiśaṃ vilokya), he uttered the lion's roar (siṃhanādam anadat) and proclaimed: I will have no further rebirths (iyam me paścimā jātiḥ) and I will save all beings.³³⁴

3. Physical marks and superhuman power

The recluse A-sseu-t'o (Asita)³³⁵ examined him and said to king Tsing-fan (Śuddhodana):

“In the garden of Lumbinī, the place where the two nāgas bathed the divine child is shown side-by-side with the twin springs that no less miraculously appeared to furnish water for his bath.” (A. Foucher): cf. Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 6, p. 902a28-902b5.

The carved monuments may be divided into two groups. In the first, the Bodhisattva is bathed, or more precisely, sprinkled by Brahmā and Śakra: this is the case at Gandhāra (Foucher, Agb., p. 309, fig. 156 = Ingholt, fig. 16 = Marshall, fig. 58) and at Swāt (Tucci, Il trono di diamante, Bari, 1967, fig. 80-81). In the second group, he is escorted by two nāgas or sprinkled by them: this is the case at Mathurā (Vogel, pl. 51a, right; pl. 52b) and on the steles at Benares (Foucher, Agb., p. 413, fig. 209a, left).

We may ask why here the Traité replaces the two traditional nāgas, Nanda and Upananda, by two of their fellows, Anavatapta and Sāgara. This may be because at the time of the birth of the Buddha, the first two were not yet converted and still had to be tamed by Maudgalyāyana (see below, k. 32, p. 300a29 seq.; k. 100, p. 752b12). However, it is doubtful that such a care for verisimilitude bothered the ancient exegetists. Identical in their behavior, the nāgarājas were practically interchangeable and it was permissible to choose freely from the list of the eight most important of them: Nanda, Upananda, Sāgara, Vāsukin, Takṣaka, Manasvin, Anavatapta, Utpalaka (cf. Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 4, l. 11-12).

³³⁴ For the seven steps of the Bodhisattva, see above, p. 6F and note.

³³⁵ According to the Pāli sources, Asita, the old teacher and titular chaplain to king Śuddhodana, became a recluse and was living in retreat close to the royal palace, which did not prevent him from going to the Himalayan peaks and even to the Caturmahārājikadeva heaven. In the Sanskrit sources, he was a native of Dakṣiṇāpatha, the son of the Brahmin Ujjayinī and spent his leisure time between Mount Vindhya and Mount Kailāsa, a chain of the Himalayas. However it may be, the hermit enjoyed extensive powers that allowed him to foretell the future. Hearing from the Trāyastriṃśa gods that Śuddhodana had just had a son, he hastened to the royal palace to examine the newborn. Earlier, the experts in signs had already discovered that two paths only were open to the little Siddhārtha: he would be a cakravartin king or a full Buddha. Having carefully studied the 32 physical marks and the 80 minor marks of the child, Asita declared that without a doubt Siddhārtha would become Buddha some day. However, Asita was not present at this fortunate event for his death was near and he was destined to be reborn in ārupyadhātu. And so, having rejoiced, Asita burst into tears. He was, however, consoled at the thought that his

1) On the soles of his feet are [two] wheels with a thousand spokes (adhas tasya pādayoś cakre jāte sahasrāre); his toes are joined by a web (jālāvanaddhāṅgulī); he will be able to be firmly established in the Dharma (dharme supratīṣṭitah) and nobody can shake him or destroy him.

2) His hands are marked with the śrīvatsa (śrīvatsalakṣitaṇṇi) and adorned with a web (jālālaṃkṛta): with these hands he will be able to reassure beings and prevent them from being fearful.³³⁶

Continuing his examination, [Asita also noted the following marks]:³³⁷

3) On his head there is a fleshy bone (uṣṇīṣaśiraskatā) like the top of a mountain of blue pearls; rays of blue light radiate on all sides from it.³³⁸

4) On his head there is the mark of the cranium, the height of which cannot be seen (anavalokitamūrdhatā).³³⁹ among gods and men, nobody will be able to surpass him.

nephew, Nālaka or Naradatta, according to the sources, would one day benefit from the presence and teachings of the Buddha.

Later, the Traité (k. 29, p. 274b4; k. 40, p. 350a12-13) will return to this recluse, famed in Buddhist literature and art:

³³⁶ Here the Traité limits itself to citing the first of the 32 lakṣaṇas and the 84th and last of the anuvyañjanas according to the order established by the Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 24, p. 395b28-396b9. Above, p. 272-279F, it has commented fully on the 32 lakṣaṇas, to which the reader is referred.

³³⁷ In the lines that follow, the Traité draws attention to twelve of the marks, namely, nine lakṣaṇas and three anuvyañjanas.

³³⁸ 32nd lakṣaṇa.

³³⁹ Anavalokitamūrdhatā 'Invisible cranial summit', in Chinese wou kien ting siang, in Tibetan, spyi gtsug bltar mi mtho'i ba. This anuvyañjana does not appear in the lists of marks given by the canonical scriptures or the early biographies of the Buddha mentioned above (p. 271 and 272 as note) and seems to be an invention of the Mahāyāna.

The Sanskrit word anavalokitamūrdhatā is attested in the Suvikrāntavikrāmin, p. 114, l. 11 and the Bodh. bhūmi, p. 381, l. 2-3. In the editions of the Gaṇḍavyūha, p. 65, l. 18, the reading avalokitamūrdhitā, reproduced in Edgerton, Dictionary, p. 74, is faulty.

In the Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 24, p. 395c28, anavalokitamūrdhatā is the first anuvyañjana; in the Śatasāhasrikā, T 220 (vol. VI), k. 381, p. 968c18-19, it is the 66th anuvyañjana. This minor mark appears again in numerous Mahāyāna sūtras and śāstras: Bimbisārārāja, T 41, p. 825b7; Brahmāyus, T 76, p. 884a18; Karuṇāpūṇḍarīka, T 157, k. 2, p. 177c4-5; Avatamsaka, T 278, k. 6, p. 432c5; k. 17, p. 508a13; k. 46, p. 691b5-6; T 279, k. 27, p. 146a7 and 16; k. 62, p. 335c21; Śraddhābālādhanāvarāra, T 305, k. 5, p. 955a25-955b25; Che tchou touan kie, T 309, k. 4, p. 997b29-997c1; Ratnakūṭa, T 310, k. 10, p. 54b9; Tathāgataguhyā, T 312, k. 8, p. 724a16; Bodhisattvapiṭaka, T 316, k. 27, p. 851b11; Amitāyurbuddhānusmṛti, T 365, p. 344a9; Wou chang yi king, T 669, k. 2, P. 474c24; Upāsakaśīla, T 1488, k. 1, p. 10293-6; Upadeśa, T 1509, k. 26, 256a9 and 17; king kang sien louen, T 1512, k. 5, p. 831b29; k. 9, p. 863a4-5; Yogācāryābhūmi, T 1579, k. 49; p. 567a2-3: 568a17-19; Mahāyānasamgraha and its commentaries, T 1594, k. 3, p. 149c1; T 1597, k. 9, p. 371c29; T 1598, k. 9, p. 437c27-28; Comm. on the Houan wou leang cheou by Tche li, T 1751, k. 6, p. 227a7-8.

We know that the 80 anuvyañjanas are supplementary to the 32 lakṣaṇas. In fact, the anavalokitamūrdhitā is a property of the 32nd lakṣaṇa of the Buddha, the cranial protuberance (uṣṇīṣa). This is what the Bodh. bhūmi says, p. 381: Tatrosṇīṣaśiraskatānavalokitamūrdhatā caikamahāpuruṣalakṣaṇam veditavayaṃ tadvyatirekeṇānupalambhāt: “The two make up a single mark of the Great Man; there is no difference between them.”

When the Traité says here that nobody can see the top of the Buddha’s cranium and that nobody among gods and men can surpass him, it should be taken literally: the uṣṇīṣa of the Buddha is invisible and nobody can go above it This explains several mysterious episodes in the Buddha’s life:

When the recluse Asita wanted to examine the new-born Buddha, the baby’s feet turned upside-down and placed themselves on the chignon of the recluse (bodhisattvassa pādā parivattitvā tāpasassa jaṭāsu patitṭhajimsu): cf. Nidānakathā in Jātaka, I, p. 54, l. 25-26.

“When Gautama travels, heavenly gifts, precious parasols and flowers rain down like snow. The devas, nāgas and flying birds do not dare to fly above him for, among beings of the threefold world, none can see the summit [of his cranium]”; cf. Brahmāyusūtra, T 76, p. 884a16-18.

Sātāgira and Hemavata who were flying to an assembly of yakṣas were stopped in full flight and forced to land because, if they had continued on their route, they would have passed above the Buddha: cf. Comm. on the Suttanipāta, I, p. 221-223; Comm. on the Udāna, p. 64.

Near Rājagṛha, at Yaśṭivana ‘Perch Forest’: “Once a Brahmin, having heard that the Buddha’s body was sixteen feet high, persisted in doubting and did not believe it. He wanted to measure the Buddha with a bamboo rod sixteen feet long, but the Buddha’s body constantly rose above the top of the rod and surpassed sixteen feet. He continued growing so that the Brahmin, quite unable to reach the true height, threw away his stick and went away. As a result of this event, the bamboo stick remained planted

6) He has clear eyes (viśuddhanetra), wide eyes (viśalanetra), the color of which is deep blue (abhinīlanetra).³⁴¹

7) His nose is high (tuṅganāsa), fine (śucināsa) and pleasing.³⁴²

8) His mouth has forty teeth (catvāriṃśaddanta), white (suśukla), pure, sharp and wondrous.³⁴³ in the ground and took root there.” This anecdote is told by Hiuan-tsang in the Si-yu-ki, T 2087, k. 9, p. 920a7-12, and is represented on the bas-reliefs at agndhāra (Foucher, Agb. p. 505, pl. 251b; p. 522, pl. 256c) but has left no trace in the texts. However, a canonical passage should be noted where the Teacher forbade everyone except himself to measure a pudgala: Mā puggalesu pamāṇikā ahuvatthu ... yo vā pan’assa madiso. “Do not be one of those who measure men, for the person who takes the measure of men wounds himself. It is I who am able to take the measure of men, or someone like me.” (Anguttara, III, p. 350, 351; V, p. 140, 143; Tsa a han, T 99, k. 35, p. 258a23-25; 258c7-8; Śūraṅgamasamādhi, p. 208; Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 92).

Like all the lakṣaṇas and anuvyañjanas, the anavalokitamūrdhatā is the fruit of immense merit accumulated over innumerable kalpas: “When he was Bodhisattva, the Buddha venerated the teachers, the ancient ones, the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas, for innumerable lifetimes; he prostrated [at their feet] with the top of his head, destroying all pride in himself: this is why he has obtained the mark of the invisible top of the cranium” (Upāsakaśīla, T 1488, k. 1, p. 1039b3-6). Same explanation in King kang sien louen, T 1512, k. 5, p. 831b29; k. 9, p. 863a4-5.

For other comments, see H. Durt, Note sur l’origine de l’Anavalokitamūrdhatā, Indian and Buddhist Studies, XVI, p. 1967, p. 443-450.

14) A halo one arm-span in width (read tchang kouang = vyāmaprabha) surrounds his body, of varied colors, incomparable in beauty.³⁴⁹

Endowed with these thirty-two marks, this man will, before long, leave home (pravrajita), will attain omniscience (sarvajñāna) and will become Buddha.

This is how the physical qualities (kāyaguṇa) of the Buddha should be [220a] recollected.

Moreover, the qualities (guṇa) and the physical strength (kāyabala) of the body of the Buddha surpasses ten myriads of white gandhastins;³⁵⁰ this is physical power inherited from his parents. His supernatural powers (abhijñā), his qualities and his strength are immense and limitless. The body of the Buddha is adorned with the thirty-two marks (dvātrimśallakṣaṇa) and the eighty minor marks (aṣṭīyanuvyañjanāni); inwardly he has the innumerable attributes and qualities of the Buddhas: this is why one does not tire of seeing him. Those who see the Buddha's body forget about the five worldly objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) and never think of them again. One's happiness is complete on seeing the Buddha's body; one never tires of seeing it.³⁵¹

These are the qualities of the Buddha's body under which one should recollect him.

4. The five pure aggregates (anāsravaskandha)³⁵²

[I. Śīlaskandha]. – Furthermore, in the Buddha, maintenance of morality (śīla) is perfect (sampanna) and complete (pariśuddha). From the first production of the mind of Bodhi (prathamacittoṭpāda), he practices morality and accumulates it without measure. Endowed with the mind of compassion (karuṇācitta), he does not seek the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala). He does not lean toward the Bodhi of the śrāvakas or of the pratyekabuddhas. He is without fetters (saṃyojana). He maintains discipline from birth to birth only for the purification of his own mind (svacittapariśodhana) and so as not to harm beings. Thus, when he obtains the Bodhi of the Buddhas, his morality is perfected.

³⁴⁹ 50th lakṣaṇa: see above p. 277F, 453-456F.

³⁵⁰ The Buddha has the physical strength of Nārāyaṇa, equal to myriads of white elephants in rut. See Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 36, p. 749b23-749c13; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 30, p. 155a-b; k. 83, p. 428c20; k. 191, p. 957a26; Kośa, VII, p. 72-74; Nyāyānusaāra, T 1562, k. 75, p. 748b; Abhidharmaṭṭhapa, p. 388-389.

³⁵¹ Thus at the moment of his death, the disciple Vakkali had nothing to blame himself for, but he felt one cruel regret; he confessed: "For a long time I wanted to go to the Buddha to contemplate him, but I did not have the strength in my body to go to visit him." (Samyutta, III, p. 120).

³⁵² For these five anāsravaskandha, see references above, p. 1233, n. 3.

This is how one should recollect the aggregate of morality (śīlaskandha) of the Buddha.

[2. Samādhiskandha]. – Furthermore, the aggregate of samādhi (samādhiskandha) is perfected in the Buddha.

Question. – We can know that the Buddha is disciplined because his bodily and vocal actions (kāyavakkarman) are pure; we can know that he is wise because he explains the Dharma in detail and cuts through the doubts (saṃśaya) of beings. But in regard to meditative stabilization (samādhi), it is impossible to know if a third person is practicing it, especially if it is a Buddha.

Answer. – As the great wisdom (mahāprajñā) of the Buddha is perfect (sampanna), it must be concluded that his dhyānas and his absorptions (samāpattis) are perfected. Similarly, when we see that the lotus flowers (padmapuṣpa) are large, we agree that the pool (hrada) must also be large. When we see that the light of the lamp (dīpaloka) is large, we agree that there is also abundant oil (taila). And so, since the supernatural powers (abhijñā) and the prodigious strength (prātihāryabala) of the Buddha are immense and incomparable, we know that the power of his dhyānas and his absorptions is also perfected. When we see that an effect (phala) is great, we know that its cause (hetu) is necessarily great.

Furthermore, in some circumstances, the Buddha himself said to people that his dhyānas and samāpattis are very deep (gambhīra).

[The Miracle of Ādumā].³⁵³ – It is said in a sūtra that the Buddha was in the land of A-t'eou-mo (Ādumā), seated in meditation under a tree (niṣaṇṇaḥ pratisaṃlayanāya). Suddenly there was a heavy rainstorm with lightning and thunder. Four cowherds (gopālaka) and two workmen (kārṣaka)³⁵⁴ were so frightened by the noise that they died. A few moments later, calm returned and the Buddha went out to walk (caṅkrame caṅkramyate).

³⁵³ Meeting the Buddha between Kuśinagarī and Pāpā, a minister of the Mallas called Putkasa spoke to him about his teacher Ārāḍa Kālāma and his extraordinary power of concentration: one day when he was deep in meditation, Ārāḍa did not hear the noise of a caravan of five hundred wagons that passed by close to him. The Buddha affirmed that he too possessed a similar power of absorption and gave him as proof an incident that had occurred in the village of Ādumā (in Pāli, Ātumā).

This miracle appears in the various recensions of the Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra: Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 272-276; Mahāparinibbāna in the Dīgha, II, p. 131-132; and various Chinese translations: T 1, k. 3, p. 19a21; T 5, k. 2, p. 168b13-21; T 6, k. 2, p. 183c23-184a3; T 7, k. 2, p. 198a17-198b4 (see E. Waldschmidt, Lebensende des Buddha, p. 155-157, a comparative study of these versions). The miracle is also told in Lieou tou tsi king, T 152, k. 7, p. 42c23-29 (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 281) and Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1451, K. 37, p. 391b3-18. Here is the Sanskrit version of the Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra:

Eko 'yaṃ Putkasa samaya Ādumāyāṃ viharāmi bhūtāgāre. pūrvāṇhe nivasya pātracivaram ādāyādumāṃ piṇḍāya ... sphoṭatyāḥ śadbam. Prasannaś ca me puruṣo vaśīkṛtaḥ.

³⁵⁴ Most other sources say four oxen (balivardaka) and two workmen (kārṣaka).

A vaiśya, having bowed down to the Buddha's feet, walked along after him and said: Bhagavat, for a moment there was thunder, lightning and four cowherds as well as two workmen were so frightened by this noise that they died. Did the Bhagavat not hear the crash?

The Buddha said: I heard nothing.

The vaiśya: Was the Buddha sleeping at that moment?

The Buddha said: No, I was not asleep.

The vaiśya: Had you entered into the absorption of non-identification (asaṃjñīsamāpatti)?

The Buddha: No, I was conscious (saṃjñy eva sammanah), and I was just in meditative stability.

The vaiśya exclaimed: That is wonderful (āścaryaṃ bata)! The dhyānas and the samāpattis of the Buddha are great and profound (mahāgambhīra). Being in meditation, fully conscious and fully awake (saṃjñy eva samāno jāgram), he did [220b] not hear this great noise!

In other sūtras, the Buddha said to the bhikṣus: “The samādhis into which the Buddha enters and comes out of, Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana do not even know the names of them.”³⁵⁵ How then (kiṃ punar vādaḥ) would they know their nature?

See, for example, the samādhi of the King of Samādhi (samādhīrājasamādhi),³⁵⁶ the samādhi of the Lion's Play (siṃhavikrīḍitasamādhi),³⁵⁷ etc.: when the Buddha enters them, he makes the universes of the ten directions shake in six ways; he emits great rays (raśmi) and by emanation he creates innumerable Buddhas who fill the ten directions.

[The miracle of the multiplication of the Buddhas].³⁵⁸ – One day Ānanda reflected thus: Formerly, under the Buddha Jan-teng (Dīpaṃkara), people were good, had long life (dīrghāyusa) and were easily converted. Today, under the Buddha Śākyamuni, people are actually bad, have a short life (alpāyusa) and are hard to convert. Is Śākyamuni going to enter into nirvāṇa without having completed his work as Buddha (buddhakārya)?

³⁵⁵ Mūlasarv. Vin, Bhaiṣajyavastu, in Gilgit Manuscripts, III, Part I, p. 171, l. 14-19: Api tu yāsāṃ dhyānavimokṣasamādhīsamāpattīnāṃ lābhī Tathāgatas tāsāṃ pratyakabuddhā nāmāni na jānanti. yāsāṃ pratyakabuddhā lābhīnas tāsāṃ bhikṣuḥ Śāriputo nāmāni na jānīte. yāsāṃ lābhī Śāriputro bhikṣus tāsāṃ Maudgalyāyano bhikṣur nāmāni na jānīte: “The trances, the liberations, the concentrations and the absorptions that the Tathāgata obtains, the bhikṣu Śāriputra does not know their names. Those that Śāriputra obtains, the bhikṣu Maudgalyāyana does not know their names.

³⁵⁸ An event closely analogous to the great miracle at Śrāvastī which the Traité has already related in detail above, p. 531-535F.

In the morning, Ānanda questioned the Buddha about this. The sun had just risen and, at that very moment, the Buddha entered into the samādhi of Daybreak (sūryodayasamādhi). Just as the rays of the rising sun lit up Jambudvīpa, so, from the body of the Buddha and from the pores of his skin (romakūpa) rays were emitted that illumined universes of the ten directions as many as the sands of the Ganges (gaṅgalādīvālukopama).

From each of these rays arose lotus flowers with a thousand petals made of the seven jewels (saptaratnamayāni sahasrapatrāṇī padmāni). On each of these flowers there was a seated Buddha each of whom emitted innumerable rays. From each of these rays arose other thousand-petalled lotus flowers made of the seven jewels on each of which was a seated Buddha.

All these Buddhas filled universes in the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges and converted beings. Some preached the Dharma, others were silent, others walked about, still others, by feats of magic (rddhiprātihārya), shot out water and fire successively. They converted beings of the five destinies in the ten directions by these skillful means (upāya).

By the power of the Buddha (bhagavataḥ prabhāvena), Ānanda saw all these things. Then the Buddha withdrew the bases of his magical power (rddhipādān punar eva pratisamharati sma), emerged from meditation and asked Ānanda if he had seen and heard these things. Ānanda replied: “Thanks to the Buddha's power, I saw and I heard.”

The Buddha asked him: “Does the Buddha have enough power to be able to finish [quickly] his task as Buddha?”

Ānanda answered: “O Bhagavat, suppose that the beings filled universes in the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges and the Buddha lived only one single day, if, [in order to convert them], the Buddha used the power [which you have just demonstrated], he could certainly fully accomplish completely (atyantam) his task as Buddha (buddhakārya).” And Ānanda exclaimed: “It is truly wonderful (adhbhutam bata), O Bhagavat! The Buddha's attributes are immense (apramāṇa) and inconceivable (acintya).”

This is why we know that the dhyānas and the absorptions of the Buddha are perfected (sampanna).

[3. Prajñāskandha]. – Furthermore, the wisdom aggregate (prajñāskandha) is perfected (sampanna) in the Buddha. From the first production of the mind of Bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) and during incalculable periods (asamkhyeyakalpa), there is no dharma that he has not practiced. From existence to existence, he has accumulated qualities (guṇa). Mindful (smṛtimat) and resolute (ātāpin), he sacrificed his life to find wisdom (prajñā), as was the case for the bodhisattva Śa-t'o-po-louen (Sadāprarudita).³⁵⁹

³⁵⁹ This bodhisattva found a manuscript of the Prajñāpāramitā at Gandhāra in the city of Gandhavatī in the middle of a tower where the bodhisattva Dharmodgata had hidden it. It had been written on gold-leaf with molten beryl; sealed with seven seals, it was enclosed in a precious casket resting on a bed set with

Furthermore, as he has cultivated great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and wisdom (prajñā), the Buddha has perfected the wisdom aggregate (prajñāskandha). Other people do not have this great compassion, and even if [220c] they do have wisdom, they do not perfect great compassion. Wanting to save beings and seeking all kinds of wisdoms, the Buddha has destroyed even his attachment to the Dharma (dharmasaṅgha) and suppressed the sixty-two kinds of wrong view (dṛṣṭigata). He does not fall into the pairs of extremes (dvāv antau):³⁶⁰ a life attached to the five objects of enjoyment and pleasure (pañcakāmaguṇeṣu kāmasukhallikānuyoga) or a life of personal mortification (ātmaklamathānuyoga), nihilism (ucchedadṛṣṭi) or eternalism (śāśvatadṛṣṭi), existence (bhava) or non-existence (vibhava), and other extremes of this kind.

Furthermore, the Buddha's wisdom is peerless (anuttara) and his penetration (pratiśvedha) without equal (asama), for they are all the result of very deep concentrations (gambhīrasamādhi) and are not disturbed by coarse or subtle emotions (sthūlasūkṣmakleśa). He practices well the thirty-two auxiliaries to enlightenment (bodhipāṭṣikadharmā), the four trances (dhyāna), the four formless absorptions (ārūpyasamāpatti), the eight liberations (vimokṣa), the nine successive absorptions (anupūrvavīhārasamāpatti) and the other qualities (guṇa); he possesses the ten strengths (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśaradya), the four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid), and the eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā); he has obtained the unhindered and inconceivable liberations (asaktācintyavimokṣa):³⁶¹ this is why the wisdom aggregate of the Buddha is perfected (sampanna).

Furthermore, the Buddha has vanquished the great heretical scholars (tīrthikamahopadeśācārya), namely:

the seven jewels. To pay homage to bodhisattva Dharmodgata, Sadāprarudita 'Eternally Weeping' sacrificed his body several times and, not finding any water to wash the place where he was to meet the bodhisattva, "he took a sharp blade, pierced his body everywhere and sprinkled the place with his own blood" (tikṣṇaṃ śastraṃ grhītvā svākāyaṃ samantato viddhvā taṃ prthivīpradeśaṃ svarudhireṇa sarvaṃ asiñcat).

The adventures of Sadāprarudita are told at length in various recensions of the Prajñāpāramitā:

1) Aṣṭasāhasrikā: Sanskrit text, chap. 30 and 31. p. 481-526 (transl. Conze, p. 201-223); Chinese versions, T 224, k. 9-10, p. 470c-477b; T 225, k. 6, p. 503c-507c; T 227, k. 10, p. 580a-586b.

2) Pañcaviṃśati, T 221, k. 20, p. 141b-146b; T 223, k. 27, p. 416a-423c.

3) Śatasāhasrikā, T 220 (vol. V), k. 498-400, p. 1059a-1073a.

But the chapters on Sadāprarudita and Dharmodgata are not part of the original edition of the Prajñāpāramitā. Actually, the Ratnagūṇasamcayagāthā which makes up the earliest summary of this literature does not mention these two bodhisattvas, and the chapters in question show indirect contacts with the Mediterranean gnosis of the beginning of our era. See E. Conze, The Composition of the Aṣṭasāhasrikā, BSOAS, XIV, 1952, p. 251-262.

The Traité will comment fully on the two chapters in question (k. 96-100, p. 731a-753c) and will often evoke the spirit of Sadāprarudita's sacrifice (k. 30, p. 283a20; k. 34, p. 314a12; k. 49, p. 412a20, 414c13.

³⁶² The same year as his enlightenment, the Buddha went to Urubilvā to convert the thousand Jātilas, fire worshippers, led by Urubilvākāśyapa, a venerable old man aged one hundred and twenty years, and his two brothers, Nadi- and Gatākāśyapa. To impress these heretics, the Buddha performed no less than eighteen miracles, beginning with the taming of a venomous snake. Finally convinced of not having attained sainthood (arhatta) and that he did not even know the Path, Urubilvākāśyapa asked to be received into the Buddhist order and his five hundred disciples made the same request. The Buddha agreed and the newly converted threw their garments of hide and their religious objects into the river in order to put on the Dharma robe.

Nadi- and Gayākāśyapa, further downstream, saw the cast-off garments of their co-religionists and fearing that some misfortune had occurred to them, they rushed to find out what had happened. They found their friends already shaven and wearing the saffron robes of the disciples of the Buddha.

Influenced by this example, they too asked to be accepted into the Saṃgha of monks.

The Buddha vanquished all these great scholars: this is why we know that his wisdom aggregate (prajñāskandha) is perfected (sampanna).

Furthermore, in the three Baskets (tripiṭaka), the twelve classes of texts (dvādaśāṅgabuddhavacana) and the eighty-four thousand articles of the Dharma (caturśītisahasradharmaskandha), we see how numerous were the words of the Buddha (buddhavacana): this is why we know that his wisdom also is great.

Thus, a vaiśya, seeing at dawn a place where there had been a lot of rain, said to the people: “Last night, the power of the rain-dragon (varṣa-nāga) was very great.” The people asked him: “How do you know?” He answered: “I see that the ground is damp, the mud abundant, the mountain collapsed, the trees knocked down and the animals killed; that is how I know that the power of the dragon was great.”

It is the same for the Buddha: although his profound wisdom is not visible to the eye, it makes the mighty rain of the Dharma (mahādharmavarṣam abhivarṣati) rain down; he vanquishes the great scholars (mahopadeśācārya) like the kings of the gods Śakra and Brahmā: this is why it is possible to know that the Buddha’s wisdom is great.

Furthermore, as the Buddhas have acquired the unhindered liberations (asaktavimokṣa) over everything, their wisdom is unhindered.

Furthermore, this wisdom of the Buddha is completely pure (parisuddha) and surpasses all ordinary analysis (vicāra). He does not see any nature in dharmas that is eternal (nitya) or non-eternal (anitya), finite (antavat) or infinite (anantavat), mobile (gamika) or immobile (agamika), existent (sat) or non-existent (asat), impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), conditioned (saṃskṛta) or unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), arising and perishing (utpanna-niruddha) or non-arising non-perishing (anutpanna-aniruddha), empty (śūnya) or non-empty (aśūnya). The eternal purity (nityaviśuddhitā) of dharmas is immense (apramāṇa), like space (ākāśasama)! This is why his wisdom is unhindered (asakta).

Those who see arising and cessation (utpādanirodha) [in dharmas] cannot see non-arising and non-cessation (anutpādānirodha) in them; those who see non-arising and non-cessation in dharmas cannot see arising and cessation in them. If non-arising and non-cessation are real (bhūta), then arising and cessation are false (abhūta). If arising and cessation are real, non-arising and non-cessation are false. It is the same for all analyses of this type (evamvidhavicāra). As the Buddha has unhindered wisdom (pratisaṃvid) [on this subject], we know that his wisdom is perfected.

[4. Vimuktiskandha]. – Furthermore, one recollects the perfection of the deliverance skandha (vimuktiskandhasampad) in the Buddha. The Buddha is free from all the disturbing emotions (kleśa) and their traces (vāsanā). As he has [221a] uprooted them, his deliverance is real (bhūta) and indestructible (akṣaya). Since he is endowed with omniscience (sarvajñānasamanvāgata), it is ‘unhindered deliverance’ (asaktavimukti). Since he has the eight liberations (vimokṣa) and these are profound (ganbhīra) and universal (vyāpin), it is ‘complete deliverance’ (sampannavimukti).

Furthermore, since the Buddha has left [the lower stages] of those who are liberated by chance (samayavimukta) and those liberated by wisdom (prajñāvimukta), he realizes the twofold deliverance (ubhayabhāgavimuti) perfectly.³⁶⁸ As he has these [two] deliverances, it is ‘perfected deliverance aggregate’ (sampannavimuktiskandha).

Furthermore, the Buddha has obtained deliverance because he has destroyed Māra’s armies (mārasenā),³⁶⁹ eliminated the negative emotions (kleśa), rejected the dhyāna systems, and also because he enters into and comes out of samādhi supremely and without obstacle.

Finally, in the path of seeing the truths (satyadarśanamārga),³⁷⁰ the Bodhisattva attained sixteen profound deliverances (vimukti):

(i) [The first vimukti] was a conditioned deliverance (saṃskṛtavimukti) associated with duḥkhe dharmajñāna. [Commonly called duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti].

(ii) [The second vimukti] was an unconditioned deliverance (asaṃskṛtavimukti)³⁷¹ resulting from the abandonment (prahāṇa) of the ten fetters (saṃyojana) relating to the suffering [of kāmabhūta]. [Commonly called duḥkhe dharmajñāna.]

And so on up to [the sixteenth Vimukti] called mārge ‘nvayajñāna’.

Then, in the path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga), the Bodhisattva obtained eighteen deliverances:

(i) [The first vimukti] was a conditioned deliverance (saṃskṛtavimukti) associated either with anvayajñāna or with dharmajñāna.

(ii) [The second vimukti] was an unconditioned deliverance (asaṃskṛtavimukti) resulting from the abandonment of the three fetters to meditation (bhāvanāsaṃyojana) in ārūpyadhātu.

And so on up to the eighteenth vimukti where there is a conditioned deliverance associated with the destruction of the impurities (āsravakṣayaajñāna) and an unconditioned deliverance resulting from the ³⁶⁸ Of the six kinds of arhats, five are liberated as a result of chance (samayavimukta): their deliverance of mind (cetovimukti) is thus by chance (sāmayiki) because it depends on circumstance and is cherished because it must be guarded constantly: cf. Anguttara, III, p. 173; Kośa, p. 251, 154, 167, 274.

The saint who is liberated from the obstacle of the disturbing emotions (kleśāvaraṇa) by the power of wisdom is said to be liberated by wisdom (prajñāvimukta): cf. Anguttara, IV, p. 452-453; Kośa, VI, p. 274, 276, 297; VII, p. 97; VIII, p. 181.

The saint who, by the power of wisdom, is freed from the obstacle of the disturbing emotions (kleśāvaraṇa) and who, by the power of concentration (samādhi), is freed from the obstacle which stands in the way of the eight liberations (vimokṣāvaraṇa), is said to be doubly delivered (ubhayatobhāgavimukta): cf. Anguttara, I, p. 73; IV, p. 10, 77; Kośa, II, p. 205; VI, p. 273, 276.

³⁷⁰ An allusion to the enlightenment of Śākyamuni who attained Bodhi in thirty-four moments of mind: sixteen of darśanamārga and eighteen of bhāvanāmārga: see above, p. 130F note, and especially p. 1036F note.

³⁷¹ On the difference between conditioned vimukti and unconditioned vimukti, see Kośa, VI, p. 2906.

abandonment of all the fetters (sarvasaṃyojanaprahāṇa). These two deliverances together constitute the ‘perfection of the deliverance aggregate’ (vimuktiskandhasampad).

[5] Vimuktijñānadarśanaskandha. – Furthermore, one recollects the perfection of the aggregate of the Buddha called knowledge and seeing deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśanaskandha). This aggregate is of two types:

(i) In regard to emancipation from his disturbing emotions, the Buddha puts the knowledge of destruction of the impurities (āsravakṣayajñāna) to work: from his own experience (adhyātmasākṣātkāra) he knows: “In me, suffering is completely known, its origin has been abandoned, its destruction has been realized and the path [to its destruction] has been practiced” (duḥkhaṃ me parijñātaṃ, samudayo me prahīṇo, nirodho me sākṣātkṛto, mārgo me bhāvita iti).³⁷² this is the vimuktijñānadarśanaskandha consisting of the knowledge of the destruction of the impurities (āsravakṣayajñāna).

Next, he knows this: “The suffering completely known by me is no longer to be known; [its origin abandoned by me is no longer to be realized]; the path [to its destruction] practiced by me is no longer to be practiced” (duḥkhaṃ me parijñātaṃ na punaḥ parijñātavyaṃ, samudayo me prahīṇo na punaḥ prahātavyo, nirodho me sākṣātkṛto na punaḥ sākṣātkartavyo, mārgo me bhāvito na punaḥ bhavitavya iti).³⁷³ this is the vimuktijñānadarśana consisting of the knowledge that the impurities, once destroyed, will not arise again (āsravānutpādajñāna).

ii) The Buddha knows that this particular person will find deliverance by entering the concentration of emptiness (śūnyatā), another person by entering into the concentration of signlessness (ānimitta), yet another into the concentration of wishlessness (apraṇihita). He knows that one individual will be led to deliverance without resorting to any skillful means (upāya). Another will find deliverance after a long time, a third after a short time, a fourth in this very moment. One individual will find deliverance if he is addressed in subtle words, another in coarse words, yet another in varied conversation (saṃbhinnapralāpa). One individual will find deliverance if he sees miracles (rddhibala), another if the Dharma is preached. The person in whom lust predominates (rāgabahula) finds deliverance if his desire (rāga) is increased; the one in whom hatred predominates (dveṣabahula) finds deliverance if his hate is increased, as was the case for the nāgas *Nan-to*³⁷⁴ and Ngeou-leou-p’ in-louo (Urubilva).³⁷⁵

³⁷⁴ One day the Buddha accompanied by five hundred monks went to the Trāyastriṃśa gods but, in order to do so, he had to fly over the home of the nāga king Nandopananda. Fearing that the dust from the feet of these shaven monks might fall on his head, the nāga wanted to prevent them from passing overhead. He wound his coils seven times around Mount Meru in order to hide the Trāyastriṃśa heaven

It is for various reasons of this kind that people find deliverance, as it is explained in regard to the Dharma eye (dharmacakṣus). Knowing and clearly seeing these various deliverances is called vimuktijñānadarśanaskandhasampad. [221b]

Furthermore, one recollects the Buddha who knows all (sarvajñā), who sees all (sarvadarśin), his great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī), his great compassion (mahākaruṇā), his ten powers (bala), his four from them. The Buddha entrusted the task of conquering him to Maudgalyāyana. The disciple took the form of a royal nāga and wound his coils around the body of his adversary fourteen times. Against the flames and smoke of Nandopananda, he sent out still stronger flames and smoke. Then taking on his human form, he entered the nāga’s body which he traversed from top to bottom. When he came out, Nandopananda breathed out on him ‘the wind from his nose’, but Maudgalyāyana, in the fourth dhyāna, changed into the suparṇa bird, the sworn enemy of the dragons and began to chase the nāga while giving off ‘the suparṇa breath’. Completely humbled, Nandopananda changed into a young Brahmin and took refuge in the Buddha.

This story is in the Nandopanandanāgarājadamanaśūtra, of which three versions exist: A Pāli version in Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 336-337 (transl. Nanamoli, p. 436-438); a Tibetan translation entitled Kluhi rgyal po dgaḥ bo ñerdgaḥ ḥdul baḥI mdo, OKC, no. 755 (Tib. Trip., vol. 21, p. 304-3-7); a Chinese translation by Tche K’ien, entitled Long wang hiong to king, T 597, p. 131.

Elsewhere there are frequent allusions to the discomfiture of Nanda: Divyāvadāna, p. 395; Legend of Aśoka (T 99, k. 23, p. 168a; T 2042, k. 2, p. 104b13; T 2043, k. 2, p. 138b9; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 28, p. 703b24; Jātaka, V, p. 126. The Traité will return to it later, k. 32, p. 300a29; k. 100, p. 752b12.

³⁷⁵ This is the nāga of Urubilvā on the Nairāṇjanā who occupied the Fire House (agnyāgāra) of the Jaṭilas. Urubilvākāśyapa, the leader of these heretics, had authorized the Buddha to stay there. When the Buddha entered, the furious snake spat out smoke and flames; the teacher replied with the same, so much so that the building seemed about to burst into flame. During the night, Kāśyapa, who watched the stars, noticed the fire and wondered if the Buddha had not been burned to ash. But in the meantime, the Buddha, in meditation, developed so much light and heat that the nāga, completely dazzled, allowed himself to be placed peacefully in the Buddha’s begging bowl. The next day Kāśyapa, a witness to the nāga’s submission, sincerely admired the Buddha’s magical powers, not without thinking himself to be more saintly than the Buddha.

fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) his four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid) his eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā), etc.

Recollecting the immense and inconceivable qualities (apramāṇācintyaḡuṇa) is what is called ‘recollection of the Buddha’ (buddhānusmṛti).

This recollection takes place in seven stages (bhūmi). Sometimes it is impure (sāsrava), sometimes it is pure (anāsrava). If it is impure, it entails retribution (savipāka); if it is pure, it does not entail retribution (avipāka). It is associated with three indriyas (indriyatrayasaṃprayukta), namely, the indriyas of happiness (sukha), satisfaction (saumanasya) and indifference (upekṣā).³⁷⁶

It is acquired by effort (prāyogika) or by retribution (vaipākika). That of the present universe is acquired by effort, e.g., when one practices the concentration of recollection of the Buddha (buddhānusmṛtisamādhī). That of the buddhafield of the Buddha Wou-leang-cheou (Amitāyus) is acquired by retribution; the people who are born there spontaneously (svaraseṇa) recollect the Buddha.³⁷⁷

All this is fully explained in the Abhidharma.

II. RECOLLECTION OF THE DHARMA

Recollection of the dharma (dharmaṇusmṛti). – The Buddha said: “The yogin should recollect the Dharma, skillfully presented, obtaining its retribution in the present lifetime (sāmaḡṛṣṭika) without fear of burning ³⁷⁶ These three indriyas ‘sovereign organs’ in fact make up the members (aṅga) of dhyāna: see above, p. 1237F, n. 3; Kośa, VIII, p. 147.

³⁷⁷ The inhabitants of Sukkhāvatī, the buddhafield of Buddha Amitāyus, spontaneously and effortlessly recollect the Buddha, because it is precisely by the practice of anusmṛti that they are reborn in Sukkhāvatī. See Amitāyurbuddhānusmṛtisūtra, T 365, p. 344c13-17: “There are three kinds of beings who will reborn in Sukkhāvatī. Who are these three? 1) Beings with loving-kindness of mind (maitrīcitta), who do not kill and are endowed with morality (śīla); 2) those who study and recite the Vaipulyasūtra; 3) those who practice the six recollections (ṣaḡanusmṛti). If in applying these merits (puṇyapariṇāmanā) they express the wish to be reborn in this buddhafield and they fulfill these qualities (guṇa) in one to seven days, they will be reborn in Sukkhāvatī.”

Later (k. 29, p. 276a17-22), the Traité will return to this subject: “The bodhisattva always practices the buddhānusmṛtisamādhī and, for that reason, wherever he is reborn, he always encounters the Buddhas. Thus it is said in the Pan tcheou san mei (Pratyutpannasamādhī, T 318): The bodhisattva who enters this samādhī sees the Buddha Amita. This Buddha is asked: As a result of what action has he acquired rebirth in this field? – The Buddha answers: O son of noble family, it is because he has always practiced the buddhānusmṛtisamādhī and his mindfulness was infallible that he obtains rebirth in my buddhafield.”

(nirjvara),³⁷⁸ independent of time (akālika), leading to the good place (aupanāyika), the penetration into which is unhindered.”³⁷⁹

1. Dharma skillfully presented

It is skillfully presented because it is not contradictory to the two truths (satyadvayāvirodhāt), i.e., the conventional truth (saṃvṛtisatya) and the absolute truth (paramārthasatya). The wise man (vijñā) cannot refute it and the fool (bāla) cannot criticize it.

This Dharma is also free of the pairs of extremes (antadvaya), i.e., a life attached to the five objects of enjoyment and pleasure (pañcakāmaḡuṇeṣu kāmasukhallikānuyoga) or a life of personal mortification (ātmaklamathānuyoga).³⁸⁰

It is free of other pairs of extremes: eternalism (śāśvata) and nihilism (uccheda), self (ātman) and non-self (anātman), existence (bhava) and non-existence (abhava). Because it is not attached to these pairs of extremes, the Dharma is said to be ‘skillfully presented’.

Heretics who boast of their own system (svadharmotkarṣa) and denigrate the systems of others (paradarmapaṃsaka) cannot express themselves skillfully.

2. Dharma, obtaining its retribution in the present lifetime

The Dharma obtains its retribution in the present existence (saṃḡṛṣṭika): as it eliminates the various problems of the world caused by lust (rāga) as well as the various teachings (upadeśa) and arguments caused by wrong views (mithyāḡṛṣṭi), body (kāya) and mind (citta) find happiness in it. Thus the Buddha said:

Observing morality is happiness:

Body and mind do not burn;

One sleeps well and, on awakening, one is happy;

One’s fame extends afar.³⁸¹

³⁷⁸ In place of tche-nao, read je-nao, as in the following lines.

³⁷⁹ Here the Traité is taking liberties with the canonical formula cited in the preliminary note to this present chapter.

³⁸⁰ See above, p. 23F, 396F, 655F, 1354F.

³⁸¹ Udānavarga, VI, 3, p. 149.

Moreover, in this Dharma of the Buddha, the linking of causes and conditions (hetupratyaya prabandha) produces the following fruit: Because of [221c] the purity of his morality (śīlavissuddhi), the yogin has no regrets (kaukr̥tya). His mind being without regrets, he produces the joy inherent in the Dharma (dharmopasaṃhitapramōdya). By means of the joy of the Dharma, his body and mind have pleasure (prasrabdhi) and happiness (sukha). His body and mind having pleasure and happiness, he can concentrate his mind. Concentrating his mind, he understands in accordance with the truth (yathābhūtaṃ prajñanāti). Understanding in accordance with the truth, he finds disgust (nirveda). Finding disgust, he becomes detached from desire (virajyate). Detached from desire, he obtains deliverance (vimukti), he obtains the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) of deliverance, he obtains nirvāṇa.³⁸²

As for the heretics (tīrthika), their Dharma is void (śūnya), painful (duṣkaracārin) and without result.

[Story of Jambuka]. – Thus the arhat Yen-fou (Jambuka) said the following when he acquired bodhi:

Formerly I was a heretic
For fifty-five years;
I ate only dried cow-dung
And I slept on thorns.

Having endured such cruel tortures, I gained nothing from them, not like today when, having seen the Buddha and having heard the Dharma, I have left home (pravrajita) and, in three days, having done what had to be done (kṛtakṛtya), I have become arhat.³⁸³

³⁸² Phrases borrowed from the stock of nava prāmodyapūrvakā dharmāḥ: Mahāvvyūty., no. 1586-1595: Prītimuditasya prītir jāyate, prītimanasah kāyah ... vimukto 'smīti jñānadarśanaṃ bhavati.

Samyutta, IV, p. 79; II, p. 95: Pamuditassa pīti jāyati, pītimanassa kāyo ... vimuccati, vimuttasmiṃ vimuttamhīti ñāṇaṃ hoti.

³⁸³ Theragāthā, p. 34, v. 283-286: Pañcapaññāsa vassāni rajojallaṃ adhārayim / ... tisso vijjā anupattū, kataṃ buddhassa sāsanam ti //

Transl.- “For fifty-five years I covered myself with dust and dirt, eating only one meal per month, and I tore out my hair and beard.

I stood on one foot and refused to sit down; I ate dry dung and accepted no invitations.

Having followed this path that leads to the bad destinies for so long, borne along by the stream, I took refuge in the Buddha.

Wonder at this refuge! Admire the excellence of the Dharma! I have obtained the three knowledges and have carried out the Buddha’s command.”

For more details, see Comm. on the Theragāthā, I, p. 386 seq. (tr. Rhys Davids, Brethren, p. 179-180) and Comm. on the Dhammapada, II, p. 52-63 (tr. Burlingame, II, p. 130-137):

At the time of the Buddha Kāśyapa, Jambuka as an elder lived with a lay devotee. A wandering monk, in the course of his alms-round, came to the layman and was welcomed there. In a fit of jealousy,

This is why we know that the Dharma of the Buddha ‘obtains its fruit in the present lifetime’.

Question. – If the Dharma of the Buddha obtains its fruit in the present lifetime, how is it that, among the disciples of the Buddha, some derive nothing from it?

Answer. – The yogin who knows the words of the Buddha and applies them constantly cannot fail to receive his reward (vipāka). In the same way, the sick person (glāna) who follows the orders of a good physician (vaidya) and takes all the medicine (pratipakṣa) cannot fail to be cured.

On the other hand, if the yogin does not conform to the Buddha’s instructions and does not apply them constantly, his immorality (dauḥśīlya) and his distractions (cittavikṣepa) will cause him to obtain nothing. But it is false that the Dharma is not good.

Moreover, if those who have not attained bodhi do not arrive at nirvāṇa in the present lifetime, in the future lifetime they will, nonetheless, have wealth and happiness and, little by little (kramaśas), they will attain nirvāṇa. Finally, their efforts will not be in vain. Thus the Buddha said: “Those who have gone forth from home (pravrajita) in view of nirvāṇa will all reach nirvāṇa, some slowly (mandam) and other quickly (śighram).³⁸⁴ Thus the Dharma ‘obtains its fruit in the present existence’ (sāṃdṛṣṭika).

3. Dharma without torment of burning

The Dharma is without the torment of burning (nirjvara). These sufferings of burning are of two kinds: torments of the body (kāyopāyāsa) and torments of the mind (cittopāyāsa). The torments of the body are fetters, prison, beatings, being put to death, etc. The torments of the mind are sadness (daurmanasya), fear Jambuka insulted the visitor and declared that for his part he would never accept anything from lay people and rather preferred to eat dung, tear out his hair, go naked and sleep on the ground.

At the time of Buddha Śākyamuni, Jambuka took birth in a wealthy family of Rājagṛha, As a child, he refused all normal food and ate his own excrement; when he was grown, he went quite naked and slept on the ground. His parents put him in the hands of the Ājivikas, naked ascetics, who accepted him into their order. But Jambuka refused to follow his colleagues on their alms-rounds. When they were far away, he went into the public latrines to eat excrement. When he felt someone watching him, he stood on one foot and turned his open mouth into the wind. Among those who questioned him, he passed as a great ascetic, an eater of wind, refusing all food. Once a month, however, he accepted putting on his tongue a bit of butter and honey on the end of a piece of kuśa grass: such condescension, he said, would assure the spectators eternal salvation. He lived thus for fifty-five years. One day the Buddha came to stay in a near-by cave and Jambuka noticed that, during the night, the four kings of the gods, Śakra and Brahmā came to serve the Teacher. To his astonishment, the Buddha explained that he was superior to these great deities. Jambuka converted and attained arhathood.

This story should be compared to the Jāmbālāvadāna contained in the Avadānaśatsks, I, p. 279-288 (transl. Feer, p. 190-194) and translated into Chinese as the Sīuan tso po yuan king, T 200, k. 5, p. 227a-228a.

³⁸⁴ Unidentified passage. On the superiority of the monastics’ morality, see above, p. 839-846F.

(bhaya), etc., caused by desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa), avarice (mātsrya) or jealousy (īrṣyā). In the Dharma of the Buddha, since morality is pure, the body escapes from the torments of fetters, prison, beatings, being put to death, etc. Since the mind has eliminated the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa), eliminated the five obstacles (pañcanīvaraṇa) and obtained true bodhi, it escapes from the torments of desire, hatred, avarice, jealousy, doubt (vicikitsā), etc., and as there are no torments, there is no burning (jvara).

Moreover, the trances (dhyāna) and the pure absorptions (samāpatti) produce joy and happiness including all the physical sensations (kāyavedanā): this is why all the burning has gone away. Thus, when a man tormented by great heat (gharmāṛta) reaches a clear cool pool (taḍāga), the cold revives him and he no longer suffers from the heat.

Moreover, whether they depend on wrong views (dṛṣṭyapekṣa) or whether they depend on thirst (tṛṣṇāpekṣa),³⁸⁵ the disturbing emotions (kleśa) are called ‘burnings’ (jvara). Since they are absent in the Dharma of the Buddha, the latter is called ‘without torment of burning’ (nirjvara).

4. The Dharma is independent of time

The Dharma is independent of time (akālika). The Dharma of the Buddha acts [222a] independently of time and gives its fruit (phalaṃ dadāti) independently of time. Among the heretics (tīrthika), some rules hold when the sun has not risen but do not hold when the sun has risen; some hold when the sun has risen but do not hold when the sun has not risen; yet others are valid in the daytime but are not valid at night, and finally some hold at night but do not hold in the daytime. In the Dharma of the Buddha, time does not intervene: when one has cultivated the noble eightfold Path (āryāṣṭāṅgikmārga), one attains nirvāṇa. Just as fire (agni) burns when it finds kindling (indhana), so pure wisdom (anāsrava prajñā), as soon as it arises, burns all the disturbing emotions (kleśa), and that independently of time.

Question. – But the Buddha spoke of medicine at the proper time (kālabhaiṣajya), of clothing at the proper time (kālavasana), of food at the proper time (kālabhojana),³⁸⁶ and the good roots that are not yet ripe (aparipakvakuśalamūla) will ripen in a person when they meet up with the favorable time. How can you say that [the Dharma] is independent of time (akālika)?

Answer. – In these cases, when speaking of time, the Buddha is speaking in accord with worldly usage (lokaśamvṛti) and, in order that his doctrine should last for a long time, he has linked his arguments with time. But when one cultivates the Path, one obtains nirvāṇa and its wondrous qualities, the concentrations (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā); these do not depend on time.

³⁸⁵ These two kinds of negative emotions are mentioned above, p. 211F, 213F.

³⁸⁶ For example, the Buddha authorized the use of five kinds of medicines “at the suitable time if they have been accepted at the appropriate time” (anujānāmi bhikkhave pañc bhesajjāni kāle pariggahetva kāle paribhuñitum): cf. Vinaya, I, p.200. Similarly, he carefully distinguished meals at the proper time (kālabhojana) from meals outside the proper time (vikālabhojana): cf. Saṃyutta, V, p. 470.

The rules of the heretics all depend on time; the Dharma of the Buddha demands only that the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) be fulfilled. As long as [the three elements of the Path], morality (śīla), samadhi and wisdom (prajñā) are not perfected (sampanna), one does not obtain bodhi. When morality, samadhi and wisdom are perfected, the fruit is attained and does not depend on time.

Moreover, we speak of time when a long time is necessary to obtain the fruit, but once the fruit is obtained, there is no further question of time. Thus, when a good dye (rañjana) has penetrated [the cloth], it is fixed; it is the same for a person whose mind is pure: as soon as he has heard the Dharma, he is tinged with it and he obtains the purity of the Dharma eye (dharmacakṣurviśuddhi). Therefore the Dharma is ‘independent of time’ (akālika).

5. Dharma leading to the good place

The Dharma leads to the good place (auṇayika). The thirty-seven pure auxiliaries of Bodhi (saptatṛiṃśad anāsrava bodhipākṣikadharmāḥ) lead (upanayanti) a person to nirvāṇa. Thus, when one sets sail on the Ganges, one necessarily reaches the great ocean.³⁸⁷

The outside heretical systems (anyatīrthika) which the Omniscient One (sarvajñā) did not preach that are full of wrong views (mithyadrṣṭi) lead to the bad places or, if they sometimes lead to the heavens (svarga), one falls back from them and suffers. Not being eternal, these heavens are not ‘the good place’.

Question. – If the leader (upanetr) does not exist, how ‘to lead’ to the good place?

Answer. – It is true that the leader does not exist. Only dharms can lead other dharms. The pure and good abandonment (anāsravakuśalaprahāṇa) of the five aggregates of existence (pañcaskandha) – aggregates to which is given the power of the name of being (sattva) – lead to nirvāṇa in the same way that the wind (vāyu) blows the dust (rajas) or the water (vāri) carries away straw (tṛṇa). Even without a leader, there can be progress (gamana).

Moreover, in the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagrī), there is neither agent (kāraka) nor leader (upanetr) who exercises control (vaśita) over the causes and conditions on which the retribution depends.

6. Dharma of unhindered penetration

³⁸⁷ Canonical comparison: cf. Saṃyutta, IV, p. 179: Samuddaninno bhikkhave Gaṅgāya nadiyā soto samuddapoṇo samuddapabbhāro.

The Dharma is of unhindered penetration. Utilizing the seals of the Dharma (dharmamudrā) of the Buddha,³⁸⁸ his penetration is unhindered in the same way that the holder of the royal seal (rājāmudrā) is never delayed or restricted [in his movements].

³⁸⁸ By dharmamudrā, the Traité means three fundamental characteristics of things preached by the Buddha: Sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ, sarvadharmā anātmānaḥ, śāntaṃ nirvāṇam, “All formations (i.e., all dharmas coming from causes) are impermanent; all dharmas are without self, peaceful is nirvāṇa”: cf. K. 15, p. 170a2-4 (above, p. 912F); k. 22, p. 222a28-b1; k. 26, p. 253c13-15; k. 32, p. 297c23-24. As we are about to see, such statements are frequent in the canonical texts but, as far as I [Lamotte] know, the expression dharmamudrā does not appear in the Pāli Nikāya. On the other hand, in the Sanskrit Saṃyuktāgama translated into Chinese by Guṇabhadra (436-443), there is an Āryadharmamudrāsūtra, T 99, no. 80, k. 3, p. 20a25-b28. Before that, Dharmarakṣa had given a separate translation under the name Cheng fa yin king, T 103, p. 500a-b: it was published the 5th day of the 12th month of the 4th yuan-k’ang year, i.e., January 7, 295 (cf. Li-tai, T 2034, k. 6, p. 63c22-23). This sūtra was authoritative for the Sarvāstivādins as well as the Mādhyamikans: it is cited in the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 104, p. 541c10; T 1546, k. 46, p. 359a23), the Che tchou p’i p’o cha louen (T 1521, k. 1, p. 25a17; k. 10, p. 73b23), the Maitreyapariṣchopedeśa (T 1525, k. 2, p. 240b15) and the Satyasiddhiśāstra (T 1546, k. 6, p. 281c2; k. 12, p. 332c15; k. 15, p. 363b23, 365a26).

Whether it is used in the doctrines of the Lesser or the Greater Vehicle, the term dharmamudrā appears frequently in the Mahāyānasūtras: cf. Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 28, l. 8, 92, l. 13; Avatamsaka, T 279, k. 5, p. 22c1; k. 18, p. 97a17-18; Ratnolādhārāṇi, T 299, k. 2, p. 891a24; Ratnakūṭa, T 310, k. 6, p. 35a11; k. 6, p. 36a1; k. 25, p. 141a; k. 116, p. 656c12; T 355, k. 1, p. 237a3.

The phrases used to express the nature of things permit many variations:

A. TWO STATEMENTS. – Sabbe saṅkhārā aniccā, sabbe dhammā anattā: cf. Saṃyutta, III, p. 132, l. 26; 133, l. 1 and 31; 134, l. 3.

B. THREE STATEMENTS. – Sabbe saṅkhārā aniccā, sabbe saṅkhārā dukkhā, sabbe dhammā anattā: cf. Anguttara, I, p. 286, l. 8, 14 and 20.

The postcanonical Pāli sources call Tilakkhaṇa ‘Three Natures’ impermanence, suffering and non-self mentioned in this phrase: cf. Comm. on Jātaka, I, p. 48, l. 28; 275, l. 23; III, p. 377, l. 5.

C. THREE STATEMENTS. – Sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ, sarvadharmā anātmānaḥ, śāntaṃ nirvāṇam: cf. Saṃyukta, T 99, k. 10, p. 66b14; 66c7 and 21; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 9, p. 45a21; Northern Mahāparinirvāṇa, T 374, k. 13, p. 443a2-3.

D. The same statements, but with the name Sa fa yin ‘Three Dharmamudrās’. – Sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ, sarvadharmā anātmānaḥ, śāntaṃ nirvāṇam: cf. Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1442, k. 9, p. 670c2-3; Satyasiddhiśāstra, T 1646, k. 1, p. 243c17-18; Lien houa mien king, T 386, k. 2, p. 1077a23-24 and 26-27; Mahāyānāvātāra, T 1634, k. 1, p. 38c23.

As we have seen at the beginning of this note, this is the formula adopted by the Traité.

E. FOUR STATEMENTS, entitled Sseu fa pen or Sseu fa pen mo ‘Fourfold beginning and end of dharmas’ which may be reconstructed in Sanskrit as Dharmapūrvāparānta: Sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ, Question. – What are the seals of the Buddha’s Dharma?

Answer. – There are three kinds of seals of the Buddha’s Dharma: i) All conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmā) arising and perishing from moment to moment are impermanent (anitya); ii) All dharmas are without self (anātman); [222b] iii) Peaceful is nirvāṇa (śāntaṃ nirvāṇam).

[1. Sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ]. – The yogin knows that the threefold world (tridhātu) is entirely composed of arisings and ceasings governed by causes (saṃskṛtā utpādanirodhāḥ). The formations (saṃskāra) that previously existed no longer exist; those that exist now will not exist later. These instantaneous arisings and cessations (kṣaṇikā utpādanirodhāḥ) coming forth like a series (saṃtānasādrśya) may be seen and cognized in the way that one cognizes and sees a series of similar [moments] (sadrśasaṃtāna) in the water of a river (nadījala), the flame of a lamp (dīpajvāla) or a storm. This is why people consider them to be a living being (sattva) and, by a mistake consisting of taking what is impermanent to be permanent (anitye iti viparyāsaḥ), people speak about a changeable (gantr) [entity] lasting forever.³⁸⁹ That is the seal confirming the impermanence of all formations (saṃskārānityatā).

[2. Sarvadharmā anātmānaḥ]. – All dharmas are without self. In dharmas there is neither lord (īśvara, svāmin), nor agent (kāraka), knower (jānaka), seeing subject (paśyaka), living object (jīva), or doer of actions. All dharmas depend on causes and conditions (hetupratyayāpekṣa); depending on causes and conditions, they are not autonomous (svatantra); since they are not autonomous, they are not self, and the nature of self is non-existent (ātmalakṣaṇam nopalabhyate), as is said in the P’o-wo-p’in sarvasaṃskārā duḥkhāḥ, sarvasaṃskārā anātmānaḥ, śāntaṃ nirvāṇam: cf. Ekottara, T 125, k. 18, p. 640b13-18; k. 36, p. 749a7-11.

This formula is evidently faulty for it is not just the saṃskāras but also all dharmas that are anātman.

F. FOUR STATEMENTS. – Sarvasaṃskārā anityāḥ, sarvasaṃskārā duḥkhāḥ, sarvadharmā anātmānaḥ, śāntaṃ nirvāṇam (cf. Sūtrālaṃkāra, p. 149, l. 1-3), or the variant Anityāḥ sarvasaṃskārāḥ, duḥkhāḥ sarvasaṃskārāḥ, anātmānaḥ sarvadharmāḥ, śāntaṃ nirvāṇam (cf. Bodh. bhūmi, p. 277, l. 5-10).

These four statements are variously named:

1) Sseu fa pen ‘Fourfold root of dharmas’: cf. Ekottara, T 35, k. 23, p. 668c3-8;

2) Fourfold dharmamudrā: cf. Tathāgataguhyasūtra, T 312, k. 17, p. 741b7-12;

Bodhisattvapīṭaka, T 316, k. 7, p. 794c21-24.

3) Fourfold dharmoddāna ‘Summary of dharmas’ (in Chinese, Sseu fa yeou t’o na): cf. Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, T 476, k. 6, p. 586c14; Sūtrālaṃkāra, p. 17, l. 3; 55, l. 6; 73, l. 22; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 277, l. 5 (T 1579, k. 46, p. 544a6).

G. FIVE STATEMENTS. – Anityāḥ sarvasaṃskārāḥ, duḥkhāḥ sarvasaṃskārāḥ, śūnyāḥ sarvadharmāḥ anātmānaḥ sarvadharmāḥ, śāntaṃ nirvāṇam: cf. Vimalakīrti, p. 165.

H. TEN STATEMENTS. – Che fa-yin ‘The ten dharmamudrās’: cf. Avatamsaka, T 279, k. 41, p. 218a6-15.

³⁸⁹ This is fully explained in Kośa, IX, p. 279-281.

(Ātmapratīṣedhaprakaraṇa) ‘Chapter on the refutation of the self’.³⁹⁰ This is the seal of non-self (anātmamudrā).

³⁹⁰ Tenth chapter (prakaraṇa) of the Catuḥśataka ‘The Four Hundreds’ by Āryadeva. As its name indicates, this work consisted of 400 stanzas (kārikā) divided up into 16 chapters of 25 stanzas each.

The work exists completely only in Tibetan translation:

1) Bstan bcos bĕi brgya pa ĕes baĥi leĥur byas pa (Catuḥśatakaśāstrakārikā), translated by Sūkṣmajāna in India and revised by Sūryakīrti of the Pa-tshab: cf. Tib. Trip., vol. 95, no. 5246, p. 131-1-1 to 139-5-3.

2) Byaṅ chub sems dpaĥi ĥbyor spyod bĕi paĥi rgya cher ĥgrel pa (Bodhisattvayogacaryācatuḥśatakaĥikā), commentary by Candrakīrti, also translated by Sūkṣmajāna and Sūryakīrti: cf. Tib. Trip., vol. 98, no. 5266, p. 183-4-4 to end.

Sanskrit fragments of the work have been found and edited by Haraprasad Sastri in Memoirs of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, III, no. 8, 1914, p. 449514. See also P. Vaidya, Études sur Āryadeva et son Catuḥśataka, 1923, p. 69-167; G. Tucci, La versione cinese del Catuḥśaka... confrontata col testa sanscrito e la traduzione tibetana, Rivista degli Studi Orientali, X, 1925, p. 521-567; L. de La Vallée Poussin, Le Nirvāṇa d’après Āryadeva, MCB, I, 1931-32, p. 130-135; Vidhushekhara Bhattacharya, The Catuḥśataka of Āryadeva, Chap. VII, Proceedings and Transactions of the 4th Oriental Conference, II, 1926, p. 831-871; The Catuḥśataka of Āryadeva, Sanskrit and Tibetan Texts with copious Extracts from the Commentary of Candrakīrti, reconstructed and edited, Part II (Visvabharati Series No. 2, 1931).

The Chinese also translated just the last chapters of the Catuḥśataka:

1) Kouang po louen pen, T 1570. Translation of kārikā no. 291-400 made by Hiuan-tsang at Ta ts’eu ngen sseu, the 10th day of the 6th month of the 1st *yong-houe*i year, i.e., July 13, 650 (cf. K’ai-yuan, T 2154, k. 8, p. 556b21).

2) Ta tch’eng kouang po louen che louen, T 1571. Translation of the same kārikās with commentary by Dharmapāla, begun on the 27th day of the same year, January 20, 651 (cf. K’ai-yuan, T 2154, k. 8, p. 556b22).

The tenth chapter to which the Traité refers here is part of the chapter conserved in the three languages. It is dedicated to refutation of the ātman and entitled Yogācārecatuḥśatake ātmaśuddhyupāyaśaṃdarśanaṃ nāma daśamaṃ prakaraṇam in the Sanskrit fragments (cf. Vaidya, o.c., p. 89), Bdag dḡag pa bsgom pa pstan pa (Ātmapratīṣedhabhāvanāśaṃdarśana) in the Tibetan versions (Tib. Trip., vol. 95, no. 5246, p. 137-1-5; vol. 98, no. 5266, p. 241-2-6), P’o wo p’in (Ātmapratīṣedhaprakaraṇa) in the Chinese versions (T 1570, k. 1, p. 182c18; T 1571, k. 2, p. 194a27). It is also by the name P’o wo p’in that the Traité cites it here.

In the Madh. vṛtti on Nāgārjuna’s Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, Candrakīrti refers to the Catuḥśataka by Āryadeva in various ways: Uktam Āryadevena (p. 16, 199), Uktam Āryadevapādīḥ (p. 220, 359, 376), Uktam Śatake (p. 173, 351, 372, 378, 396, 505), Śatakaśāstre (p. 506), Śatakaśāstre cāryadevapādair (p. 552). All these references have been identified by L. de La Vallée Poussin in his edition of the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā with comm. by Candrakīrti, 1903 and foll. This is indeed the Catuḥśataka. But the fact of having omitted the numeral catuḥ might lead to confusion because, besides the Catuḥśataka ‘Four Hundreds’, Āryadeva also composed a Śatakaśāstra ‘Treatise in a hundred [kārikās]’, totally unknown in the Sanskrit and Tibetan traditions but which was authorized in China in the school of the Three Treatises.

This Śatakaśāstra by Āryadeva, with a commentary by Vasu-bodhisattva, was translated into Chinese by Kumārajīva under the title of Po louen: T 1569. The translation was done at Tch’ang-ngan in the 6th hong-che year, i.e., in 404 (cf. Tch’ou, T 2145, k. 2, p. 11a21; Li-tai, T 2134, K. 8, p. 79a5). The work has been fully translated into English by G. Tucci, Pre-Diṇṇāga Buddhist Texts on Logic from Chinese Sources (Gaekwad’s Oriental Series, vol. 49), 1929, and partially into French by L. de La Vallée Poussin, Le Nirvāṇa d’après Āryadeva, MCB, I, 1931-2, p. 128-130. Kumārajīva’s translation is introduced by a preface T 1569, p. 167c-168a; Tch’ou, T 2145, k. 11, p. 77b-c) by his disciple and collaborator Seng-tchao (384-414): ‘Eight hundred and some years after the Buddha’s nirvāṇa, a great monastic scholar named T’i-p’o (Deva) composed a treatise in a hundred stanzas, the Śatakaśāstra. This treatise consisted of twenty chapters (prakaraṇa) of five stanzas each. It was commented on by P’o-seou k’ai-che (Vasu, the bodhisattva), a scholar who was the authority of his time: “What he says cannot be disputed, what he refutes cannot be re-established.” Kumārajīva, the Indian śramaṇa, translated the last ten chapters of this treatise (i.e., stanzas 51-100).”

It may be noted that the ten chapters of the Śatakaśāstra translated by Kumārajīva deal with the same subject as the eight chapters of the Catuḥśāstra translated by Hiuan-tsang and often carry the same titles. Thus the second chapter of the Śatakaśāstra, entitled P’o chen p’in (T 1569, k. 1, p. 170c11-174b21) correspond to the second chapter of the Catuḥśataka entitled P’o wo p’in (T 1570, k. 1, p. 182c18-183b10). But although the subject is the same, the explanation is quite different.

In citing the P’o wo p’in, the Traité does not refer to a chapter of the Prajñāpāmitā as I [Lamotte] first thought, for no chapter of this name appears in the Tables Comparatives des versions des Prajñāpāramitā prepared by Hikata and added to his edition of the Suvikrāntavikrāmaparipṛcchā. Neither does the Traité refer here to a chapter of the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (or Madhyamaśāstra) of Nāgārjuna, for chapter XVIII which deals with the ātman is entitled ‘Examination of the ātman’ (Ātmaparīkṣā in Sanskrit, Bdag brtag pa in Tibetan, Kouan-wo in Chinese). The only chapter that enters into consideration here is the Ātmapratīṣedhaprakaraṇa of the Catuḥśataka by Āryadeva.

This citation is of importance because it proves that the first Madhyamika authors (Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva, Rāhulabhadra) were known to the author of the Traité and consequently the latter is later than them:

1) The Mūlamadhyamakakārikās (or Madhyamakaśāstra) of Nāgārjuna are, with the Prajñāpāramitā, the main source of inspiration for the Traité. Sometimes the latter cites entire passages without referring to it by name (e.g., p.1204F seq.), sometimes it gives the title: Madhyamakaśāstra; cf. k. 1, p. 64b11 (above, p. 69F); k. 19, p. 198a5 (above p. 1142F); k. 25, p. 245c7-8; k. 38, p. 338b29.

2) We have seen that it refers to Āryadeva’s Catuḥśataka by designating it simply with the title of a chapter, a strange method of reference but to which it is accustomed.

3) Above (p. 1060-1065F), it has reproduced in its entirety Rāhulabhadra’s Prajñāpāramitāśotra.

Nāgārjuna, Āryadeva and Rāhulabhadra represent the first lineage of Madhyamika scholars. Their biographies are legendary and their dates uncertain. Not content with giving us contradictory information on them, the sources confuse them with the siddhas of the same name who were present at Nalandā several centuries later (see above, Vol. I, p. XIF, notes 8 and 9).

In the introduction to Vimalakīrti, p. 70-71, I [Lamotte] have tried to interpret the facts given in the 5th century by Kumārajīva, his disciples Seng-tchao and Seng-juoei and his illustrious friend Houei-yuan. It seems indeed that the eminent individuals place Nāgārjuna between 243 and 300 C.E.

The Indians, Chinese and Tibetans agree in making Āryadeva the pupil of Nāgārjuna. Here it will suffice to refer the reader to the note on Āryadeva published in Ceylon Encyclopedia, vol. II, p. 109-115. At the beginning of his commentary on the Catuḥśataka, Candrakīrti (c. 600-650 C.E.) tells us: “Āryadeva was born in the island of Sīṃhala (Ceylon) and was the son of the king of the land. After having been crown prince, he renounced the world, went to Dakṣiṇa (Dekkan), became a disciple of Nāgārjuna and followed his teachings.”

The Ceylonese chronicles of the Dīpavaṃsa (XXII, v. 41 and 50) and the Mahāvāṃsa (XXXVI, v. 29) make mention of a mahāthera Deva who lived in Ceylon at the time of the heresy of the Vetullavāda, i.e., of the Mahāyāna which spread in the island. Deva attracted the good graces of kings Vohārikatissa (260-282 C.E.) and Saṃghatissa (293-297 C.E.). This detail allows us to place Deva in Ceylon in the second half of the 3rd century.

From Ceylon, Deva, alias Āryadeva, went to southern India and traveled over the entire continent. In the 7th century, Hui-an-tsang found traces of his passage from Śrughna near the sources of the Ganges (Si-yu-ki, T 2087, k. 4, p. 891b) to Prayāga at the junction of the Yamunā and the Ganges (k. 5, p. 897b), at Pāṭaliputra (k. 8, p. 912c), at Dakṣiṇakosala (k. 10, p. 929a-c) and in the land of Cola (k. 10, p. 931b). The meeting between Āryadeva and Nāgārjuna “who was already old and weak” took place at Pāṭaliputra, capital of Magadha. The Ceylonese monk embraced the ideas of the old man and became a convinced Mādhyamikan. His many adventures and his physical traits explain the large number of nicknames that serve to designate him: Kānadeva, Nīlanetra, Piṅgalanetra, Piṅgalacakṣus, Kārṇatipa, etc. Among his works that he published, apparently after his teacher’s death in the first years of the 4th century C.E., the Madhyamakaśāstra (T 1564), commentary on the Mūlamadhyamakakārikās of Nāgārjuna, and the ‘Hundreds’ (Catuḥśataka and Śatakaśāstra), polemical works discussed above.

Rāhulabhadra was certainly associated with the Madhyamaka propaganda from the beginning, but we do not know where to place him exactly.

In a series of fourteen stanzas the original Sanskrit of which was found by G. Tucci and published in Oriens Extremus, IX, 1962, p. 49-51, Candrakīrti summarizes the activity of the early Mādhyamikans in the following way:

*Spaṣṭaṃ Rāhulabhadrapādasahito Nāgārjunō tanmatam Devedāpy anugamyamānavacanaḥ kālaṃ ciraṃ dīṣṭavān / tacchāstrapravivekamiścitadhiyaś tīrthyās vijītyākhilāṃs
tacchisyā api śāsanam munivaryādiṣṭavantaś ciraṃ || 6||*

“In the presence of the Venerable Rāhulabhadra, Nāgārjuna, whose words were followed also by Deva, has explained clearly and fully the mind of this [Buddha]. The disciples of this [Nāgārjuna] also, having their opinions determined by examination of the treatise by this [Nāgārjuna] and having vanquished all the heretics, have fully explained the doctrine of the best of Munis, [i.e., the Buddha].”

The term Rāhulabhadrapādasahita, in Tibetan, Sgra gcan ḥdzin ni bzan poḥi ḥal sna dan bcas, literally means ‘endowed with the feet of Rāhulabhadra’, but after a proper name, pāda is a title of respect; this is why I [Lamotte] have translated it as in the presence of the ‘Venerable’ Rāhulabhadra. Nevertheless, pāda has other meanings than that of ‘feet’, mainly that of ‘verse, line with a 4-strophe’. Candrakīrti, by a play of words of which the Indians are so fond, perhaps chose the expression to suggest to the minds of his readers the famous ‘strophes’ of which Rāhulabhadra was the author, namely the twenty strophes of the Prajñāpāramitāstotra appearing as the heading to the Sanskrit manuscripts of the Prajñāpāramitā (Aṣṭasāhasrikā, ed. R. Mitra; Pañcaviṃśatisāh., ed. N. Dutt; Suvikrātavikrāmin, ed. R. Hikata) and cited fully by the Traité (p. 1969-1965F).

In any hypothesis, it seems that to Candrakīrti’s eyes Rāhulabhadra was Nāgārjuna’s inspiration and preceded him in time.

But the problem is not that simple. Information equally as old in date but coming, it is true, from the Chinese, make Rāhulabhadra a contemporary of Nāgārjuna and a commentator of his works.

Ki tsang (549-623) of the San louen sect says: “The dharmācārya Rāhula was a contemporary of Nāgārjuna and explained the eight negations” (Tchong kouan louan chou, T 1824, k. 3, p. 40c16-17.

Tchan jan (711-782) of the T’ien t’ai sect, mentions four basic works in regard to Nāgārjuna: “There is the commentary of Piṅgalanetra called Madhyamakaśāstra which was translated by Kumārajīva of the Heou Ts’in (T 1564). Secondly, the commentary of Asaṅga called Chouen tchong louen which was translated by Bodhiruci of the Heou Wei (T 1565): there are only two rolls of it. The others have not been published. Thirdly, the commentary of the dharmācārya Rāhula, also called Madhyamakaśāstra; Paramārtha of the Leang translated it but we have only one chapter on the hetupratyaya. Fourthly, the commentary of the bodhisattva Bhāvivēka, called Prajñāpraṭipāśāstra; the Tripiṭaka master Po p’o (Prabhāmītra) of the T’ang translated it (T 1566); it is in sixteen rolls” (Tche kouan fou hing tchouan hong kiue, T 1912, k. 1, p. 140c1-5).

Rāhulabhadra appears here in appropriate place but it is especially his stotras that made him famous. In the words of Mochizuki, Encyclopaedia, p. 1953, E. Kawaguchi has brought from Tibet a manuscript of the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka with twenty stanzas of homage written by Rāhulabhadra in honor of this text. Other stanzas attributed to Rāhula or Rāhulabhadra are also cited by Śāramati in his Mahāyānāvātāraśāstra (T 1634, k. 2, p. 48a15 and 48c12) and by Asaṅga in the Chouen tchong louen (T 1565, k. 1, p. 40b18).

Like the other famous Mādhyamikas, Rāhulabhadra was drawn by the Chinese into the cycle of the patriarchs where he occupies the 15th or 16th place, after Nāgārjuna and Kānadeva: cf. Fou fa tsang yin yuan tchouan, T 2058, k. 6, p. 319c14-329a1; Fou tsou t’ong ki, T 2035, k. 5, p. 175b2-17; Fou tsou tai t’ong tsi, T 2036, k. 4, p. 504c8-505b2). He appears again in the lists of siddhas (cf. G. Tucci, A Sanskrit Biography of the Siddhas and some questions connected with Nāgārjuna, Jour. and Proc. of the Question. – How is it that only the conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma or saṃskāra) are impermanent (anitya) whereas ‘all’ dharmas are non-self (anātman)?

Answer. – Unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛtadharma), being without causes (ahetuka) or conditions (apratyaya), do not arise and do not cease. As they do not arise and do not cease, they are not said to be impermanent.

Furthermore, one cannot produce attachment of mind (cittābhiniveśa) or error (viparyaya) toward unconditioned dharmas; this is why they are not said to be impermanent (anitya) but they can be said to be non-self (anātman). People say that the ātman is eternal (nitya), universally extended (vyāpin) and endowed with knowledge (jñānin); this is why [the sūtra] speaks of non-self in regard to ‘all’ dharmas.

[3. Śāntaṃ nirvāṇam]. - Peacefulness is nirvāṇa because the fire of the three poisons (triviṣa) and the threefold degeneration is destroyed in it. This is the seal of peace (śāntamudrā).

Question. – Why does the seal of peace apply to only one dharma [namely, nirvāṇa] and not to several?

Answer. – In the first seal, it is a matter of the five aggregates (pañcaskandha); in the second seal, it is a question of all dharmas, qualified as non-self; in the third seal it is a question of the fruit (phala) of the first two, [namely, nirvāṇa]: it is called the seal of peace.

[By saying] that all the formations are impermanent (sarvasaṃskāra anityāḥ), the five outer objects of enjoyment (bāhyakāmaguṇa) considered as belonging to a self (ātmīya) are destroyed. [By saying] that all dharmas are without self (sarvadharmā anātmānaḥ), the inner self (adhyātman) is destroyed. The ‘I’ and the ‘mine’ being destroyed, there is śāntaṃ nirvāṇam.

Considering the impermanence of the formations (saṃskārānityatā), the yogin experiences disgust (nirveda) for the suffering of the world but, while knowing this disgust and this suffering, he remains attached to the view of the svāmin, the sovereign entity “capable”, he says, “of having this thought”. – This is why there is a second seal of the Dharma (dharmamudrā): the yogin knows that all dharmas are without Asiatic Soc. of Bengal, XXVI, 1930, p. 138-155). In turn, the Tibetan historians introduce him into the Nālandā cycle: Bu-ston (II, p. 123, 135) and make him the teacher of Nāgārjuna, whereas Tāranātha (p. 85-86) gives him as student of and successor to Āryadeva.

It is not impossible that Nāgārjuna would have cited him, but death prevented him from referring to the works of his close or distant successors such as Āryadeva or Rāhulabhadra. The first was certainly his disciple and the Śātakas of which he was the author, while remaining in the lineage of the teacher, show a style and concerns that are quite different.

The Traité, which loosely quotes Nāgārjuna’s Mūlamadhyamakārikās, Āryadeva’s Śataka, and Rāhulabhadra’s Stotra, is not therefore the work of Nāgārjuna but, as has already been suspected by P. Demiéville, “the work of Sarvāstivādin adepts of the Lesser Vehicle converted to the Greater Vehicle of the Mādhyamika school” (JA, 1951, p. 282).

Otherwise, if the chronology presented here is correct, if the activity of Nāgārjuna is placed in the middle of the 3rd century and that of Āryadeva between the end of the 3rd and the beginning of the 4th centuries, the compilation of the Traité should cover the first decades of the 4th century of our era self (sarvadharmā anātmānaḥ). Analyzing the five aggregates (skandha), the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana), the eighteen elements (dhātu) and the twelve causes (nidāna) inwardly and outwardly (adhyātmabahirdhā) to look for a svāmin, he does not find any. And as the latter does not exist, all dharmas are without self and are inactive. – Recognizing this, the yogin stops his futile proliferation (prapañca) and, having no other refuge (niśraya), he takes refuge only in cessation (nirodha): hence the seal of śāntaṃ nirvāṇam.

Question. – In the Mahāyāna it is said: “Dharmas do not arise, are not destroyed and have but one single nature (ekalakṣaṇa), viz., the absence of nature (alakṣaṇa).”³⁹¹ Why is it said here that all conditioned dharmas are impermanent and that that is a seal of the Dharma? Are these two teachings not contradictory (virodha)? [222c]

Answer. - To consider impermanence (anityatā) is to consider emptiness (śūnyatā). If one considers form (rūpa) as momentary (kṣaṇika) and impermanent (anitya), one knows that it is empty (śūnya). The past substance (atītaṃ rūpaṃ), being destroyed, it is invisible (adrśya) and thus without the nature of substance. The future substance (anāgataṃ rūpaṃ), not yet being born, is without activity, without function and invisible, thus without the nature of substance. The present substance (pratyutpanna rūpaṃ) also is without duration, invisible and non-discernible, thus without the nature of substance. Absence of substance is emptiness; emptiness is non-arising and non-cessation. Non-arising (anutpāda) and non-cessation (anirrodha), arising (utpāda) and cessation (nirrodha) are in reality (tattvena) one and the same thing. The explanation can be both developed (vistara) and summarized (saṃkṣepa).

Question. – We accept that past and future substances, being invisible, do not have the nature of substance. But present substance is visible as long as it lasts. Why do you say that it does not have the nature of substance?

Answer. – Present substance also does not have any duration (sthiti). As I have said in regard to the four smṛtyupasthānas (p. 1163F), every dharma, the nature of cessation of which we see after the event (paścat), must clearly possess this nature of cessation from its birth (utpāda) but, as it is subtle (sūkṣma), we do not recognize it.

[If the duration of conditioned dharmas were a stable duration, there would never be cessation.] Let us suppose there is a man who is wearing sandals (pādūkā): if these were new from the very first day, they would never wear out; afterwards (paścat), they would always be new and there would be no ageing. Having no ageing, they would be eternal (nitya). From the fact of this eternity, there would be no sin (āpatti) and no merit (puṇya):³⁹² and, as there would be no more sin or merit, the usual rules of the Buddhist Path (mārga) would be overturned (vikṣipta).

³⁹¹ Pañcaviṃśati, p. 164, l. 8-9 (T 223, k. 4, p. 242c2-4; k. 8, p. 278c1-2): Sarva ete dharmā...

ekalakṣaṇā yadutālakṣaṇāḥ.

³⁹² Cf. Madh. vṛtti, p. 324: If action did not exist in itself (svabhāvata), it would certainly be eternal because existence in itself is not susceptible to modification. Thus action would never be accomplished. Action is what necessarily requires the activity of a free agent. But [if you presuppose eternity], it is not

Furthermore, since the natures of arising and cessation (utpādabhaṅgalakṣaṇa) always go along with the formations (saṃskāra), there is no period of duration. If there were a period of duration, there would be neither arising nor cessation.

This is why present substance has no duration and, in duration, there is no arising or cessation, for duration reduced to a single moment (ekakṣaṇe sthitiḥ) is characteristic of the formations (saṃskāra).

This is the Dharma ‘of unhindered penetration’. This is how the Dharma is to be recollected.

7. Other qualities of the Buddhist Dharma

Furthermore, there are two kinds of Dharma:³⁹³ i) the Buddha’s speech (buddhavacana), namely, the Three Baskets (tripiṭaka), the twelve-membered Buddha’s words (dvādaśāṅgabuddhavacana) and the eighty-four thousand articles of the Dharma (caturaśīti dharmaskandhasahasrāṇi); ii) the meaning of the Dharma (dharmārtha) preached by the Buddha, namely the eightfold noble Path (āryāṣṭāṅgamārga) with [its three elements], discipline (śīla), concentration (saṃādhi), wisdom (prajñā) and the fruit of deliverance (vimuktiṭhala) of nirvāṇa.

The yogin should first recollect the speech of the Buddha and then recollect the meaning of the Dharma.

I) Recollecting the speech of the Buddha. –

The Buddha’s speech is beautiful, marvelous, truthful and of great usefulness. The Buddha’s speech is both profound (gambhīra) and not very profound; profound because it has in view the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa); not very profound because it is skillfully formulated. His repetitions are faultless because each has its significance.

The speech of the Buddha rests on four bases and is adorned with four qualities: i) wisdom (prajñā), ii) truth (satya), iii) equanimity (upekṣā), iv) cessation (nirodha).

It is irrefutable because it uses four ways of responding to questions (praśnavyākaraṇa):³⁹⁴ i) responding in a categorical way (ekāṃśena vyākaraṇam), ii) responding by distinguishing (vibhajya vyākaraṇam), iii) responding by means of a question (pariprcchāvyākaraṇam), iv) responding by not answering (sthāpanīya vyākaraṇam).

explained. Why? Because an eternal entity cannot be accomplished (yasmāt kriyate na hi śāśvatam).

That which possesses a real existence is ‘eternal’. That which is real eludes accomplishment (karaṇa) and consequently does not depend on a cause. Even without having accomplished good or bad action, every person would be rewarded.

The words of the Buddha are either permissions followed by prohibitions, or prohibitions followed by permissions, or permissions not followed by prohibitions, or prohibitions not followed by permissions. These four methods are in harmony and are not contradictory.

The speech of the Buddha, which has the [true] nature of things, is free of futile proliferation (prapañca); being expressed rationally, it suppresses any commentary on existence and non-existence.

The speech of the Buddha is in accord with the absolute (paramārtha) and, [223a] even when it speaks about conventional things (saṃvṛtidharma), it is faultless, for it is not in contradiction with the twofold truth [absolute truth and conventional truth].

The speech of the Buddha aims at the good (hita): to the pure man, it addresses gentle words; to the impure man, harsh words. But whether they are gentle or harsh, they are alike without fault (nirdoṣa).

The speech of the Buddha is in accord with the holy Dharma (saddharmam anuvartate), but is not attached to it (saddharma nābhiniṣate).³⁹⁵ It is the foe of impure laws but experiences no haughtiness toward them. It criticizes many things but does not blame anything. It praises the Dharma in multiple ways but remains without any support (apratisthāna).³⁹⁶

There is nothing to be added to and nothing to be removed (anūnānadhika) from the speech of the Buddha: whether it is summarized (saṃkṣipta) or developed (vistīrṇa), it is good at the beginning (ādau kalyāṇa) and good throughout.

The speech of the Buddha is abundant, but the flavor of the meaning (artharasa) is not abated: It attracts people’s hearts but does not allow them to get attached (saṅga); its sublimities are varied but they inspire no fear in anyone. It has its extensions everywhere but fools (bāla) cannot understand it.

The speech of the Buddha has different extraordinary (adbhuta) effects; it can make men’s hair stand on end (romaharṣa) so that they sweat, become breathless and are terrified; it can also make the gods become angry so that their cries fill the ten directions and they shake the earth in six ways. It can make people attached to the world forever to leave it and others who are not attached to it, rejoice.

Wrong-doers who hear the speech of the Buddha become sad and tormented by their wrong-doings; good people, mindful (smṛtimat) and energetic (ātāpin), enter the Path. For those who hear it, it is as if they were tasting ambrosia (amṛtarasa), ‘good at the beginning, good in the middle and good at the end’ (ādau kalyāṇa, madhye kalyāṇa, paryavasāne kalyāṇa).

Furthermore, in the great assemblies, each person wants to hear something, and the Buddha answers him with a single sound (ekasvareṇa).³⁹⁷ Each makes sense out of it and each thinks the Buddha has spoken for him alone.³⁹⁸ In the great assemblies, whether the listener is far or near, the sound reaches him with the same intensity; it fills the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu and reaches innumerable universe in the ten directions. The beings who are to be converted (vainryasattva) hear it, those who are not to be converted do not hear it. It is as if a thunderbolt (aśani) struck the earth: the deaf (badhira) do not hear it but those who hear it understand what it is.

³⁹⁵ Cf. the Kolopamasūtra cited above, p. 64F, n. 1 to which the Traité will return later (k. 31, p. 290c22, 295b29; k. 85, p. 657a2).

³⁹⁶ On the Dharma without any support, see Vimalakīrti, p. 270-271; Śūraṅgamasamādhi, p. 187-188.

³⁹⁷ A belief characteristic of Indian Buddhism that has its extension into China. The subject has been masterfully explained by P. Demiéville in Hobogirin (Butsugo, p. 207-209; Button, p. 215-217). The Traité makes only a brief allusion to it here, but will return to it later (k. 30, p. 284a-b).

The Buddha preached the Dharma in various ways (cf. Vimalakīrti, p. 109-110) and notably by a single sound (ekasvareṇa) or by vocal emission in a single moment (ekakṣaṇavāgudāhāreṇa). This sound expresses the Dharma in its entirety, reaches all the universes of the ten directions, rejoices the minds of all beings and destroys the negative emotions. Each hearer, according to his level and capability, understands it and believes that the Buddha preached it for him alone.

The doctrine of the single sound was already formulated in some sects of the Lesser Vehicle. The Vibhajyavādins produced a stanza of praise of the Buddha (īsan fo song) cited in the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, p. 410a16; T 1546, k. 41, 306c24; T 1547, k. 9, p. 482c16): “The Buddha uses a single sound to enunciate the Dharma and then beings, each according to his category, understand it. All say: The Bhagavat uses the same language as I do, that is why he enunciates a certain meaning for me alone.” – For the Mahāsāṃghikas as well, the Buddha enunciates all dharmas by means of a single sound (cf. Bareau, Sectes, p. 58, thesis 4).

But the Sarvāstivādins (Bareau, ibid., p. 145, thesis 54) rejected this doctrine and the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 79, p. 410b25) comments that the previously cited stanza does not belong to the Tripiṭaka and gives (p. 410c8-9) a toned-down interpretation of it: “Even though the sounds of the Buddha are numerous and varied, they are equally useful, and that is why they are said to be one single sound.”

The Mahāyānasūtras enthusiastically adopted the doctrine of one single sound.

The Prajñāpāramitā considers the single sound to be a secondary characteristic of the 18th lakṣaṇa, ‘the brahmic voice’, and places it in its list of anuvyañjanas: cf. Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 24, p. 396b5; T 220, vol. VI, k. 381, p. 968c26-27; Cheng t’ien wang, T 231, k. 7, p. 723c1; Jen wang jou kouo, T 246, k. 2, p. 842c29 ³⁹⁸ Allusion to the passage of the Pañcaviṃśati commented on above, p. 525F.

These are the various ways of recollecting the speech of the Buddha.

2) Recollection of the meaning of the Dharma.

What is the meaning of the Dharma (dharmārtha)? It is faith (śraddhā), morality (śīla), generosity (tyāga), learning (śruta), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā) constituting the Path, all the good dharmas, and also the three seals of the Dharma (dharmamudrā) already discussed above (p. 1368F) in regard to penetration (prativedha): “All conditioned dharmas are impermanent; all dharmas are without self; peaceful is nirvāṇa.” This is the meaning of the Buddha’s Dharma.

These three seals cannot be attacked by any scholar (upadeśācārya) and, no matter how many the tirades, no one can transform this nature of things (dharmatā), not even if one transforms cold (śīta) into heat (uṣṇa).

The nature of things (dharmatā) is irrefutable. And, supposing that one could harm space (ākāśa), these seals of the Dharma cannot be assailed. The saint (ārya) who knows this threefold nature of dharmas eludes controversial [223b] subjects (vivādasthāna) that all rest on wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi). In the same way, the person endowed with sight (cakṣuṣmat), seeing blind men (andha) arguing about various colors, has pity on them and smiles but does not argue with them.

Question. – In the system of the śrāvakas, the Buddha spoke about four truths, [the four noble Truths]; in the Mahāyāna, there is only one truth, [absence of nature]. Why now speak of three truths, [the three seals of the Dharma]?

Answer. – The Buddha spoke of three realities (tattva), the seals of the Dharma (dharmamudrā), but when one understands them, they make four, and when one summarizes them, they make one:

a. Impermanence (anitya) is the account of the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya), the truth of the origin (samudayasatya) and the truth of the Path (pratipatsatya).

b. Non-self (anātman) is the account valid for every dharma.

c. Peace-nirvāṇa (śāntaṃ nirvāṇam) is the truth of the cessation of suffering (nirodhasatya).

Furthermore, conditioned dharmas are impermanent because they arise and perish from moment to moment. Depending on causes and conditions (hetupratyayāpekṣa), they have no independence (asvatānta). Being without autonomy, they are non-self (anātman). Since they are impermanent, non-self and without nature (alakṣaṇa), the mind does not become attached to them. As there is no nature or attachment, there is śāntaṃ nirvāṇam. Thus, although it is said in the Mahāyāna that “dharmas do not arise, do not perish and have but a single nature, namely, the absence of nature”³⁹⁹, this absence of nature (alakṣaṇa) is precisely Śāntaṃ nirvāṇam. It is the object of the concentration recollecting the Dharma (dharmanusmṛtisamādhi), the object of knowledge (jñānālambana) that exhausts all the qualities of the bodhisattvas and pratyekabuddhas.

³⁹⁹ See above, p. 1376F, n. 1.

Question. Why does the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānusmṛti) have as object (ālambate) only the qualities of āśaikṣa present in the Buddha's body? Why does the concentration of the recollection of the Community (saṃghānusmṛtisamādhi) have as object the dharmas of the śaikṣa and āśaikṣa present in the bodies of the Buddha's disciples (buddhaśrāvaka)? And why are all the other good pure dharmas (kuśalānāsravadharma) the object (ālambana) of the concentration on the recollection of the Dharma (dharmānusmṛtisamādhi)? ⁴⁰⁰

Answer. – It was Kia-tchen-yen-ni-tseu (Kātyāyanīputra) who said that, but [we others], the Mahāyānists, say this:

i) The object of buddhānusmṛtisamādhi is the qualities (guṇa) and magical powers (ṛddhibala) used by the Buddhas of the three times and the ten directions, and all the Buddhas in general during the period from their first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda) until the disappearance of their holy Dharma (dharmavipralopa).

ii) The object of dharmānusmṛtisamādhi is: a. the words of the Buddha (buddhavacana); b. the meaning of the Dharma (dharmārtha) preached by the Buddha. [The words of the Buddha] form a single metre (pāda), a single stanza (gāthā) up to the eighty-four thousand articles of the Dharma (caturśīti dharmaskandhasahasrāṇi). [The meaning of the Dharma preached by the Buddha] is the good dharmas (kuśaladharmas), faith (śraddhā), morality (śīla), generosity (tyāga), study (śruta), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (prajñā), etc., up to and including nirvāṇa-without-residue (nirupādīśeṣanirvāṇa).

iii) The object of saṃghānusmṛtisamādhi is the Community of bodhisattvas, pratyekabuddhas and śrāvakas, the Communities and qualities (guṇa) of all the other saints (ārya) excluding the Buddha. ⁴⁰¹

III. RECOLLECTION OF THE COMMUNITY

⁴⁰⁰ The objector puts forth here the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika theories on the threefold taking of refuge.

One takes refuge in the dharmas of the āśaikṣa or the arhat which constitute a Buddha and not in the material body (rūpakāya) of the Buddha which remains that of a bodhisattva. One takes refuge in all the Buddhas and not in one single Buddha. One takes refuge in the dharmas of the śaikṣa and the āśaikṣa which constitute the Saṃgha, the latter including among its members non-arhats and arhats. One takes refuge in the Dharma, i.e., in pratisaṃkhyānirodha or nirvāṇa. These theories are explained in Vibhāṣā. T 1545, k. 34, p. 177a seq.; Kośa, IV, p. 76-79; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 38, p. 555c seq.; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 125-127.

Kośakārikā, IV, v. 32 says: Buddhasaṃghakarāṇ dharmān āśaikṣān ubhayāṃś ca saḥ / nirvāṇaṃ caiti śaraṇaṃ yo yāti karaṇatrayam:

“He who takes the triple refuge takes refuge in the dharmas of the āśaikṣa which make up the Buddhas, in the dharmas of the two kinds [dharma of the āśaikṣa and of the śaikṣa] which make up the Saṃgha, and in nirvāṇa.”

⁴⁰¹ The Buddha does not appear in the recollection of the Saṃgha because he is recollected separately.

Recollection of the Community (saṃghānusmṛti). – “The Community of disciples of the Buddha (śrāvakasamṃgha) is completely endowed with the discipline element (śīlaskandhasaṃpanna), is completely endowed with the concentration element (samādhiskandha), the wisdom element (prajñāskandha), the deliverance element (vimuktiskandha), and the ‘knowledge and vision of deliverance’ element (vimuktijñānadarśanaskandha).⁴⁰² It includes the four pairs of individuals (cattvāri puruṣayugāni) or the eight individuals (aṣṭau puruṣapudgalāḥ). It is worthy of alms (dakṣiṇīya), worthy of homage (pūjanīya), worthy of veneration (arcinīya). It is the supreme field of merit for the world (anuttaraṃ puṇyakustaram lokasya).”

The yogin should recollect the Community celebrated by the Buddha in these words and meditate on the qualities (guṇa) of the śrāvakaṣaṃgha, the pratyekabuddhasaṃgha and the bodhisattvasaṃgha making up the Holy Community (āryasaṃgha).

1. Community endowed with the five pure skandhas

The perfection of these five elements (skandhasaṃpad) has already been discussed above (p. 1349F).

Question. – These five elements have already been used to praise the Buddha. Why use them again here to praise the Community? [223c]

Answer. – Here the praise of this perfection is about the five pure elements (anāsravaskandha) insofar as they are possessed by the disciples.

The perfection is of two kinds: i) real perfection (bhūtasamṃpad); ii) nominal perfection (nāmasamṃpad). If one praises the perfection to be obtained or already obtained by the disciples of the Buddha,⁴⁰³ this is nominal perfection. If one has in mind the perfection of the Buddha, this is real perfection.

Furthermore, here the praise [of the Community of disciples] is made in order to distinguish it from the heretic (tīrthika) communities, wandering monks (pravrajita) and lay people (grhastha).

The communities of heretics and lay people boast of their prosperity, their nobility or their power. The communities of wandering monks boast about their wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi), their asceticism (duṣkacaryā), their ties (saṅga), their wisdom (prajñā), their teachings (upadeśa) and their critics (vivāda). Here, in recollecting the community of monks, speaking about discipline (śīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā) would not be enough. This is why the Buddha himself celebrates all the qualities (guṇa) of the śrāvakaṣaṃgha, its origins (maula), its establishment (āvastha), the perfection of its discipline (śīlaskandhasaṃpad) and so on up to the perfection in knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśanaskandhasaṃpad).

⁴⁰² These five anāsravaskandhas are not mentioned in the canonical formulation of the saṃghānusmṛti.

⁴⁰³ The Saṃgha actually includes both śaikṣas and āśaikṣas in its ranks.

Based on the discipline element (śīlaskandhāsrita), the Saṃgha is unshakeable (acala). – It bends the bow of concentration (samādhidhanus). – It lets fly the arrow of wisdom (prajñeṣu). – It destroys the enemies, the disturbing emotions (kleśāmitra) and obtains deliverance (vimukti). – It produces knowledge (jñāna) and vision (darśana) in regard to this deliverance.

In the same way, a strong man (balavān puruṣaḥ) first makes his feet steady, bends his bow, lets fly the arrow and destroys his enemy. He frees himself thus from a twofold fear: he avoids offending the king and he escapes from the dangers of battle. Knowing and seeing precisely that his enemies have been destroyed, he experiences joy (muditā).

This is why we use the five [pure] elements to praise the Community.

2. Community worthy of offerings, etc.

The Community is ‘worthy of offerings’ (dakṣiṇīya) thanks to the perfection of the qualities (guṇasampad) represented by these five [pure] elements.

Just as a rich, noble and powerful person is extolled by the people, so the Community of the disciples of the Buddha, who hold the power of discipline (śīla), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (prajñā) wealth (ādhyatā),⁴⁰⁴ deliverance (vimukti), knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimuktijñānadarśana), this Community, I say, is ‘worthy of offerings’ (dakṣiṇīya), ‘worthy of homage’ (pūjanīya), ‘worthy of salutation’ (añjalikaraṇīya), ‘worthy of veneration’ (arcanīya).

3. Community, the best field of merit

The Community is ‘the best field of merit for the world’ (anuttaraṃ punyakṣetraṃ lokasya).

There are two types of patrons (dānapati): the poor (daridra) and the rich (āḍhya). The poor dānapati is rewarded for his homage (vandana), his signs of respect (satkāra) and his eagerness (pratyutdgamana) toward the Community. The rich dānapati is rewarded, not only for his homage, his signs of respect and his eagerness toward the Community, but also for his gifts in kind (āmiṣadāna). This is why he Community is ‘the best field of merit of the world.’

Worked, plowed, planted at the proper time, watered and freely irrigated, a good field (sukṣetra) necessarily gives an abundant crop. It is the same for this field of merit, the Community. The plow of wisdom (prajñāhala) is used to plow up the roots of the fetters (saṃyojanamūla); the four immeasurables (apramāṇacitta) are taken to break it up and soften it; the dānapati sows the seeds of faith (śraddhā) and of generosity (dāna); he waters it with the water of the recollection of generosity (tyāgānusmṛti), respect (satkāra) and pure mind (viśuddhacitta). In the present lifetime (ihajanma) or in the next lifetime (parajanamani), he obtains an immense worldly happiness (apramāṇalaukikasikha) and obtains the fruits of the three Vehicles (yānatrayaphala).

[Avadāna of Bakkula]. – Thus, at the time of the Buddha Pi-p’o-che (Vipaśyin), the bhikṣu Po-kiu-lo (Bakkula) offered a a-li-lō (harītakī) fruit to the Community. For ninety-one kalpas he enjoyed happiness among gods and men. He was never sick. And today, having met the Buddha Śākyamuni, he went forth from [224a] home (pravrajita), destroyed his impurities (kṣiṇāsrava) and became arhat.⁴⁰⁵

Bandumatyām rājadhānyām gāndhiko ‘hām ... glānam abhijñanāmi tāvatkālikam apy aham. Transl. – In the capital of Bandhumatī, I was once the owner of a hardware shop and, at the time of Vipaśyin, I invited the community of monks. During the Rains, the Community was invited, but nobody asked anything of me, except for one monk who begged for a single myrobalan (harītaki). For ninety-one kalpas, I had not a single bad destiny. See how useful was the reward for this gift of medicine! I have enjoyed much happiness for having done this small meritorious action. Having given this single myrobalan, I rejoiced for a long time in the heavens. Then, by virtue of the residue of my action, I have obtained a human birth, and I do not remember having accepted, while I was śaikṣa, the least offering in the kingdom. My life-span [was one hundred and sixty years] during that existence and, in all that time, I do not remember having suffered any illness.

The Traité will return later to this bhikṣu: cf. k. 24, p. 238a5; k. 29, p. 271b18; k. 38, p. 341c3. This is a well-known monk called Bakkula, Vakula and Vākula in Sanskrit; Bakkula, Bākula and Vakkula in Pāli. The name means ‘Two families’ (dvakkula, dvikkula): actually, during his last lifetime, Bakkula had taken birth in a wealthy family in Kauśāmbī, but when his nurse was bathing him in the Yamunā, he was swallowed by a fish. The animal was sold to the wife of a merchant in Benares and when she opened the fish, she found the baby alive. She wanted to adopt him but the true parents of the child reclaimed him. The king cut through the dispute by declaring that the child henceforth belonged to the ‘two families’. At the age of eighty, Bakkula met the Buddha, entered into the monastic order and, after seven days, attained the state of arhat. He lived for eighty more years, clothed in rags and tatters, declining any offering of food and refusing to preach even a stanza of two pādas. The Buddha designated him as the foremost of those free of sickness and with few desires. After his death, a stūpa was built for him. Later, during his well-known pilgrimage of holy places, the emperor Aśoka, contrary to his well-known generosity, placed a single piece of gold on the funerary monument of the arhat, but the latter had had so little desire that the protector spirit of the stūpa refused the gold piece.

The sources on Bakkula are very numerous, and here are the main ones:

⁴⁰⁴ This mention of wealth is completely misplaced.

[Avadāna of Koṭṭiṃṣa]. – Thus, at the time of the Buddha Vipāsyin, the śramaṇa Eul-che-yi (Koṭṭiṃṣa) built a house (layana), covered the floor with rugs (dūṣya) and offered it to the Community. For ninety-one kalpas he enjoyed happiness among the gods and among men. His feet did not tread on the ground. When he was born, on the soles of his feet (pādātala) he had hair two inches long, soft and fine (romāṇi dvyāṅgulāni mṛdusaṃsparśāni śubhāni). Seeing this, his father rejoiced and gave him twenty koṭi ounces of gold. Koṭṭiṃṣa saw the Buddha, heard the Dharma and became arhat. Of the disciples, he was foremost in exertion (ārabdhavīryāṇām agryaḥ).⁴⁰⁶

Transl. – I built a single house for the community in the capital of Bandhumati, at the time of Vipāsyin. I spread out scattered carpets over the floor of this house and then, with joyous mind and happy spirit, I uttered the following vow: May I serve the perfect Buddha and receive ordination! May I reach nirvāṇa, supremely peaceful and unaging! By virtue of this merit, I have transmigrated for ninety-one kalpas; as god or as man, by the strength of my merit, I was well known. Then, thanks to the residue of my action, in the course of my last lifetime I was born at Campā, the only son of a high nobleman. When he learned of my birth, my father uttered the following: “I will give this child a fortune of twenty koṭis.” On the soles of my feet I had hair four inches long, fine, soft to touch, beautiful, like cotton-down. For the ninety-one kalpas that passed, I do not remember having set my bare foot on the ground. I have served the Leader of the caravan, the perfect supreme Buddha. I have attained arhathood; I am cool and at peace.

The Traité will return three times (k. 26, p. 253b8-9; k. 29, p. 271b20-21; k. 32, p. 301b13) to this śramaṇa Koṭṭiṃṣa, whose full name was Śroṇa-koṭṭi-ṃṣa, in Pāli Soṇa-kolivīsa. He came from a rich family in Campā, capital of Bengal. Summoned to Rājagṛha by king Bimbasaṛa, he met the Buddha there and having heard the preaching of the Teacher, he asked for and received ordination as a monk. He retreated to the Sītavana to meditate but did not succeed in concentrating himself. Restless and tormented, he walked to and for so long and so hard that the especially tender soles of his feet became lacerated and bled profusely. The Buddha came to find him and preached the Vīṇūpamovādaśūtra to teach him to moderate his ardor and temper his exertion. On this occasion he authorized Koṭṭiṃṣa to wear furred boots and soon extended this favor to all the bhikṣus. This anecdote is told in all the Vinayas: Pāli Vin, I, p. 179-185 (cf. Anguttara, III, p. 374-379); Mahīśāsaka Vin. T 1421, k. 21, p.

Since gifts as small [as those of Bakkula and Koṭṭiṃṣa] produce such great fruits of retribution (vipākaphala), [the Community] is called ‘the best field of merit for the world’.

4. Community consisting of four pairs and eight classes of individuals

“In the Community, there are four pairs of individuals (catvāri puruṣayugāni) or eight classes of individuals (aṣṭāu puruṣapudgalāḥ).”⁴⁰⁷

145a13-146b15; mahāsaṃghika Vin., T 1425, k. 31, p. 481a2- 182a1; Dharmagupta Vin., T 1428, k. 38, p. 843b12-145a25; Sarv. Vin., T 1435, k. 25, p. 183a15-b3; Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1447, k. 2, p. 1055c14-1056a15; T 1450, k. 16, p. 184b25-187c20.

The Buddha proclaimed Koṭṭiṃṣa the foremost of those who practice exertion (Anguttara, I, p. 24). According to the Si yu ki (T 2087, k. 11, p. 934c-935a), this śramaṇa made a statue of Maitreya in sandalwood, worked miracles and conversions in Koṅkan where Aśoka dedicated a stupa to him.

Śroṇa-koṭṭi-ṃṣa should not be confused with the arhat Śroṇa Koṭṭikarṇa, in Pāli Soṇa Koṭṭikarṇa, the foremost of the fine orators (aggam kalyāṇavākkaraṇānam), disciple of Mahākātyāyana and apostle of Avanti.

⁴⁰⁷ In contrast to the prthagjana ‘the worldly’, the āryas who have entered onto the Path and who make up the holy Community, are arranged into various groups:

A. TWO GROUPS: the śaikṣa ‘those who are still in training’ and the aśaikṣa ‘those who no longer train’, i.e., the arhat ‘saints’.

B. EIGHT GROUPS OF INDIVIDUALS (aṣṭāu puruṣapudgalāḥ), namely:

1. Prathamaphalapratipannaka, candidate for the first fruit of the religious life.

2. Srotaāpanna.

3. Dvitiyaphalapratipannaka, candidate for the second fruit.

4. Sakṛdāgamin.

5. Ṭṛtiyaphalapratipannaka, candidate for the third fruit.

6. Anāgamin.

7. Arhattvaphalapratipannaka, candidate for the fruit of arhat.

8. Arhat.

C. FOUR PAIRS OF INDIVIDUALS (catvāri puruṣayugāni) formed by the eight preceding groups taken in pairs.

D. TWENTY-SEVEN INDIVIDUALS, made up of eighteen types of śaikṣa (aṣṭādaśa śaikṣāḥ) and nine types of aśaikṣa (navāśaikṣāḥ).

The eighteen types of śaikṣa are:

1. Prathamaphalapratipanna, candidate for the first fruit.

2. Srotaāpanna.

3. Dvitiyaphalapratipanna, candidate for the second fruit.

4. Sakṛdāgamin.
5. Tritīyaphalapratipanna.
6. Anāgamin.
7. Arhattvaphalapratipanna, candidate for the fruit of arhat.
8. Śraddhānusārin, pursuing [the truth] because of faith.
9. Dharmānusārin, pursuing [the truth] by means of dharmas, i.e., the twelve-membered

Scripture.

10. Śraddhādhimukta, convinced by faith.
11. Drṣṭiprapta, in possession of the speculative view.
12. Kulaṃkula (Pāli: kolaṅkola), passing from family to family [among gods and men and attaining nirvāṇa after two or three rebirths].
13. Ekavīcika (in Pāli ekavijī; in Chinese yi tchong for Kuārajīva, yi kien for Hiuan-tsang), separated from nirvāṇa [by one rebirth].
14. Antarāparinirvāyin, [anāgāmin obtaining] nirvāṇa in the intermediate existence.
15. Upapadyaparinirvāyin, [anāgāmin obtaining] nirvāṇa as soon as he is reborn.
16. Sābhisamskāraparinirvāyin, [anāgāmin obtaining] nirvāṇa with effort.
17. Anabhisamskāraparinirvāyin, [anāgāmin obtaining] nirvāṇa effortlessly.
18. Ūrdhvasrotas, [anāgāmin] with upward movement. [Not obtaining nirvāṇa in the place where he is reborn on leaving Kāmadhātu, but moving upward to the Akaniṣṭha or in Bhavāgra].

The nine kinds of aśaikṣa are:

19. Parihāṇadharman, [arhat] likely to fall
20. Cetanādharmān, [arhat] likely to end his existence
21. Anurakṣaṇadharman, [arhat] likely to keep [what he has acquired]
22. Sthitākampya, [arhat] likely to remain [in the fruit] and not moving
23. Prativedhanābhavya, [Arhat] likely to penetrate effortlessly into the Unshakeables.
24. Akopyadharma, unshakeable [arhat not likely to fall]
25. Cetovimukta, [arhat] possessing deliverance of mind
26. Prajñāvimukta, [arhat] delivered by wisdom
27. Ubhayatobhāgavimukta (kong kiai t'o for Kumārajīva; kiu kiai t'o for Hiuan-tsang), [arhat] doubly delivered [from the obstacle of the disturbing emotions (kleśāvaraṇa) and the obstacle opposing the eight liberations (vimokṣāvaraṇa)].

The Pāli sources did not fix the number of individuals at twenty-seven, but they were aware of them and have given definitions for them.

For nos. 1 to 7, see, e.g., Samyutta, V, p. 202. – For nos. 8 to 11, see Dīgha, III, p. 105; Majjhima, I, p. 478-479; Aṅguttara, I, p. 64. – For nos. 12 and 13, see Samyutta, V, p. 205; Anguttara, I, p. 233; IV, p. 380-381; Nettipakarāṇa, p. 189. – For nos. 14 to 18 (five types of anāgāmin), see Dīgha, iii, p. 237; Samyutta, V, p. 70, 237, 285, 314, 378; Anguttara, IV, p. 14, 15, 146, 380; V, p. 120. – For nos. 26 and 27, see Dīgha, II, p. 71; Majjhima, I, p. 439, 477; Samyutta, I, p. 191; Anguttara, I, p. 73; IV, p. 10. 77. For the group, cf. Puggalapaññatti, p. 14-16; Nettipakarāṇa, p. 189-190.

It is due to these eight noble individuals (aṣṭāv āryapudgalāḥ) that the Buddha speaks of it as the ‘best field of merit for the world’.

Question. – [In the Dakṣiṇīyasūtra] the Buddha said to the vaiśya Ki-kou-tou (Anāthapiṇḍada): “In the world there are two fields of merit (puṇyakṣetra), the śaikṣas and the aśaikṣas.”⁴⁰⁸ [According to this same sūtra, “the śaikṣas are eighteen in number and the aśaikṣas are nine in number.”⁴⁰⁹ Why then does the Buddha, in the present passage speak only of eight [noble individuals]?]

Answer. – In the place where the Buddha was explaining at length (vistareṇa), he spoke of ‘eighteen plus nine’; but here, where he is summarizing (saṃkṣepeṇa), he mentions only eight. However, these twenty-seven are included (saṃgrhīta) in these eight:

1-2) The śraddhānusārin and the dharmānusārin are included in the srotaāpattiphalapratipannaka, or in the sakṛdāgāṃphalapratipannaka, or in the anāgāṃphalapratipannaka.

3) The kulamkula is included in the sakṛdāgāṃphalapratipannaka.

4) The ekavīcika is included in the anāgāṃphalapratipannaka.

5-9) The five kinds of anāgāmin, [namely, i) antarāparinirvāyin, ii) upapadyaparinirvāyin, iii) sābhisamskāraparinirvāyin, iv) anabhisamskāraparinirvāyin, v) ūrdhvasrotas] are included in the arhattvaphalapratipannaka.

The list of the twenty-seven individuals is one of the masterpieces of the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika Abhidharma which, with the help of the canonical sources, has located them precisely along the Path to nirvāṇa: Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 77, p. 397a; k. 53, p. 274c-277b; Samyuktābhidharmaśāra, T 1552, k. 6, p. 910c-914a; Abhidharmāmṛta, T 1553, k. 1, p. 973a27-c26 (reconstr. By Sastri, p. 85-88); Kośa, VI, p. 193-217, 2541-255, 277.

The Prajñāparamitās have used the preceding sources broadly to establish their twenty categories of saints, but - and this is essential – the end-point of the career is no longer the entry into nirvāṇa but the arrival at the state of Buddha by the conquest of anuttarasamyakṣambodhi.

The description of this career may be found in the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 60-73 (transl. Conze, p. 33-41) and the Śatasāhasrikā, p. 266-281; a short description is in Abhisamayālaṃkāra, I, v. 23-24 (transl. Conze, p. 11-13); clear and precise definitions in Āloka, p. 35-36 (transl. Obermiller, Analysis, I, p. 51-56).

Later (k. 54, p. 447a), the Traité will return to these categories of saints.

The Vijñānavādins also had a list of the traditional twenty-seven types of individuals: Abhidharmasamuccaya, ed. Pradhan, p. 88-91 (T 1605, k. 6, p. 689a10-c24; T 1616, k. 13, p. 754b10-755c28).

⁴⁰⁸ Dakṣiṇīyasūtra in the Tchong a han (T 26, k. 30, p. 616a8-11) corresponding to Anguttara, I, p. 62-63.

⁴⁰⁹ Ibid. p. 619a11-13, cited in Kośavyākhyā, p. 566, l. 25-26.

10-11) When they pass into the path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga), the śraddānusārin and the dharmānusārin are given the names of śraddhādhimuktika and dṛṣṭiprāpta. This śraddhādhimuktika and dṛṣṭiprāpta are included in the [first] fifteen classes of Śaikṣas.

The nine fields of merit [of the āśaikṣa] are included in the arhattva.

5. Other qualities of the Community

1) Moreover, the yogin should recollect the Community [by saying]: the Community are my true companions (sahāyaka) on the way to nirvāṇa. Joined with it in the same discipline and the same vision, I should be joyful, respect it wholeheartedly, follow it and not be in opposition to it. Previously I had bad people as my companions, women, sons, slaves, etc.: they accompanied me in the three bad destinies (durgati). Now that I have noble people (āryapudgala) as companions, I go in safety to nirvāṇa. The Buddha is like the king of physicians (vaidyārāja), the Dharma is like good medicine (bhaiṣajya) and the Community is like a nurse (glānopasthāyaka).⁴¹⁰ I must obtain pure discipline (viśuddhaśīla) and right thought (yoniso mansikāra). I must undergo the medication prescribed by the Buddha. The Community is the sole means for me to cut through the sickness of the bonds (bandhanavyādhi): it is my nurse. This is why it is necessary to recollect the Community.

2) Furthermore, the Community has immense perfections of discipline, concentration and wisdom (śīlasamādhiprajñāsampad) and the depth of its virtues cannot be plumbed (durvigāhya).

THE DĀNAPATI WHO EXCLUDED THE ŚRĀMAṆERAS FROM HIS INVITATION⁴¹¹

Kośa, VI, p. 294 and Kośavyākhyā, p. 606: Vaidyabhūto Bhagavān anuttaro bhiṣak śalyaharteti sortāt, dharmabhaiṣajyadaiśikatvāc ca. bhaiṣajyabhūto dharmah kleśavyādhibhaiṣajyatvāt. nirvāṇārogyasamprāpakatvāc copasthāyakahūtaḥ saṃgho nirvāṇārogyaprāptaye parasparopasthānāt: “The Blessed One is physician, for the sūtra (Tsa a han, T 99, k.15, p. 105a-b; Kośavyākhyā, p. 514) calls him ‘the supreme physician who pulls out the arrows’ and because he preaches the medicine of the Dharma. The Dharma is medicine because it remedies the sicknesses of the passions. Finally, because it brings about the peace of nirvāṇa, the Community is the nurse, for its members support one another in order to obtain the peace of nirvāṇa.”

⁴¹¹ We have already noted several times a certain number of borrowings by the Traité from the Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā by Kumāralāta or from its Chinese recension, the Ta tchouang yen louen king (T201),

Thus a noble wealthy banker (śreṣṭhin) who had faith in the Community (saṃghe prasannaḥ) said to the steward (vaiyāvṛtyakara)⁴¹² of the Saṃgha: “I invite the monks in order [of seniority] to dine with me.” Day after day, he invited them in order; but when the day came for the turn of the novices (śrāmaṇera), the steward did not allow them to accept the invitation. The śrāmaṇeras said: “Why do you not allow us to accept the invitation?” He replied: “Because the patron [224b] (dānapati) does not like to invite the young monks.” Then he spoke this stanza:

Bearded men with hair white as snow

Whose teeth have fallen out and whose faces are wrinkled,

Who walk bent over with decrepit bodies:

Those are whom the dānapati likes to invite.

Now these śrāmaṇeras were all great arhats. Like lions struck on the head, they leaped up from their seats and spoke these stanzas:

This dānapati is a stupid man:

He sees forms and does not see virtues.

He neglects the young

And receives only decrepit ancient men.

Moreover, the Buddha has uttered these gāthās:

The one who is called Venerable

Is not necessarily old.

There are old men, decrepit, bearded and with white hair, better known under the name of Sūtrālaṃkāra by Āsvaghoṣa. In this regard, see the Gopālakāvadāna (above, p. 146-152F), the ‘Complete gift of Kaṇva the painter’ (p. 672-675F), ‘Āśoka and the bhikṣu with the sweet breath’ (p. 695-698F), the Śaḍdanta-jātaka (p. 716-718F), the Nigrodhamogajātaka (p. 972-975F), etc. The anecdote of the ‘Dānapati excluding the śrāmaṇeras from his invitation’, an anecdote that will be told in the following pages, is taken directly from the Kalpanāmaṇḍikā, ed. H. Lüders, p. 139-140, or from the Ta tchouang yen louen king, 3rd narrative, k. 1, p. 261a19-262c3 (transl. E. Huber, Sūtrālaṃkāra, p. 22-30). The translation of the Traité is closer to the Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā than to the Sūtrālaṃkāra. Few works have been as thoroughly studied as this said Sūtrālaṃkāra of Āsvaghoṣa, and it is rather surprising to note that the important loan made here by the Traité has not yet been acknowledged.

⁴¹² Vaiyāvṛtyakara, or also vaiyāprtyakara, vaiyāpatyakara; in Pāli veyyāvaccakara: see Edgerton, Dictionary, p. 511; Mochizuki, Enc., p. 2254b.

Who have 'grown old in vain' (mohajīrṇa) and inwardly are without virtue.⁴¹³

He who, abandoning the fruits of wrongdoing and of merit,

Energetically practices continence

And renounces everything,

He is truly called Venerable.⁴¹⁴

Then the śrāmaṇeras had this thought: "We should not passively look at this dānapati who measures good and evil in the Saṃgha." And they again spoke these stanzas:

Our hearts remain unchanged

Under praise and blame;

But this man denigrates the Buddha and the Dharma:

We cannot help but instruct him.

Let us go quickly to his dwelling-place

To teach him the Dharma.

It would truly be a great pity

If we did not save him.

Then all the śrāmaṇeras changed their bodies and became transformed into old men. Their beards and hair were white as enow; their heavy eyebrows covered their eyes (bhrūlamabhir avaguṇṭhitākṣa); their skin was wrinkled like waves; their spine was bent like a bow (dhanur iva vakraprṣṭha) and they walked leaning on a stick (yaṣṭiviṣaktapāṇi). According to their turn (anukrameṇa), they received their invitation and started out, all faltering with unsteady pace: one would have said they were white poplars shaken by the wind.⁴¹⁵

Seeing them coming, the dānapati rejoiced, went to meet them, greeted them and made them sit down. When they were seated, they resumed their youthful forms. Startled, the dānapati said to them:

These distinguished old men

Have recovered their youth

⁴¹³ Dhammapada, v. 260; Udānavarga, XI, v. 11, p. 189.

⁴¹⁴ Dhammapada, v. 267; Udānavarga, XI, v. 12, p. 189; Mahāvastu, III, p. 422.

⁴¹⁵ Cf. the fragment of the Kalpanāmaṇḍikā, p. 138: Te sarve palitavidyotiṭasirogaṇḍapārsvabhṛulomabhir avaguṇṭhitākṣi... dhanurvakkraprṣṭiṣvāmśā yaṣṭiviṣaktapāṇayāḥ pavanabalapracalitā supuṣpītāḥ sindhuvāritagulmāḥ.

As if they had drunk the elixir of youth;⁴¹⁶

How does such a miracle come about?

The śrāmaṇeras said to him: "Do not feel any fear or doubt; we are not demons (amānuṣa). You wanted to measure (pramāṇīkartum) the Saṃgha, and that is very dangerous. Out of pity for you, we have manifested these transformations. The noble Saṃgha which you claim to know deeply is immeasurable (apramāṇa) for, as it is said:

[224c] Then it would be possible to sound the depth of the sea

With the fine proboscis of a mosquito;

But among gods and men

There is no one who is able to measure the Saṃgha.⁴¹⁷

The Saṃgha cannot even be singled out

According to its qualities and its nobility,

And you claim to be able

To measure the great virtuous ones according to their age.

Great and small alike produce knowledge:

It is not found [exclusively] among the old or among the young.

If he is wise, brave and energetic

Even a young man is an Elder (sthavira).

If he is lazy and without wisdom

Even the old man is but a child.

In wanting to measure the Saṃgha today, you have committed a great fault. If somebody wanted to sound the depth of the great ocean (mahārṇavam avagāhitum) with his finger-tip (aṅgulyagra), he would be the laughing-stock of the sages.

[Dahasūtra]. – Have you not heard the Buddha say: "There are four things that, small as they are, cannot be mistaken (catvāro daharā iti nāvajñeyāḥ): i) the crown prince (kumāra), young as he may be, will be king of the country and cannot be despised; ii) the snake (uruga), small as it may be, kills people with its ⁴¹⁶ Ibid., p. 139: Rasāyanam iva prāśya punar bālatvam āgatāḥ.

⁴¹⁷ Ibid., p. 139: Apy eva gādham varuṇālayasya svatuṇḍasūcyā maśako labheta na tv eva lokāḥ sacarācaro 'yam saṃghā... "Perhaps a mosquito could reach the bottom of the sea with its proboscis; but the entire universe with its beings, mobile and immobile, [can never sound] the Saṃgha."

venom and cannot be despised. iii) a small fire, if it is badly tended, is able to burn down the forest and cannot be despised; iv) the śrāmaṇera, young as he is, is able to attain the noble supernatural powers (āryābhijñā) and absolutely cannot be despised.”⁴¹⁸

[Āmrasūtra]. – The Buddha also said: “There are four kinds of individuals like the mango (catvāra ima āmropamāḥ puruṣāḥ): i) a mango that is green but seems to be ripe (āmam pakvavarṇi), ii) a ripe mango that seems to be green (pakvam āmavarṇi); iii) a green mango that seems to be green (āmam āmavarṇi), iv) a ripe mango that seems to be ripe (pakvam pakvarṇi).”⁴¹⁹

It is the same for the disciples of the Buddha (buddhaśrāvaka): i) some are endowed with noble qualities (āryaguṇasamanvāgata), but by their postures (īryāpatha) and their speech (vacana) do not seem to be good people; ii) others seem to be good people by their postures and their speech, but they are not endowed with good qualities; iii) still others do not seem to be good people by their postures and their speech and they are not endowed with noble qualities; and finally, iv) others seem to be good people by their postures and speech and are endowed with noble qualities.

Why do you not remember these words and want to measure the Saṃgha? By wanting to hurt the Saṃgha, you hurt yourself.⁴²⁰ You have committed a great fault; it is a thing of the past and it cannot be blamed in retrospect. Therefore return to wholesome thoughts, send away doubts (saṃśaya) and regrets (kaukrīya) and listen to these stanzas that we address to you:

The noble Saṃgha is immeasurable,

Difficult to understand in its positions (īryapatha).

It cannot be measured either on the basis of its background (kula)

Or on the basis of learning (bahuśruta),

Or on the basis of majesty (anubhāva)

Or on the basis of age (vayas)

Or on the basis of its bearing

Or on the basis of eloquence (vagviśuddhī):⁴²¹

The noble Saṃgha is a great ocean

⁴¹⁹ Ambānisutta in Anguttara, II, p. 106-107 (cf. Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 17, p. 634a17-b17).

⁴²¹ Kalpanāmaṇḍitikā, p. 139: Neryāpthena na kulena na ca śrutena na... na vayasā na ca vāgviśuddhyā śakyaṃ pramāṇum iha kenacid āryasaṃghaḥ.

The qualities of which are very deep.

The Buddha has praised this Saṃgha in hundreds of ways.

Whatever little one gives, it produces abundant fruit.

This third jewel enjoys wide renown;

This is why one should venerate the Saṃgha.⁴²²

[225a] There should no distinction made between old and young

Learned or unlearned, light or shadow,

In the same way that a man seeing a forest does not distinguish Between the campaka, the eraṇḍa or the śāla trees.

When you meditate on the Saṃgha

Avoid making distinctions between fools and saints.

When Mahākāśyapa went forth from home

His garment was worth a hundred thousand gold pieces;

Wishing to wear the lowly garb of a beggar,

He sought for rags and tatters but found none.⁴²³

⁴²² Ibid., p. 139: Taṃ tuṣṭve padaśatataiḥ svayam eva buddho yatrālpam apy upakṛtaṃ bahutām upaiti. Ratnaṃ tṛtīyaṃ iti yat prathitaṃ prthivyām arcyaḥ sa Śākyamuniśiṣyaganaḥ samagraḥ: “The Buddha himself praised this Saṃgha in hundreds of phrases. Even a small service given to it increases. Known on earth by the name of the Third Jewel, this entire group of disciples of Śākyamuni is worthy of being honored.”

⁴²³ In the Cīvarasutta in Saṃyutta (II, p. 219-222), Mahākāśyapa says that in order to become a monk, he had a paṭapilotikāṃ saṅghāṭi made, ‘an undergarment made of pieces of cloth’. According to he Commentary of Saṃyutta (II, p. 180), Kāśyapa meant the saṃghati which was made by cutting up his garments of great value (Iti mahārahāṇi vatthhāṇi chinditvā kataṃ saṅghāṭiṃ sandhāya paṭopilotikānaṃ sa’ghāṭiṃ ti vuttaṃ). The Buddha admired the quality of the material: Mudukā kho tyāyaṃ Kassapa paṭapilotikānaṃ saṅghāṭi. “That is why”, continues Kāśyapa, “I made a gift to the Blessed One of my undergarment made of pieces of cloth, and I replaced them with the hempen rags use by the Blessed One” (So khv āhaṃ paṭapilotikānaṃ saṅghāṭiṃ Bhagavato pādāsi, ahaṃ pana Bhabavato sāṇāni paṃsukūlāni nibbasanāno paṭipajjīṃ).

It is the same for the noble Saṃgha:

If one looked there for the lowliest field of merit,

The donor would still be rewarded a hundred thousand times.

What is more, the search would fail, for it cannot be found there.

The Saṃgha is a great sea

Whose moral discipline is the shore.

If an immoral (duḥśīla) monk were to be found there

He would end up by not being counted in the number of the monks

For the Saṃgha is like the great ocean

Which refuses the company of corpses.”⁴²⁴

Hearing these words and seeing the magical power (rddhibala) of the śrāmaṇeras, the dānapati became frightened and his hair stood on end. Joining his palms together, he said to the śrāmaṇeras: “Holy ones, I confess my sin (āpattiṃ pratideśayāmi): I am but a common man (prthagjana) and my mind is always following after sin. I have a small doubt and would like to question you.” And he spoke this stanza:

The great virtuous ones have broken through doubt

And I have met them today.

If I did not consult them

I would be the fool among fools.

The śrāmaṇeras said: “If you wish to ask, then ask; we will answer according to what we have learned.”

The dānapati asked: “Which is more meritorious, pure faith (prasannacitta) toward the Jewel of the Buddha or pure faith toward the Jewel of the Saṃgha?”⁴²⁵

In the corresponding sūtra in the Saṃyuktāgama (Tsa, T 99, k. 41, p. 303b22; Pie tsa, T 100, k. 6, p. 418b6), it is stated that Kāśyapa’s saṃghāṭi was worth one hundred thousand ounces of gold.

According to the legend related above (p. 190-196F), Kāśyapa actually remains at Rājagṛha within the Gr̥dhṛakūṭaparvata. He is clothed in the robes of the Buddha and must hand them over to the future buddha, Maitreya.

⁴²⁴ The great ocean has eight wonderful extraordinary qualities, one of which is not being able to cohabit with corpses: Mahāsamuddo na matena kuṇapena saṇivasati; yaṃ hoti mahāsamuddo matam kuṇapaṃ, taṃ khippaṃ ñeva tīraṃ vāheti thalaṃ ussāreti: cf. Vinaya, II, p. 237; Anguttara, IV, p. 198, 201; Udāna, p. 53,55. See also Daśabhūmika, p. 97, l. 9-10.

The śrāmaṇeras answered: “We see no difference between the Jewel of the Saṃgha and the Jewel of the Buddha. Why?”

[Udaya and Sundarikasutta].⁴²⁶ – The Buddha was begging his food one day in Śrāvastī. There was a brahmin from the P’o-lo-to-che clan (Bhāradvāja) who lived there. Several times the Buddha went to his him to beg alms. The brahmin had the following thought: “Why does this śramaṇa come repeatedly as if he were a creditor (ṛṇa)?”⁴²⁷

Then the Buddha spoke these stanzas:

The seasonal rains always fall anew,

The five grains always grow anew.

The fields are cultivated always anew,

The harvest is reaped always anew.

One takes rebirth always anew,

And one dies always anew.

⁴²⁵ A scholastic problem to which there are three theses:

1) The gift to the Buddha and the gift to the Saṃgha each give a great fruit of retribution:

Theses 170 and 171 of the Theravādins (Bareau, Sectes, p. 233; Kathāvatthu, XVII, 9-10, p. 553-556.

2) The gift to the Buddha does not give a great fruit of retribution because, having entered nirvāṇa a long time ago, the Buddha cannot enjoy the gift made to him and because the Buddha, in the passage in which we are interested here, has defined the Saṃgha as ‘the best field of merit for the world’: Thesis 5 of the Vetullakas (Bareau, Sectes, p. 255; Kathāvatthu, XVII, 10, p. 555-556); Thesis 21 of the Mahīśāsakas (Bareau, ibid., p. 185).

3) The gift to the Saṃgha does not give a great fruit of retribution because the Saṃgha is lower in merit than the Buddha and because the Sūtra (Majjhima, III, p. 254) gives the Buddha as the best field of merit: Thesis 4 of the Vetullakas (Bareau, ibid., p. 255; Kathāvatthu, XVII, 9, p. 553); Thesis 1 of the Dharmaguptakas (Bareau, ibid., p. 192).

See also Kośa, IV, p. 283, note; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 38, p. 558c. For the Traité, both kinds of gifts are equally fruitful.

⁴²⁶ Here the Traité is apparently combining two suttas from the Saṃyutta: 1) the Udayasutta of the Saṃyutta, I, p. 173-174 (Tsa, T 99, no. 1157, k. 42, p. 308a3-b18; Pie tsa, T 100, no. 80, k. 4, p. 401b11-c19) and 2) the Sundarikasutta of the Saṃyutta, I, p. 167-170 (Tsa, T 99, no. 1184, k. 44, p. 320b21-321a23; Pie tsa, T 99, no. 98, k. 5, p. 408b25-c26).

⁴²⁷ Saṃyutta, I, p. 173-174: Sāvattthi nidānaṃ. Atha kho Bhagavā pubbaṇhasamayam nivāsetvā pattacīvaraṃ ādāya yena Udayassa ... Pakattho yaṃ samaṇo Gotamo punappuṇaṃ āgacchati ti.

But since the noble Dharma is realized always anew,

Who therefore would be born or die always anew?⁴²⁸

Having heard these stanzas, the brahmin thought: “The Buddha is a great saint who has completely understands my mind.” Shamefully, he took the alms-bowl (pātra), went back into his house, filled the bowl with excellent food and offered it to the Buddha. [225b] The Buddha did not accept it and said: “I am being given this food for having spoken a stanza. I will not eat it.”⁴²⁹

The brahmin asked: “To whom should I give this food?”

The Buddha said: “I see nobody among gods and men who can digest this food. Take it and throw it on the ground somewhere where there are few plants (alpaharite) or in the water where there are no insects (apraṇaka udake).”⁴³⁰

The brahmin followed the Buddha’s orders, took the food and threw it in the water where there were no insects. Immediately the water boiled; smoke and fire came out as though red-hot iron had been plunged into it.⁴³¹

Seeing this, the brahmin was frightened and said: “It is extraordinary (adbhuta) that the magical power (ṛddhibala) contained in this food should be so great.” He returned to the Buddha, bowed down before the Buddha’s feet, confessed his sin (āpattiṃ pratyadeśayat), asked for the going-forth (pravrajya) and received the precepts (śīla). The Buddha said to him: “Good! Come!” At that moment, the brahmin’s beard and hair fell off by themselves and he became a śramaṇa.⁴³² Gradually he cut through his fetters (saṃyojana) and attained the Bodhi of the arhats.

⁴²⁸ Saṃyutta, I, p. 174.

⁴²⁹ Saṃyutta, I, p. 168, where the Buddha answered thus: Transl. – “I cannot profit from the fact that I have chanted a stanza. The Buddha refuse what is offered to them for having chanted a stanza. This rule is in force, O brahmin, wherever it is a question of the Dharma.”

This stanza is also cited in Saṃyutta, I, p. 173; Suttanipāta, p. 14, 85. – For gāthābhigīta, see Edgerton, Dictionary, p. 50.

⁴³⁰ Saṃyutta, I, p. 168-169: Atha kassa cāhaṃ imaṃ havyasesaṃ dammī ti... vā chaḍ dehi appāṇake vā udake opilāpehi ti. This is a stereotyped phrase: cf. Vinaya, I, p. 157. 158, 225, 352; II, p. 216; Majjhima, I, p. 13, 207; III, p. 157.

⁴³¹ Saṃyutta, I, p. 169: Atha kho... brāhmaṇo taṃ havyasesaṃ appāṇake udake opilāpasi... divasamtatto udake pakkhitto.

⁴³² In contradiction to the sources that it uses, the Traité has the brahmin being ordained by means of ehibhikṣukā upasampadā, one of the four kinds of ordination mentioned in the Mahāvastu, I, p. 2, I. 15. This is a quick ordination and undoubtedly the oldest form. The texts render it by the well-known formula: Sa Bhagavatā ehibhikṣukayā ābhāṣitaḥ, shi bhikṣo cara brahmacaryam iti. Bhagavato vācāvasānaṃ eva muṇḍaḥ saṃvṛtaḥ saṃghāṭīprāvṛtaḥ pātrakaravyagrahastah saptāhāvaropitakeśaśmaśrur varṣaśatopasaṃpannasya bhikṣor uryāpathenāvasthitaḥ: “He was summoned with the phrase Ehi bhikṣukā by the Blessed One who said to him: ‘Come, O monk, practice

[Dakṣiṇāvibhaṅgasūtra]. - There was also Mo-ho-kiao-t’an-mi (Mahāgautamī) who offered upper and lower precious robes, golden in color to the Buddha. Knowing that the Saṃgha could use them, the Buddha said to Gautamī: “Give these upper and lower robes to the Saṃgha”.⁴³³

This is why we know that [the gift] to the Buddha Jewel and [the gift] to the Saṃgha Jewel are equally meritorious.

The dānapati asked: “If the Saṃgha can direct and receive the gifts made to the Buddha, why did the Buddha not permit the Saṃgha to eat the food of the brahmin Bhāradvaja?”

the religious life.’ As soon as the Bhagavat finished speaking, the neophyte found himself with his head shaved, clothed in the monastic robe, a begging-bowl and a flask in his hand, with hair and beard that would have grown in seven days, similar in his posture to a monk ordained for a hundred years.” Cf. Divyāvadāna, p. 48, 281, 341, 558.

⁴³³ Beginning of the Dakṣiṇāvibhaṅgasutta in Majjhima, III, p. 253: Ekam samayaṃ Bhagavā akkesu viharati Kapilavattusmiṃ Nogrōdhāra āme. Atha kho Mahāprajāpatī Gotamī navaṃ dussayugaṃ ... saṃghe te dinne ahañ c’eva pūjito bhavissāmi saṃgho cati. Transl. – One day the Blessed One was at Kapilavastu among the Śākyas, in the Nyagrodha monastery. Then Mahāprajāpatī, the Gautamī, carrying two new robes, went to the Blessed One and, having approached, she bowed down to the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Seated to the side, she said: “Venerable One, this new cloth has been cut up and stitched by me for the Blessed One: may the Blessed One have compassion for me and accept this.” Then the Blessed One said to Mahāprajāpatī the Gautamī: “Gautamī, give it to the Saṃgha, if you give it to the Saṃgha, I will be honored and the Saṃgha also.”

This is Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, born to Devadaha, of the Śākya Añjana. Her brothers were Daṇḍapāṇi and Suprabuddha and her sister was Mahāmāyā, mother of the Buddha. The latter had died eight days after the birth and Mahāprajāpatī took the place of mother to the Buddha. Like her sister, she was the wife of Śuddhodana to whom she had born a son, the handsome Nanda. The Buddha accepted his aunt into the Buddhist order with her five hundred companions. Her entry into nirvāṇa, particularly glorious, has been noted above (p. 587-588F). According to some sources, Mahāprajāpatī presented only one robe to the Buddha, a yellow robe with gold thread (Tchong a han, T 26, k. 47, p. 721c23-722a4); a robe of tie, i.e., linen (Fen pie pou che, T 84, p. 903b23-c10); fine linen cloth, golden in color (Hien yu king, T 202, k. 12, p. 434a6-15); a vassikasāṭikā, i.e., a rain-cloak (Milindapañha, p. 240). On the other hand, the passage from the Majjhima cited at the beginning of the present note speaks of a pair of robes (dussayuga), and the Mahīśāsaka Vin. (T1421, k. 29, p. 185b17-23) also speaks of two new robes offered to the Buddha by Mahāprajāpatī. The Buddha said to the latter: “You may give them to the Saṃgha and you will obtain a great fruit of retribution. I too count among the Saṃgha.” Finally, at his aunt’s insisting, the Buddha decided to share: “I accept one robe and I give the other to the Saṃgha.”

This variation among the sources is probably explained away by scholastic reasons, for we have seen above (p. 1400F, n. 1) that the sects differed in opinion about the respective value of a gift to the Buddha and a gift to the Saṃgha, and the Buddha’s attitude to his aunt’s offering bears directly on this problem (cf. Kathāvatthu, p. 553, l. 29-31; Nyāyānusmāra, T 1562, k. 38, p. 558c6-7, 19).

The śrāmaṇeras answered: “It was in order to bring to light the great power (mahābala) of the Saṃgha. If [the brahmin] had not seen that this food, put into the water, had such great magical power (mahārddhibala), he would not have known how great is the power of the Saṃgha, but since the Saṃgha is able to accept things offered to the Buddha, we know that the power of the Saṃgha is great. Thus, when a master physician (bhaiṣajyaguru) wants to try out a poisoned drug (viṣauṣadhi), he gives it first to a chicken (kukkuṭa); then, when the chicken has died, he swallows the poison himself so that we know how great is the power (anubhāva) of the master physician. Know then, O dānapati:

The person who loves and honors the Buddha

Must also love and honor the Saṃgha

There can be no distinction

For both are equally ‘Jewels’.

Then, hearing these words spoken, the dānapati rejoiced and said: “From today on, I, so-and-so, will honor with an equal mind the young and the old who have entered into the ranks of the Saṃgha and I will avoid making distinctions.”

The śrāmaṇeras said: “Since you honor the best field of merit (anuttara buddhaṣetra) with faith, you will before long attain Bodhi. Why?”

The learned (bahuśruta), the virtuous (śīlavat).

The sages (prajñā) and the ecstasies (dhyāyīn)

All enter into the ranks of the Saṃgha

Like the ten thousand rivers flowing into the sea.

Just as all the plants and the medicinal herbs

Grow on the Snowy Mountain (himālaya),

Just as the hundred grains and all the bushes

Grow on the earth,

[225c] So all good people

Are found in the ranks of the Saṃgha.

[Gośṛṅgasūtra]. – Finally, have you not heard that one day the Buddha, speaking to Tch’ang (Dīrgha), the general of the Yakṣas (yakṣasānāṇī), praised the three good disciples A-ni-lou-t’o (Anuruddha), Nan-t’i-kia (Nandika) and Tch’e-mi-lo (Kimbila)? The Buddha said [to Dīrgha]: “If the entire world with its gods and men thinks about these three sons of noble family (etān trīṇ kulaputrān prasannacittanānasmaret) with faith, it will obtain immense benefits during the long night (dīrgharātram).”⁴³⁴

It seems that it would be better still to honor the Saṃgha, for these three men did not constitute a Saṃgha,⁴³⁵ and if the Buddha attributes such fruits to recollecting these three men, then how much more fruitful still to recollect the whole Saṃgha with pure faith. This is why, O dānapati, one should recollect the Saṃgha with all of one’s strength. A stanza says:

This group of holy people

Is a formidable army:

It destroys king Māra, our enemy;

It is our companion on the way to nirvāṇa.

434 Cūḷagosiṅgasutta in Majjhima, I, p. 205-211 (Tchong a han, T 26, k. 48, p. 729b-731a). Being in Nādikā in the Giṇḍakāvasatha, the Buddha paid a visit to three of his disciples, Anuruddha, Nandiyā and Kimbila, who were meditating in the Gosīṅgālavama. He congratulated these three monks for living together on the best of terms like a mixture of milk and water, looking after one another fondly. The friendly words between the Teacher and his disciples were interrupted by the arrival of the yakṣa Dīgha Parajana who had come to greet the Buddha and who said: “Truly, it is a great benefit for the Vajji people (in Sanskrit (Vṛji) that the Tathāgata stays among them and that these three venerable disciples are also present.” It is then that the Buddha answered Dīgha with the phrase alluded to here by the Traité: Sadevako ce pi Dīgha loko samārako sabhahmako sassamaṇabrāhmaṇī pajā ... sadevamanussāya dīghaarattaṃ hitāya suchāya. “If the world with its devas, māras and Brahmās, if the population with its monks and brahmins, with its gods and men, thought of these three sons of noble family with faith, that would contribute to the good and welfare of this world and this population during the long night [of saṃsāra].”

Sections of the Gosiṅgasutta occur in Majjhima III, p. 155-157 and the perfect harmony (sāmaggi) between Anuruddha, Nandiyā and Kimbila is also noted in other places in the Canon: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 62; Vinaya, I, p. 350-352; II, p. 182. As for Dīgha Parajana, the yakṣa general, he appears in the list of gods and semi-gods favorable to Buddhism: Āṭṇaṭṭiyasuttanta (Dīgha, III, p. 205, l. 7).⁴³⁵ Indeed, they were only three, and there must be four in order to constitute a saṃgha according to the disciplinary rule: Tayo janā sambahulā ti vuccanti, tato paraṃ saṃgho: “Three people are said to be ‘many’; more is a ‘saṃgha’ ” (Comm. of the Udāna, p. 102). The Vinaya (I, p. 319-320) distinguishes three kinds of saṃgha according to whether it is composed of four, five, ten, twenty, or more than twenty bhikṣus. For the proper procedure of ordination, the Saṃgha must be composed of a minimum of ten members (dasavagga bhikkhusaṃgha). But the Buddha made exception for the frontier regions such as Avanti where monks were less numerous: in this district, five monks were enough to confer ordination (Vinaya, I, p. 197, l. 17-20).

Thus the śrāmaṇeras explained the holy qualities of the Saṃgha to the dānapati in many ways. Having heard them, the dānapati and his entire family, great and small, saw the four noble Truths (āryasatyā) and attained the fruit of srotaāpanna,

This is why the saṃgha should be recollected wholeheartedly.

IV. RECOLLECTION OF THE MORALITIES

1. The various kinds of morality

There are two kinds of morality (śīla): i) impure morality (sāsravaśīla); ii) pure morality (anāsravaśīla).

Firstly, impure morality is of two kinds: i) the morality of discipline (saṃvaraśīla); ii) the morality connected with the meditative stabilizations (samādhisahāgataśīla).⁴³⁶

During his early practices, the yogin recollects these three kinds of morality. Having practiced all three, then he recollects only the pure morality (anāsravaśīla).

The morality of discipline (saṃvaraśīla) prevents the sins (pāpa) and corruption from gaining power. The morality of trance and concentration dissipates all the negative emotions (kleśa). Why?

When one has attained the inner happiness (adhyātmasukha) [of the meditative stabilizations], one no longer seeks worldly happiness (lokasukha). Pure morality (anāsravaśīla) uproots the roots of sins (pāpa) and negative emotions (kleśa).

Question. – Why recollect the moralities?

Answer. – As I have said above (p. 1393F) in regard the recollection of the Saṃgha, the Buddha is like the king of physicians (vaidyārāja), the Dharma is like good medicine (bhaiśajya), the Community is like the nurse (glanopasthāyaka) and morality is like submitting to the medical regime. The yogin says to himself: “If I do not fall in line with this obligation, the Three Jewels (triratna) will be of no use to me. If the guide (nāyaka) shows the good path but the traveler does not use it, that is not the fault of the guide.”⁴³⁷ This is why I should recollect morality (śīla).“

Furthermore, morality is the support (adhiṣṭhāna) of all good dharmas. Just as the hundred grains and the medicinal plants grow depending on the earth, in the same way, observing pure morality produces great profound concentrations and the knowledge of the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa). It is also the foremost gate

⁴³⁶ Cf. Kośakārikā, IV, 13:

*Avijñaptis tridhā jñeyā saṃvarāsaṃvaretarā /
saṃvaraḥ prātimokṣākhyo dhyānaḥ ‘nāsravas tathā //*

⁴³⁷ The guide is simply the one who indicates the path (mārgakhyāyin): it is not up to him whether one follows his advice or not. Comparison already used by the Majjhima, III, p. 5-6.

(prathamadvāra) for monastics (pravrajita), the stick (daṇḍa) on which all monastics lean, the primary cause and condition (hetupratyaya) of reaching nirvāṇa (nirvāṇādhigama). As it is said: “Thanks to keeping morality, the mind is free of regret (kaukrtya), and finally deliverance (vimukta), nirvāṇa, is attained.”

2. Qualities of the Moralities to be recollected

The yogin recollects pure morality (viśuddhaśīla).

[According to the sūtras]: “The faultless moralities (śīlāṇy akhaṇḍāṇi), the moralities without cracks (acchidrāṇi), the moralities without rifts (aśabalāṇi), the unvarying moralities (akalmāṣāṇi), the liberating moralities (bhujīṣyāṇi), the [226a] moralities without careless attachment (aparāṃṣṭāṇi), the moralities praised by the sages (vijñāpraśastāṇi) and without defects (agarhitāṇi)⁴³⁸ are pure morality.”

[1-2] Śīlāṇy akhaṇḍāṇy acchidrāṇi. – What are the faultless (akhaṇḍa) moralities?

a. If, with the exception of the four grave offenses formulated in the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla), one violates all the other serious precepts, this is a violation ‘with faults’ (khaṇḍa). The other wrongdoings are ‘cracks’ (chidra).

b. Moreover, the physical wrongdoings (kāyikāpatti) are called ‘defects’ and the vocal wrongdoings are called ‘rifts’.

c. Finally, the great sins are called ‘defects’ (defeats?) and the small wrongdoings are called ‘cracks’.

[3] Śīlāṇy aśabalāṇi. – If the good mind (kuśalacitta) is turned toward nirvāṇa and prevents the fetters (saṃyojana) and the various faulty examinations (vitarka) and subtle analyses (vicāra) from gaining access, there is morality ‘without rifts’ (aśabala).

[4] Śīlāṇy akalmāṣāṇi. – If the mind goes [alternately] in two directions, sometimes toward nirvāṇa and sometimes toward saṃsāra, there is ‘varying’ morality (kalmāṣa). [If the mind goes exclusively toward nirvāṇa, there is ‘unvarying’ morality (akalmāṣa)].

[5] Śīlāṇi bhujīṣyāṇi. – Following morality, not following after external conditions (bāhyapratyaya), like the independent (svatantra) unfettered man, observing pure morality without being enslaved by desire (trṣṇādāśya), this is ‘liberating morality’ (bhujīṣya).

[6] Śīlāṇy aparāṃṣṭāṇi. – In the face of morality, the yogin does not undergo the fetter of lust (rāga), pride (māna), etc. He knows the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of morality (śīlaninitāni nodgrhṇāti). If he grasps the characteristics of morality, he would be like a prisoner held by manacles who, even after having been pardoned, remains attached to his golden manacles. The person attached [to his own morality] by the ⁴³⁸ See the preliminary note to the present chapter, p. 1332F. Here Kumārajīva translates the canonical terms rather freely. The latter are explained literally in Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 182-183.

passion of love is as if in prison: even if he manages to escape, he remains attached (sakta) to the morality like golden fetters. But the yogin who knows that morality is cause and condition for purity (anāsravahetupratyaya) does not experience this attachment [to morality itself] and is liberated, free of fetters: this is what is called morality ‘without thoughtless attachment’ (aparāmrṣṭa).⁴³⁹

[7] Śīlāni vijñāpraśastāni. – These are the moralities praised by the Buddhas, the bodhisattvas, the pratyekabuddhas and the śrāvakas. If the yogin practices such morality, uses such morality, these are the moralities ‘praised by the sages’ (vijñāpraśasta).

The moralities of the heretics (tīrthikaśīla) are the moralities of the bull (gośīla), the deer (mrgaśīla), the dog (kukkuraśīla),⁴⁴⁰ the flesh-eating demons (rākṣasaśīla), the mute (mūkaśīla), the deaf (badhiraśīla): these moralities are not praised by the sages; they are cruel and do not bring any good retribution (vipāka).

Furthermore, among the three kinds of morality, pure morality (anāsravaśīla) is praised by the sages. It is indestructible, unchanging and, by depending on this morality, one obtains true wisdom: therefore it is the morality ‘praised by the sages’.

Pure morality is of three kinds: it is, as the Buddha said, right speech (samyagvāc), right action (samyakkarmānta) and right livelihood (samyagājīva).⁴⁴¹ The meaning of this threefold activity has been explained (p. 1182F) in regard to the eightfold noble Path (āryāṣṭāṅgika mārga). It is necessary to continue this explanation fully here.

3. The position of morality among the Path members

Question. – If morality is cause and condition for meditative stability (samādhi) and if meditative stability is cause and condition for wisdom (prajñā), why is wisdom placed at the beginning (ādaū) of [the list] of the eightfold noble Path, morality at the middle (madhye) and meditative stability at the end (paryavasāne)?⁴⁴²

Answer. - When one is starting out on a trip, it is the rule to first consider the path to travel with one’s eyes and then to travel. When one is traveling, one must be careful. While walking energetically, one always ⁴³⁹ The Buddha several times has condemned the unjustified trust in the efficacy of rituals and vows (śīlavrataparāmarśa): cf. Vinaya, I, p. 184; Majjhima, I, p. 433; Anguttara, III, p. 377; IV, p. 144.

⁴⁴⁰ Heretics having taken the vow of living in the manner of a given animal. Majjhima, I, p. 387 mentions a Puṇṇa who was a govatika, a Seniya who was a kukkuruvatika, etc. See also Dīgha, III, p. 6-7; Comm. On the Majjhima, III, p. 100; Nettipakaraṇa, p. 99.

⁴⁴¹ Majjhima, I, p. 301: Yā c’āvuso Visakha sammāvācā yo ca sammākamanto yo ca sammā ājīvo, ime dhammā sīlakkhandhe saṅgahitā.

⁴⁴² This question has already been asked above, p. 838F. In the list of the eight members of the path, the first two constitute prajñāskandha, the next three śīlaskandha and the last three samādhiskandha.

recalls the advice of the guide. If these are remembered, one attentively follows one’s route without going off on false paths. It is the same for right view (samyagdrṣṭi).

1) First, with right wisdom, one considers the five aggregates of attachment (upadānaskandha) which are always painful: this is what is called [the truth] of suffering (duḥkha). Suffering is the result of a group of fetters (samyojana), affection (anunaya), etc.: this is what is called the origin (samudaya). The cessation of the fetters (samyojananirodha), affection, etc., is called nirvāṇa. Considering the eight members (aṣṭāṅga) in this way is called Path. All of that is [226b] right view (samyagdrṣṭi).

From that moment, the yogin whose mind is firm knows that saṃsāra is false and should be abandoned, that nirvāṇa is true and should be followed. This clear seeing of things (read kiue-ting = vyavasāya, nirṇaya) is called right view (samyagdrṣṭi).

2) The yogin knows and sees these things, but the strength of his mind is not great and he is not yet able to start out on his journey. He reflects, calculates and stimulates the right view so that it may gain power. This is called right intention (samyaksamkalpa).

3-5) His wisdom being fervent, he wants to express it in words. This is why he then practices right speech (samyagvāc), right action (samyakkarmānta) and right livelihood (samyagājīva).

6) At the time when he practices morality, he is energetic, without laziness, and never stops in the meditative stabilizations with form and without form (rūpārūpyasamādhi). This is called right exertion (samyagvyāyāma).

7) Using right view, he contemplates the four Truths (catuḥsatya). He never forgets that all the disturbing emotions (kleśa) are enemies (amitra) to be destroyed, that right view, etc., are friends to follow. This is called right mindfulness (samyaksmrṭi).

8) He concentrates his mind on the four Truths without being distracted. He prevents it from being led toward the form and formless meditative stabilizations (rūpārūpyasamādhi) but wholeheartedly moves toward nirvāṇa. This is called right meditation (samyaksamādhi).

At the beginning [during the preparatory Path], the yogin obtains the good-impure (kuśalāśrava) good roots called heat (uṣmagata), summits (mūrdhan) and patience (kṣānti),⁴⁴³ which are developed in beginning, intermediate and final minds.

When he penetrates into the pure mind (anāsravacitta) [constituting the first moment of the Path of seeing], he is perfected quickly in one instant.⁴⁴⁴ Here there is no distinction between initial, intermediate and final minds.

⁴⁴³ Uṣmagata, mūrdhan, kṣānti and laukikāgradharma are the four auxiliaries of the stage of penetration (nirvedhabhāgñya) of the Buddhist Truths and are practiced during the preparatory Path (prayogamārga) immediately preceding the Path of seeing the truths (darśanamārga): see above, p. 395F, n.

Right view (samyagdr̥ṣṭi) is associated with right conceptualizing (samyaksaṃkalpa), right effort (samyagvyāyāna), right mindfulness (samyaksmṛti), right concentration (samyaksamādhi); and the threefold morality [consisting of samyagvāc, samyakkarmānta and samyagājīva] functions in concomitance with these five members (read wou fen):

- 1) Right view (samyagdr̥ṣṭi) distinguishes the beautiful and the ugly and deals with the good (hita).
- 2) Right intention (samyaksaṃkalpa) deals with encouraging right view.
- 3-5) Right speech (samyagvāc), etc., [namely, samyakkarmānta and samyagājīva] maintains all the qualities (guṇa) of this wisdom so that they are not lost.
- 6) Right effort (samyagvyāyāna) encourages wisdom so that it advances rapidly and does not stop.
- 7) Right mindfulness (samyaksmṛti) recalls and never forgets the seven things to be done.
- 8) Right concentration (samyaksamādhi) makes the mind pure, free from stains (kaṣāya) and distraction (vikṣepa). It assures the success (siddhi) of right view and the seven [preceding] members. It is like a lamp (dīpa) inside a house sheltered from the wind that burns brightly.

In this way pure morality (anāsravaśīla) occurs in the eightfold noble Path and is praised by the sages (vijāpraśasta).

4. Impure morality

Question. – We accept that pure morality (anāsravaśīla) must be praised by the sages; but why praise impure morality (sāsravaśīla)?

Answer. – Impure morality is similar to pure morality and, in harmony with it, implements causes and conditions [for salvation]. This is why the sages praise it jointly. Suppose that, in a band of brigands, someone rebels and comes to confide in me. Brigand though he was, now he is coming to me and I must welcome him. I am able to use him to destroy the thieves. Why should one not remember that these thieves that are the negative emotions (kleśa) are in the ramparts of the threefold world (traiḍhātukanagara)?

These roots of good (kuśalamūla) constituting impure morality (sāsravaśīla) that are called heat (uṣmagata), summits (mūrdhan), patience (kṣānti) and supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgradharma) are indeed superior to other [good]-impure (kuśalasāsrava) dharmas. This is why the yogin uses them: it is thanks to them that he can destroy the brigands that are the disturbing emotions (kleśa) and that he can obtain the precious pure dharma (anāsravadharma) that is the duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti. That is why [this impure morality] is praised by the sages.

⁴⁴⁴ The preparatory Path is followed by the Path of seeing the truths consisting of sixteen mind-moments. Starting with the first, i.e., the duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti, the ascetic becomes an Ārya, a candidate for the first fruit. See above, p. 1067F.

This is the recollection of morality (śīlānusmṛti).

V. RECOLLECTION OF ABANDONMENT

In regard to the recollection of abandonment (tyāgānusmṛti), there are two kinds of abandonment (tyāga): i) abandonment consisting of generosity (dānatyāga); ii) abandonment of all the disturbing emotions (sarvakleśatyāga). [226c] Abandonment consisting of generosity is of two kinds: i) material gifts (āmiṣadāna); ii) gift of the Dharma (dharmadāna) or preaching. Altogether these three kinds of abandonment (trividhatyāgasāmagrī) make up abandonment (tyāga).⁴⁴⁵

1. Material generosity

Material generosity (āmiṣadāna) is the root (mūla) of all good dharmas.

The yogin has the following thought: It is thanks to the first four recollections (anusmṛti) that I will succeed in curing the sicknesses of the disturbing emotions (kleśavyādhi). How am I going to get these four recollections? Now, in previous existences and in this present lifetime, the occasions of making gifts to the Three Jewels are rare. Why? In this beginningless universe (anādiko lokadhātu), beings are ignorant of generosity to the Three Jewels: this is why their merits (puṇya) become exhausted and disappear. But the Three Jewels have immense qualities: this is why gifts made to them are inexhaustible and necessarily lead to nirvāṇa. Furthermore, if the Buddhas of the past have first produced the mind, this was as a result of their numerous or less numerous gifts. And so the Buddha said that generosity is the first aid to Bodhi.

Furthermore, human life is impermanent (anitya) and wealth (dhana) slips by like a flash of lightning. If they should be given even when people do not ask anything of you, then why would you not give them when they beg of you to give them? It is necessary to give in order to create conditions favorable to Bodhi.

Furthermore, wealth is cause and condition for all kinds of disturbing emotions (kleśa) and misdeeds (āpatti), whereas morality (śīla), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (prajñā) and the various good dharmas are cause and condition for nirvāṇa. Consequently, if one must rid oneself of one's wealth [because it is dangerous], why not make a gift of it to the excellent field of merit (puṇyakṣetra)?

[The two brothers who got rid of their gold]. – Thus, there were two brothers, older and younger who, without companions, went on a voyage, each carrying ten pounds of gold. The older said to himself: “Why should I not kill my younger brother and take his gold? On this deserted path, nobody would know.” The younger, in turn, said to himself: “I should kill my older brother and take his gold.” The two brothers each had evil plans; their words and their looks differed.

⁴⁴⁵ These kinds of generosity have been mentioned above, p. 700F.

But the two brothers came to themselves and felt remorse (kaukr̥tya): “How would we be any different from demons (amanuṣya) and beasts (tiryagoni)? We are brothers born of the same parents and, for the sake of a little bit of gold, we are having such bad feelings for each other.”

Together they came to the shore of a deep lake. The older brother took his gold and threw it into the water. The younger brother said: “Good, good!!” and, in his turn, threw his gold into the water. The older brother, too, said: “Good, good!”

The two brothers asked each other why they had said it was good and each answered the other: “Because of this gold, we had bad feelings and wanted to kill one another. Now that we are rid of our gold, we say that it is good and we both agree.”

This is why we know that it is always necessary to renounce one’s wealth, the cause of bad feelings. Why then not give it away when, by giving it, one gains great merit (mahāpuṇya)? Thus it is said:

Generosity is a precious treasure
It is also a good friend (kalyāṇamitra).
It is beneficial from one end to the other,
There is nobody who can destroy it.

[227a] Generosity is an umbrella of wondrous secrets:

It can keep off the rain of hunger and thirst.
Generosity is a solid vessel;
It can cross the ocean of poverty.

Avarice (mātsarya) is a calamity:
Because of it, one experiences sadness and fear.
Bathing it with the water of generosity
At once brings good fortune and happiness.

The miser deprives himself of clothing and food;
At the end of his life he has neither joy nor happiness.
Although he is reputed to be rich,
He is no different from the poor person.

The miser’s home
Is like a burial mound or a tomb;
The beggars keep far away from it
And finally nobody comes near it.

This is why the miser
Is rejected by the sages.
Even if the breath of life is not exhausted
He is no different from a dead man.

The miser has neither merit nor wisdom:
He is not firmly resolved to give.
About to fall into the pit of death,
His love of saving changes into suffering and hate;
Only his tears will depart with him,
The fire of sadness and regret will burn his body.

The good donor is happy
And, after death, has no suffering.
The person who practices generosity,
His renown fills the ten directions.

He is loved by the sages,
Entering into their assemblies, he is not afraid.
When his life over he is reborn among the gods
And in time he will certainly gain nirvāṇa.⁴⁴⁶

⁴⁴⁶ The last two stanzas are to be compared with Anguttara, III, p. 40: Dadaṃ piyo bhajanti naṃ bahū ...devānaṃ saḥavyagatā ramanti te.

Their Sanskrit correspondent is in the Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, p. 189-190: Dadat priyo bhavati bhajanti taṃ janāḥ ... devānāṃ svabhāvagatā ramanti te.

Condemning avarice (mātsarya) in many ways and praising generosity (dāna) is called ‘recollection of material generosity’ (āmiśadānānūsmṛti).

2. Generosity of the Dharma

How is generosity of the Dharma (dharmadāna) recollected?

The yogin has the following thought: The benefits of generosity of the Dharma are very great: it is because of generosity of the Dharma that all the disciples (śrāvaka) of the Buddha have found the Path.

Moreover, the Buddha said: “Of the two kinds of generosity, generosity of the Dharma is foremost.”⁴⁴⁷ Why?

The retribution (vipāka) for material generosity (āmiśadāna) is limited whereas the retribution of generosity of the Dharma is immense. Material generosity is rewarded in the desire realm (kāmadhātu) whereas generosity of the Dharma is rewarded in the threefold world (trai dhātuka) and also beyond the threefold world.

If the ascetic does not seek glory (śloka), profit (lābha) or power (prabhāva), if he exerts himself solely in the Path of the Buddhas and develops great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā), if he saves beings from the suffering of birth, old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maraṇa), then this is ‘pure generosity of the Dharma’ (viśuddhadharmadāna). Otherwise, it is only a business deal or a barter.

Moreover, when material generosity is practiced widely, wealth is exhausted; on the other hand, when generosity of the Dharma is practiced widely, the Dharma grows. Material generosity that has existed for countless generations is an old habit; on the other hand, generosity of the Dharma which did not exist before the blossoming of the holy Dharma (saddharma) is something new.⁴⁴⁸

Material generosity remedies only hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsā), sicknesses (vyādhi) of cold, heat (śītoṣṇa), etc.; generosity of the Dharma can drive away the sicknesses of the ninety-eight defilements (kleśa).⁴⁴⁹ [227b]

Transl.: The donor is precious; people love him; he wins renown and his glory increases. He enters the assembly undisturbed, for the man who is without miserliness is fearless. This is why the wise give gifts, having effaced the stain of avarice and seeking happiness. Established for a long time in the heavens, they enjoy themselves in the company of the gods.

⁴⁴⁷ Anguttara, I, p. 91, etc., cited above, p. 699F, n. 1.

⁴⁴⁸ This consideration has already been developed above, p. 699-700F.

⁴⁴⁹ The 98 anusāyas: cf. Kośa, V, p. 9.

For all these reasons, a distinction is made between material generosity and generosity of the Dharma. The yogin should recollect the generosity of the Dharma.

Question. – What is generosity of the Dharma (dharmadāna)?

Answer. – Generosity of the Dharma is the fact of teaching others the twelve classes of texts preached by the Buddha (dṛvādaśāṅgabuddhavadāna)⁴⁵⁰ with a pure mind and in view of merit (puṇya).

Furthermore, generosity of the Dharma is also the fact of using magical power (ṛddhibala) so that people may find the Path. Thus it is said in the Wang-ming p’ou-sa king (Jālinīprabhabodhisattvasūtra or Viśeṣacintibrahmapariṣcchā): “People who see the brilliance of the Buddha find the path and are reborn among the gods.”⁴⁵¹

Therefore if, without saying anything vocally, one brings others to find the Dharma, that is generosity of the Dharma.

In this gift of the Dharma, the mental nature (cittasvabhāva) of beings, the greater or lesser number of their defilements (kleśa), the sharpness (tīkṣnatā) or dullness (mṛdutā) of their wisdom (prajñā) must be taken into consideration; it is necessary to be based on what can be useful to them in order to preach the Dharma to them. In the same way, the medicine (bhaiṣajya) is regulated for the sickness (vyādhi) for which it is efficacious.

There are people who are especially lustful (rāgabahula), especially hateful (dveṣabahula), especially stupid (mohabahula), combining two of these tendencies, or mixing all three. For the lustful, contemplation of the horrible (aśubhabhāvanā) is preached. For the hateful, loving-kindness (maitrīcitta) is preached; for the stupid, the profound co-dependent production of phenomena (gamabhīrapratītyasamutpāda) is preached; for those who combine two of these tendencies, both of these practices are preached; for those who mix all three, all three practices are preached. If one does not know the nature of the sickness and one errs in the medicine, the sickness gets worse.

Those who believe in the existence of beings (sattva) are taught that only the five aggregates (pañcaskandha) exist, and that there is no ātman in them. Those who deny the existence of beings are taught the renewing of the five skandhas serially (pañcaskandhasaṃtāna) so that they do not fall into [the wrong view] of nihilism (ucchedavāda).⁴⁵² To those who seek wealth, generosity is preached. To those who wish to be reborn among the gods, morality (śīla) is preached. To those who are afflicted, the things of the gods are preached. To unfortunate lay people (grhastā), the regulations of the monks (pravrajita) are

When the Buddha walks to and fro, the soles of his feet shine and beings are touched by this light. Those who encounter this light are reborn after their death among the gods.”

⁴⁵² In this first series of cases, the sermon is from the therapeutic point of view (prātipakṣika siddhānta): see above, p. 33-35F.

preached. To lay people who love money, the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla) of the upāsaka is preached. To those who hate saṃsāra, the three seals of the Dharma (dharmamudrā), impermanence (anitya), non-self (anātman), nirvāṇa, are preached.⁴⁵³

Being based on the doctrine of the sūtras, the preacher himself shows the meaning (artha) and the logic (nyāya) and adorns the gift of the Dharma with comparisons (avadāna) in order to preach it to beings.

3. Abandonment of the afflicting emotions

To destroy, to reject all [the afflicting emotions] from the three fetters (saṃyojana)⁴⁵⁴ up to the ninety-eight latent tendencies (anuśaya) is called ‘abandonment’ (tyāga). By recollecting the rejection of these things as one rejects venomous snakes (āśīviṣa)⁴⁵⁵ or like shackles, one acquires salvation (yogakṣema) and joy (prāmodya).

Furthermore, recollection of the abandoning of the disturbing emotions (kleśatyāgānasmṛti) also enters into recollection of the Dharma (dharmānasmṛti).

Question. – If it enters into the recollection of the Dharma, why speak of it again here?

Answer. – Abandonment of the disturbing emotions is something splendid (cāru), difficult to acquire (durlabha), peerless (anuttara) and immense (paramāṇa); this is why it is mentioned separately.

Furthermore, there is a difference between recollection of the Dharma and recollection of abandonment. To recollect the Dharma is to recollect the Dharma of the Buddha, the foremost of all good dharmas. To recollect abandonment is to recollect the disturbing emotions (āpatti) and sins (āpatti) insofar as they are quickly rejected. Since their aspects (ākāra) are distinct, the two recollections are different. [227c]

For these many reasons, the yogin should recollect abandonment [of the disturbing emotions]. This recollection of abandonment constitutes the first practice of knowledge as dhyāna where there is a risk of experiencing pride (abhimāna).⁴⁵⁶

VI. RECOLLECTION OF THE DEITIES

1. Recollection of the gods–by-birth

⁴⁵³ In this second series of cases, the sermon is from the individual point of view (prātipauruṣika siddhānta): see above, p. 31-32F.

⁴⁵⁴ Satkāyādṛṣṭi, śīlavrataparāmarśa and vicikitsā: cf. Kośa, V, p. 85; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 79, l. 8-9.

⁴⁵⁵ See the apologue of the four venomous snakes in the Āśīviṣopamaśūtra: see above, p. 702-707F; Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, p. 136-137, note.

⁴⁵⁶ See Kośa, V, p. 27.

In this recollection of the gods (devatānasmṛti), it is a question [of the six classes of gods of kāmadhātu], from the Cāturmahārājakāyikas up to the Paranirmitavaśavartidevas.

Question. – The disciples (śrāvaka) of the Buddha should recollect the Buddha and the Dharma of the Buddha exclusively; why [still] recollect the gods?

Answer. – As a reward for their actions, people receive the happiness of the heavens (svargasukha); this is why the deities [who live there] are recollected.

Furthermore, the Buddha himself gave the reasons for practicing the eight recollections and declared:

“The noble disciple who recollects the deities should have the following thought: ‘The Cāturmahārājikadevas are born in their paradise as a result of five good qualities (kuśaladharmā), namely, faith (śraddhā) in [the retribution] of sin (āpatti) and merit (punya), the observance of morality (śīla), hearing the holy Dharma (saddharma), the practice of generosity (tyāga) and the practice of wisdom (prajñā). I too possess these five qualities and I rejoice, for it is said that the deities, as a result of these five qualities, have taken birth in the blessed abodes. I too who possess these qualities could be reborn there if that is what I wanted. But as the happiness of the paradises is transitory, I will not do so.’ And the disciple will reason in the same way [for the other five groups of deities] up to and including the Paranirmitavaśavartidevas.”⁴⁵⁷

Question. – In the threefold world (traiadhātuka), there are many pure deities [occupying rūpadhātu and ārūpyadhātu]. Why recollect only the gods of the desire realm (kāmadhātu)?

Answer. – It is in the śrāvaka system that it is a matter of just recollecting [only the deities of kāmadhātu; but in the Māhayāna it is forbidden to recollect the deities of the threefold world.

The yogin who has not yet attained the Path very often is still attached in mind to the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) belonging to the world of men. This is why the Buddha recommends recollecting the deities. If the yogin has been able to cut through lust (rāga), he will be reborn among the gods of the two higher realms [rūpadhātu and ārūpyadhātu]. If he has not been able to cut through lust, he will be reborn among the six classes of gods of the desire realm [kāmadhātu] where the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa) are excellent (pranīta), subtle (sūkṣma) and pure (viśuddha).

The Buddha does not want people to be reborn again and enjoy the five objects of enjoyment; but there are beings who are unable to enter into nirvāṇa, and it is these beings that the Buddha tells to recollect the deities.

⁴⁵⁷ According to the Sanskrit Āgamas faithfully quoted here, recollection of the deities brings a rebirth solely among the six classes of gods of kāmadhātu. According to the Pāli Nikāyas, it can bring a rebirth, not only among the six classes of gods of kāmadhātu, but also among the Brahmakāyika gods of rūpadhātu and the gods higher than the latter. See the citations and references in the initial note to the present chapter, p. 1333F.

Thus, one day the son of a king (rājaputra) was standing in a high and dangerous place: it was impossible to get him down and he was about to fall to the ground, The king sent someone to spread a thick mattress on the ground so that when the prince fell he would not be killed by being crushed on the ground.

2. Recollection of gods of native purity

Furthermore, there are four kinds of gods:⁴⁵⁸ i) metaphorical gods (saṃmatideva), ii) gods by birth (upapattideva), iii) pure gods (viśuddhideva), iv) gods of native purity (upapattiviśuddhideva):

i) The actual god called T'ien-tseu “Son of a god or Devaputra”, for example, is a metaphorical god.

ii) [All the deities of the threefold world] from the Cāturmahārājikas up to the neither-discriminating-nor-non-discriminating gods (naivasamjñānāsamjñā deva) are gods by birth (upapattideva).

iii) All the holy individuals (āryapudgala) born among humans are gods by purity (viśuddhideva).

iv) All the holy individuals born among the gods of the threefold world (traidhātuka) are gods by native purity (upapattiviśuddhideva), namely:

a. The srotaāpanna called kulaṃkula and the sakṛdāgāmin called ekavīcika who, in the paradises, sometimes attain the state of anāgāmin or arhat are the upapattiviśuddhideva.

b. In the form realm (rūpadhātu), there are five kinds of anāgāmin who are no longer reborn in this realm [i.e., kāmadhātu] but attain the state of arhat in rūpadhātu.

c. In the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu), there is a kind of anāgāmin who, being detached from the form realm (rūpadhātu), is reborn in the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu), cultivates the pure path there, becomes arhat and enters into nirvāṇa. [228a]

Therefore we call recollection of the deities (devatānusmṛti) the fact of recollecting two kinds of deities: i) the deities by birth (upapattideva) and ii) the deities of native purity (upapattiviśuddhideva).

VII. RECOLLECTION OF BREATHING

On recollection of inhalation and exhalation (ānāpānusmṛti) see what is said in the Tch'an king (Dhyānasūtra).⁴⁵⁹

VIII. RECOLLECTION OF DEATH

⁴⁵⁸ See above, p. 331F and note 2.

⁴⁵⁹ Dhyānasūtra, already cited above, p. 1024F. See below, k. 24, p. 239b8; k. 28, p. 264c25; k. 91, p. 705b6.

In regard to recollection of death (marañānusmṛti), there are two kinds of death: i) death by oneself (ātmanā maraṇam), ii) death by another (pareṇa maraṇam).⁴⁶⁰

The yogin always recollects these two types of death. If nobody kills it, this body will die necessarily by itself.⁴⁶¹ Not even for the time of a finger-snap (acchṭāsamghitātāmātram) can one believe that this conditioned dharma (saṃskṛtadharma) which is the body will not die. At all times within this body, death is present without even waiting for old age (jarā). One cannot be based on this mass of sorrows (śoka), sufferings (upāyāsa) and decrepitude (parijūnya). The desire for life makes us hope for safety (yogakṣema) and immortality (amṛta), but this hope arises only in fools (mohapuruṣa). In the body, the four great elements are all destroyed. As long as a person carries the chest containing the [four venomous snakes (āśvīṣa)],⁴⁶² how can the wise think of safety?

That exhalation (praśvāsa) should be followed by inhalation (āśvāsa), that inhalation should be followed by exhalation, that awakening (nidrā) should follow sleep (prabodha), all these things are difficult to guarantee. Why? Because internally as well as externally, the body has many enemies (vairin), Thus it is said:

Some die in the womb,

Some die at birth,

Some die at a ripe age,

Some die during old age.

In the same way, when the fruit is ripe

It falls for all kinds of reasons.⁴⁶³

⁴⁶⁰ According to the sūtra, there are four ways of taking on a new existence (ātmabhāvavratilamba): 1) that in which one's own volition (ātmasaṃcetanā) is acting and not that of another (paraśaṃcetanā); 2) that in which the volition of others is acting and not one's own, etc. : cf. Dīgha, III, p. 231; Anguttara, II, p. 159; Kośa, II, p. 219.

According to the Visuddhimagga, p. 189, it is necessary to recollect death at the normal time (kālamaraṇa) resulting from exhaustion of merit (puññakkhaya), from exhaustion of the lifespan (āyukkhaya) or both, and death at abnormal time (akālamaraṇa) resulting from an action putting an end to the action producing life.

⁴⁶¹ For “the end of life is death” (marañantaṃ hi jīvitaṃ): Dhammapada, v. 148.

⁴⁶² See the apologue of the four venomous snakes in the Āśvīṣopamasūtra, above, p. 702-707F; Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, p. 136-137, note.

⁴⁶³ Cf. Suttanipāta, v. 576, p. 113:

*Phalānaṃ iva pakkānaṃ pāto papatanā bhayaṃ /
evam jatānaṃ maccānaṃ niccaṃ maraṇato bhayaṃ //*

People always seek to avoid

Death, the cruel and wicked thief.

But it is hard to believe

That one can ever escape this thief and find safety.⁴⁶⁴

Imagine a great and wise man

Of unsurpassable power and strength:

Neither before nor after

Nor at present will he escape death.⁴⁶⁵

There are no skillful words,

There are no supplications that can free one.

Thee is no fortified place

Where one can hide from it.⁴⁶⁶

Neither by observing pure morality

Nor by exertion can one elude it.

Death is a pitiless thief.

“When the fruits are ripe, it is to be feared that they may fall in the morning; in the same way, when mortals are born, they risk death perpetually.”

⁴⁶⁴ In the Visuddhimagga, p. 190, death appears as a butcher (vadhaka) who threatens all beings and, as soon as they are born, holds a knife at their throats.

⁴⁶⁵ If people of great fame, great merit, great strength, great supernatural powers, great intelligence, if the pratyekabuddhas and the samyakṣambuddhas themselves do not escape death, how could a man like me do so (mādisēṣu kathā va kā)? Cf. Visuddhimagga, p. 192-193.

⁴⁶⁶ Cf. Dhammapada, v. 128:

Na antalikkhe, na samuddamajjhe na pabbatānaṃ vivaraṃ pavissa / na vijjatī so jagatippadeso yatraṭṭhitaṃ nappasahetha maccu //

“Neither in the sky, nor in the middle of the sea, nor by crawling into mountain caves can one find any place in this world where death cannot vanquish us.”

When it comes, there is no place to escape from it.

This is why, in the course of transitory and dangerous existence, the yogin should not think of or hope to live.

[Marāṇasmṛtisūtra].⁴⁶⁷ – One day when the Buddha was speaking to the bhikṣus on the meaning of death (saraṇasaṃjñārtha), a certain bhikṣu, having arranged his upper robe over his left shoulder (ekāṃsam uttarāsaṅgaṃ kṛtvā), said to the Buddha: “I can meditate on the meaning of death.”

The Buddha asked him: “How do you meditate?”

The bhikṣu said: “I do not hope to live longer than seven years.”

The Buddha said: “That is an unmindful way to meditate on the meaning of death.”

Another bhikṣu said: “I do not hope to live longer than seven months.” Another bhikṣu said seven days, and yet others said six, five, four, three, two or one day. The Buddha said to them: “All of you are meditating unmindfully on the meaning of death (marāṇasaṃjñā).”

⁴⁶⁷ A slightly different version of the Marāṇasutta I of the Anguttara, III, p. 303-306, or IV, p. 316-319, partially quoted in the Visuddhimagga, ed. Warren, p. 196 which has its correspondent in the Ekottarāgama (Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 35, p. 741c27-742b2). The Pāli sources place this sūtra at Nāndika in Giṇḍakāvāsatha; the Sanskrit sources place it at Śrāvastī in the Jetavana in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

Here are translations of a few extracts from the Marāṇasatisutta: Marāṇasati bhikkhave bhāvitā bahukulikatā mahapphalā ... ahaṃ bhante bhāvēmi marāṇasatin ti.

This first monk who wished or hoped to live for one night and one day in order to meditate on the Buddha’s teaching on death was followed by three others who wished to live for one day (divasaṃ), for the time of one meal (ekaṃ piṇḍapātamaṃ), or for the time of eating and swallowing four or five morsels (cattāro pañca ālope), respectively.

The Buddha declared that these four monks live unmindfully (pamattā viharanti) and practice a lazy ‘recollection of death’ for destroying impurities (dandaṃ marāṇasatiṃ bhāventi āsavānaṃ khayāya).

Finally, two other monks came who wished to live the time of eating and swallowing a single morsel (ekaṃ ālopaṃ) or even the time between an inbreath and an outbreath, or the time of a single inhalation (yadantaraṃ assasitvā vā passasāmi passasitvā vā assasāmi) in order to meditate on the Buddha’s teaching on death.

The Buddha declared that these two monks lived without unmindfulness (appamattā viharanti) and practiced a ‘recollection of death’ effective in destroying the impurities (tikkhaṃ marāṇasatiṃ bhāventi khayāya).

According to the Ekottarāgama (l.c., p. 742a23), the monk who was certain of living only the time of one inbreath or outbreath was Vakkhali, well known by his suicide (Saṃyutta, III, p. 119-124).

One bhikṣu said [that he did not hope to live longer than one morning], from morning until mealtime. Yet another, that he did not hope to live longer than a single meal (eka piṇḍapāta). The Buddha declared: “You also are meditating unmindfully on the meaning of death.”

Finally a bhikṣu, having arranged his upper robe over his left shoulder, said to the Buddha: “[I hope to live only as long as the time needed] for an outbreath (yāvāt prāśvasāmi) without waiting for the next inbreath, or the time required for an inbreath (yāvād āśvasāmi) without waiting for the next outbreath.” The Buddha declared: “That is true meditation on the meaning of death, without unmindfulness. O bhikṣus, all conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma) arise and perish from moment to moment. Their time of duration (sthitikāla) is very brief. They are like a magic show (māyopama), deceiving the ignorant yogins.”⁴⁶⁸

It is for these many reasons that one recollects death.

IX. LOGICAL ORDER OF THE EIGHT RECOLLECTIONS

Question. – The Dharma is the teacher (ācārya) of all the Buddhas of the three times.⁴⁶⁹ Why then recollect the Buddha first? What is the order (anukrama) of the eight recollections?

Answer. – 1-3) Although the Dharma is the teacher of the Buddhas of the three times (tryadhvan) and the ten directions, it is the Buddha who preached the Dharma because his skill is great.

[The king who built a ladder to facilitate the ascent of a mountain.] – In the Himavat there was a precious mountain (ratnagiri) at the summit of which there was a precious wish-fulfilling stone (cintāmaṇiratna) and all kinds of precious substances. People wanted to climb up there: some, having climbed halfway, turned back; others turned back from near the summit.

There was a very virtuous king who, out of compassion for beings, had a huge ladder built (mahāśopāna). The entire population, great and small down to children of seven years, succeeded thus in climbing the mountain and gathered the wish-fulfilling jewel and all kinds of precious substances as they pleased (yatheṣṭam).

It is the same for the Buddha. The ‘precious mountain’ is the true nature of all dharmas of the world. The ninety-six kinds of heretics⁴⁷⁰ cannot reach it; even Brahmā Devarāja who seeks the true nature of dharmas ⁴⁶⁸ Ekottarāgama (l.c., p. 742a27-29): “All formations (saṃskāra) are empty (śūnya) and calm (praśānta). That which is born and that which dies is a magical creation, without true reality.”

⁴⁶⁹ Shortly after his enlightenment, the Buddha looked in the heavens and on earth for someone to venerate and serve. Finding nobody worthy of his homage, he chose the Dharma as his teacher. See the Gāṇḍavāsutta of the Saṃyutta, I, p. 138-149 (T 99, no. 1188, k. 44, p. 321a27; T 100, no. 101, k. 5, p. 410a3-b9). This sūtra has been quoted above, p. 586F.

⁴⁷⁰ See above, p. 432F, n. 1, and later k. 27, p. 261a15-16; k. 36, p. 325c11; k. 40, p. 349b22; k. 49, p. 412b5; k. 74, p. 581b18. Except for the Ekottarāgama, in the canonical scriptures no mention is made of these 96 sects.

cannot find it. What then could be said for other people? In his great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā), the Buddha has pity on beings. Endowed with the six perfections (pāramitā) and possessing omniscience (sarvajñāna), wisdom (prajñā) and skillful means (upāya), he preaches the ‘ladder’ of the twelve classes of texts (dvādaśaṅgabuddhavadhana) and the eighty-four thousand articles of the Dharma (caturaśīṭṭharmaskandhasahasra). A-jo-kiao-tch'en-jou (Ājñātakaundinya),⁴⁷¹ Chō-li-fo (Śāriputra), Mou-k'ien-lien (Maudgalyāyana), Mo-ho-kia-chō (Mahākāśyapa) and even śrāmaṇeras of seven years, *Sou-mo*⁴⁷² (Sumana), all obtained the pure dharmas (anāsravadharma), the faculties (indriya), the powers (bala), the [factors] of enlightenment (saṃbodhyaṅga) and the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa). Although this pure nature is wondrous, all beings who receive the kindness of the Buddha obtain it. This is why recollection of the Buddha comes first.

Next comes recollection of the Dharma and recollection of the Saṃgha. Since the Saṃgha is based on the word of the Buddha to explain the Dharma, it comes third. On the other hand, other men cannot explain the Dharma, whereas the Saṃgha can: this is why it is described as a Jewel (ratna).

The Buddha is the Jewel among men; the Jewel among the ninety-six heretical systems is the Dharma of the Buddha; the Jewel among all the communities is the Saṃgha.

Finally, it is because of the Buddha that the Dharma appeared in the world and it is because of the Dharma that there is a Saṃgha.

4) The yogin wonders how to obtain the Jewel of the Dharma. By including himself in the ranks of the Saṃgha, he will avoid all misdeeds (duṣkṛta), gross (audārika) or subtle (sūkṣma) of body (kāya) or speech (vāc). This is why morality (śīla) is listed next. [228c]

⁴⁷¹ One of the first five disciples of Śākyamuni who witnessed the austerities of the Buddha and benefited from the Sermon at Benares: Vinaya, I, p. 12; Catuspariśad, p. 152. The Traité has mentioned him above, p. 102F.

⁴⁷² Below, k. 20, p. 271b27-c2, the Traité will return to this Sumana, also called Sumanas or Kaṇḍasumana: “The bhikṣu Kaṇḍasumana, in a previous lifetime, saw the stūpa of the Buddha Vipāśyin and gave it the sumanā flower that he was wearing behind his ear. As a result of this, for eighty-one kalpas he enjoyed happiness among gods and men and, in his last lifetime, he had behind his ear a sumanā flower the perfume of which filled the whole house; this is why he was called Kaṇḍasumana. Then, disgusted with the world, he went forth from home and obtained the Bodhi of the Arhats.”

For this legend and others connected to him, see the Anavataptagāthā, ed. Bechert, p. 109-115; transl. Hofinger, p. 205-207; Fo wou po ti tseu, T 199, p. 191b23-191c22; Mūlasarv. Vin., Gilgit Man., III, part 1, p. 180-181, and T 1448, k. 16, p. 79c1-29; Pāli Apadāna, p. 117; Theragāthā, p. 38, 46; Mahākarmavibhaṅga, p. 101; Avadānaśataka, II, p. 67-71 (200, k. 9, p. 245a3-b2); Commentary of the Dhammapada, IV, p. 120-137; Milindhapāṇha, p. 115, 291, 350.

When he was but seven years of age, Sumana was ordained by Anuruddha (Comment. on Dhammapda, IV, p. 136, l. 12). He may be identified, perhaps, with the Sumana who represented the monks from Pāvā at the second Council at Vaiśālī (Vinaya, II, p. 305; Dīpavaṃsa, IV, v. 51; Mahāvamsa, IV, v. 49, 59).

5) How does the yogin [who practices these first four recollections] differ from the seven categories [of disciples of the Buddha]?⁴⁷³

Possessing morality (śīla), the yogin wants to avoid the sins of mind (cittaduṣkṛta), [namely, covetousness (abhidhyā), malice (vyāpāda) and wrong view (mithyadr̥ṣṭi).

a. Recollecting generosity (no. 5), he destroys greed (abhidhyā).

b. Wanting the recipients of generosity (pratigrāhaka) to find happiness, he destroys malice (vyāpāda).

c. Thinking of merit (punya) and its fruit of retribution (vipākaphala), he destroys wrong view (mithyādr̥ṣṭi).

Dwelling thus in the rules of morality (no. 4) and of generosity (no. 5), the yogin becomes established in the ten good paths of action (daśakuśalakarmapatha)⁴⁷⁴ and escapes from the ten bad paths of action (daśākuśalakarmapatha).

6) The ten good paths of action have two kinds of fruits (phala):

a. those who practice them in a superior way are reborn among the pure gods (viśuddhadeva) [of rūpa- and ārūpyadhātu].

b. those who practice them in a medium way are reborn among the gods [of kāmdhātu].

This is why the yogin recollects the deities (no. 6) after morality (no. 4) and generosity (no. 5).

By practicing the dhyānas and the samāpattis, he has access to the deities of the two higher realms, he destroys the bad investigations (vitarka), gathers only the good dharmas and concentrates his mind one-pointedly.

This is why he recollects the deities (devatānusmṛti).

7) Next the yogin recollects inhalation and exhalation (ānāpāna). By recollecting the in-and outbreath, he is able to destroy bad investigations (vitarka) like the rain dampens the dust.⁴⁷⁵

⁴⁷³ The yogin who practices the recollections of the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha and śīla who is being considered here seems to be confused with the seven categories of the Buddha's disciples who, inspired with perfect faith (āveṣṭaprasāda), recollect the same subjects daily (cf. Dīgha, II, p. 93-94; III, p. 227; Saṃyutta, II, p. 69-70; V, p. 343. 365, 386-387; Anguttara, IV, p. 406-407; V, p. 183-184.).

The seven categories of disciples of the Buddha have been enumerated by the Traité above, p. 577F. These are the bhikṣu, bhikṣuṇī, śikṣamāṇā, śrāmaṇa, śrāmaṇerikā, upāsaka and upāsikā (for details, see Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 123, p. 643c).

What distinguishes the yogin from these seven categories of disciples is that he does not limit himself to recollecting the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha and śīla, but also abandonment (tyāga). The first four recollections destroy only the first seven akuśalakarmapathas, namely, the sins of body and speech, whereas recollection of abandonment destroys also the last three akuśalakarmapathas, namely, the sins of mind.

⁴⁷⁴ Listed above, p. 501F.

Seeing the breath coming in and going out, he understands the dangers that menace the body; it is because of the inbreath and the outbreath that the body is maintained alive.

This is why he recollects the inhalation and the exhalation (ānāpānānusmṛti).

8) Finally, the yogin recollects death (maraṇa). It may happen actually that, conscious of possessing the first seven recollections and basing himself on their virtues (guṇa), the yogin becomes lazy (kausīdya). It is at this moment that he should recollect death for, if the work of death is constantly present, how could he be lazy and be content with the qualities he has acquired?

Thus, at the Buddha's death, A-ni-liu (Aniruddha) said:

Conditioned dharmas are like clouds:

The wise man should not be proud of them.

When the thunderbolt of impermanence (anityatāvajra) strikes

It destroys the king of mountains that was the Holy Master (ārṣa).⁴⁷⁶

This is the order of the eight recollections.

Third Section THE RECOLLECTIONS ACCORDING TO THE MAHĀYĀNA

Question. – You have just set forth the eight recollections practiced by the śrāvakas. How do the eight recollections practiced by the bodhisattva differ?

Answer. – The śrāvakas practice for themselves whereas the bodhisattvas practice for all beings.

In the śrāvakas, they free only from old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maraṇa), whereas in the bodhisattvas they perfect the qualities (guṇa) of omniscience (sarvajñāna). These are the differences (viśeṣa).

Furthermore, here in the Prajñāpāramitasūtra (above, p. 650F), the Buddha said to Śāriputra: “The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who abides in the Prajñāpāramitā by the method of non-abiding (asthānayogena) should fulfill the perfection of generosity (dānapāramitā) and the other qualities up to the eight recollections (anusmṛti) by basing himself on their non-existence (anupalabdhitām upādāya).”

⁴⁷⁵ Ānāpānasmṛti is the antidote to vitarka: see Kośa, VI, p. 153.

⁴⁷⁶ The recensions of the Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, Sanskrit (ed. Waldschmidt, p. 400) as well as Pāli (Dīgha, II, p. 157) attribute rather different stanzas to Aniruddha.

For the expression Cheng-tchou ‘Holy Master’ used to render the Sanskrit ārṣa, see below, p. 1592F, n. 1.

First there is non-abiding (asthāna) and then non-existence (anupalabdhitā): these are the two seals (mudrā) by means of which [the anusmṛti of the bodhisattvas] differ. For the meaning of this non-abiding and this non-existence, see what has been said above (p. 656-657F).

(A note in red says that the eight recollections are finished.)

CHAPTER XXXVII: THE TEN CONCEPTS

PRELIMINARY NOTE (p. 1431F)

Various partially overlapping lists of saṃjñā have already been mentioned above, p. 1311F.

1. In the Pāli Nikāyas, there are two different lists of ten saññās: the first, in Dīgha, III, p. 291; Saṃyutta, V, p. 132-133; Anguttara, V, p. 105, 309; the second in Anguttara, V, p.109.

The saññās 1-7 of the first list are defined in Anguttara, IV, p. 46-53; the second list is explained in Anguttara, V, p. 109-112.

2. In the Prajñāpāramitā, the Sanskrit list in Pañcaviṃśati (ed. Dutt, p. 20, l. 5-8) mentions ten saṃjñās; on the other hand, the Sanskrit list in the Śatasāsrīkā (ed. Ghosa, p. 60, l. 15-61, l. 6) mentions only six:

Pañcaviṃśati	Śatasāhasrika
1. anitya-	1. anitya-

4. It is probable that, from their divergence from the original Sanskrit of the Prajñāpāramitās, the Chinese versions were modeled on the list of ten saṃjñās appearing in the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika Abhidharmas (Jñānaprasthāna, T 1543, k. 27, p. 894b27-29; T 1013, k. 18, p. 1013c18-20; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 166, p. 836c20-22):

1. amityā-, 2. anitye duḥkha-, 3. duḥkhe 'nātma-, 4. aśuci-, 5. āhāre pratikūla-, 6. sarvaloke 'nabhirati-. 7. maraṇa-, 8. prahāṇa-, 9. virāga-, 10. nirodha-saṃjñā.

[229a] Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 20, l. 5-9; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 60, l. 15-61, l. 6). – [The bodhisattva-mahāsattva should completely fulfill] the ten concepts (daśa saṃjñāḥ), namely:

1. impermanence (anityasaṃjñā),
2. suffering (duḥkhasaṃjñā),

I. THE CONCEPT OF IMPERMANENCE

Question. – Why are all the practices sometimes called knowledges (jñāna), sometimes recollections (anusmṛti) and sometimes concepts (saṃjñā)?

Answer. – When one begins to practice the good dharma so as not to lose them, they are called recollections (anusmṛti); when one develops the object (nimitta) and develops the mind (citta), they are called concepts (saṃjñā); when one understands precisely (niyata) without feeling any doubts (vicikitsā), they are called knowledges (jñāna).

The concept associated with the wisdom (prajñāsamprayuktasaṃjñā) that considers all conditioned dharma (saṃskṛtadharma) to be impermanent (anitya) is called the concept of impermanence (anityasaṃjñā).⁴⁷⁷

All conditioned dharma (saṃskṛtadharma) are impermanent because they arise and perish incessantly, because they depend on causes and conditions (hetupratyayāpekṣa) and because they do not entail any accumulation (upacaya). Furthermore, at the moment of their arising, they come from nowhere and, at the moment of their cessation, do not go anywhere: this is why they are said to be impermanent.

Furthermore, they are said to be impermanent because the two kinds of worlds (loka) are impermanent: beings (sattva) are impermanent and the universe (lokadhātu) is impermanent. Thus it is said:

The great earth and its plants and trees disappear.

Mount Sumeru crumbles and the ocean dries up,

The abodes of the gods are entirely consumed:

Is there anything then in the universe that is eternal?

The Venerable One with the ten strengths had physical splendor,

The light of his wisdom was immense;

He saved all beings,

His renown filled the ten directions.

But today when he has been wiped out, where is he?

Who is the sage who would not be grieved by it?⁴⁷⁸

In the same way, Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, Subhūti and other holy individuals (āryapudgala), noble cakravartin kings, sovereigns of nations, the kings of the ever-happy gods, the deities, saints, great virtuous people, noblemen, they too all perish. The flame and the brilliance of the great fire⁴⁷⁹ disappears suddenly and the world is reduced to nothing, like a lamp exposed to the wind, like the tree growing on a dangerous shore, like the filter filled with water that empties immediately. Therefore there is ‘impermanence’, because all beings and all the abodes of beings are transitory.

Question. – Why does the bodhisattva practice this concept of impermanence?

Answer. – Because beings who are victim to the mistake of taking what is impermanent to be eternal (anitye nitya iti viparyāsaḥ) undergo the mass of suffering and do not succeed in escaping from saṃsāra. [229b] ⁴⁷⁸ Variations on the stanzas of lamentation uttered by the disciples at the death of the Buddha (above, p. 88-89F, Cf. the stanza of Brahmā in the Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 400:

*Sarvabhūtāni loke 'smin nikṣepsyanti samucchrayam / evaṃvidho yatra śāstā lokeṣv apratipudgaḥ / tathāgatabalaprāptaḥ
cakṣuṣmān parinivṛtaḥ //*

⁴⁷⁹ The fire at the end of the kalpa.

The yogin who possesses this concept of impermanence converts (paripācayati) beings, saying to them: “All dharmas are impermanent; do not become attached to the notion of eternalism; you will then lose the opportunity to practice the Path.”

The four noble Truths (āryasatya) are the supreme and wondrous teaching of the Buddha; of these Truths, the first is the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya), and the aspect of impermanence (anityākāra) is the first aspect [of the truth of suffering].⁴⁸⁰ This is why the bodhisattva practices the notion of impermanence.

Question. – But there are people who still feel attached to impermanent things when they are present.

[The king who was attached to his wife because old age would make her ugly]. – There was a king who had a wonderful wife who had been born from the womb of the earth. In the form of a ten-headed rākṣasa, she was about to cross the great ocean. The king was very sad. A wise minister consoled him: “The king is endowed with the power of knowledge (jñānabala) and he [knows well] that the queen will return very soon. Why does he feel sad?” The king replied: “What saddens me is not to think that my wife cannot return; I am only afraid [that on her return] her youth will already have passed.”

In the same way, seeing beautiful flowers or lovely fruits about to fade, people are even more attached to them. Thus, when one knows that things are impermanent, one develops even more fetters (saṃyojana). How can you say that impermanence calls forth disgust (udvega) and breaks the fetters?

Answer. – Seeing impermanence in that way is to understand only a small part of it (kaṃcid eva pradeśam) and not to realize it completely. You will be no different than the animals that see impermanence in this way. This is why, [here in the Prajñāpāramitasūtra], the Buddha tells Śāriputra that ‘the concept of impermanence must be completely perfected’ (anityasaṃjñā paripūrayitavyā).

Question. – Then what is this ‘perfect’ concept of impermanence?

Answer. – It is observing that conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma) arise and perish from moment to moment like dust blown by the wind, like water rushing down from the mountain, like the flame that is extinguished. Conditioned dharmas are without solidity or vigor; they cannot be grasped or retained; like magical fabrications (nirmāṇa), they deceive worldlings (prthagjana).

Thanks to this impermanence, the yogin succeeds in breaking through the threshold of emptiness (śūnya) and, since no dharma exists in emptiness, it too is nonexistent. How is that? Birth (utpāda), duration (sthiti) and destruction (bhaṅga) do not co-exist in one and the same moment (kṣaṇa); at the moment of birth, duration and destruction cannot exist; at the moment of duration, birth and destruction cannot exist; at the moment of destruction, birth and duration cannot exist.⁴⁸¹ Birth, duration and destruction are mutually opposed (virodha) to one another in their characteristics (lakṣaṇa) and their nature (svabhāva); they do not exist together. Since they do not exist, neither does impermanence (anitya) exist.

Question. – If there is no impermanence, why did the Buddha speak of impermanence in regard to the truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya)?

⁴⁸⁰ Anitya is the first of the sixteen aspects (ākāra) characterizing the noble truths: see above, p., 641F.

⁴⁸¹ Reasoning borrowed from Madh. kārikā, VIII, 2, p. 146; see above, p. 37F and note.

Answer. – Worldly people (prthagjana) who produce wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) have claimed that the world is eternal (nitya). The Buddha spoke of impermanence in order to destroy this eternalistic view (śāsvatadr̥ṣṭi) and not because he considered impermanence to be real (bhūta).

Furthermore, before the Buddha appeared in the world, ordinary people used only conventional means to remove the disturbing emotions (kleśa). But today, when it is a question of uprooting the roots of the disturbing emotions (kleśamūla), the Buddha speaks of impermanence.

Furthermore, heretical systems (tīrthikadharmā) speak of deliverance (vimukti) when one is only apparently liberated from the five objects of enjoyment (pañca kāmagaṇa), but the Buddha has said: “It is on account of wrong concepts that one is bound up, and it is by considering the correct concept of impermanence that one is liberated (vimukta).”

Furthermore, there are two ways of thinking about the notion of [229c] impermanence: i) that which entails a residue, ii) that which does not entail a residue. Thus the Buddha said: “When all the beings and all the things have disappeared and only their names remain, impermanence ‘involves a residue’; when all the beings and all the things have disappeared and their names have also disappeared, impermanence ‘does not involve a residue’.

There are also two other ways of thinking about impermanence: i) the death of the body and its destruction; ii) births and deaths without continual renewal.

Furthermore, some say that morality (śīla) is the most important. Why? Because in dependence on morality one obtains the cessation of the impurities (āsravakṣaya). – Others say that learning (bahuśruta) is the most important. Why? Because in dependence on wisdom (prajñā) the result is obtained. – Others say that meditative stabilization (samādhi) is the most important, for the Buddha said: “Concentration can attain Bodhi.”⁴⁸² – Others say that the twelve strict observances (dhūtagaṇa)⁴⁸³ are the most important. Why? Because they purify the practice of morality.

This is how each one, maintaining his own practice as the most important, does not seek nirvāṇa diligently. But the Buddha said: “These qualities (guṇa) all lead to fractions of nirvāṇa; however, the consideration of the impermanence of dharmas (anityānupaśyanā) is the true path to nirvāṇa.”⁴⁸⁴

For all these reasons and even though dharmas are empty, the Buddha preached the concept of impermanence.

Finally, the concept of impermanence is synonymous with the noble Path (āryamārga). The Buddha designated the Path by all kinds of different names: sometimes he called it the four foundations of ⁴⁸² Cf. Anguttara, II, p. 45: Samādhībhāvanā bhāvitā bahulīkatā dīṭṭhadhammasukhavihārāya... nānādagassanapaṭilābhāya saṃvattati.

⁴⁸³ Twelve dhūtagaṇa according to the Sanskrit sources (Mahāvīyut., no. 1127-1139); thirteen dhūtagaṇa according to the Pāli sources (Vinaya, V, p. 131, 193; Visuddhimagga, p. 48-67).

⁴⁸⁴ Cf. Anguttara, IV, p. 46: Satt’ imā saññā bhāvitā bahulīkatā mahapphalā honti mahānisaṃsā amatogadhā amatapariyosānā.

mindfulness (catvari smṛtyupasthānāni), sometimes he called it the four Truths (catvāri satyāni), sometimes the notion of impermanence.

[Anityatāsūtra]. – This is what is said in a sūtra:

“If the notion of impermanence is properly cultivated, it destroys all attachment to desire (kāmarāga), all attachment to subtle matter (rūparāga), all attachment to the formless (ārūpyarāga), all pride (asmimāna) and all ignorance (avidyā).”⁴⁸⁵

Thus it eliminates the fetters of the threefold world (traidhātukasamyojana). This is why it is synonymous with Path.

This concept of impermanence is sometimes impure (sāsrava) and sometimes pure (anāsrava). When it understands impermanence correctly, it is pure; when it begins to study impermanence, it is impure.

In the Mahāyāna, the bodhisattvas with vast mind convert beings in many ways: this is why their notion of impermanence is both impure and pure.

If it is pure, it occurs in nine levels (bhūmi); if it is impure, it occurs in eleven levels.⁴⁸⁶

It has as object (ālambate) the five aggregates of attachment (upādānaskandha) of the threefold world. It is associated with four dominant organs (indriya), except that of unpleasantness (duḥkendriya).⁴⁸⁷

For all the reasons given here, worldly people (prthagjana) and the saints (ārya) extol the qualities (guṇa) of the concept of impermanence.

II. THE CONCEPT OF SUFFERING

In regard to the concept of suffering (duḥkhasamjñā), the yogin says to himself that all conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharmā), being impermanent (anitya), are painful (duḥkha).⁴⁸⁸

⁴⁸⁵ Literal citation from a sūtra in Saṃyukta (T 99, no. 270, k. 10, p. 70c6-7) entitled Chou king ‘Sūtra of the Tree’. Its correspondent is the Aniccataṣutta of Saṃyutta, III, p. 156, the wording of which is only slightly different: Anicca-saññā bhikkhave bhāvitā bahulīkatā sabbaṃ kāmārāgaṃ pariyādiyati sabbaṃ rūparāgaṃ pariyādiyati sabbaṃ bhavarāgaṃ pariyādiyati sabbaṃ avijjaṃ pariyādiyati sabbaṃ asmimānaṃ pariyādiyati samāhanti.

⁴⁸⁶ The term kāma-, rūpa- and ārūpya-rāga designates attachment in regard to the threefold world.

According to Kośa, V, p. 8, kāmarāga means attachment to kāmadhātu; bhavarāga, attachment to the two higher realms, rūpa- and ārūpyadhātu.

⁴⁸⁷ See Kośa, I, p. 101.

⁴⁸⁸ The notion of suffering must bear upon all formations without distinction (sabbasaṅkhāresu anodhiṃ karitvā): Anguttara, III, p. 443.

Question. – If conditioned dhammas, as impermanent, are painful, are the dhammas of holy persons (āryapudgala), conditioned but pure (saṃskṛtānāsravadharma), also painful?

Answer. – Although dhammas are impermanent, only those who become attached to them experience suffering; those who are not attached to them are without suffering.

Question. – There are saints who, without being attached to them, nevertheless undergo suffering. Thus Chō-li-fou (Śāriputra) suffered from sicknesses of wind and heat,⁴⁸⁹ Pi-ling-k'ie-p'o-ts'o (Pīlindavatsa) suffered from eye disease,⁴⁹⁰ and Lo-p'o-na-po-t'i (Lavaṇābhadrīka) [Note by Kumārajīva: 'the foremost of the children who bawl a lot': Rāvaṇābhadrīka?] suffered from hemorrhoids.⁴⁹¹ Why do you say that they have no suffering?

⁴⁸⁹ According to the Vinayas, Śāriputra suffered from kāyaḍāha 'fever' (Pāli Vin., I, p. 214), a wind sickness (Dharmagupta Vin., T 1428, k. 42, p. 867b29-c19) of hot blood (Sarv. Vin., T 1435, k. 26, p. 190c24-191a8), of dhātuvaiṣaṃyā 'unbalanced humors' (Mūlasarv. Vin., Gilgit Man., III, part 1, p. 239, l. 18-240, l. 22), of wind and hot blood (Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1440, k. 4, p. 528c18-23). He was cured by fibers and roots (bisa) of the lotus plant (muḷālikā), lotus sap (bisakṣīra) or also by wheat broth and wheat juice. Another time when he was suffering from stomach wind (udaravāta), he was cured by garlic (laśuna): cf. Pāli Vin., II, p. 140.

⁴⁹⁰ Pīlindavatsa's eye disease has already been noted above, p. 121F, but actually this arhat also suffered from migraines (sīsabhitāpa), a wind ailment (vātābhāda), rheumatism of the legs (aṅgavāta), articular rheumatism (pabbavāta), etc.: Cf. Pāli Vin., I, p. 204-206.

⁴⁹¹ The Turfan manuscripts, confirmed by the Mahāvīyut., no. 1061, have transmitted to us the correct name of this arhat: Lavaṇābhadrīka and not Lāvanyābhadrīka as Hofinger proposes. The previous lives and last lifetime of this disciple are summarized in the Anavataptagāthā (ed. Bechert, p. 184-187; transl. Hofinger, p. 272-274; Fo wou po ti tseu, T 199, p. 200a22-b21; Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1448, k. 17, p. 89c11-90a11). The similarity of the stories of the previous lives of this arhat found in the Anavataptagāthā and in the Apadāna, II, p. 489-491 allow the identification of the Lavaṇābhadrīka of the Sanskrit sources with the Lakuṇṭabhaddiya 'the good dwarf' of the Pāli sources; Saṃyutta, Iip. 279; Anguttara, I, p. 23 (where the Buddha proclaimed him to be foremost among those with gentle voices (aggam mañjussarāṇam); Udāna, p. 76; Theragāthā, p. 49, v. 466-472.

According to the Commentary of the Dhammapada, III, 453-454, the Buddha spoke two well-known stanzas in regard to Lakuṇṭaka (Dhammapada, v. 294-295; Gāndhārī Dharmapada, p. 120, v. 12; Udānavarga, p. 377, v. 24; p. 494-495, v. 61-62; Nettippakaraṇa, p. 165):

Mātaraṃ pitaraṃ hantvā rājāno dve ca khattiye /

raṭṭhaṃ sānucaraṃ hantvā añiḥho yāti brāhmaṇo //

Mātaraṃ pitaraṃ hantvā rājāno dve ca sotthiye

Transl. – Having killed his mother (disturbing emotions) and his father (pride) and the two warriors (the view of eternalism and the view of nihilism), having destroyed the kingdom (the twelve Answer. – There are two kinds of suffering: i) bodily suffering (kāyika [230a] dukkha), ii) mental suffering (caitasika dukkha). By the power of their wisdom (prajñābala), the holy individuals (āryapudgala) have no further mental suffering like sadness (daurmanasya), jealousy (īrṣyā), malice (vyāpāda), etc. On the other hand, because they have received a body composed of the four great elements (mahābhūtamaya) as a result of actions in their previous existences (pūrvajanmakarman), they still have bodily sufferings such as old age (jarā) and sickness (vyādhi), hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāsa), cold and heat (śītoṣṇa), etc., but these bodily sufferings are slight and quite rare.

The saint may be compared to a man who, knowing himself to be burdened with a debt (ṛṇa) with regard to a third party, does not consider it to be painful to discharge the debt. By contrast, the man who does not remember his debt and from whom the creditor demands it forcibly is furious, angry and full of suffering.

Question. – Painful sensation (dukkhavedanā) is a mental event (caitasika dharma) co-existing with the mind (citta). The body, like grass or wood, is disjunct from the mind and without reasoning (vitarka). How can you say that the holy person feels (vedayati) only bodily suffering?

Answer. – When the worldly person (prthagjana) feels suffering (dukkhaṃ vedayati), his mind creates a pang of grief (daurmanasya) stimulated by the anuśaya (negative propensity) of hostility (pratigha); his mind is turned only toward the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa). As the Buddha said:

[Śālyatvena sūtra]. – Worldly people do not know that, outside of the five objects of enjoyment, there is another way of getting out of suffering (na hi prajānati prthagjano 'nyatra pañcakāmaguṇebhyo dukkhasya nihsaraṇam). In pleasant feeling (sukhavedanā), he is stimulated by the propensity of lust (rāgānuśaya); [in unpleasant feeling (dukkhavedanā), he is stimulated by the propensity of hatred (pratighānuśaya); in the feeling that is neither unpleasant nor pleasant (aduhkhāsukhavedanā), he is stimulated by the propensity of ignorance (avidhyānuśaya).⁴⁹² When the worldly person feels suffering, bases of consciousness) along with its inhabitants (joy and desire), the brahmin proceeds without confusion.

Having killed his mother and father, two learned kings and a tiger, (the five obstacles to dhyāna, the fifth of which, the tiger, is doubt), without confusion the brahmin goes forth.

These stanzas are specimens of intentional language (abhisamḍhi, abhiprāya, saṃdābhāṣya): cf. Abhidharmasamuccaya. ed. Pradhan, p. 106-107. They have taxed the ingenuity of interpreters: see the note of Bhikkhu Nānamoli, Nettipakaraṇa, tr., p. 218, and the detailed study of F. Bernhard, Zur Textgeschichte und Interpretation der Strophen: Dhammapada 294, 295, Festschrift für Wilhelm Eilers, 1968, p. 511-526.

In an appendix Sur le moine Lo-siun-yu, Lin Li-kouang (L'Aide-Mémoire de la Vraie Loi, 1949, p. 278-290) has grouped, under the general theme of a deformed monk, a whole series of arhats of various names among whom Lavaṇābhadrīka appears as well as the bhikṣu Lo p'in tchou or Lo p'in tcheou mentioned above (p. 931-932F and note) by the Traité.

⁴⁹² The bad propensities of lust (rāga), hatred (pratigha) and ignorance (avidyā) often form a separate group (cf. Majjhima, III, p. 285; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 205), but also appear in the lists of six (Kośa, V, p. 2) or seven anuśaya (Dīgha, III, p. 254, 282; Saṃyutta, V, p. 60; Anguttara, IV, p. 9).

inwardly (adhyātman) he undergoes the suffering of the threefold poison (triviśaduḥkha) – [namely, desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha) –], and outwardly (bahirdhā) he suffers cold and heat (śītoṣṇa), the whip and the stick, etc., just as an inwardly feverish man also is burning externally.”

The [same] sūtra says: “When the worldly person loses a loved object, both his body and his mind suffer from it: it is as if he was being pierced by two arrows (tadyathainaṃ dvābhyāṃśalyābhyāṃ vidheyuḥ). The saints, however, do not have the suffering of pangs of grief (daurmanasya): they have only the bodily suffering (kāyikaduḥkha) and no other suffering.”⁴⁹³

⁴⁹³ Extracts from the Sallattena sutta of the Saṃyutta, IV, p. 207-210 (Tsa a han, T 99, no. 470, k. 17, p. 119c28-120b14): Assutavā bhikkhave puthujāno dukkhāya vedanāya phuṭho samāno socati kilamati ... dutiyena sallena anuvijjheyyaṃ, evaṃ hi so bhikkhave puuriso ekasallena vedanaṃ vedyati.

Transl. – When the ignorant worldly person, O monks, is touched by an unpleasant feeling, he is upset, he is troubled, he laments, he beats his breast and becomes confused. Thus he is feeling two sensations, one bodily and the other mental. It is as if a man were pierced with one arrow and then pierced with a second arrow: this man feels the pain of both arrows.

Thus, O monks, the ignorant worldly person, being touched by an unpleasant feeling, is upset, troubled, laments, beats his breast and becomes confused. Then he feels two sensations, one physical and the other mental. Being touched by an unpleasant feeling, he is full of hatred. As he is full of hatred for the unpleasant sensation, the propensity of hatred for the unpleasant feeling lies within him. And this man, being touched by the unpleasant feeling, wishes for the happiness of pleasure. Why? Because the ignorant worldly person does not know that the exit from unpleasant feeling can be other than in the happiness of the pleasures. .

Since he wishes for the happiness of the pleasures, the propensity of the lust for pleasant feeling lies within him, He does not properly know the origin and cessation of these feelings, their flavors, their disadvantages and the way to exit from them. .

Since he does not correctly know the origin and cessation of feelings, their flavors, their disadvantages or the way of exit from them, the propensity of ignorance toward the feeling that is neither unpleasant nor pleasant lies within him.

If he experiences a pleasant feeling, he feels it like an obedient slave; if he experiences an unpleasant feeling, he feels it like an obedient slave; if he experiences a feeling neither pleasant nor unpleasant, he feels it like an obedient slave. This means, O monks, that the ignorant worldly person is subjugated by birth, death, sorrows, lamentations, sufferings, sadness, torments: I say that he is subjugated by suffering.

But the noble learned disciple, being touched by an unpleasant feeling, is not grieved, is not troubled, does not lament, does not beat his breast and does not fall into trouble. He experiences only one feeling, namely, bodily sensation and not mental sensation. It is as if a man were pierced by one arrow but not pierced by a second arrow: this man feels the pain of just one arrow.

The same reasoning is taken up again by the Milindapañha, p. 44 (transl. Horner, I, p. 61). See also P. Demiéville, Les versions chinoises du Milindapañha, p. 120-121.

Furthermore, suffering is associated with the five consciousnesses (pañcaviññānaprayukta), and the sufferings of the whip and the stick, of cold and heat, etc., due to external causes, are bodily sufferings. The others are mental sufferings.

Furthermore, I have said that pure conditioned dharma (saṃskṛtānāsravadharma) are not suffering because [the saints] are not attached to them. But the body of holy individuals is impure (sāsrava). Since impure dharma (sāsravadharma) are painful, what is the mistake [in asserting that the saints feel bodily suffering]? But in fact, these sufferings felt by their bodies are faint and rare.

Question. – If all that is impermanent is suffering, the Path (mārga) too is suffering. How can you drive suffering away with suffering?⁴⁹⁴

Answer. – The aphorism “All that is impermanent is suffering” applies to the five aggregates of attachment (upādānaskandha), but the Path, although impermanent insofar as it is formation (saṃskāra), is not called suffering. Why? Because it destroys suffering and does not create attachment (abhiniveśa). United with the wisdoms of emptiness (śūnya) and non-self (anātman), it is impermanent but it is not suffering.

This is why the arhats, at the moment they obtain the Path, say the following stanza:

We do not rejoice in being reborn,

Neither do we rejoice in dying;

With mindfulness and awareness

We are waiting to leave when the time comes.⁴⁹⁵

When the Buddha entered nirvāṇa, Ānanda and the disciples not yet detached from passion (avītarāga), who had not yet cultivated the eightfold noble Path (āryāṣṭāṅgamārga), wept and lamented; the anāgāmins, detached from desire (vītarāga) were all frightened; the arhats whose impurities were destroyed (kṣīṇāsrava) remained impassive and only said: “The Eye of the world has disappeared too soon” (atikṣipraṃ cakṣur lokasyāntarhitam).⁴⁹⁶

⁴⁹⁴ In the hypothesis imagined, how could one drive away the suffering of saṃsāra by the suffering of the Path?

⁴⁹⁵ A well-known stanza:

Nābhinandāmi maraṇaṃ, nābhisandāni jīvitaṃ / kālaṃ ca paṭikaṅkhāmi sampajāno patissato ti //

It is frequently repeated with the variant nibbisaṃ bhatako yathā at the end. The Theragāthā, v. 1002, the Milinda, p. 45 and the Comm. on the Dīgha put it in the mouth of Sāriputta, but it was also pronounced by the theas Nisabha (Theragāthā, v. 196), Saṃkicca (v. 607), Revata (v. 655) and Aññākoṇḍañña (v. 686).

[238b] It is because they possessed the power of the Path that these arhats who had received great favors from the Buddha and appreciated his immense qualities (apramāṇaguṇa) did not experience any suffering. This is why we know that the Path, although impermanent, is not a cause of suffering and therefore it is not called suffering. Only the five aggregates of attachment (upadānaskandha) are suffering. Why? Because one clings to them, because they are impermanent and insecure.

Here in regard to the meaning of suffering (duḥkhārtha), what has been said above (p. 1158F) concerning vedanāsmṛtyupasthāna should be fully repeated.

Furthermore, those who possess a body (dehin) are always suffering (sadā duḥkhita),⁴⁹⁷ but out of stupidity (moha), they do not take it into account. Thus it is said:

Since it is very tiring to ride a horse,

One looks for a place to stand up.

Since standing up is very tiring,

One seeks a place to sit down.

Transl. – On the death of the Blessed One, of the monks who were not yet free from desire, some raised their arms to the heavens uttering cries, others threw themselves down on the ground, turning to and fro, thinking: “The Blessed One has died too soon! The Blessed One has entered nirvāṇa too soon! Too soon has the Eye of the world disappeared from the world!” But the monks who were free from desire endured their grief with contemplation and lucidity, saying: “Impermanent are the formations. How could they not disappear?”

The version of the Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, p. 400-402, 406-408, differs slightly:
Tatraikatyā bhikṣavaḥ prthivyām āvartante parivartante. ekatyā bāhūn pragrhya prakrośanti. evaṃ cāhuḥ: atikṣipraṃ bhagavān parinirvṛtaḥ. atikaṣipraṃ sugataḥ parinirvṛtaḥ. atikṣipraṃ cakṣur lokasyānatarhitaḥ. ekatyās cetoduḥkhasamarpitās tiṣṭhanti. ekatyā dharmatām eva pratismaranti: prāḡ evāsmākaṃ bhagavatāḥkhyātāṃ sarvair iṣṭaiḥ kāntaiḥ priyaiḥ manāpair nānābhāvo bhaviṣyati vinābhāvo viprayogo viśaṃyogaḥ. kuta etal labhyaṃ yat taj jataṃ bhūtaṃ kṛtaṃ saṃskṛtaṃ vedayitaṃ pratītyasamutpannaṃ kṣayadharmāṃ vyayadharmāṃ vibhavadharmāṃ virodhadharmāṃ pralokadharmāṃ na prarūjyate nedaṃ sthānaṃ vidyate.

Transl. – Then some monks rolled about on the ground; others raised their arms to the heavens, uttering cries: “The Blessed One has died too soon! The Blessed One has entered nirvāṇa too soon! Too soon has the Eye of the world disappeared!” Others, filled with mental anguish, stood about and others yet recalled the nature of things and said: “Previously the Blessed One spoke to us about all these things that are hoped for, loved, cherished, pleasant but destined to division, to separation, to disjunction. How could it be that what is born, fabricated, conditioned, felt, resulting from causes, destructible, transitory, insecure, inconsistent, perishable, not be broken up? This possibility does not exist.”

⁴⁹⁷ See above, p. 584F.

Since sitting down too long is very tiring,

One looks for a place to lie down in peace.

Much fatigue results from these activities,

What at first was pleasant then becomes painful.

To look straight ahead or to the side, to breathe in and out

To bend down, to stretch out, to sit down, to get up,

To walk or to stand still, to go or to come:

Nothing can be done without suffering.

Question. – “The five aggregates of attachment are suffering” (pañcopādānaskandhā duḥkham),⁴⁹⁸ but it is as a result of a [subjective] notion of suffering (duḥkhasaṃjñā) that they are suffering. Actually, if everything is suffering, why did the Buddha say: “There are three kinds of feeling: pleasant feeling (sukhavedanā), unpleasant feeling (duḥkhavedanā) and feeling that is neither unpleasant nor pleasant (aduḥkhāsukhavedanā)?”⁴⁹⁹ And if suffering comes from a [subjective] notion of suffering, how can you say that the [holy] truth of suffering (duḥkhasatya) concerns a real suffering?

Answer. – Yes, the five aggregates of attachment are suffering, but ordinary people (prthagjana), under the influence of the fourfold error (viparyāsa) and urged on by desire (kāmapīḍita), consider the five objects of enjoyment as happiness (sukha). It is as though someone smeared ointment onto a man’s ulcer (ganḍa) and when his suffering has stopped, he thinks this ulcer, which itself is not happiness, is happiness.

The Buddha spoke of three kinds of feelings in accordance with the views of the world (loka), but in reality (tattvena) there is no happiness there.⁵⁰⁰ If there were truly happiness in the five aggregates of attachment

⁴⁹⁸ Samkṣiptena pañcopādānaskandhā duḥkham: aphorism taken from the Sermon at Benares:

Nidānasamyuktam p. 194; Catuḥpariṣad, p. 158; Pāli Vinaya, p. I, 10; Dīgha, II, p. 307; Saṃyutta, V, p. 421.

⁴⁹⁹ Dīgha, III, p. 275; Saṃyutta, II, p. 53, 82; IV, p. 207; Anguttara, III, p. 400; Itivuttaka, p. 46: Tisso vedanā: sukā vedanā, duḥkhā vedanā, adukkhamasukhā vedanā.

(upādānaskandha), why did the Buddha say: “The destruction of the five aggregates of attachment is happiness” (pañcopādānaskandhanirodhaḥ sukham)?”⁵⁰¹

Furthermore, since the mind of happiness (sukhacitta) arises in relation to the loved object, happiness is not assured definitively (niyata). If happiness were assured, it would not depend on attachment of the mind (cittābhīniveśa) in the same way that if fire (agni) were really hot, it would not depend on kindling to heat up. But as happiness is not assured, here it is called suffering.

Furthermore, what the world wrongly considers to be happiness can create innumerable fruits of suffering (apramāṇaduḥkikhaphala) in the present lifetime and in the future lifetime (ihaparatra): this is why it is called suffering. Just as a little bit of poison (viṣa) poured into the water of a big river cannot change the water,⁵⁰² so the poisonous plant that the world wrongly thinks [is happiness] is no longer visible in the great waters of suffering. Thus it is said:

When a being falls from the paradises and is reborn in hell

He remembers the former bliss of paradise:

The palace courtesans showed themselves to him in a crowd,

The parks and pools rejoiced his heart.

[230c] Now he sees the fires of hell coming to burn him

Like a great fire consuming a bamboo forest.

Then, while still seeing the pleasures of paradise,

Transl. – I have spoken, O monk, of three feelings: pleasant feeling, unpleasant feeling, neither unpleasant nor pleasant feeling. Yes, I have spoken of these three feelings. But also, O monk, I said: All that is felt is felt in suffering.” It is in view of impermanence that I said ”All that is felt is felt in suffering.”

An extract of the corresponding Sanskrit sūtra is cited in Kośavyākhyā, p. 519, l. 18-20: Samskārānityatām Ānanda saṃdhā mayā bhāṣitaṃ saṃskaraṇavipariṇāmatām: Yat kiṃcid veditam idam atra duḥkhasyeti: O Ānanda, it is in view of impermanence, it is in view of transformation of the formations, that I said: “All that is felt, there is suffering in it.”

The Kośa (VI, p. 129-130) concludes that all feeling, including pleasant feeling, is suffering. Pleasant feeling has as object not a real pleasure but sometimes a remedy for suffering (duḥkhapratikāra), sometimes a modification of the suffering (duḥkhavikalpa).

⁵⁰¹ Upādānanirodhā... sokapariḍevaduḥkhadomanassupāyāsā nirujanti: Pāli Vin, I, p. 1; Saṃyutta, II, p. 7; III, p. 14; Anguttara, I, p. 177.

⁵⁰² Cf. Anguttara, I, p. 250: Seyyathāpi bhikkhave puriso loṇaphalaṃ Gangāya nadiyā pakkhipeyya. Taṃ kiṃ maññatha bhikkhave. Api nu sā Gangā nadī amunā loṇaphalena loṇā assa apeyyā ti. – No h'etaṃ bhante.

He is alarmed in vain: that is useless.

The concept of suffering (duḥkhasaṃjñā) concerns the same objects as the concept of impermanence (anityasaṃjñā).⁵⁰³ Analysis of suffering in these many different ways is called the concept of suffering.

III. THE CONCEPT OF NON-SELF

Concept of non-self (anātmansaṃjñā). – “That which is suffering is non-self” (yad duḥkhaṃ tad anātmā).⁵⁰⁴ Why? The five aggregates of attachment (pañcopādānaskandha) are all suffering and have no independence (aiśvarya, vibhīta). If they have no independence, they are non-self (anātman). If they had an independent self, “it would be impossible for the body to feel suffering” (na kāyo vyābādhāya saṃvarteta).⁵⁰⁵ Thus it is said:

There are fools

Who consider their body or their mind as their self.

Gradually they become strongly attached to them:

They do not understand the law of impermanence.

There is no agent (kāraka) in this body

Neither is there any perceiver (vedaka).

This body is without a master,⁵⁰⁶

And, nevertheless, it does all kinds of things.

From the six organs (indriya) and the six objects (viṣaya)

Arise the six kinds of consciousnesses (viññāna);

⁵⁰³ Namely, the five upādānaskandha.

⁵⁰⁴ The entire explanation that follows turns upon the canonical formula: Yad aniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ, yaṃ dukkhaṃ tad anattā, yad anattā taṃ netaṃ mama neso haṃ asmi na meso attā ti: “That which is impermanent is suffering; that which is suffering is non-self; that which is non-self is not mine, I am not that and that is not me.” Cf. Saṃyutta, II, p. 22, 82, 84,; IV, p. 1.

⁵⁰⁵ Implicit reference to the Sūtra on the non-self which follows the sūtra on the four noble Truths (cf. Pāli Vin, I, p. 13-14; Saṃyutta, III, p. 66-68; Catuspariṣad, p. 162-164; Mahāvastu, III, p. 335-337: Rūpañ ced ātmabhaviṣyad rūpaṃ na vyābādhāya duḥkhāya saṃvarteta, labhyeta ca rūpasya: evaṃ me rūpaṃ bhavate evaṃ mā bhād iti.

⁵⁰⁶ Adopting the variant tchou in place of cheng.

From the coming together of the three (trikaṣaṃnipāta)

Contact (sparsa) arises.⁵⁰⁷

From contact as condition

There arise feeling, memory and action,

In the same way as fire arises

When the lens, kindling and the sun come together.

Organs, objects and consciousnesses having come together,

The action to be accomplished is realized.

There is continuity (saṃtanaśādrśya)

As in the seed, the sprout and the stem.⁵⁰⁸

Furthermore, there is no ātman because the characteristics (lakṣaṇa) of the ātman do not exist. Dharmas must have a characteristic so that we may know that they exist. Thus, if we see smoke (dhūma) and we feel heat (uṣṇa), we know there is a fire (vahni). Because there are differences [in characteristics] between the five sense objects (viśaya), we know they exist. Because beings of various sorts conceive and compute things in different ways, we know that there are minds (citta) and mental events (caitasikadharma). But since the ātman has no characteristic, we know it does not exist.

Question. – However, there is breathing (ānāpāna) which is a characteristic of the ātman, and also the looking straight ahead and sideways (ālokitavilokita), life (āyus), mind (citta), suffering or happiness (duḥkhasukha), affection or aversion (icchādvēṣa), the will (prayatna), etc., which are characteristics of the ātman. If there were no ātman, then who would have this breathing, this looking straight ahead or sideways, this life, this mind, this suffering or this happiness, this affection or this aversion, this will, etc.? Thus we know that there is an ātman moving internally and that the life (āyus) and mind (citta) are properties of the ātman.⁵⁰⁹

If there were no ātman, one would be like an ox (go) without an oxherd (sārvhvāha). But since there is an ātman, it can govern the mind, penetrate things without any loss of attentiveness (pramāda).

⁵⁰⁷ According to the Pāli Abhidhamma (Atthasālinī, p. 109) and the Sarvāstivādin (Kośa, III, p. 96), contact (sparsa), the sixth link in the pratītyasamutpāda chain (above, p. 350F), are six in number and arise from the coming together of the three (trikaṣaṃnipāta), namely, organ, object and consciousness. For the Sautrāntikas, sparsa is only the meeting itself (Kośa, III, p. 96-97).

⁵⁰⁸ Cf. Kośa, IX, p. 296-299.

⁵⁰⁹ The objector here is the spokesman for the Vaiśeṣikas who assume nine substances (dravya), including the ātman, endowed with qualities (guṇa): cf. Vaiśeṣikasūtra (I, I, 5-6).

If there were no ātman, who would direct the mind and experience unhappiness or happiness? If there were no ātman, one would be like a piece of wood (kāṣṭha), unable to distinguish between suffering and happiness, and it would be the same for affection or aversion, effort, etc.

Nevertheless, since the ātman is subtle (sūkṣma), it cannot be cognized by the five sense organs (indriya), and it is by these characteristics that we know it exists. [231a]

Answer. – But all these characteristics are characteristics of the consciousness (viññānalakṣaṇa)! It is because there is consciousness that there is breathing, looking straight ahead or sideways, life, etc., and when the consciousness leaves the body, all of that disappears.⁵¹⁰ According to your concept of an eternal (anitya) and omnipresent (vyāpin) ātman, the corpse (kuṇapa) itself should still possess respiration, the ability to look straight ahead and sideways, life, etc.

Furthermore, breathing (ānāpāna), etc., are material dharmas (rūpidharma) moving on the wind of the mind: these are characteristics of consciousness (viññāna) and not characteristics of the ātman. As for life (āyus) which is a formation dissociated from mind (cittaviprayuktasamskāra), this also is a characteristic of consciousness.

Question. – When one enters into the absorption without mind (acittakasaṃāpatti)⁵¹¹ and possibly one sleeps without dreaming, the breathing (ānāpāna) continues and life (āyus) continues. How can you say that [breathing and life] are characteristics of consciousness?

Answer. – Although consciousness is temporarily suspended in the absorption without mind, shortly thereafter it must necessarily recur, for it does not leave the body; the time of duration of consciousness is long; the time when it disappears is short. This is why [breathing and life] are characteristics of consciousness. When a man goes out for a walk, we cannot say that his house is without an owner!

Sadness and happiness (duḥkhasukha), affection and aversion (icchādvēṣa), will (prayatna), etc., are associated with the mind (cittasamprayukta), mutual conditions (sahabhūpratyaya) and accompanying the mind (cittānuparivartin): when mind exists, they exist; when mind does not exist, they do not exist. This is why these are characteristics of consciousness and not characteristics of the ātman.

Furthermore, supposing the ātman did exist, it would be either eternal (nitya) or non-eternal (anitya). But, as is said:

⁵¹⁰ The Buddha indeed said:

Āyur uṣmātha viññānāṃ yadā kāyaṃ jahaty amī / apaviddhaḥ tadā śete yathā kāṣṭham acetanaḥ //

“When life, heat and consciousness leave the body, the body lies abandoned, like a piece of wood, without any feeling.”

For this stanza, which shows variations, see Kośavyākhyā, p. 668, l. 16-17, and for the canonical sources, Majjhima, I, p. 206, l. 9-11; Saṃyutta, III, p. 13=43, l. 4-5.

⁵¹¹ Absorption without mind, also called absorption of non-discrimination (asaṃjñisaṃāpatti), during which mind and mental events are arrested: see Kośa, II, p. 201.

If the ātman were eternal

There would be no new existence (punarbhava).

Eternal and without birth,

It would also be without deliverance.

It would also be infallible and inactive:

This is why we should know

That there would be neither sinner nor saint

Nor any object to be sensed (vedaka).

To abandon the ‘me’ (ātman) and the ‘mine’ (ātmīya)

Is then to attain nirvāṇa.

But if there really were an ātman,

We would be unable to reject the idea of ‘me’.

If the ātman were non-eternal

It ought to perish with the body,

Like water rushing down from a high cliff.

There would no longer be either sin or merit.⁵¹²

⁵¹² In an inaugural dissertation at Munich, M. Saigura has identified these three stanzas as Mūlamadhyamakārikā VIII, 12; XVIII, 2: XVIII, 4, of which here are the text and translation:

Evaṃ vidyād upādāṃ vutsargād iti karmaṇaḥ / kartuś ca karmakartrbhyāṃ śeṣān bhāvān vibhāvayet //
Ātmany asati cātmīyaṃ kuta eva bhaviṣyati / nirmamo nirahaṃāraḥ śamād ātmātmanīnayoḥ //
*Mamety aham iti kusīṇe bahirdhādhyātmam eva ca /
Nirudhyata upādānaṃ tatkusayāj janmanaḥ kṣayaḥ //*

Transl.- One should understand appropriation as the ‘rejection’ of action and agent. By means of action and agent, one will be able to recognize the other essences.

As the ‘me’ does not exist, how could the ‘mine’ exist? The [yogin] is freed from [the idea] of ‘me’ and [the idea] of ‘mine’ by means of the suppression of ‘me’ and what is profitable to the ‘me.’

See [above, p. 735F] what has been said in the chapter on Dānapāramitā about the ātman, the cognizing (jānaka) or non-cognizing subject, and the active (kāraka) or non-active subject.

Since we cannot discover the characteristics of the ātman, we know that the ātman is absent in all dharmas. Since we know that there is no ātman in the dharmas, we cannot conceive the idea of ātman. Since there is no ātman, there cannot be an idea of ātmiya, ‘the idea of things belonging to the ātman’. When the ātman and the ātmiya have disappeared, there is no longer any bondage, and when there is no longer any bondage, that is nirvāṇa. This is why the yogin should cultivate the concept of non-self (anātmasaṃjñā).

IV. LINKS BETWEEN IMPERMANENCE, SUFFERING AND NON-SELF

Question. – Impermanence (anitya), suffering (duḥkha) and non-self (anātman) are one single thing or they are three things. If they are only one thing, we should not speak of three. If they are three things, why did the Buddha [identify them] be saying: “That which is impermanent is suffering; that which is suffering is non-self” (yad anityaṃ tad duḥkham, yad duḥkham tad anātma)? [231b]

Answer. – It is just one and the same thing, namely, the correct grasping of impure dharmas (sāsravadharmapratigraha) but, since the points of view differ, there are three distinct [terms]:

1) Anityasaṃjñā is associated with the aspect of impermanence (anityākārasaṃprayukta). – Duḥkhasaṃjñā is associated with the aspect of suffering (duḥkhākārasaṃprayukta). – Anātmasaṃjñā is associated with the non-self aspect (anātmākārasaṃprayukta).⁵¹³

2) Anityā does not penetrate into the threefold world (traiḍhātuka). – Duḥkha makes known the defects (doṣa) of the threefold world. – Anātman is rejection of the world (lokaparityāga).

3) Anitya produces the mind of disgust (udvegacitta). – Duḥkha produces fear (bhaya). – Anātman tears up in order to liberate.

4) Concerning anitya, the Buddha said: “The five aggregates of attachment are impermanent” (pañcopādānaskandhā anityāḥ). – Concerning duḥkha, the Buddha said: “That which is impermanent is suffering” (yad anityaṃ tad duḥkham). – Concerning anātman, the Buddha said: “That which is suffering is non-self” (yad duḥkham tad anātmā).

What is called ‘me’ and ‘mine’ being suppressed both externally as well as internally, the appropriation is destroyed and the destruction of the latter [results] in the destruction of birth.

These kārīkās have nothing in common with the stanzas presented here by the Traité. Many other fanciful comparisons may also be found in the dissertation in question ⁵¹³ Anitya, duḥkha and anātmaka along with emptiness (śūnya) comprise the four aspects of the first noble Truth: above, p. 641F.

5) Concerning anītya, the Buddha spoke of the destruction of the five aggregates of attachment. – Concerning duḥkha, the Buddha said that it pierces the heart like an arrow (śalya). – Concerning anātman, the Buddha spoke of rejection (utsarjana).

6) Concerning anītya, he said that it destroys desire (trṣṇā). – Concerning duḥkha, he said that it destroys pride of self (asmimāna). – Concerning anātman, he said that it destroys wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi).⁵¹⁴

7) Anītya dispels the view of eternalism (śāśvatadrṣṭi). – Duḥkha dispels the view in which there is the happiness of nirvāṇa in the present lifetime. – Anātman dispels any possibility of attachment (abhiniveśasthāna).

8) Anītyā is addressed to those who are attached to permanent things. – Duḥkha is addressed to those who imagine a possibility of happiness. – Anātman is addressed to those who imagine a stable Self.

[Anītya, duḥkha and anātman] are one notion with three different aspects.

The notion of non-self (anātmasamjñā) takes as its object (ālambate) the multiplicity of things (nānātva): see what was said with regard to the notion of suffering (duḥkhasamjñā).

V. THE CONCEPT OF REVULSION TOWARD FOOD

When one notices that food arises from disgusting causes and conditions (aśubhahetupratyaya), this is the notion of revulsion toward food (āhāre pratikūlasamjñā).⁵¹⁵

Thus, meat (māṃsa) comes from sperm (bīja), blood (śoṇita) and urine (mūtra); it is the seat of pus (pīya) and worms (kṛmī). Ghee (ghṛta), milk (kṣīra) and curdled milk (dadhi), products of a transformation of blood, are nothing but rottenness.

The cook also adds to it his sweat and all kinds of dirt. When food is put into the mouth, the throat (mastaka) secretes disgusting saliva (siṅghāṇaka) that runs down from two channels, joins with the mucus (kheṭa)⁵¹⁶ and then produces flavor (rasa). The food is thus formed like vomit (udara) where it is solidified by the earth [element] (prthivī), moistened by the water (ap), stirred by the wind (vāyu) and cooked by the fire (tejas).⁵¹⁷ In the same way, when boiled rice (yavāgū) is cooked in a pot (sthālī), the dirt sinks to the bottom and the clean part stays at the surface. By means of a process similar to wine-brewing, the impurities are changed into excrement (viś) and the cleanliness into urine (mūtra).

The kidneys have three orifices.⁵¹⁸ By means of the [internal] wind, the fatty juice spreads throughout the hundred veins (asirā), joins with the blood, coagulates and is changed into flesh (māṃsa).

From this new flesh arise fat (meda), bone (asthi) and marrow (majjam).

From that comes the organ of touch (kāyendriya). From the union of the recent flesh and the new flesh arise the five sense organs (pañcendriya). From the five sense organs arise the five consciousnesses (pañcavijñāna). From the five consciousnesses arises the mental consciousness (manovijñāna) which analyzes and grasps characteristics (nimittāny udgrhṇāti) and distinguishes the beautiful from the ugly.

Next there arise the ideas of ‘me’ (ātman) and ‘mine’ (ātmīya), negative emotions (kleśa) and bad actions (nigraha).

This is how the yogin meditates on food, the first and last causes of which involve many impurities (aśubha). He knows that his internal (ādhyātmika) four great elements (mahābhūta) are not different from the external (bāhya) four great elements, and it is only from the wrong view of the self (ātmadrṣṭi) that the existence of the ‘I’ is created.

Furthermore, the yogin says to himself: “In order to make this food, somebody has worked very hard; he had to clear the land, plant, hoe, harvest, [231c] beat, grind, wash and cook. For a single bowl of cooked rice (odana), the laborers have combined oceans of sweat (sveda). If they are compared, the food is just a small amount but the sweat [poured forth to make it] is a huge amount. And this food that has required such great labor is nothing but bitter suffering. As soon as it is put into the mouth, it becomes dirt and is worth nothing. In the space of one night, it is changed into excrement and urine. At the beginning, it was a pleasant taste loved by people; changed into dirt, it is a disgusting thing that nobody wants.”

The yogin also says to himself: “If I am attached to this bad food, I will fall into hell (niraya) where I will have to swallow red-hot iron balls (ayoguḍā ādīptāḥ).⁵¹⁹ Having come out of hell, I will become an animal ⁵¹⁴ Samyutta, IV, p. 147-148, expresses itself in an analogous manner: Understanding and seeing the six senses, the six objects, the six consciousnesses and the six contacts as aniccato suppresses wrong views (micchādiṭṭhi); seeing them as dukkhato suppresses the belief in the ‘I’ (sakkāyadiṭṭhi); seeing them as anattato suppresses all speculation on the self (attānudiṭṭhi).

⁵¹⁵ Cf. Anguttara, IV, p. 49: Āhāre paṭikūlasaññaparicetena bhikkuno cetasā bahulaṃ viharato rasatanhāya cittaṃ paṭilīyati paṭikuṭati paṭivaṭṭati na sampasāriyati, upekkhā vā pātikkulyatā vā saṅghātī: “When a monk devotes himself deeply to reflection filled with disgust towards food, his mind escapes from desire for flavors, withdraws, shrivels up and is not released; indifference or repugnance is established.”

⁵¹⁶ Salivary secretion influenced by the vegetative nervous system. The parotid or salivary glands are meant here, the excretory channel of which is called the Stenon channel, opening by a distinct orifice on either side (note by Dr. C. Harvengt).

⁵¹⁷ The internal four great elements give the body solidity, liquidity, movement and warmth, respectively.

⁵¹⁸ Rather than kidneys, what is meant here is the bladder which has three orifices, two upper orifices, the ureters which bring in the urine excreted by the kidneys, and a lower orifice, the urethra, by means of which it expels this urine outside at intervals at greater or lesser intervals (note by Dr. C. Harvengt).

⁵¹⁹ Punishment reserved for a particular hell described above, p. 963F and note.

(tiryagyonī), a cow (go), a sheep (eḍaka) or a camel (uṣṭra), and I will be acquitted of my former debt. Or else, I will be a pig (sūkara), a dog (kukkura) and I will always eat excrement.”

Thinking of food in this way engenders the notion of disgust (udvegasaṃjñā) and, by means of this disgust for food, one becomes disgusted with the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāraṃgaṇa).

[The brahmin who unwittingly ate disgusting cakes.] – There was a brahmin who practiced the rules of [alimentary] purity. Having to go to some unclean land on business, he thought: “How will I manage to avoid all this uncleanliness? It will be necessary for me to eat dry food and so I will be able to maintain my purity.”

He saw an old woman who was selling cakes of white marrow (meal, flour??) and said to her: “I have reason to stay here for about a hundred days. Make me these cakes regularly and bring them to me, I will pay you well.” Each day the old woman made the cakes and brought them to him. The brahmin liked their taste and was happy with this plentiful food.

At the beginning, the cakes made by the old woman were white, but later, little by little they lost their color (rūpa) and their taste. The brahmin asked the old woman what was the reason for this. She replied: “It is because the canker (gaṇḍa) is healed.” The brahmin asked her what she meant by this and the old woman answered: “At my house, a prostitute contracted a canker on her privy parts and we applied flour (saktu), ghee (ghṛta) and sweet herbs (yaśtimadhu) to it.⁵²⁰ The canker ripened, the pus (piya) came out and mixed with the poultice. This happened every day and I made the cakes that I gave you with this: that is why they were so good. Now that the woman’s canker has healed, where am I going to find [the wherewithal to make them]?”

Having heard this, the brahmin struck his head with his fists, beat his breast, vomited and shouted: “How can I say how much I have violated the rules of [alimentary] purity? But now my business is settled.” Leaving all his affairs, he returned in haste to his native land.

It is the same for the yogin. He is attached to food and drink, is joyful and loves to eat. Seeing the beautiful colors of the food, its softness, its aroma and its taste, he does not think about the impurities (aśubha). Later when he has to undergo the painful retribution (duḥkhavipākā), how great will be his repentance (kaukṛtya)! If he can see the beginning and the end (pūrvāparānta) of food, he produces a mind of disgust (udvegacitta) and, eliminating the desire for food (āhāratṛṣṇā), he rejects the five⁵²¹ objects of enjoyment (pañcakāraṃgaṇa). Completely detached (virakta) from the happiness of the world of desire (kāmadhātu), he cuts through these five objects and is also free from the five fetters of lower rank (pañcāvārabhāgiyasamyojana).⁵²²

⁵²⁰ Mahāvvyut., no. 5802.

⁵²¹ Adopting the variant wou in place of sseu.

⁵²² The five fetters favorable to “the lower part”, i.e., to kāmadhātu, either prevent one from leaving of this world or make one return to it. These are belief in the self (satkāyadrṣṭi), unjustified trust in the efficacy of rituals and vows (śīlavrataparāmarśa), doubt (vicikitsā), love of pleasure (kāmacchanda) and

For all these reasons and these disadvantages [of food], the yogin no longer loves it and is no longer attached to it: This is what is called the notion of repugnance toward food (āhāre pratikūlasaṃjñā).

VI. LOGICAL ORDER OF THE TEN CONCEPTS

Question. – Anityasaṃjñā, duḥkhasaṃjñā, anātmasaṃjñā are associated with a pure wisdom (anāsravaprajñā) whereas the four following concepts, āhāre pratikūlasaṃjñā, [sarvaloke ‘nabhiratisaṃjñā, marāṇasaṃjñā and aśucisaṃjñā] are [232a] associated with an impure wisdom (sāsravaprajñā). Why does [the sūtra] speak of them secondly?

Answer. – The Buddhist doctrine consists of a twofold path: i) the path of seeing the Truths (darśanamārga) and ii) the path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga).

In the path of seeing the Truths, by using the three notions [of anitya, duḥkha and anātman], the yogin destroys wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi), obtains the quality of ārya, but is not yet detached from desire (virakta).

It is with this detachment (vairāgya) in mind that, after having spoken of the first three notions, the sūtra now speaks of the four intermediate notions: āhāre pratikūlasaṃjñā, [sarvaloke ‘nabhiratisaṃjñā, marāṇasaṃjñā and aśucisaṃjñā] by means of which the yogin succeeds in freeing himself from the afflictions, lust, etc. (rāgādikleśa).

Thus the first three notions are features of the path of seeing the Truths (satyadarśanamārga), the four intermediate notions are features of the path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga) and the last three notions [prahāṇasaṃjñā, vairāgyasaṃjñā and nirodhasaṃjñā] are features of the path of the saints who have nothing more to train in (aśaikṣamārga).

In starting to practice the foundation of mindfulness of the body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna), the yogin still has some notion of revulsion toward food but, as he rarely uses it, the Buddha did not speak of it.⁵²³ Here, so that the srotaāpannas and sakṛdāgamins can escape from desire, the Buddha, having spoken about anātmasaṃjñā [the third notion on the list], now speaks of the four [intermediate] notions beginning with āhāre pratikūlasaṃjñā.

VII. THE CONCEPT OF DISSATISFACTION TOWARD THE ENTIRE WORLD

malice (vyāpāda): cf. Dīgha, I, p. 156; II, p. 92, 252; III, p. 234; Majjhima, I, p. 432; Samyutta, V, p. 61, 69; Anguttara, IV, p. 459; V, p. 17.

⁵²³ An allusion to the Satipatṭhānasutta of Majjhima, I, p. 55-63, which is silent about revulsion toward food.

Notion of dissatisfaction toward the entire world (sarvaloke 'nabhirati). – If one thinks about the world, its sense pleasures (kāmaguṇa), sweet tastes (rasa), chariots, fine garments, warm rooms, gardens, houses and all kinds of pleasant things, one has a notion of contentment (abhiratisaṃjñā). If one thinks of the misfortunes and misdeeds of the world, the mind has a notion of dislike (udvegasamjñā). What are the ills of the world?

The ills of the world are of two types i) beings (sattva); ii) lands (pradeśa).

1. Evils and wickedness of beings

a. Beings have eight kinds of evils and torments: 1) birth (jāti), 2) old age (jāra), 3) sickness (vyādhi), 4) death (maraṇa), 5) being separated from what one loves (priyaviprayoga), 6) gaining what one does not love (apriyasamprayoga), 7) not getting what one wants (yad apīcchan paryeṣamāṇo na labhate), 8) in short, the five aggregates of attachment are suffering (saṃkṣiptena pañcopāpādanaskandhā duḥkham).⁵²⁴

b. As for the wickedness of beings:

Out of excessive lust (rāgabāhulyāt), they do not differentiate between beauty and ugliness; they do not follow the teachings of their parents and teachers; they have no shame (hrī) or modesty (apatrāpya) and are not different from the animals.

Out of excessive hatred (dveṣabāhulyāt), they do not differentiate between the light (laghu) and the heavy (guru); enraged by the poison of anger (krodhaviṣa), they go so far as to refuse the Buddha's word;⁵²⁵ they do not want to hear the Dharma; they are not afraid of the bad destinies (durgatī); they inflict violent beatings; they do not care about others' sufferings and, entering into the great shadows (mahātamas), they see nothing more.

Out of excessive ignorance (mohabāhulyāt), they do not find the means of realizing what they are looking for; they do not understand the causes of things, as if they were trying to get milk (kṣīra) from a horn (viṣāṇa).⁵²⁶

Enveloped by ignorance (avidhyāvṛta), even if they are in the light of the sun, they will never see anything.

Out of excessive greed (mātsaryabāhulyāt), their house is like a tomb which nobody comes near.

Out of excessive pride and haughtiness (mānastambha), they do not honor the saints (ārya) and do not venerate their parents.

Careless (pramatta), they ruin themselves and have no honesty.

Out of excessive wrong views (mithyādrṣṭibāhulyāt), they do not believe in the present existence (ihajanman) or in the future existence (parajanman), they do not believe in sin (āpatti) or merit (puṇya), and it is impossible to live with them.

All these afflictions abounding in them, these wretched people have no uprightness. Their sins are numerous, they commit the five heinous crimes of immediate retribution (pañcānantarya): sometimes they kill their father and mother; sometimes they wound the saints; sometimes they demand special honors, they slander faithful and celibate people and they are an offense to their kinsmen.

Furthermore, of the beings inhabiting the world, honest people (sādhu) are rare and evil people (durjana) are numerous.

It may be that people of good conduct are poor, lowly and ugly, and it may be that rich good-looking people are of bad conduct. It may be that those who love to give are poor and without resources, and it may be that rich [322b] fortunate people are miserly, greedy and unwilling to give.

If people see a thoughtful man silent and not speaking, they say that he is proud, haughty and does not want to serve. If they see an obliging man, benevolent and charitable, they say he is deceitful and a toady. If they see an eloquent orator, they accuse him of being dependent on inadequate knowledge and consider him to be proud.

If they see a simple straightforward honest man, they all join up to deceive him, subjugate him, direct him and tyrannize him. If they see an easy gentle man, they join up to despise him, trample him underfoot and treat him impolitely. If they see a man observing pure morality, they accuse him of hypocritical behavior, scorn him and do not respect him.

Such people are perverts and unlovable.

2. Wretchedness of lands

Wretchedness of lands. – All lands are filled with calamities and disadvantages: heat and cold (śītoṣṇa), hunger and thirst (kṣupipāsā), sickness, epidemics, malaria, suffering, old age, sickness, death, fears; there is no country free of them. Anywhere you go, all these evils follow you and there is no place where you can avoid them. Although there are wealthy peaceful lands, many are tormented by the defilements (kleśa) and do not deserve the name of happy lands. All involve the two kinds of suffering, bodily suffering (kāyika duḥkha) and mental suffering (caitasika duḥkha); no land is free of them. Thus it is said:

There are lands that are too cold,

There are lands that are too hot,

⁵²⁴ Excerpt from the Sermon of Benares: Pāli Vinaya. I, p. 10; Catuspariṣad, p. 158; Mahāvastu, III, p. 332; Lalitavistara, p. 417; Mahāvvyut., no. 2223-2240.

⁵²⁵ Rejection of the holy Dharma (saddharmapratikṣepa) is a particularly serious fault: cf.

Sarvadharmavaipulyasaṃgrahasūtra cited in Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 95, and Pañjikā, p.147.

⁵²⁶ Canonical comparison (Majjhima, III, p. 141: Seyyathāpi puriso khīratthiko khīragavesī khīrapariyesanāṇī caramāno gāviṃ taruṇavacchaṃ visāṇato āviñjeyya... abhabho khīrassa adhigamanāya.

There are lands without safety and protection,

There are lands where the miseries abound.

There are lands perpetually in famine (durbhikṣa),

There are lands where sicknesses are abundant,

There are lands where merit is not cultivated.

Thus there is no happy place.

As beings and lands have all these troubles, it is said that there is no happiness in the world (loka).

The ills of the desire realm (kāmadhātu) are such [as we have spoken of], but when one dies in the two higher realms [rūpa- and ārūpyadhātu] and falls back down here, one suffers even greater humiliation than in this lower world: thus, when one falls from a very high place, one is smashed to pieces and crushed.

Question. – What are the differences between anītya, duḥkha and anātmasaṃjñā on the one hand and sarvaloke ‘nabhiratisaṃjñā’ on the other hand, and why speak of them separately?

Answer. – There are two kinds of consideration (anupaśyanā): i) a general consideration (samastānupaśyanā), ii) a specific consideration (bhinnānupaśyanā). The first three concepts are of the general order whereas [the concept of the world] is of specific order.⁵²⁷ Furthermore, there are two kinds of consideration: i) consideration about things (dharmānupaśyanā), and ii) consideration about beings (sattvānupaśyanā). The first three concepts are a consideration consisting of disapproval of all things, whereas here, the concept of the world is considering the wickedness and the troubles of beings: it is not the same.

Furthermore, the first three notions are the pure path (anāsravamārga),⁵²⁸ whereas the concept of the world belongs to the impure path (sāsravamārga).

Finally, the first three notions are of the path of seeing the Truths (satyadarśanamārga) whereas the concept of the world is of the path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga).

Thus there are many differences. The concept of dissatisfaction in regard to the entire world (sarvaloke ‘nabhiratisaṃjñā’) is included in all the levels (sarvabhūmisamgrhīta) and bears upon the dharmas of the threefold world.

VIII. THE CONCEPTS OF DEATH AND IMPURITY

⁵²⁷ The concepts of anītya and duḥkha include all conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛta) and the concept of anātmā includes all dharmas without exception: they therefore have as object all dharmas inclusively.

The concept of sarvaloke ‘nabhirati’ is concerned only with beings (sattva) and lands (pradeśa).

⁵²⁸ Because they involve detachment in regard to the threefold world.

On the concept of death (marāṇasaṃjñā), see what has been said above (p. 1422F) about marāṇānasmṛti. – On the concept of impurity (aśucisaṃjñā), see what has been said above (p. 1151F) about kāyasmṛtyupasthāna.

IX. THE CONCEPTS OF RENUNCIATION, DETACHMENT AND CESSATION

[232c] The concepts of renunciation (prahāṇasaṃjñā), detachment (virāgasamjñā) and cessation (nirodhasamjñā) have the characteristics (nimitta) of nirvāṇa as object (ālambante).⁵²⁹ Because the latter cuts through the fetters (saṃyojana), there is the notion of renunciation; because it renounces the fetters, there is the notion of detachment; because it suppresses the fetters, there is the notion of cessation.

Question. – If that is so, one single notion would suffice; why then mention three?

Answer. – It is again a matter of one and the same thing spoken of in three different ways as was the case above (p. 1452F), where it was said: That which is impermanent is suffering and that which is suffering is impermanent.” It is the same here where the wickedness and the miseries of the entire world are so heavy that they are condemned in three ways. When a huge tree is being cut down, it is impossible to cut it down using just one saw. Since nirvāṇa is an excellent (praṇīta) dharma not yet attained previously (apūrvaprāpta), it is praised in diverse ways: hence the notions of renunciation (prahāṇasaṃjñā), detachment (virāgasamjñā) and cessation (nirodhasamjñā).

Furthermore, as nirvāṇa cuts through the three poisons (triviṣa), it is called abandonment (prahāṇa); as it abandons desire (rāga), it is called detachment (virāga), and as it suppresses all suffering to the point that it no longer arises, it is called cessation (nirodha).

Furthermore, during the preparatory path (prayogamārga) consisting of heat (uṣmagata), summits (mūrdhan), patience (kṣānti) and the supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgradharma),⁵³⁰ the yogin who has ⁵²⁹ Anguttara, V, p. 110-111, defines these three concepts in the following way: Idh’ Ānanda bhikkhu uppannaṃ kāmavittakkaṃ nādhivāseti pajahati vinodeti vyantīkaroti ...taṇhakkhayo nirodho nibbānaṃ ti. Ayaṃ vucati’ Ānanda nirodhasaññā.

Transl. – Here, O Ānanda, the monk refuses, abandons, removes, destroys and suppresses the thoughts of desire, malice, harm and wicked bad dharmas when they arise: this is the concept of abandonment.

Then the monk, withdrawn into the forest, under a tree or in an empty house, reflects and says to himself: The pacification of all the formations, the rejection of all conditionings, the destruction of desire, cessation, nirvāṇa, is a good thing, is an excellent thing: this is detachment.

Finally, the monk, withdrawn into the forest, etc. ... : this is the concept of cessation.

Note that this sūtra defines detachment and cessation in the same terms. These concepts are synonyms of nirvāṇa.

⁵³⁰ The four aids to insight (nirvedhabhāgāyā) discussed above, p. 495F, 1067F, 1411F.

the vision of the correct knowledge (samyagjñāna), moves away from the defilements (kleśa): that is the notion of detachment (virāgasamjñā). – Obtaining the pure path (anāsravamārga), he cuts the fetters (samyojana): that is the notion of renunciation (prahāṇasamjñā). – When he enters into nirvāṇa, he suppresses the five aggregates of attachment (pañcopādānaskandha) that will be continued no longer: that is the notion of cessation (nirodhasamjñā).

The notion of renunciation is nirvāṇa-with-residue (sopadhiśeṣanirvāṇa); the notion of cessation is nirvāṇa-without-residue (nirupadhiśeṣanirvāṇa); the notion of detachment is the means (upāya), the door, to both nirvāṇas.

These three concepts, sometimes impure (sāsrava) and sometimes pure (anāsrava), are included (samgrhīta) in all the stages (bhūmī).

CHAPTER XXXVIII: THE ELEVEN KNOWLEDGES, THE THREE MEDITATIVE STABILIZATIONS AND THE THREE FACULTIES (p. 1465F)

First Section THE ELEVEN KNOWLEDGES

PRELIMINARY NOTE

According to the oldest sources, the Buddhist texts call for a number of knowledges (Sanskrit, jñāna; Pāli, ñāṇa) which the scholastics will do their utmost to classify and define.

I. THE TEN KNOWLEDGES IN THE SŪTRAPITAKA

Attempts at classification are relatively rare:

1. The suttas of the Ñāṇassa vatthūni of the Saṃyutta, II, p. 56-60 (Tsa a han, T 99, no. 356-357, k. 14, p. 99c19-100a11) propose two classes of ñāṇa, one of 44 and the other of 77 units. The first results from attributing to each of the eleven members of the causal chain – from jarāmaraṇa to saṅkhāra – four knowledges relating to suffering, its origin, its cessation and the path to its cessation, which gives a total of $4 \times 11 = 44$. The second class results from attributing seven more knowledges to each of the same members, so $7 \times 11 = 77$.

2. Other more important groupings are also given by the Sūtrapitaka:

a. Four knowledges concerning: i) things (dhamme ñāṇaṃ), ii) consequences (anvaye ñāṇaṃ), iii) analysis of another's mind (paricchede ñāṇaṃ = paresaṃ cittaparicchede ñāṇaṃ), iv) conventions (sammutiñāṇaṃ), respectively: cf. Dīgha, III, p. 226, 277; Vibhaṅga, p. 315, 330.

b. Four other knowledges, altogether constituting right view (sammādiṭṭhi) and concerning i) suffering (dukkhe ñāṇaṃ), ii) its origin (samudaye ñāṇaṃ), iii) its cessation (nirodhe ñāṇaṃ), iv) the path to its cessation (mārga or nirodhagāminiyā paṭipadāya ñāṇaṃ): cf. Dīgha, II, p. 312; III, p. 227; Majjhima, III, p. 251; Saṃyutta, V, p. 8-9, 430; Paṭisambhidā, I, p. 41, 118, 133; Vibhaṅga, p. 104, 235, 293, 315, 328; Dhammasaṅgaṇī, p. 189.

c. Two knowledges, belonging to the arhat, concerning cessation of the impurities (khaye ñāṇaṃ) and their non-rearising in the future (anuppāde ñāṇaṃ) respectively: cf. Dīgha, III, p. 214, 274.

Later scholasticism, adding the three groups together, will posit the category of ten knowledges.

II. THE TEN KNOWLEDGES IN THE SANSKRIT ABHIDHARMA

Working with the canonical sources that have been presented above, the Sanskrit Abhidharma established a list of ten knowledges, one of the masterpieces of the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāsika school. These are:

- 1) dharmajñāna,
- 2) anvayaññāna,
- 3) paracittaññāna,
- 4) saṃvṛtījñāna,
- 5) duḥkhaññāna,
- 6) samudayaññāna,
- 7) nirodhaññāna,
- 8) mārgaññāna,
- 9) kṣayaññāna,
- 10) anutpādajñāna.

This list, the order of which is sometimes slightly modified, appears on the following texts:

1. Vasumitra's Abhidharmaprakaraṇapāda, T 1541, k. 1, p. 628b7-c6; T 1542, k. 1, p. 693c22-694a14. Extracts of the original Sanskrit are cited by the Kośavyākhyā, p. 616, l. 29-617, l. 27.
2. Kātyāyanīputra's Abhidharmajñānaprathāna, T 1543, K. 12, p. 829c; T 1544, k. 9, p. 963c.
3. Dharmatrāta's Saṃyuktābhidharmasāra, T 1552, k. 6, p. 817a11-b5.
4. Gośaka's Abhidharmārtarasa, T 1553, k. 1, p. 974a5-6 (reconstr. Sastri, p. 89, l. 3-4).
5. Skandhila's (?) Abhidharmāvatāraprakaraṇa, T 1554, k. 2, p. 985b12-13.
6. Harivarman's Satyasiddhiśāstra, T 1646, k. 16, p. 371c21-372c28.
7. Mahāvibhāṣā by the Five Hundred great Arhats, T 1545, k. 106, p. 549b21-c10.
8. Kośa, VII, p. 11.
9. Saṃghabhadra's Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 73, p. 735c8-10.
10. Abhidharmadīpa, p. 374.
11. Mahāvīyutpatti, no. 1234-1243.

In these texts there are precise definitions of these ten jñāna: those of the Abhidharmaprakaraṇapāda (T 1542, p. 693c23-694a15) partially cited in the Kośavyākhyā, p. 616, l. 29-617, l. 27 are presented here:

1. Dhammajñānaṃ katamat. kāmapratisaṃyukteṣu saṃskāreṣu yad amāsravaṃ 8. ... jñānaṃ idam iccyate 'nvayaññānaṃ.

9-10. Missing in the Sanskrit version.

Transl. from the Chinese. – 1. What is the knowledge of things (dharmajñāna)? The knowledge of things is: i) the pure knowledge concerning the formations associated with the desire realm; ii) the pure knowledge concerning the cause of the formations associated with the desire realm; iii) the pure knowledge concerned with the the cessation of the formations associated with the desire realm; iv) the pure knowledge concerned with the path leading to the cessation of the formations associated with the desire realm; v) the knowledge concerned with the knowledge of things and the stage {Fr. terre} of the knowledge of things is also called knowledge of things.

2. What is subsequent knowledge (anvayaññāna)? Subsequent knowledge is: i) the pure knowledge concerning the formations associated with the form realm and the formless realm; ii) the pure knowledge concerning the cause of the formations associated with the form realm and the formless realm; iii) the pure knowledge concerning the cessation of the formations associated with the form realm and the formless realm; iv) the pure knowledge concerning the paths leading to the cessation of the formations associated with the form realm and the formless realm; v) the pure knowledge concerning the subsequent knowledge and the stage of subsequent knowledge is also called consecutive knowledge.

3. What is the knowledge of another's mind (paracittaññāna)? Realized by cultivation of the knowledges (jñānabhāvanā), it is the support (niraya) of the fruit of this cultivation. Obtained by this cultivation, it is an unimpeded knowledge (apratihataññāna) concerning another's mind (citta) and mental events (caitta) associated with the desire realm and also in part with the pure (anāsrava) mind and mental events of another.

4. What is conventional knowledge (saṃvṛtījñāna)? It is all the impure knowledges (sarvasāsravaññāna).

5. What is the knowledge of suffering (duḥkhaññāna)? It is the pure knowledge produced when the five aggregates of attachment are considered to be impermanent, painful, empty and without self.

6. What is the knowledge of the origin of suffering (samudayaññāna)? It is the pure knowledge produced when the cause of impure things is considered as cause, origin, production and condition.

7. What is the knowledge of the cessation of suffering (nirodhaññāna)? It is the pure knowledge produced when this cessation is considered as cessation, peace, excellent and bringing salvation.

8. What is the knowledge of the path of cessation of suffering (mārgaññāna)? It is the pure knowledge produced when the path is considered as path, logical, the definitive attainment and exit.

9. What is the knowledge of the suppression of the impurities (kṣayaññāna)? It is the pure knowledge produced when one thinks: "Suffering has been completely known by me; the origin has been abandoned by me; the cessation has been realized by me; the path has been practiced by me": it is a knowledge, a seeing, a science, an intelligence, a light, an understanding.

10. What is the knowledge of the non-rearising of the impurities (anutpādayjñāna)? It is the pure knowledge produced when one thinks: “The suffering perfectly known by me is no longer to be known; the origin abandoned by me is no longer to be abandoned; the cessation realized by me is no longer to be realized; the path practiced by me is no longer to be practiced”: it is a knowledge, a seeing, a science, an intelligence, a light, an understanding.

III THE ELEVEN KNOWLEDGES IN THE MAHĀYĀNA

The Mahāyāna retains the list of ten knowledges established by the Sanskrit Abhidharma but gives it a very different interpretation and adds an eleventh knowledge at the end.

1. Lists of Eleven Knowledges in the Prajñāpāramitās in Sanskrit

List A appears in the Pañcaviṃśati, ed. N. Dutt, p. 208, l. 23—209, l. 1. It should also be on p. 20 of the same editions but the text is corrupt.

List B appears in the Aṣṭādaśasāhasrikā, ed. E. Conze, p. 193, l. 18-23, and the Śatasāhasrikā, ed. P. Ghosa, p. 61, l. 6-62, l. 16; p. 1440, l. 10-13.

List A	List B
1. duḥka-	1. duḥkha-
2. samudaya-	2. samudaya-
3. nirodha-	3. nirodha-
4. mārga-	4. mārga-
5. kṣaya-	5. kṣaya-
6. anutpāda-	6. anutpāda-
7. dharma-	7. dharma-
8. anvaya-	8. anvaya-
9. saṃvṛti-	9. saṃvṛti-
10. parijaya-	10. paricaya-
11. yathāruta-jñāna	11. yāthāruta-jñāna .

The last two numbers are problematic:

Paricaya- or parijaya-jñāna. – For the meaning of the word, see Edgerton, Dictionary, p. 322; Conze, Materials, p. 245. The Pañcaviṃśati defines it as pratīpatparijayajñāna ‘cognition of the mastery of the path’ according to Conze. The Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1441, l. 20, defines it as pratīpakṣajñāna ‘knowledge of the antidote’. Neither of these definitions is satisfactory. But if we proceed by elimination, it is clear that in the list of the ten knowledges paricaya or parajayajñāna, whichever the orthography of the word, can here only designate the paracittajñāna ‘knowledge of another’s mind’ rendered in the Pāli sources given above by the terms paricchede ñānaṃ or cittaparicchede ñānaṃ.

Yathārutajñāna. – Taken out of context, the expression can only mean ‘knowledge that conforms to the expression’. But the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 209, l. 9 and the Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1441, l. 21, defines it as tathāgatasya sarvākārajñatājñānam ‘knowledge of the consciousness of all aspects [of things], belonging to the Tathāgata’. If this explanation is valid, then I [Lamotte] think the reading yathārutajñāna should be corrected to yathābhūtajñāna ‘consciousness conforming to reality’, the variant attested by some Chinese versions.

2. Lists of the eleven knowledges in the Chinese Prajñāpāramitās

List A appears in the Pañcaviṃśati translated by Kumārajīva, T 223, , k. 1, p. 219a13-15; and in the Pañcaviṃśati by Hiuan-tsang, T 220, vol. VII, k. 415, p. 80b1-3.

List B appears in Kumārajīva’s Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 5, p. 254c19-21, and the translations of Hiuan-tsang in the Śatasāhasrikā (T 220, vol. V, k. 3, p. 12a25-27), the Pañcaviṃśati (T220, vol. VII, k. 402, p. 7c4-6), and the Aṣṭādaśasāhasrikā (T 220, vol. VII, k. 479, p. 429c24-26; ik. 489, p. 487c24-25).

It should be noted that Kumārajīva calls the eleventh knowledge yathābhūtajñāna whereas Hiuan-tsang always give it the reading yathārutajñāna.

Here I [Lamotte] limit myself to restoring the Pañcaviṃśatī translated by Kumārajīva, T 223, k. 5, p. 254c21-255a4, into Sanskrit:

1. Tatra katamad duḥkhajñānam. yad duḥkhasyānutpādajñānam idam ucyate ... 11. ... tathāgatasya sarvākārajñatājñānam idam ucyate yathābhūtajñānam.

Transl. – 1. What is the knowledge of suffering? It is the knowledge of the non-production of suffering.

2. What is the knowledge of the origin of suffering? It is the knowledge of the abandonment of this origin.

3. What is the knowledge of the cessation of suffering? It is the knowledge of the original cessation of this suffering.

4. What is the knowledge of the path of cessation of suffering? It is the awareness of the noble eightfold Path.

5. What is the knowledge of the cessation of the impurities? It is the knowledge of cessation of lust, hatred and ignorance.

6. What is the knowledge of the non-rearising of the impurities? It is the knowledge of the non-production of these impurities in the Blessed One.

7. What is the knowledge of things? It is the knowledge consisting of the discerning of [the characteristics, impermanence, etc.] of these things.

8. What is subsequent knowledge? It is the knowledge consisting of saying: “The eye is impermanent” and so on up to “Mind, contact, co-dependent production and feeling are impermanent.”

9. What is conventional knowledge? It is the knowledge of the name of causes and conditions.

10. What is the knowledge of another’s mind? It is to know the minds of other beings and other individuals by means of the mind.

11. What is knowledge conforming to reality? It is the knowledge, belonging to the Tathāgata, of the consciousness of all the aspects.

These explanations are exactly opposite to the definitions given above by the Sanskrit Abhidharma: they represent the Mahāyānist point of view and are commented on by the Traité in turn: below, p. 1483F and later, k. 27, p. 257c14-16; k. 48, p. 406b-c; k. 84, p. 650c9-15; k. 99, p. 749a14.

Śāstra. – I. DEFINITION OF THE ELEVEN KNOWLEDGES

1. The knowledge of things (dharmajñāna) is:

a. the pure knowledge concerning things associated with the desire realm (kāmadhātusamprayukteṣu dharmeṣu yad anāsravaṃ jñānam).

b. the pure knowledge concerning the cause of things associated with the desire realm (kāmadhātusamprayuktānaṃ dharmāṇaṃ hetau yad anāsravaṃ jñānam).

d. the pure knowledge concerning the path leading to the cessation of things associated with the desire realm (kāmadhātusamprayuktānāṃ dharmāṇaṃ prahāṇāya mārga yad anāsravaṃ jñānam).

e. also the pure knowledge concerning the knowledge of the things themselves and its stage (api khalu dharmajñāne dharmajñānabhūmau ca yad anāsravaṃ jñānam).

2. It is the same for the subsequent knowledge (anvaya-jñāna) concerning [things associated] with the form realm and the formless realm (rūpārūpyasahātusaṃprayukteṣu dharmeṣu).

3. The knowledge of another's mind (paracittajñāna) cognizes:

a. the mind (citta) and mental events (caitasikadharma) relating to the desire realm and the form realm (kāmarūpadhātusaṃprayukta) presently belonging to others,

b. also a small part of their pure minds and mental events (anāsravacittacaitta).

4. Conventional knowledge (saṃvṛtījñāna) is all of the impure knowledges (sarvasāsravajñāna).

5. The knowledge of suffering (duḥkhajñāna) is the pure knowledge produced when the five aggregates of attachment are considered as impermanent, suffering, empty and without self (pañcopādānaskandhān anityato duḥkhataḥ śūnyato 'nātmataś ca manasikurvato yad anāsravaṃ jñānam).

6. The knowledge of the origin of suffering (samudayajñāna) is the pure knowledge produced when the cause of impure dharmas is considered as cause, origin, successive and associated causation (sāsravahetukaṃ hetutaḥ samudayataḥ prabhavataḥ pratyayataś ca manasikurvato yad anāsravaṃ jñānam).

7. The knowledge of the cessation of suffering (nirodhajñāna) is the pure knowledge produced by considering this cessation as cessation, peaceful, excellent and bringing salvation (nirodhaṃ nirodhataḥ śāntataḥ prañītaṃ niḥsaraṇataś ca manasikurvato yad anāsravaṃ jñānam).

8. The knowledge of the path of cessation (mārgajñāna) is the pure knowledge produced by considering this path as path, logical, attainment and ultimate exit (mārgaṃ mārgato nyāyataḥ pratipattito nairyaṇikataś ca manasikurvato yad anāsravaṃ jñānam).

9. The knowledge of the cessation of the impurities (kṣayajñāna = āsravakṣayajñāna) is the pure knowledge produced by thinking: "Suffering is completely known by me (duḥkhaṃ me pariñātam); the origin has been abandoned by me (samudayo me prahīṇaḥ); cessation has been realized by me (nirodho me sāṅgātṛtaḥ); the path has been practiced by me (mārgo me bhāvitaḥ)"; it [223a] is a wisdom (prajñā), a seeing (darśana), a knowing (vidyā), an understanding (buddhi).

10. The knowledge of the non-rearising of the impurities (anutpādayajñāna) is the pure knowledge produced by thinking: "The suffering completely known by me is no longer to be known (duḥkhaṃ me pariñātam na pariñātavyam); the origin abandoned by me is no longer to be abandoned (samudayo me prahīṇo na prahātavyaḥ); the cessation realized by me is no longer to be realized (nirodho me sāṅgātṛto na sāṅgātṛtavyaḥ); the path practiced by me is no longer to be practiced (mārgo me bhāvito nabhāvitaḥ)": it is a wisdom (prajñā), a seeing (darśana), a knowing (vidyā), an understanding (buddhi).

11. The wisdom conforming to reality (yathābhūtajñāna) is a knowledge conforming exactly to reality and free of obstacles (apratihata) concerning the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) of all dharmas.

B. The Ten Knowledges According to the Abhidharma

1. Objects of the ten knowledges⁵³¹

1) Dharmajñāna has as object (ālamabate): a. things associated with the desire realm (kāmadhātusaṃprayuktā dharmāḥ); b. the cause of things associated with the desire realm (kāmadhātusaṃprayuktānām dharmānām hetuḥ); c. the cessation of things associated with the desire realm (kāmadhātusaṃprayuktānām dharmānām nirodhaḥ); d. the path leading to the cessation of things associated with the desire realm (kāmadhātusaṃprayuktānām dharmānām prahāṇāya mārgaḥ).

2) Anvaya-jñāna is similar, [with the difference that it concerns the things of rūpa- and ārūpyadhātu, their cause, their cessation and the path to their cessation].

3) Samvṛtījñāna has as object all the dharmas.

4) Paracittajñāna has as object the mind (citta) and mental events (caitasikadharma), impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), occurring in the mind of another.

Of the ten knowledges, one is impure (sāsrava), [namely, saṃvṛtījñāna], eight are pure (anāsrava) and one, namely, paracittajñāna, should be set apart since it is impure when it has an impure mind as object and pure when it has a pure mind as object.

3. Mutual inclusion of the ten knowledges⁵³³

1) Dharmajñāna contains (saṃgrhṇāti):

a. dharmajñāna [properly called],

⁵³¹ Compare Prakaraṇapāda, T 1542, k. 1, p. 694b4-c4; Kośa, VII, p. 5seq.; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 377, l. 1-378, l. 6.

⁵³² Cf. Kośa, VII, p. 4.

5) Duḥkhaññāna contains:

a. suḥkhaññāna [properly called],

b. a small part, [that which has as object the truth of suffering], of dharmajñāna, of anvayaññāna, of kṣayaññāna, and of anutpādajñāna.

6-7) Samudayaññāna and nirodhaññāna are explained on the same principle.

8) Mārgaññāna contains:

a. mārgaññāna [properly called],

b. a small part, [that which has the truth of the path as object], of dharmajñāna, of anvayaññāna, of paracittajñāna, of kṣayaññāna, and of anutpādajñāna.

10) Anutpādajñāna is explained according to the same principle.

4. The associates of the ten knowledges

[a. The faculties (indriya).]

i) Nine knowledges are associated (saṃprayukta) with eight faculties (indriya), excluding the faculty of wisdom (prajñendriya), the faculty of dissatisfaction (daurmanasyendriya) and the faculty of displeasure (duḥkhendriya).⁵³⁴ ii) Samvṛtījñāna is associated with ten faculties, excluding the faculty of wisdom (prajñendriya).

[b. The concentrations (samādhi).]

i) Dharmajñāna, anvayaññāna and duḥkhaññāna are associated with the samādhi of emptiness (śūnyatāsamādhi).

ii) Dharmajñāna, anvayaññāna, nirodhaññāna, kṣayaññāna and anutpādajñāna are associated with the samādhi of signlessness (ānimittasamādhi).

iii) Dharmajñāna, anvayaññāna, paracittajñāna, duḥkhaññāna, samudayaññāna, mārgaññāna, kṣayaññāna and anutpādajñāna are associated with the samādhi of wishlessness (apraṇihitasamādhi).

[c. The concepts (saṃjñā).]

i) Dharmajñāna, anvayaññāna, saṃvṛtījñāna, duḥkhaññāna, kṣayaññāna and anutpādajñāna are associated [with three concepts from the group of the ten concepts mentioned on p. 1433F]: the concept of impermanence (anityasaṃjñā), the concept of suffering (duḥkhasaṃjñā) and the concept of non-self (anātmasaṃjñā).

ii) Samvṛtījñāna is associated with the four intermediate concepts [of the same group, namely, the concept of the repugnant nature of food (āhāre pratikūlasaṃjñā), the concept of displeasure in respect to the whole world (sarvaloke ‘nabhiratsaṃjñā), the concept of death (marāṇasaṃjñā) and the concept of impurity (aśucisaṃjñā).

iii) Dharmajñāna, anutpādajñāna, nirodhaññāna, kṣayaññāna and anutpādajñāna are associated with the three final concepts [of the same group, namely, the concept of abandonment (prahāṇasaṃjñā), the concept of detachment (virāgasamjñā) and the concept of cessation (nirodhasamjñā).

Some say that saṃvṛtījñāna is sometimes associated with the concept of detachment (virāgasamjñā).

5. Mutual consciousness of the ten knowledges.⁵³⁵

Dharmajñāna has as object (ālambate) nine knowledges, excluding anvayaññāna. The same for anvayaññāna, [excluding dharmajñāna].

Samvṛtījñāna, paracittajñāna, kṣayaññāna and anutpādajñāna have as object the ten knowledges. [233b]

Duḥkhaññāna and samudayaññāna have as object saṃvṛtījñāna and the impure (sāsrava) paracittajñāna.

⁵³⁴ See definitions in Kośa, I, p.101.

⁵³⁵ Cf. Saṃyuktābhidharma, T 1552, k. 6, p. 920b10-25; Abhidharmāṃśa, T 1553, k. 2, p. 974c8-12 (reconstred by Sastri, p. 92, l. 9-14); Kośa, VII, p. 43; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 377, l. 1-9.

Nirodhajñāna does not bear upon any knowledge.

Mārgajñāna has as object nine knowledges, excluding asmṃvṛtījñāna.

6. Aspects of the ten knowledges⁵³⁶

Dharmajñāna and anvayajñāna have the sixteen aspects (ṣoḍaśakāra) [of the four noble Truths (p. 641F)].

Paracittajñāna has four aspects: [those of the truth of the Path (māragasatya)].

Duḥkha-, samudaya-, nirodha- and mārgajñāna have each of the four aspects [of their respective truths].

Kṣayajñāna and anutpādayajñāna both have fourteen aspects, excluding the empty aspect (śūnyākāra) and the non-self aspect (anātmakākāra).

Samṃvṛtījñāna, when it occurs in heat (uṣmagata), summits (mūrdhan) and patience (kṣānti), has sixteen aspects. When it occurs in supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgradharma), saṃvṛtījñāna has four aspects, [those of the truth of the path (māragasatya)].⁵³⁷

7. Acquisition of the ten knowledges in the darśana- and āśaikṣamārga⁵³⁸

A. In the darśanamārga.

1) Entering into the first pure mind (prathame 'nāsravacitte), [i.e., duḥke darmajñānakṣānti], the saint (ārya) acquires one single knowledge, the saṃvṛtījñāna.

2-3) In the second mind [i.e., duḥkhe dharmajñāna], he adds duḥkhajñāna and dharmajñāna.

4) In the fourth mind [i.e., duḥkhe 'nvayajñāna], he adds anvayajñāna.

5) In the sixth mind [i.e., samudaye dharmajñāna], he adds samudayajñāna.

6) In the tenth mind [i.e., nirodhe dharmajñāna], he adds nirodhajñāna.

⁵³⁶ Cf. Samyuktābhidharma, T 1552, k. 6, p. 918b11-c6; Abhidharmāmṛta, T 1553, k. 2, p. 974a26-b5 (reconstructed Sastri, p. 90, l. 12-17; Kośa, VIII, p. 15-16, 27-28).

⁵³⁷ This is a matter of the saṃvṛtījñāna practiced in the preparatory path (prayogamārga) during the four nirvedhabhāgiyas: heat, etc. See above, p. 395F, n. 1.

⁵³⁸ To follow this explanation and the next section easily, one must remember the great stages in the Path of nirvāṇa: 1) Path of seeing the truths (satyadarśanamārga) with its 16 moments of mind; 2) Path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga) with its 162 moments of mind; 3) Path of the saint at the end of his career (arhat or āśaikṣa). For a brief summary, see Lamotte, Histoire du Bouddhisme indien, p. 677-686, or references in the Introduction of L. de La Vallée Poussin in vol. V of the Kośa.

In regard to the precise subject of the acquisition of the ten knowledges in the darśana- and the āśaikṣamārga, cf. Samyuktābhidharma, T 1552, k. 6, p. 918c-16-27; Kośa, VII, p. 47-48; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 378, l. 7-17.

7-8) In the fourteenth mind [i.e., mārga dharmajñāna], he adds mārgajñāna.

But if he is already free of desire (vītarāga), [i.e., if, before entering into the supramundane path (lokottaramārga) of the darśanamārga, he has already been freed from desire by means of the worldly path (laukikamārga) of detachment], then the saint (ārya) also adds paracittajñāna.

B. In the āśaikṣamārga.

9) In the path of the one of no further training (āśaikṣamārga), the arhat adds kṣayamārga.

10) If he has attained unshakeable deliverance (akopyā vimukti), he adds also anutpādayajñāna.

8. Development of the ten knowledges in the threefold Path⁵³⁹

A. In the darśanamārga.

1) In the first pure mind (anāsravacitta), [i.e. duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti], the yogin does not develop (na bhāvayati)⁵⁴⁰ knowledge.

2) In the second mind, [i.e., duḥke dharmajñāna], he develops two knowledges, present (pratyutpanna) and future (anāgata).

3) In the fourth moment, [i.e., duḥkhe 'nvayajñāna], he develops two present knowledges and three future knowledges.

4) In the sixth moment, [i.e., samudaye dharmajñāna], he develops two present and future knowledges.

5) In the eighth mind, [i.e., samudaye 'nvayajñāna], he develops two present knowledges and three future knowledges.

6) In the tenth mind, [i.e., nirodhe 'nvayajñāna], he develops two knowledges, present and future.

7) In the twelfth mind, [i.e., nirodhe 'nvayajñāna], he develops two present knowledges and three future knowledges.

8) In the fourteenth mind, [i.e., mārga dharmajñāna], he develops two knowledges, present and future.

⁵³⁹ Cf. Samyuktābhidharma, T 1552, k. 6, p. 918c28-919c27; Abhidharmāmṛta, T 1553, k. 2, p. 974b5-c8 (reconstr. Sastri, p. 90, l. 18-92; l. 8: in line 18 of p. 90, the word asamāpattimadhyamadyānābhūmyoḥ should be corrected to anāgamyadyānāntarabhūmyoḥ; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 107, p. 552a6-554b23; Kośa, VII, p. 48-50 and 54-59; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 379-381.

⁵⁴⁰ Cf. Kośavyākhyā, p. 632, l. 14-15: Iha dvividhā bhāvanādhikṛtā pratilambhabhāvanā niṣevāṇabhāvanā; pratilambhabhāvanā prāptiṭaḥ, niṣevāṇabhāvanā saṃmikkhakhībhāvataḥ: “This is a twofold development here: a development of obtaining as acquisition, and a development of assistance from the fact of having preceded”. This is why the ascetic can simultaneously develop present (pratyutpanna) and future (anāgata) knowledges.

9) In the sixteenth mind, [i.e., mārge 'nṣayajñāna], he develops two present knowledges [mārgajñāna and anṣayajñāna], and develops six future knowledges [dharmajñāna, anṣayajñāna, duḥkhajñāna, samudayajñāna, nirodhajñāna and mārgajñāna]. If he is detached (vītarāga), he develops seven knowledges [by adding paracittajñāna to the preceding six].⁵⁴¹

B. In the bhāvanāmārga.

10) The srotaāpanna who wishes to become detached from the fetters (saṃyojana) of kāmādhātu develops seven knowledges, excluding paracittajñāna, ṣṣayajñāna and anutpāḍajñāna, in the seventeenth mind.⁵⁴²

11) In the ninth deliverance (vimukti = vimuktimārga), [when the saint becomes anāgāmin by destruction of the ninth category of passions of kāmādhātu],⁵⁴³ he develops four knowledges, excluding ṣṣayajñāna and anutpāḍajñāna.

When, [by cessation of the fifth category of passions of kāmādhātu],⁵⁴⁴ the person inspired by faith (śraddhadhimukta) becomes informed by possession of the view (drṣṭipratpa), he develops six knowledges in the twofold path⁵⁴⁵, excluding paracittajñāna, saṃvrtijñāna, ṣṣayajñāna and anutpāḍajñāna.

It is at the sixteenth mind-moment of the darśanamārga, which is also the first moment of the bhāvanāmārga, that the saint (ārya) takes possession of the first fruit of the religious life and becomes srotaāpanna.

⁵⁴² See Kośabhāṣya, p. 408:

Sarāgabhāvanāmārga tadūrdhvaṃ saptabhāvanā // ṣoḍasāt kṣaṇād ūrdhvaṃ bhāvanāmārga yāvan na vītarāgo bhāvati tāvat sarveṣu prayogānantaryavimuktiviṣeṣamārggeṣu sapta jñānāni bhavyante:
dharmānṣayaduḥkhasamudayanīrodhamārgasaṃvrtijñānāni. laukikaṣ ced bhāvanāmārgaḥ saṃvrtijñānaṃ pratyutpannam. lokottaraṣ cec caturṇaṃ dharmajñānaṃ anyatamat.

Transl. – “Above, in the Path of meditation associated with desire, there is the development of seven knowledges.” - Beyond the sixteenth moment, in the Path of meditation, as long as one is not liberated from desire, in the preparatory paths, irresistible, freeing and excellent, seven knowledges are cultivated: dharmā-, anṣaya-, duḥkha-, samudaya-, nirodha-, mārga- and saṃvrti-jñāna. If the path of meditation is mundane, saṃvrtijñāna is developed; if the path of meditation is supramundane, another of the four dharmajñāna is cultivated.

⁵⁴³ One becomes anāgāmin by cessation of the ninth and last category of passions of kāmādhātu: one is never again reborn in kāmādhātu.

⁵⁴⁴ By cessation of the fifth category of passions of kāmādhātu, one becomes śraddhadhimukta or drṣṭipratpa according to whether one is of weak faculties or strong faculties: Āloka, p. 35, l. 20-21:

12) When the saint is detached from the passions belonging to seven stages (bhūmi), [namely, the four dhyānas of rūpādhātu, and the first three samāpattis of ārūpyadhātu], the following should be distinguished:

a. in the uninterrupted paths (ānantaryamārga, also called prahāṇamārga), he develops seven knowledges, excluding paracittajñāna, ṣṣayajñāna and anutpāḍajñāna.

b. in the paths of deliverance (vimuktimārga), he develops eight knowledges, excluding ṣṣayajñāna and anutpāḍajñāna.⁵⁴⁶

13) When the saint is detached from the passions of the summit of existence (bhavāgra or the fourth samāpatti of ārūpyadhātu), the following should be distinguished:

a. in the [nine] uninterrupted paths (ānantaryamārga or prahāṇamārga of this sphere), he develops six knowledges, excluding paracittajñāna, saṃvrtijñāna, ṣṣayajñāna and anutpāḍajñāna.

b. in the [first] eight paths of deliverance (vimuktimārga), he develops seven knowledges, excluding saṃvrtijñāna, ṣṣayajñāna and anutpāḍajñāna.⁵⁴⁷

⁵⁴⁶ Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 408:

Saptabhūmijayābhijñānakopyāptyākīrṇabhāvite/

Transl. – “In the uninterrupted paths of conquest over the seven levels, of acquisition of the supernatural powers and unshakeable quality, of mixed meditation, [seven knowledges are developed] and also in the eight paths of deliverance of the above.”

Fill in: ‘seven knowledges are developed’. The seven levels are the four dhyānas and the [first] three ārūpyas. Victory over these seven levels is detachment. During this detachment from the seven levels, in the five supernatural powers, in the quality of unshakeability and in the mixed meditation, all the unstoppable paths practiced by the śaikṣa entail the development of seven knowledges, the same as the preceding. If the path of meditation is worldly, saṃvrtijñāna is cultivated. If the path is supramundane, one of the four anṣayajñānas and one of the two dharmajñānas are developed. But in the quality of unshakeability, saṃvrtijñāna is not developed because it is not opposed to Bhavāgra. Here ṣṣayajñāna is the seventh knowledge.

Above the detachment from the seven levels, in the detachment from bhavāgra, during the [first] eight paths of deliverance, seven knowledges also are developed: dharmā-, anṣaya-, duḥkha-, samudaya-, nirodha- mārga- and paracittajñāna. Saṃvrtijñāna is not developed because it is not opposed to bhavāgra. But one of the four anṣayajñānas and one of the two dharmajñānas are actually cultivated

C. In the śaikaśamārga.

14) In the first mind of ‘the one who has nothing further to practice’ (śaikaśasya prathamacitta), a mind coinciding with the ninth and last deliverance (vimukti) of bhavāgra,

a. the arhat who is unconditionally liberated (asamayavimukta) develops the ten knowledges and all the impure and pure roots of good (sarvāstavanāsravakuśalamūla).

b. the arhat who is conditionally liberated (samayavimukta) develops nine knowledges [excluding anupādajñāna], and all the impure and pure roots of good.⁵⁴⁸

All of these distinctions are fully explained in the A-p’i-t’an-men (Abhidharmamukha?).

C. The Eleven Knowledges According to the Mahāyāna

1. Knowledge conforming to reality

The knowledge conforming to reality (yathābhūtajñāna) has a special characteristic (viśeṣalakṣaṇa): it will be fully explained in the following chapters of [233c] the Prajñāpāramitā.⁵⁴⁹ ānataryapathe ṣaṇṇām.

Śaikaśasyendriyottāpanāyāṃ vimuktimārga sarāgasya ṣaṇṇāṃ bhāvanā: ... sarvānantaryamārgapratīṣiddhatvāt. kim arthaṃ pratiṣidhyate. apratipakṣatvāt.

Transl. “For the śaikaśa, in the path of deliverance of perfecting the faculties, there is the development of six or seven knowledges; in the uninterrupted path, development of six knowledges.”

In the path of deliverance, during the development of the faculties, the śaikaśa who still has the defilements develops six knowledges: dharmā-, anvaya-, samudaya-, nirodha- and mārgajñāna. If he is detached from desire, he develops seven, adding paracittajñāna to the previous ones.

Whether or not he is detached from desire, in the uninterrupted path of perfecting the qualities, he develops the six knowledges mentioned above, but not saṃvṛtījñāna, because [perfecting the faculties] is like the path of seeing; not paracittajñāna because this knowledge is excluded from any path of seeing. Why is this knowledge excluded? Because it does not counteract [the passions].

⁵⁴⁸ Cf. Kośabhāṣa, p. 409:

Akopyasya daśabhāvanā, tatsaṃcāre ‘nantyamuktau ca / yas tv akopyadharmā bhavati tasya ... vimuktimārga daśānāṃ bhāvanā.

Transl. – “In the Unshakeable, ten knowledges are developed, and also during the passing into the quality of the unshakeable in the last path of deliverance.”

The person who has the quality of unshakeability develops the ten knowledges, and also the person who passes into the state of unshakeability develops the ten knowledges in [the ninth] and last path of deliverance [of bhavāgra].

The saint whom the Traité speaks of as definitively delivered (asamayavimukta) corresponds to the Unshakeable one of whom the Kośa speaks.

2. The eleven knowledges

Some say:

1) The knowledge of things (dharmajñāna) cognizes the five aggregates of attachment (pañcopādānaskandha) as impermanent (anitya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and without self (anātmaka). It knows that dharmas are all the result of a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasāmagryapekṣa) in the sense that ‘actions have ignorance as condition’ (avidyāpratīyāḥ saṃskārāḥ) and so on up to ‘old age and death have birth as condition’ (jātipratīyayaṃ jarāmaraṇam).

Thus the Buddha said to the brahmacārin Siu-che-mo (Susīma): “First it is necessary to use the knowledge [of the causality] of things in order to analyze dharmas, then to use the knowledge concerning nirvāṇa.”⁵⁵⁰

2) Subsequent knowledge (anvayajñāna). – Knowing that the present five aggregates of attachment (pratīyutpannopādānaskandha) are impermanent (anitya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and non-self (anātmaka), one deduces that, in the past (atīta) and the future (anāgata) and in the form realm (rūpadhātu) and the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu) as well, the five aggregates of attachment are likewise impermanent, suffering, empty and without self.

Thus, if we notice that presently fire (agni) warms and burns, we know by induction (anumāna) that fires past and future or fires in other places likewise [warm and burn].

3) The knowledge of another’s mind (paracittajñāna) cognizes the mind (citta) and mental events (caitasikadharmā) of other beings.

Question. – If it cognizes the mind and mental events of others, why is it called simply the knowledge of the mind of another [and not the knowledge of the mind and mental events of others]?

Answer. – The mind being sovereign, it is sufficient to call it the knowledge of another’s mind: by saying mind, we know that the mental events are understood as well.

4) Conventional knowledge (saṃvṛtījñāna) is a purely knowledge of designation (prajñaptījñāna). The saint knows that, in regard to reality (tattva), worldly people (prthagjana) know it only verbally (prajñaptitah). This is why this knowledge is called knowledge of designation (prajñaptījñāna). In the same way, those for whom a house (grha) is just a word-list of boards (phalaka), posts (sthūṇā), pillars (stambha) and walls (bhitti) only understand these materials and do not understand the real meaning (bhūtārtha) of a house. That is conventional knowledge (saṃvṛtījñāna).

5) The knowledge of suffering (duḥkhajñāna) brings into play a knowledge about suffering in order to reprimand the five aggregates of attachment (pañcopādānaskandha).

⁵⁴⁹ Pañcaviṃśati. T 223, k. 5, p. 255a2; k. 21, p. 376b19. The Traité will comment on these passages: T 1509, k. 48, p. 406c7; k. 84, p. 647b14; 650c21-23; k. 99, p. 749a14. The yathābhūtajñāna summing up the entire knowledge of the Mahāyāna coincides with the sarvākārajñāna discussed above, p. 640-642F.

⁵⁵⁰ Susīmasutta in Samyutta, II, p. 134 (Tsa a han, T 99, k. 14, p. 97b6): Pubbe kho Susīma dhammaṭṭhiñāṇaṃ pacchā nibbāṇe ñāṇam ti.

Question. – The five aggregates of attachment are both impermanent (anitya), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and non-self (anātmaka). Why speak only of the knowledge of suffering (duḥkha) and not speak of a knowledge of impermanence, emptiness and non-self?⁵⁵¹

Answer. – We speak of the knowledge of suffering in regard to the truth of suffering, the knowledge of the origin in regard to the truth of the origin, the knowledge of cessation in regard the the truth of cessation, and the knowledge of the path in regard to the truth of the path..

Question. – But the five aggregates of attachment have all kinds of evils; why proclaim only one truth on suffering and not proclaim truths on impermanence, emptiness and non-self as well?

Answer. – If truths on impermanence, emptiness and non-self were proclaimed, this would not offend the meaning of the [Buddhist] doctrine. But as beings are, above all, lovers of happiness (sukhākāma) and enemies of suffering (duḥkhapratikūla), the Buddha's lament that everything in the world is suffering (loke sarvaṃ duḥkham) was intended to lead beings to become detached from it.

On the other hand, being faced with impermanence, emptiness and non-self, beings are not very frightened; this is why the Buddha did not speak of them [as distinct truths].

Furthermore, in the Dharma proclaimed by the Buddha, the five aggregates of attachment carry different names, but all meaning 'suffering'. This is why the Buddha spoke only of the knowledge of suffering.

This duḥkhajñāna is sometimes impure (sāsrava), sometimes pure (anāsrava):

a. It is impure [in the preparatory Path], when it is in heat (uṣmagata), summits (mūrdhan), patience (kṣānti) and supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgradharma).⁵⁵²

b. It is pure when the ascetic penetrates into the Path of seeing the truths (satyadarśanamārga).

Why is that? From there on up to the supreme worldly dharmas, the yogin considers suffering in four ways.

6-8) It is the same for the knowledge of the origin, the knowledge of cessation and the knowledge of the Path.

Furthermore, the knowledge of suffering (duḥkhajñāna) cognizes that suffering nature (duḥkhākāra) does not really arise. – The knowledge of the origin [234a] (samudayañāna) cognizes that dharmas are disjunctive and without conjunction. – The knowledge of cessation (nirodhajñāna) cognizes that dharmas are forever peaceful (ādiśānta) and like nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasama). – The knowledge of the path (mārgajñāna) cognizes that dharmas are forever pure (nityaśuddha), without rectitude or evil.⁵⁵³

⁵⁵¹ In other words, since everything is impermanent, suffering, empty and non-self, why did the Buddha who proclaimed a truth of suffering not proclaim a truth of impermanence, emptiness and non-self?

⁵⁵² The four aids to penetration (nirvedhabhāgāyā) developed in the preparatory Path (prayogamārga): see above, p. 395F, n., and Kośa, VI, p. 163-168.

⁵⁵³ This paragraph condenses the Mahāyānist interpretation of the four holy Truths into a few words.

9) The knowledge of the elimination of the impurities (kṣayañāna) cognizes that all dharmas are non-existent (anupalabdha).

10) The knowledge of the non-rearising of the impurities (anutpādajñāna) cognizes that dharmas, being unreal (abhūta) and indeterminate (anīyata), do not arise (anutpanna).

11) The knowledge conforming to reality (yathābhūtajñāna) is that which can be cognized by the ten preceding knowledges. By means of this knowledge in accordance with reality, the characteristics (nimitta), conditions (pratyaya), special features (prabheda) and considerations (anupaśyanā) belonging to each of the ten knowledges are cognized, but in this knowledge conforming to reality, there is no characteristic, condition, or special feature; it destroys all considerations of things and itself has none.

In the first ten knowledges, there is the eye of the Dharma (dharmacakṣus) and the eye of wisdom (prajñācakṣus); in the knowledge conforming to reality, there is only the eye of the Buddha (buddhacakṣus).⁵⁵⁴

The first ten knowledges are shared by the arhats, pratyekabuddhas and bodhisattvas; the Buddha alone possesses the knowledge conforming to reality. Why? Only the Buddha possesses the Dharma which does not deceive (aśāthyadharmā); this is how we know that he alone possesses the knowledge conforming to reality.

Finally, when the ten knowledges enter into the knowledge in accordance with reality, they lose their original names and then there is only one true knowledge. Similarly, when all the rivers of the ten directions enter into the great sea (mahāsamudra), they lose their original names and are just called great sea.

These various explanations of the meaning of the eleven knowledges are given here in brief (saṃkṣiptena). A note in red says that the eleven knowledges are finished here.

Second section THE THREE MEDITATIVE STABILIZATIONS

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 20, l. 9-11; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 62, l. 17-63, l. 4). – [The Bodhisattva-Mahāsattva must fulfill completely the three meditative stabilizations (samādhi):

1. the concentration with both conceptualization and analysis (śavitarakaḥ śavicāraḥ samādhiḥ).
2. the concentration without conceptualization and with analysis only (śavitarako vicāramātraḥ samādhiḥ),
3. the concentration with neither conceptualization or analysis (śavitarako 'vicāraḥ samādhiḥ).

Śāstra. –

⁵⁵⁴ The five eyes (māṃsa-, divya-, prajñā-, dharmā-, buddhacakṣus) are defined in Pañcaviṃśati, p. 77-83: Śatasāhasrikā, p. 290-301).

I. THE THREE CONCENTRATIONS ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA

1. The three kinds of concentration

All the trances (dhyāna) and all the absorptions (samāpatti) that concentrate the mind are called concentration (samādhi), ‘sphere of action of right thought’ in language of the Ts’in. During this beginningless universe (anādikāliko lokadhātu), the mind is always wandering (kuṇḍala) and without uprightness; but when these spheres of action of right thought are obtained, the mind is straightened out. Thus the progress of the snake (sarpagati) is always sinuous, but when it enters into a bamboo tube, it is corrected.

This concentration is of three types:⁵⁵⁵

1) In the desire realm (kāmadhātu), the preparatory concentration (anāgāmya) of the first trance and the first trance (dhyāna), the concentration is associated with conceptualization (vitarka) and analysis (vicāra) and consequently is called ‘furnished with conceptuality and analysis’ (savitārakaḥ savicāraḥ).

2) In the dhyānāntara, [a variety of the first trance, the concentration is associated with analysis alone and is consequently called ‘without conceptuality but with analysis only’ (avitarko vicārammatraḥ).

3) From the second trance (dvitīyādhyāna) up to the level of the summit of existence (bhavāgra, or the fourth ārūpyasamāpatti), the concentration is associated with neither conceptuality nor analysis and consequently is called ‘without conceptuality or analysis’ (avitarko ‘vicāraḥ).

2. Vitarka and Vicāra.⁵⁵⁶

Question. - The mind (citta) and mental events (caitasikadharma) associated with concentration (samādhisamprayukta) are as many as twenty.⁵⁵⁷ Why mention only two here, namely, conceptualization (vitarka) and analysis (vicāra)?

Answer. – Vitarka and vicāra cause disturbance (vicakṣuḥkaraṇa) in concentration: this is why we limit ourselves to mentioning two here. Even if they are good (kuśala), they are enemies to meditative stabilization and it is difficult to escape from them. Some even say that a mind furnished with vitarka and vicāra is not concentrated. This is why the Buddha stated that the concentration with vitarka and vicāra lacks solidity.⁵⁵⁸

When the power of vitarka and vicāra is minimal, it is possible to obtain concentration. Vitarka and vicāra are able to produce concentration and are also able to destroy it. They are like the wind (vāyu) which is able to bring rain [234b] (varṣa) and also able to destroy it. Good vitarka and vicāra, which are of three types, can produce the first dhyāna; but when the first dhyāna has been obtained, as a result of the vitarka and vicāra that have caused great joy (mahāprīti), the mind is distracted (vikṣipta) and loses concentration. That is why only vitarka and vicāra are mentioned here.

Question. – What are the differences between vitarka and vicāra?

Answer. – Vitarka is the coarseness of mind (cittaudārikatā) and vicāra is the subtlety of mind (cittasūkṣmatā).⁵⁵⁹ Vitarka is the first movement of the mind toward its objects (prathamam svālambane cittasyohanam); the vicāra that follows is an analysis (vibhaṅga), a judgment on the beautiful and the ugly (suvārṇadurvarṇa).

There are three kinds of coarse (audārika) vitarka: i) the mind of lust (kāma-vitarka), ii) the mind of malice (vyāpāda-vitarka), iii) the mind of harmfulness (vihiṃsā-vitarka).⁵⁶⁰

There are three kinds of good (kuśala) vitarka: i) the mind of renunciation of desire (naiṣkramya-vitarka), ii) the mind of non-malice (avyāpāda-vitarka), iii) the mind of non-harmfulness (avihiṃsā-vitarka).⁵⁶¹

There are three kinds of subtle (sūkṣma) vitarka: i) thinking of one’s relatives (jñātī-vitarka), ii) thinking of one’s country (janapada-vitarka), iii) thinking of not dying (amaraṇa-vitarka).⁵⁶²

⁵⁵⁸ Laṭṭhikopamasutta of Majjhima, I, p. 454 (Tchong a han, T 26, k. 50. p. 743b2-3): Idaṃ kho ahaṃ. Udāyi iñjitasmiṃ vadāmi. kiṃ ca tattha iñjitasmiṃ. yad eva tattha vitakkavicārā aniruddhā honti idaṃ tattha iñjitasmiṃ: “Wherever vitarka and vicāra have not been destroyed, there is agitation.”

Kośabhāṣya, p. 227, l. 14-15: Nanu ca trīṇi dhyānāni seṇjitāny uktāni bhagavatā. yad atra vitarkaṃ vicāraṃ atrāryā iñjitam ity āhuḥ: “Did not the Bhagavat say that the [first] three dhyānas are agitated? And the Āryas have said that [the first dhyāna] where there is vitarkita and vicārīta is agitated.”

⁵⁵⁹ Atthasālinī, p. 114: Vitakkanaṃ vā vitakko ūhanam ti vuttam hoti. svāyaṃ ārammane cittasa abhiniropanalakkaṇa, so hi āramaṇo cittaṃ āropeti.

⁵⁶¹ In regard to these two classes of vitarka, cf. Majjhima, I, p. 114 (Tchong a han, T 26, k. 25, p. 589a14-18) where the Buddha said: Yan nūnāhaṃ dvidhā katvā dvidhākarvā vitakke vihareyyan ti. So kho ahaṃ bhikkhave yo cāyaṃ kāma-vitakko yo ca byāpāda-vitakko yo ca vihiṃsā-vitakko imaṃ ekabhāgaṃ akāsiṃ, yo cāyaṃ nekkhammavitakko yo ca abyāpāda-vitakko yo ca avihiṃsā-vitakko imaṃ bhāgaṃ akāsiṃ.

This classification appears frequently in the canonical texts, e.g., Anguttara, I, p. 275; II, p. 76; III, p. 429

⁵⁵⁵ Cf. Daśottara, p. 58; Dīgha, III, p. 219. 274; Majjhima, III, p. 162; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 362-363:

Anguttara, IV, p. 300: Paṭisambhidā, I, p. 48; Vibhaṅga, p. 228; Kathāvatthu, p. 413; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 17, p. 538c3-6; k. 18, p. 543c20-21; Kośa, VIII, p. 183.

⁵⁵⁶ Two mental events already defined above, p. 1028-1029F. See also Kośa, I, p. 59; II, p. 173-175.

⁵⁵⁷ Cf. Kośa, II, p. 167.

Six kinds of vitarka prevent samādhi. The three kinds of good vitarka can open the gate to samādhi, but if the vitarka and vicāra are too prominent, they lead to the loss of samādhi. It is like the wind (vayu) that propels ships (nau); beyond certain limits, it destroys the ship.

These are the many distinctions to make in regard to vitarka and vicāra.

3. Dharmas with vitarka, etc.

Question. – The sūtras speak of three kinds of dharmas: i) with both vitarka and vicāra, ii) without vitarka and with vicāra, iii) with neither vitarka or vicāra.⁵⁶³

They also speak of the levels (bhūmi) with vitarka and with vicāra, without vitarka and with vicāra, with neither vitarka nor vicāra.⁵⁶⁴ Why speak here of the concentrations with vitarka, etc., only?

Answer. – Because here we note only what is most useful.

1) The dharmas with vitarka and with vicāra are dharmas associated with vitarka and vicāra and occur in kāmadhātu (desire realm), in the anāgāmya (preparatory concentration of the first dhyāna), and in the first dhyāna. These dharmas are good (kuśala), bad (akuśala) and indeterminate (avyākṛta).

2) The dharmas without vitarka but with vicāra are dharmas associated with vicāra alone and are found in the dhyānantara (type of the first dhyāna). These dharmas are good, bad or indeterminate.

3) The dharmas with neither vitarka or vicāra are deprived of vitarka and vicāra, namely: a. all matter (sarvaṃ rūpam), b. formations dissociated from the mind (cittaprayuktasaṃskāra), c. unconditioned dharmas (asaṃskṛtadharma).

4. Levels with vitarka, etc.

⁵⁶² These three vitarkas are taken from Saṃyutta, T 99, k. 16, p. 109c4-6. They appear in the Pāli sources also: ñātivitakka, janapadavitakka and amaravitakka (Mahānidesa, p. 501, l. 21-22; Vibhaṅga, p. 346, l. 18-20, but the last one is sometimes replaced by anavaññapaṭisaṃyutta vitakka ‘the worry of not being mistaken’ (Anguttara, I, p. 254). On this last word, see also Itivuttaka, p. 72; Vibhaṅga, p. 356.

⁵⁶³ Vibhaṅga, p. 434-435 gives the complete list.

⁵⁶⁴ The samādhis should not be confused with their respective levels. Whether it is a question of dhyāna or samāpatti, the samādhis are of two types: i) the samādhi proper, namely, the concentrations raising the ascetic momentarily to certain psychic planes of rūpa-or ārūpyadhātu; ii) the samādhi spheres of existence where the gods of rūpa- or ārūpyadhātu have taken birth for a determined lifespan. The first are called cause-samādhi (kāraṇasamādhi), the second are called existence-samādhi (upapattisamādhi) or effect-samādhi (kāryasamādhi). See Kośa, VIII, p. 128.

1) The levels (bhūmi) with both vitarka and vicāra are: a. kāmadhātu, b. anāgāmya (preparatory concentration of the first dhyāna), c. part of the brahmaloka (namely, the first two stages of the first dhyāna inhabited by the Brahmakāyikas and the Brahmāpurohitas respectively).

2) The level without vitarka but with vicāra is the dhyānantara (higher stage of the first dhyāna). Those who develop this level thoroughly are the Mahābrahmarajāḥ.

3) The levels with neither vitarka nor vicāra are the levels [inhabited by the following gods]:⁵⁶⁵ a. All the Ābhāsvaras, (namely, the Parittābhas, the Apramāṇābhas and the Ābhāsvaras occupying the three stages of the second dhyāna), b. all the Śubhakṛtsnas, (namely, the Parittaśubhas, the Apramāṇaśubhas and the Śubhakṛtsnas occupying the three stages of the third dhyāna), c. all the Brhatphalas, (namely the Anabhrakas, the Punyaprasavas and the Brhatphalas occupying the first three stages of the fourth dhyāna),⁵⁶⁶ d. all the formless gods: Ārūpya (belonging to the four dhyānas of ārūpyadhātu: ākāśānantyāyatana, vijñānānantyāyatana, ākīṃcanyāyatana and naivasamjñāsamjñā āyatana, also called bhavāgra).

II. THE THREE CONCENTRATIONS ACCORDING TO THE MAHĀYĀNA

Here [in the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra], it is a matter of much higher things, namely, the meditative stabilizations (samādhi):

What are these concentrations?

1) The concentrations of the arhats and pratyekabuddhas, from the three concentrations of emptiness, etc. (śūnyatāsamādhi) up to the diamond concentration (vajrasamādhi).⁵⁶⁷

2) The concentrations of the Buddhas, from the concentration contemplating the Buddhas of the ten directions (daśadigbuddhasamādhi) up to the concentration of the hero’s progress (śūramgamasamādhi), ⁵⁶⁵ The first three dhyānas each entail three stages or levels (bhūmi), the fourth entails eight. Each stage is inhabited by a class of gods. Here, out of concern for conciseness, the Trāitē designates the group of deities of a dhyāna by giving the name of their highest category.

⁵⁶⁶ The fourth dhyāna is inhabited by eight categories of gods: 1) Anabhraka, 2) Punyaprasava, 3) Brhatphala, the only ones mentioned here, plus five categories of Śuddhāvāsikas: 1) Avṛha, 2) Atapa, 3) Sudṛṣa, 4) Sudarśana, 5) Akaniṣṭha. See Kośa, III, p. 2.

⁵⁶⁷ The meditative stabilizations of emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānimitta) and wishlessness (apraṇihita), also called the three vimokṣamukhas, have been studied above, p. 1209-1232F. The vajrasamādhi or more correctly the vajropamasamādhi, is the path of abandonment (prahaṇamārga) by means of which the ascetic abandons the ninth category (weak-weak) of the kleśas that attach him to the highest sphere of existence – the fourth samāpatti or bhavāgra from the concentration eliminating all doubts (sarvasaṃśayasamucchedasamādhī) up to the king of concentrations (samādhirājasamādhī).⁵⁶⁸

These explanations briefly outline (saṃkṣiptena) the meaning of the three concentrations. It is finished!

Third section THE THREE FACULTIES OF UNDERSTANDING

PRELIMINARY NOTE

I. THE THREE FACULTIES OF UNDERSTANDING

This is a group of three dominant faculties (indriya), pure (anāsrava) and supramundane (lokottara), assuring complete understanding (ājñā) of the four truths at different stages. They are:

1. The faculty signifying “I will understand [the holy truths] which I do not yet understand” (anāññātamaṣyāmīndriya).
2. The faulty of understanding assuring the understanding of these truths (ājñendriya).
3. The faculty belonging to the saint who has understood the truths (ājñātāvīndriya).

These three faculties which form a homogeneous group have already been mentioned in the canonical sources: Dīgha, III, p. 219; Saṃyutta, V, p. 204; Itivuttaka, p. 53; Tch’ang a han, T 1, k. 8, p. 50b13; Tsa a han, T 99, k. 26, p. 182a12-13.

They are defined in the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 209 and the Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1442:

Anāññātamaṣyāmīndriyaṃ yac chaikṣāṇāṃ pudgalānāṃ anabhisamitānāṃ ... pudgalānāṃ arhatāṃ pratyekabuddhānāṃ bodhisattvānāṃ tathāgatānāṃ arhatāṃ samyaksambuddhānānāṃ śraddhendriyaṃ, etc., up to prajñendriyaṃ.

Translation. – The anāññātamaṣyāmīndriya is the faculty of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom in individuals who are still practicing and who have not yet understood [the truths]. The ājñendriya are the same faculties in individuals who are still practicing but who already possess the understanding of the truths. The ājñātāvīndriya are the same faculties in individuals who have nothing further to practice, namely the arhats, pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattvas and the Tathāgatas, saints, fully and completely enlightened ones.

⁵⁶⁸ These are the 108 or 120 samādhis belonging to the bodhisattvas and the Buddhas. A list accompanied by brief explanations of them is given by Pañcaviṃśati, p. 142-144, 198-203, and Śatasāhasrikā, p. 825-835, 1412-1426. See also Mahāvvyut., no. 505-623.

These are definitions analogous to those found in the treatises of the Vijñānavādin school: Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 156, l. 6-14; Abhidharmasamuccaya, rec. Pradhan, p. 75, l. 25-76, l. 4; Siddhi, p. 449-452.

II. THE TWENTY-TWO FACULTIES (INDRIYA)

In the Abhidharma treatises, Pāli as well as Sanskrit, the three faculties of understanding are included in a numbered list of twenty-two also described as faculties (indriya).

So far as I [Lamotte] know, this list of twenty-two indriyas does not appear in the Pāli Nikāyas or the Sanskrit Āgamas. However, according to the Kośa, I, p. 101 and the Abhidharmadīpa, p. 44, the Buddha taught it “in a sūtra”: Dvāviṃśatir indriyāṇi. katāni dvāviṃśatiḥ. cakṣurindriyaṃ... According to Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 142, p. 729a3; 730a7, the Buddha was speaking on that occasion to the brahmin Cheng-wen, i.e., to the brahmin Jātiśroṇa according to the Kośavyākhyā, p. 90, l. 25 and 28. We may, however, note that the Chinese characters Cheng-wen are often known in Pāli under the name of Jāṇussoṇī (cf. Akanuma, p. 240).

The list of twenty-two indriyas, cited here in the order most often adopted, appear in all the Abhidharmas which devote long explanations to them: Paṭisambhidā of the Khuddakanikāya, I, p. 7, l. 23-24; Vibhaṅga, p. 122; Kathāvatthu, p. 13; Visuddhimagga, p. 417; Prakaraṇapāda, T 1542, k. 15, p. 753c9; Jñānaprasthāna, T 1544, k. 14, p. 991b23-26; Vibhāṣā, T 1645, k. 152, p. 728c7-10; Abhidharmāmṛta, T 1553, k. 1, p. 871b28-c1 (rec. Sastri, p. 74); Satyasiddhiśāstra, T 1646, k. 1, p. 251b2-18; Kośa, p. 101; Kośavyākhyā, p. 90-91Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 8, p. 377a14-17; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 44.

These twenty-two indriyas are constituted by the organs, the sensations or the faculties as follows:

1. sight (cakṣus), 2. hearing (śrotra), 3. smell (ghrāṇa), 4. taste (jihvā), 5. touch (kāya), 6. mind (manas), 7. male organ (puruṣendriya), 8. female organ (strīndriya), 9. vital organ (jīvitendriya), 10. sensation of pleasure (sukha), 11. sensation of displeasure (duḥkha), 12. sensation of satisfaction (saumanasya), 13. sensation of dissatisfaction (daurmanasya), 14. sensation of indifference (upekṣā), 15. faculty of faith (śraddhā), 16. faculty of energy (vīrya), 17. faculty of mindfulness (smṛti), 18. faculty of concentration (samādhi), 19. faculty of wisdom (prajñā), 20-22, the three faculties of understanding the truths defined above.

Among so many others, why are these twenty-two dharmas the only ones to be indriyas? The word indriya, derived from the root id or ind, is synonymous with great power (paramaiśvarya), with control (ādhipatyā). The twenty-two dharmas in question have the characteristic of being dominant in regard to the living being (satva) in that which concerns: 1. his primary constitution (mauladravya), 2. his distinctiveness (vikalpa), 3. his duration (sthiti), 4. his moral defilement (saṃkleśa), 5. his purification (vyavadāna). Indeed:

1. The point of support of the mind (cittāśraya) is made up of the six organs of consciousness, from the organ of sight to the mental organ (indriyas no. 1-6).
2. This point of support is distinguished by the two sexual organs (indriyas no. 7-8).
3. It lasts for a given time due to the vital organ (indriya no. 8).

4. It is defiled as a result of the five sensations (indriyas no. 10-14).

5. Its purification is prepared by the five moral faculties, faith, etc. (indriyas no. 15-19).

6. This purification is definitively assured by the three faculties of understanding (indriyas no. 20-22).

This nature of dominant-faculty is absent in other dharmas. This is why the indriyas are twenty-two in number, no more and no less.

All of this is explained in Kośa, II, p. 110-111.

Conforming to its custom, the Traité will explain in turn the viewpoint of the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma and the view-point of the Mahāyāna concerning the three faculties of understanding, the only ones that are absolutely pure (anāsrava) and supramundane (lokottara). The difference between the two systems resides in the fact that, for the Abhidharma, understanding concerns the four noble Truths (suḥkha, samudaya, nirodha, mārga), whereas for the Mahāyāna, it concerns the true nature of all dharmas.

Sūtra (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 20, l. 11-12; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 63, l. 4-6). – [The bodhisattva-mahāsattva must completely fulfill] three faculties (triṇḍriyāṇi):

1) the faculty signifying: I will understand that which I do not understand (anājñātāmājñāsyāmindriya)

2) the faculty of understanding (ājñendriya)

3) the faculty of that which has been understood (ājñātāvindriya).

1. The Three Faculties of Understanding According to the Abhidharma

A. Definition

1. The faculty signifying “I will understand that which I do not understand” (anājñātāmājñāsyāmindriya) is a group of nine pure faculties (navānāsravendriyasāmagrī).

In the individual who follows the truth as a result of faith (śraddhānusārin) or who follows the truth as a result of scripture (dharmānusārin)⁵⁶⁹ and who is on the Path of seeing the truths (satyadarśanamārga), this group is called anājñātāmājñāsyāmindriya and includes [the following nine indriyas]:

1-5) the five faculties, namely, faculty of faith (śraddhendriya), [faculty of energy (vīryendriya), faculty of mindfulness (smṛtindriya), faculty of concentration (saṃādhindriya) and faculty of wisdom (prajñendriya)].

6) the sensation of satisfaction (saumansayendriya).

7) the sensation of pleasure (sukhendriya).

8) the sensation of indifference (upekṣendriya).

⁵⁶⁹ These terms have been defined above, p. 1390F.

9) the mental organ (manasindriya).⁵⁷⁰

2. In the person liberated by faith (śraddhādhimukta) or in the view-attainer (drṣṭiprāpta)⁵⁷¹ who is on the path of meditation (bhāvanāmārga), this [group] of nine indriyas changes its name and is called faculty of understanding (ājñendriya). [234c]

3. In the path of those of no more learning (aśaikṣamārga), this [group] of nine indriyas is called the faculty of those who have understood (ājñātāvindriya).

B. Excellence of the three faculties of understanding

Question. – Of all the twenty-two indriyas, why does [the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra] choose these three indriyas [of understanding]?

Answer. –We call indriya [from the root ind] that which has a penetrating and obvious nature of dominance (ādhipatyā).⁵⁷² But this characteristic of dominance is not completely perfected (paripūrṇa) in the other nineteen indriyas. This is why [the Prajñāpāramitā] does not mention them here. On the other hand, the three indriyas [of understanding] are sharp (tīkṣṇa) and lead directly to nirvāṇa.⁵⁷³ Dominant (adhipati) among all the conditioned dharmas (saṃskṛtadharma), they hold sovereignty (ādhipatyā, aśvarya) and surpass all the other indriyas.

⁵⁷⁰ Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 42: Manasukhasaumanasyopekṣāḥ śraddhādini ca pañca tāni navendriyāṇi triṣu mārgeṣu triṇḍriyāṇy apy ucyante: darśanamārge anājñātāmājñāsyāmindriyaṃ, bhāvanāmārge ajñendriyam, aśaikṣamārge ajñātāvindriyam: “In the three paths, these nine indriyas, the mental organ, the sensations of pleasure, satisfaction and indifference and the five faculties, faith, etc., are also called the three faculties [of understanding]: in the path of seeing, they constitute the anājñātāmājñāsyāmindriya; in the path of meditation, the ājñendriya; in the path of the aśaikṣas, the ajñātāvindriya.”

But it should be noted that the three indriyas of understanding made up in theory of these nine indriyas actually consist of seven because the sensations of pleasure, satisfaction and indifference never co-exist: the sensation of satisfaction is present in the first two dhyānas; the sensation of pleasure, in the third dhyāna; the sensation of indifference in the anāgāmya, the dhyānantara, the fourth dhyāna and the first three ārūpyasamāpattis.

⁵⁷¹ Terms defined above, p. 1390F.

⁵⁷² Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 38: Kaḥ punar indriyārthaḥ. idi paramaiśvārye. tasya indantīti indriyāni. atha ādhipatyārtha. See also Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 142, p.730c6-10; Abhidharmamūlā, rec. Sastri, p. 75, l. 3; Visuddhimagga, p. 417-418.

⁵⁷³ The three faculties of understanding are dominant as to the ascending acquisitions (uttarottarasamprāpti), to nirvāṇa, etc.: cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 40; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 49, l. 1-2.

Furthermore, [among the other nineteen indriyas], ten are exclusively impure (sāsrava) and therefore are of no benefit.⁵⁷⁴ [These are: 1) the eye organ (cakusurindriya), 2) the ear organ (śrotrendriya), 3) the nose organ (ghrānendriya), 4) the tongue organ (jihvendriya), 5) the body organ (puruṣendriya), 6) the female organ (strīndriya), 7) the male organ (puruṣendriya), 8) the vital organ (jīvīvendriya), 9) the sensation of displeasure (duḥkhendriya), 10) the sensation of dissatisfaction (daurmansayendriya)].

[Further, among the other nineteen indriyas], nine are morally indeterminate (aniyata), sometimes impure (sāsrava) and sometimes pure (anāsrava). [These are: 1) the mental organ (manaindriya), 2) the sensation of pleasure (sukhendriya), 3) the sensation of satisfaction (saumanasyendriya), 4) the sensation of indifference (upekṣendriya), 5) the faculty of faith (śraddhendriya), 6) the faculty of energy (vīryendriya), 7) the faculty of mindfulness (smṛtīndriya), 8) the faculty of concentration (samādhīndriya), 9) the faculty of wisdom (prajñendriya).]

[Since, of these other nineteen indriyas, some are always impure and others are sometimes impure and sometimes pure], the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra is careful not to say that the bodhisattva should fulfill them completely.

Question. – But the ten concepts (daśasaṃjñā) examined above (p.1433F) were also sometimes impure and sometimes pure. Why did the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra say there that the bodhisattva should fulfill them completely?

Answer. – Because these ten concepts are auxiliaries to the Path and the pursuit of nirvāṇa. But here the ten faculties, faith, etc., (śraddhenndriya), although good (kuśala), do not seek nirvāṇa exclusively.⁵⁷⁵

As is said in the Abhidharma: “Who is endowed with the five faculties, faith, etc. (śraddhādīndriyasamanvāgata)? The person who has not cut the roots of good (samaucchinnaakuśalamūla).”⁵⁷⁶

Furthermore, when these five faculties become clear and pure (anāsrava), they are included in the three faculties [of understanding].

In the three faculties of understanding, there is inevitably the mental organ (manaindriya), and of the three sensations (vedanā) – [pleasure (sukha), satisfaction (saumanasya) and indifference (upekṣā) – there is one ⁵⁷⁴ On the division of the twenty-two indriyas into three moral categories, see Kośabhāṣya, p. 42, commenting on the kārikā, II, 8: Amalaṃ trayam, rūpīni jīvitaṃ duḥkhe sāsravāṇi, dvīdhā nava: “The three faculties of understanding are pure (amala = anāsrava); the seven material organs, the vital organ, the two sensations (pleasure and dissatisfaction) are impure; the remaining nine organs are of two types, sometimes impure, sometimes pure).

⁵⁷⁵ Actually, although they are always good (kuśala), the ten faculties, faith, etc., are sometimes impure and sometimes pure. They are perfected in the ārya to the extent that the latter conquers the various fruits of the religious life, but they are perfectly pure only in the arhat. On this subject, see Ekabhiññasutta in Saṃyutta, V, p. 204-205, the Sanskrit recension of which is in Kośavyākhyā, p. 103, l. 1-9.

⁵⁷⁶ As a result, the person who retains some roots of good, absence of desire (alobha), absence of hatred (adveṣa) and absence of error (amoha), has so far not entered onto the Path of nirvāṇa.

inevitably.⁵⁷⁷ This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra speaks here only of the three faculties [of understanding].

Finally, among the twenty-two indriyas, there are good ones (kuśala), bad ones (akuśala) and indeterminate ones (avyākṛta).⁵⁷⁸ This is why the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra does not say that all of them should be fulfilled perfectly.

C. Levels, objects, associates and causality of the three faculties

1) The three faculties [of understanding] are contained (saṃgrhita) in the aggregate of feeling (vedanāskandha), the aggregate of volition (saṃskāraskandha) and the aggregate of consciousness (vijñānaskandha).

2) The anājñātāmājñāsyāmīndriya occurs in six levels (bhūmi), [namely, the four dhyānas, the anāgāmya and the dhyānantara]. – The ājñātāvīndriya occurs in nine levels [adding the first three ārūpyasamāpattis to the preceding levels].⁵⁷⁹

3) The three faculties [of understanding] take as object (ālambante) the four noble Truths (catuḥsatya).

4) The three faculties [of understanding] are associated (saṃprayukta) with six concepts: i) the concept of impermanence (anityasaṃjñā), ii) the concept of suffering (duḥkhasaṃjñā), iii) the concept of non-self (anātmasaṃjñā), iv) the concept of abandonment (prahāṇasaṃjñā), v) the concept of detachment (virāgasamjñā), vi) the concept of cessation (nīrodhasamjñā).

5) The anājñātāmājñāsyāmīndriya is cause (hetu) of three indriyas: [itself and the two following ones].⁵⁸⁰

The ājñendriya is cause of two indriyas, [itself and the following one].

The ājñātāvīndriya is cause of ājñātāvīndriya only.

⁵⁷⁷ See above, p. 1495F, note.

⁵⁷⁸ Eight indriyas, the five faculties, faith, etc., and the three faculties of understanding are alone good (kuśala). Dissatisfaction (daurmanasya) is good or bad. The mental organ (manaindriya) and four sensations (sukha, duḥkha, saumanasya and upekṣa) are good (kuśala), bad (akuśala) or indeterminate (avyākṛta). The five material organs, sight, etc., the vital organ and the sexual organs are indeterminate (avyākṛta): cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 46; Abhidharmāmṛta, rec. Sastri, p. 75, l. 20-24; Vibhaṅga, p. 125 (differs).

⁵⁷⁹ Cf. Abhidharmadīpa, p. 53: Anājñātāmājñāsyāmīndriyaṃ ṣaṭsu bhūmiṣu: caturṣu dhyāneṣu anāgāmye dhyānāntarikāyāṃ ca... Ājñendriyam ājñātāvīndriyaṃ ca navasu bhūmiṣu: āsv eva ṣaṭsu triṣu cādyāsv ārūpyabhūmiṣu.

⁵⁸⁰ Here, by cause we should understand ‘dominant condition’ (adhipatipratyaya). The three faculties of understanding are dominant with regard to their own ascending acquisitions (uttarottarasamprāpti) and dominant among them in the sense that the first is dominant in regard to acquisition of the second, the second in regard to acquisition of the third, and the third in regard to acquisition of nirvāṇa: cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 40, l. 3-4.

6) The anājñātāmāsyāmīndriya in its turn produces two indriyas.

The ājñendriya produces in its turn either an impure (sāsrava) indriya or the ājñendriya or the ājñātāvīndriya.

The ājñātāvīndriya produces either an impure indriya or the ājñātāvīndriya.

This is fully explained in detail in the Abhidharma.

2. The Three Faculties of Understanding According to the Mahāyāna

A. In the Darśanamārga

The faculty signifying “I will understand that which I do not understand” (anājñātāmājñāsyāmīndriya) concerns the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. Wishing to understand that which he has not yet understood, [the yogin] produces the five faculties, faith, etc. (śraddhādīndriya) and by the power of these five faculties, he is able to discover the true nature of dharmas.

Thus, when a person enters the womb (garbha), he acquires two organs: i) the bodily organ (kāyendriya) and ii) the vital organ (jīvitendriya). At that time, he is like a piece of shapeless meat and his organs are unable to discern anything. But when these five organs, [eye, ear, nose, tongue and body] are completed (sampanna), he will be able to cognize the five objects [color, sound, smell, taste and touch].

It is the same for the bodhisattva. From his first production of the Bodhi mind (prathamacittotpāda) he wants to become Buddha but he has not yet perfected (na paripūrayati) the five moral faculties [faith, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom]. Although he has the aspiration (praṇidhāna) for it and wants to know the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas, he has not yet come to the cognition of it. But when the bodhisattva produces these five faculties, faith, etc., he will be able to cognize the true nature of dharmas.

It is like the eye (caṅṣus). What we call ‘eye’ is an assemblage of the four great elements (mahābhūta) and a [subtle] matter derived from the four great [235a] elements (mahābhautikarūpa).⁵⁸¹ But at the beginning, although he already possesses the four great elements, the [subtle] matter derived from these four great elements has not yet crystallized. This is why this eye is not yet [a real] visual organ (caṅṣurīndriya).

Similarly, every person who has not broken the roots of good (asammucchinnaśālamūla) possesses faith (śraddhā), but as the latter is not clear, it is not yet [a real] faculty of faith (śraddhendriya).⁵⁸²

⁵⁸¹ On the distinction between the four great elements (mahābhūta) and the subtle matter derived from the four great elements (upādāya rūpa, bhautika, rūpaprāsāda), see Kośa, I, p. 22, 63-66.

⁵⁸² Here the Traité will repeat, point by point but interpreting them from the Mahāyāna perspective, the nine indriyas taking place in the constitution of the three faculties of understanding above, (p. 1496F).

1) If the bodhisattva acquires the five moral faculties, faith, etc. (śraddhendriya), he will then be able to believe in the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. This nature is unborn (anutpanna) and unceasing (aniruddha), neither defiled (asaṃkliṣṭa) nor purified (avyavadāta), neither existent nor non-existent (naivasan nāsat), neither accepted (anupātta) nor rejected (aparītyakta), always at peace (śānta), perfectly pure, like space (ākāśasama), ineffable (anirdeśya), inexpressible (anabhilāpya); it is the cessation of all ways of speech (sarvavādamārgagoccheda), it surpasses the realm of all the minds and mental events (sarvacittacaitasikadharma-gocarasamatikrānta); it is like nirvāṇa; it is the Dharma of the Buddhas.⁵⁸³

2) Using the power of the faculty of faith (śraddhendriya), the bodhisattva acquires the faculty of energy (vīryendriya); he progresses energetically without regressing or straying.

3) By the power of the faculty of mindfulness (smṛtīndriya), he prevents bad dharmas from entering and gathers all the good dharmas.

4) By the power of the faculty of concentration (saṃādīndriya), when his mind is distracted (vikṣipya) by the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa), he concentrates it on the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa).

5) By the power of the faculty of wisdom (prajñendriya), he obtains a greater or lesser participation in the wisdom of the Buddhas, the taste (rasa) of which cannot be destroyed.

6-9) The support of these five faculties (pañcendriyāśraya), his mental faculty (manāindriya) is inevitably joined with the sensations (vedanā): sensation of satisfaction (saumansaya), pleasure (sukha) or indifference (upekṣā).

Being supported by these [nine] indriyas, the bodhisattva will enter into the assurance of the ultimate attainment of enlightenment of the bodhisattva (bodhisatvaniyāma).⁵⁸⁴ But as long as he has not obtained ⁵⁸³ Compare the definitions of ‘the true nature of all dharmas’ in Pañcavimsati, T 223, k. 2, p. 231b13-14; k. 3, p. 234c12; k. 4, p. 244a1-2; k. 6, p. 257b13-14; k. 23, p. 392a19-24; k. 27, p. 416c8-11.

⁵⁸⁴ In other words, the bodhisattva will enter into the eighth bodhisattva bhūmi, the Acalā, the ‘Unshakeable One’. According to most sources, the Acalā marks an important turning point in the bodhisattva’s career:

1) It is at this point that he enters into definitive possession (pratilābha, pratilambha, pratilambhatā) of the conviction or the certainty that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharma-kṣānti): Sūtrālamkāra, p. 122, l. 2; 131, l. 17; Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 105, l. 11; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 350, l. 27; 351, l. 13-14.

3) From that time on, the Bodhisattva’s destiny is assured (niyāma: see below, k. 27, p. 262a18-b2). He is determined as to his future buddhahood: niyato bhavaty anuttarāyāṃ samyaksaṃbodhau (Sūtrālamkāra, p. 83, l. 24); ṛtīyanīyatipātapatito bhavati (Bodh. bhūmi, p. 367, l. 12).

the fruit resulting from the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣānti), it is not yet a matter of the anāññātamāññāsyāmīndriya, the faculty signifying “I will understand that which I do not yet understand”.

B. In the bhāvanāmārga

Here the Bodhisattva cognizes the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharmas and, because he understands it well, it is a matter of the ājñendriya, the faculty of understanding.

From the time when he has obtained the fruit attached to the conviction that dharmas do not arise (anutpattikadharmakṣāntiphala), when he is installed in the irreversible level (avaivartikabhūmi), when he has received the prophecy (vyākaraṇa), up to the time when he completes the ten levels (daśabhūmi), when he is seated on the seat of enlightenment (bodhimaṇḍa) and when he obtains the diamond concentration (vajrasamādhi), all of this is included in the interval called ājñendriya.⁵⁸⁵

C. In the Aśaikṣamārga

Finally, the bodhisattva cuts through all the habitual propensities (sarvakleśavāsanā) and obtains supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksaṃbodhi). Because he has understood and completely fulfilled everything to be known (sarvajñeyadharmā), this is called ājñātāvīndriya ‘faculty of that which has been understood’.

In other words, he is a non-regressing (avaivartika) bodhisattva having non-regressing conviction (avaivartikakṣāntipratilabdha: Saddharmapuṇḍ., p. 259, l. 13). As well, the eighth bhūmi is also called Niyatabhūmi ‘Determined Level’ (Bodh. bhūmi, p. 367, l. 11); Avivartyabhūmi, avinivartanīyabhūmi, avaivartikabhūmi “Level without regression’ (Daśabhūmika, p. 71, l. 12; Sūtrālamkāra, p. 176, l. 22; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 235, l. 18). It marks the beginning of the non-reversible career (abandhyacaryā) which will be followed in the last three bhumis (Mahāvastu, I, p. 1, l. 3; 63, l. 13-14; Bodh. Bhūmi, p. 290, l. 21).

4) Finally and in particular in the eighth bhūmi, the Bodhisattva’s activity is practiced spontaneously, without action (abhisamkāra) or mental changing (ābhoga), for it is unaffected by objects or notions: this is why it is called anabhisamkārahogavīhāra or anābhoganīrnimittavīhāra: Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 105, l. 18-21; Sūtrālamkāra, p. 178, l. 3; Bodh. Bhūmi, p. 367, l. 11; Saṃgraha, p. 202.

⁵⁸⁵ The functioning of the ājñendriya extends from the eighth to the tenth bhūmi. The latter is called Dharmamegha ‘Cloud of Dharma’ (Saṃgraha, p. 202-203), Paramavīhāra ‘Ultimate abode’ (Bodh. bhūmi, p. 367, l. 13), Sarvajñānābhīṣekabhūmi ‘Level of consecration into omniscience’ (Daśabhūmika, p. 82, l. 8) or Abhiṣekāvasthā ‘State of consecration’ (Madhyāntavibhāga, p. 190, l. 24). According to the Pañcaviṃśati, p. 225, l. 8 and Āloka, p. 104, l. 8-9: Bodhisattvo daśamyām sthitaḥ saṃs Tathāgataeveti vaktavyo na tu Samyaksaṃbuddhaḥ: “The Bodhisattva who is on the tenth level should be called simply tathāgata, but not yet the completely and fully Enlightened One.

CHAPTER XXXIX: THE TEN POWERS OF THE BUDDHA ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA

PRELIMINARY NOTE

In chapter XVII to chapter XXX, the six perfections (pāramitā) to be fulfilled completely (paripūrayitavya) by the bodhisattva were discussed. They constitute the essentials of his career provided that he fulfills them by ‘the method of non-dwelling’ (asthānayogena), without grasping the characteristics (na nimittodgrahaṇa).

Chapters XXXI to XXXVIII dealt with the Path of nirvāṇa, its auxiliaries and its aids. The dharmas of the Path belong to adepts of both Vehicles but under different headings. The śrāvakas aspire to nirvāṇa, whereas the bodhisattvas delay their nirvāṇa in order to dedicate themselves to the welfare and happiness of all beings. The result is that the dharmas of the Path ‘must be realized’ (sākṣātkartavya) by the śrāvakas but merely completely ‘fulfilled’ (paripūrayitavya) or ‘cultivated’ (bhāvitavya) by the bodhisattvas. The intention of the bodhisattva is to convert beings and introduce them into the Greater Vehicle, the Vehicle of the Buddhas. They consider the dharmas of the Path as inefficacious or even non-existent (anupalabdha) and propose a new method of liberation. But how can they divert the śrāvakas from the dharmas of the Path if they have not themselves cultivated them? Someone will certainly say to them: “You criticize the old method because you are unable to use it!” It is, therefore, important for the bodhisattvas to be aware of both the theory and practice of things of the Path in order that they can discuss them in a valid manner.

In chapter XXXIX to the beginning of chapter XLII, it will be a matter not only of the perfections of the bodhisattva or the dharmas of the Path but also of the great attributes of the Buddhas. Since the bodhisattva does not yet possess them, it is not a matter of his completely fulfilling them or developing them; he can simply formulate the ‘desire to know them’ (jñātukāma), the ‘desire to attain them’ (prāptukāma).

In the present chapter, the Traité limits itself to presenting the Abhidharmic theories concerning the ten powers of the Buddha; it is in the next chapter that it will present the Mahāyāna point of view.

Translation of the Sanskrit. – These, O monks, are the ten powers of the Tathāgata, endowed with which the holy One, the fully and completely enlightened One who claims the noble place, the place of the bull, turns the wheel of Brahmā and utters the true Lion's Roar in the assembly. What are these ten?

1. First, the Tathāgata cognizes, in accordance with reality, the possible as possible and the impossible as impossible.

That the Tathāgata cognizes, in accordance with reality, the possible as possible and the impossible as impossible is the first power of the Buddha, endowed with which, the Tathāgata, the holy One, the fully and completely enlightened One who claims the noble place, the place of the bull, turns the wheel of Brahmā and utters the true Lion's Roar in the assembly.

2. Furthermore, the Tathāgata cognizes, in accordance with reality, actions of the past, future and present according to their place, their cause, their object and their retribution. That the Tathāgata...

3. Furthermore, the Tathāgata cognizes, in accordance with reality, the defilement, the purification, the types and the purity of the trances, liberations, concentrations and absorptions. That the Tathāgata...

4. Furthermore, the Tathāgata cognizes, in accordance with reality, the degree of the moral faculties of other beings, other individuals. That the Tathāgata...

5. Furthermore, the Tathāgata cognizes, in accordance with reality, the diverse aspirations of other beings, other individuals. That the Tathāgata...

6. Furthermore, the Tathāgata cognizes, in accordance with reality, the world with its various acquired dispositions, with its many acquired dispositions. That the Tathāgata...

7. Furthermore, the Tathāgata cognizes, in accordance with reality, the route that leads to the various destinies. That the Tathāgata...

8. Furthermore, the Tathāgata remembers many previous abodes, for example, one lifetime, two, three, four, five, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty lifetimes, one hundred lifetimes, one thousand lifetimes, one million lifetimes, one hundred million lifetimes, several hundred lifetimes, several thousand lifetimes, several hundreds of thousands of lifetimes, one period of disappearance, one period of creation, one period of disappearance-creation, several periods of disappearance, several periods of creation, several periods of disappearance-creation, several periods of creation, several periods of disappearance-creation. He thinks: "I had such and such a name, such and such a family, such and such a clan, such and such food among beings at that time; I experienced such and such happiness and such and such pain. I had such and such longevity, such and such a duration, such and such a life-span. When I left that place, I was reborn in that other place. And from that other place I was born here." Thus the Tathāgata remembers his many previous abodes with their aspects, their origins and their details. That the Tathāgata...

9. Furthermore, the Tathāgata, with his divine eye, purified, surpassing that of men, sees beings dying and being born and recognizes them in reality as beautiful, ugly, lowly or excellent, going towards a good or a bad destiny, according to the results of their actions. He thinks: "These beings laden with bodily misdeeds, laden with misdeeds of speech and mind, slandering the saints, having false views, acting wrongly out of their wrong views, for this cause and this reason, at the dissolution of the body after death are born in a miserable state, in a bad destiny, in the hells. On the other hand, these beings endowed with good bodily actions, endowed with good actions of speech and mind, not slandering the saints, having right views, acting well due to their right views, for this cause and this reason, at the dissolution of the body after death are born in a good destiny, the heavens, among the gods." That the Tathāgata...

10. Furthermore, the Tathāgata, by the cessation of the impurities, having realized in the present existence by means of his own wisdom the pure liberation of mind and the pure liberation by wisdom, takes his stand and knows: "Birth is exhausted by me, the religious life has been practiced, that which had to be accomplished has been accomplished, I see no further existence for myself." That the Tathāgata...

Sūtra. – Furthermore, O Śāriputra, the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to know completely the ten powers of the Buddha, the four fearlessnesses, the four infallible knowledges, the eighteen special attributes, great loving-kindness and great compassion, must exert himself in the Perfection of Wisdom (punar aparaṃ Śāriputra bodhisattvena mahāsattvenā daśa tathāgabalāni catvāri vaiśāradyāni catasraḥ pratisaṃvido 'ṣṭadaśāveṇikān buddhadharmān mahāmaitrīṃ mahākaruṇāṃ parijñātukāmena prajñāpāramitāyaṃ śikṣitavyam).

First Section GENERAL QUESTIONS

I. ATTRIBUTES OF THE ŚRĀVAKA AND ATTRIBUTES OF THE BUDDHA

[235b] Question. – The ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), etc., are the peerless attributes reserved for the Buddhas. They should therefore be treated first. Why does [the Prajñāpāramitā] speak first of the nine concepts (navasaṃjñā) [in chapter XXXV], the eight recollections (aṣṭānusmṛtayah) [in chapter XXXVI], etc.?

Answer. – The Prajñāpāramitā first spoke [in chapters XVII to XXX] of the six perfections (pāramitā) to be practiced by the bodhisattva. The thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment (saptatīrṃśad bodhipāṅkṣikadharmāḥ) and the other qualities including the three pure faculties (anāsravendriya) [which were the object of chapters XXXI to XXXVIII] are the qualities of the śrāvaka. By practicing the six perfections, the bodhisattva has acquired power (bala): he then wants to bypass the levels (bhūmi) of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, convert people engaged in [the Vehicles] of the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha and introduce them into the Vehicle of the Buddhas. This is why he criticizes these dharmas of the Lesser Vehicle (hīnayāna) of abandoning all beings and being of no benefit.

The śrāvakas say to the bodhisattva: “You are a worldly person (prthagjana) who has not yet destroyed the impurities (akṣiṇāsrava) and, because you are unable to practice these qualities, you criticize them rashly.” That is why [here, in the Prajñāpāramitā], the Buddha said: “The thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment (bodhipāṅkṣikadharmā) and the other qualities of the śrāvakas should be completely fulfilled by the bodhisattva, but only by basing himself on their non-existence (anupalabdhitām upādāya).”⁵⁸⁶

Although the bodhisattva practices these qualities, he considers them to be non-existent (anupalabdha): it is for beings devoted to bad practices (duṣcarita) that the bodhisattva practices these good practices of the śrāvaka and never rejects these qualities, non-existent and empty though they are. Neither does he hasten to realize his own nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasākṣātkāra).

If the bodhisattva did not understand, did not practice, this Lesser Vehicle and limited himself to criticizing it, who would want to believe him? If the Buddha Śākyamuni had not previously carried out the practices of austerity (duṣkaracaryā) for six years and had limited himself to criticizing them by saying that they were not the Path, nobody would have believed him. This is why he exerted himself in practices of austerity more than anyone else; then, when he had realized the Bodhi of the Buddhas, he criticized this path of austerities and everyone believed him.⁵⁸⁷ This is why, following the six perfections, the bodhisattva practices the qualities of the śrāvaka.

Furthermore, these [qualities of the śrāvaka] are not just śrāvaka qualities. The bodhisattva who practices them in conjunction with the Dharma, without abandoning the mind of beings, ‘fulfills completely’ (paripūrṇayati) all the Buddha qualities. As he uses the knowledge of the emptiness of non-existence (anupalambhaśūnyatā)⁵⁸⁸ [for this purpose], these śrāvaka qualities are also called bodhisattva qualities.

⁵⁸⁷ Described, among other sources, in the Duṣkaracaryāparivarta of the Lalitavistara, p. 243-260. The comments made by A. Foucher, La Vie du Bouddha, p. 134, on the mortifications of Śākyamuni connect up rather oddly with the considerations developed here by the Traité. The Buddha had to submit freely to the excesses of asceticism in order to be able, in the Sermon at Benares, to criticize from an awareness of the cause:

“There are two extremes which the person who is leading a spiritual life should avoid. The one is a life of pleasure, devoted to pleasures and enjoyment (kāmeṣu kāmāsukhallikānuyoga): it is base, ignoble, contrary to the spirit, unworthy, vain. The other is a life of mortification (ātmaklamathānuyoga): this is sad, unworthy, vain...The flawless one has found the middle way (madhyamā partipad)...” (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 10; Catuspariśad, p. 140; Mahāvastu, III, p. 331; Lalitavistara, p. 416).

⁵⁸⁸ Knowledge about the fifteenth of the eighteen śūnyatās postulated by the Prajñāpāramitā: Pañcaviṃśati, p. 197, l. 15; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1473, l. 1-2. This is the fact that dharmas past, future and present do not exist (nopalabhyante). The translation ‘unascertainable emptiness’ is guilty of timidity.

Question. – If the bodhisattva completely fulfills the thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment (bodhipākṣikadharma), why does he not enter into the predestination of the śrāvakas (śrāvakanīyāma)?⁵⁸⁹

Answer. – When we say that he ‘fulfills completely’ (paripūrayati), we mean that he sees them and knows them completely but without taking on their realization (sākṣātkāraṃ nopagrhnāti). By seeing and knowing them clearly, he ‘fulfills them completely’.

Let us take, for example, this saying of the Buddha:

Everyone fears the stick and the rod.

There is no one who does not protect his own life.

Inspired by the indulgence one has for oneself,

One does not inflict the stick on anyone.⁵⁹⁰

Although the Buddha says that everyone fears the stick and the rod, [this does not hold true] for beings of the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu) who have no body. Neither does it hold true for the realm of subtle form (rūpadhātu) where, there are bodies but no whip or rod. In the desire realm (kāmadhātu), it is not valid for the Buddhas, the noble cakravartin kings, the Yāma gods and other higher deities who have nothing to fear from a beating. It is in reference to those [235c] who do have reasons to fear the rod that the Buddha said “Everyone fears being beaten by the rod.”

It is the same here when we speak of ‘fulfilling completely’ [the śrāvaka qualities]: ‘fulfilling them completely’ is not to seek to realize them (sākṣātkr) or to be attached to them.

Furthermore, as has been said above, the bodhisattva does not abandon beings and [although he fulfills completely the śrāvaka qualities], it is by joining them with the knowledge bearing upon the emptiness of non-existence (anupalambhaśūnyatā).⁵⁹¹ This is why he does not fall into the class of the śrāvakas.

⁵⁸⁹ The śrāvakanīyāma is the assurance of the śrāvaka as to his future attainment of nirvāṇa, The śrāvaka is called samyaktvanīyāvakrānta (samyaktva = nirvāṇa); as soon as he has this guarantee, he is an ārya. In a similar way, bodhisattvanīyāma is the certainty for the bodhisattva of some day reaching supreme perfect enlightenment which makes him a Buddha. See Kośa, VI, p. 180-182 and notes.

⁵⁹⁰ Udānavarga, V, v, 19 (p. 144):

*Sarve daṇḍasya bibhṣanti, saveṣāṃ jīvitaṃ prīyam /
ātānaṃ upamāṃ kṛtvā, naiva hanyān na ghātayet //*

“Everyone fears the rod; life is precious to everyone. By taking oneself as the point of comparison, one avoids killing or making another kill.”

Cf. Dhammapada, v. 130:

*Sabbe tasanti daṇḍassa, sabbesaṃ jīvitaṃ piyaṃ /
attānaṃ upamaṃ katvā, na hanyya na gātaye //*

The same stanza will be cited later, k. 30, p. 278b23-24.

⁵⁹¹ See above, p. 153F, n.

II. ATTRIBUTES TO BE FULFILLED AND ATTRIBUTES TO BE COGNIZED

From the six perfections up to the three pure faculties [i.e., from chapter XVII to chapter XXXVIII], the Prajñāpāramitā spoke only [of the qualities] ‘to be completed fully’ (paripūrayitavya); why will it speak from now on of qualities which the bodhisattva is ‘desirous of obtaining’ (prāptukāma) or ‘desirous of knowing’ (jñātukāma) and in view of which ‘he must practice the perfection of wisdom’ (prajñāpāramitāyāṃ śikṣitavyam)?

Answer. – The śrāvaka qualities [that are the object of chapters XXXI to XXXVIII] are measured and limited and this is why Prajñāpāramitā spoke of the qualities ‘to be completely fulfilled’ (paripūrayitva). But from now on in what follows, it will be a matter of profound (gambhīra) and immeasurable (apramāṇa) Buddha qualities which the bodhisattva has not yet attained; this is why the Prajñāpāramitā will speak of qualities that the bodhisattva is ‘desirous of attaining’ (prāptukāma) or ‘desirous of knowing’ (jñātukāma), and in view of which he must exert himself in the perfection of wisdom.

Furthermore, as the śrāvaka qualities are easily penetrated, easily understood, the Prajñāpāramitā calls them ‘to be completely fulfilled’ (paripūrayitavya). But as the bodhisattva qualities and Buddha qualities are difficult to penetrate, difficult to understand, it now says that ‘he must exert himself in them’.

Finally, the śrāvaka qualities [concern] the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) of things. The śrāvakas understand suffering (duḥkha), the origin of suffering (duḥkhasamudaya), the cessation of suffering (duḥkhanirodha) and the path leading to the cessation of suffering (duḥkhanirodhagāminī pratipad) only.

For example, take two physicians (bhīṣaj). The first understands only the sickness (ābādha), the cause of the sickness (ābādhasamutthāna), the cure for the sickness (ābādhaprahāna) and the remedy (bhēṣaja) that cures the sickness;⁵⁹² but he does not know every sickness, nor does he know all the causes of sickness or all the cures for sickness or all the remedies curing the sicknesses. It may be also that he knows how to treat the sicknesses of men but he does not know how to treat the sickness of animals; it may be that he can cure one country but cannot cure other countries. It may also be that he can treat ten kinds of sicknesses but he does not know how to treat completely the four hundred and four kinds of sicknesses. And it is the same in regard to the causes of the sicknesses, the cures for the sicknesses and the remedies curing the sicknesses. The second physician knows the four things completely: he knows all the remedies, he knows all the sicknesses.

For the comparison of the physician, see also P. Demiéville in Hobogirin, Byḥ, III, p. 230-231.

The śrāvaka is like the lesser physician and does not know everything; the bodhisattva-mahāsattva, however, is like the greater physician; there is no illness that he does not know; there is no remedy that he does not find. This is why the śrāvaka qualities should be ‘completely fulfilled’ (parpūrayitavya), whereas those of the bodhisattva should be ‘practiced’.

III. DEFINITION OF THE TEN POWERS ACCORDING TO THE DAŚABALASŪTRA⁵⁹³

The Buddha has ten powers (bala):

- 1) He knows, in accordance with reality, that which is possible (sthāna) and impossible (asthāna): this is the first power.
- 2) He knows the actions (karmasamādāna), past, future and present, of beings and he knows them according to place (sthānatas), cause (hetutas) and retribution (vipākatas): this is the second power.
- 3) He knows, in accordance with reality, the defilements (saṃkleśa), the purity (vyāvadāna) and the modalities (vyavasthāna) of the trances (dhyāna), liberations (vimokṣa), concentrations (samādhi) and absorptions (samāpatti): this is the third power.
- 4) He knows, in accordance with reality, the degree of the moral faculties (indriyaparāparatā) of other individuals: this is the fourth power.
- 5) He knows the diverse aspirations (nānādhimukti) of other beings: this is the fifth power.
- 6) He knows the world (loka) with its diverse and numerous acquired dispositions (dhātu): this is the sixth power.
- 7) He knows the route (pratipad) that leads to the different destinies (sarvatragagāmin): this is the seventh power.
- 8) He remembers his many previous abodes (pūrvanivāsa) with their aspects (ākāra) and their causes (nidāna), namely, one existence (jāti), two existences and so on up to a hundred thousand existences and many periods of [236a] creation (vivarta) and disappearance (saṃvarta) of the world: There, among those beings, I had such and such a family (gotra), such and such a name (nāman), such and such food (āhāra), such and such suffering (duḥkha), such and such happiness (sukha), such and such longevity (dīrghāyus). When I died in this place, I was reborn in that place and when I died there, I came to be born here where I have such and such a name, such and such a family, such and such food, such and such suffering, such and such happiness and such and such a longevity: this is the eighth power.

⁵⁹³ Here the Traité quotes the Daśabalasūtra, taking some liberties, the text of which was given above, p. 1506-1508F.

9) With the divine eye (divyacakṣus), purified, surpassing that of gods and men, the Buddha sees beings dying and being born and knows them to be handsome (suvarṇa) or ugly (durvarṇa), great or small, falling into a bad destiny (durgati) or falling into a good destiny (sugati) and, as a result of the actions they have committed (yathākarmapaga), suffering the appropriate retribution (vipāka). As a result, these beings, burdened with misdeeds of body (kāyaduṣcarita), burdened with misdeeds of speech (vāgduṣcarita), burdened with misdeeds of mind (manoduṣcarita), slandering the saints (ārṇyāṇāṃ apavādaka), having wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi), acting badly because of these wrong views (mithyādrṣṭikarmasamādāna), for this cause and this reason, at the dissolution of the body after death enter into a bad destiny (durgati) and are born in hell (niraya). On the other hand, these other beings endowed with good bodily actions, endowed with good actions of speech, endowed with good actions of mind, do not slander the saints, having right view, acting well from the fact of their right view, for this cause and this reason, at the dissolution of the body after death enter into a good destiny (sugati) and are reborn in heaven (svarga): this is the ninth power.

10) By the cessation of the impurities (āsravāṇāṃ kṣayāt), having realized, in the present existence (drṣṭa eva dharme) by his own knowledge (svayam abhijñāya), the pure liberation by wisdom (prajñāvimukti), the Buddha cognizes in accordance with reality: Birth is exhausted for me (kṣiṇā me jātiḥ), the religious life has been practiced (uṣitaṃ brahmacaryam), that which had to be done has been done (kṛtaṃ karaṇīya), I see no other existence for myself (nāparam asmād bhāvam iti): this is the tenth power.

IV. WHY TEACH THE TEN POWERS?

Question. – The bodhisattvas have not yet obtained the ten powers and the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas are unable to obtain them; why speak of them here?

Answer. – 1) It is true that the śrāvakas are unable to obtain them but if they hear about the qualities of these ten powers, they tell themselves that the Buddha himself has these great qualities and they rejoice saying: “We have obtained great gains (lābhā naḥ sulabdhāḥ) and have received an unlimited benefit.” Thanks to the purity of their faith (śraddhācittaviśuddhi), they enter into the path of cessation of suffering (duḥkhakṣayamārga).

As for the bodhisattvas who hear about these powers, they diligently cultivate the bodhisattva path and will obtain these great fruits that are the ten powers, etc.

Furthermore, there are śrāvakas and bodhisattvas who, practicing the concentration of recollection of the Buddha (buddhānusmṛṭisamādhi), do not recollect merely the Dharmakāya with its many Buddha qualities. They must make the following reflections:

The Buddha is able to explain all dhammas in all their aspects (ākāra): this is why he is called ‘Omniscient’ (sarvajña).

In accordance with reality, he analyzes and skillfully preaches all dharmas: this is why he is called ‘Seeing everything’ (sarvadarśin).

By direct perception (pratyakṣam), he cognizes all dharmas: this is why he is called ‘the One whose knowledge and vision are unhindered’ (apratihatajñānadarśana).

He loves all beings impartially: this is why he is called ‘the Being of great loving-kindness and great compassion’ (mahāmaitrīmahākaruṇā).

He possesses great loving-kindness and great compassion: this is why he is called ‘Savior of the world’ (lokarāṭṭr).

He comes by a path that is in accord with the truth (yathābhūtamārgena gacchati): this is why he is called ‘Tathāgata’.

He has the right (arhati) to receive the worship (pūjā) of the entire world this is why he is called ‘Arhat’.

He is endowed with a wisdom free of error (aviparītāprajñā): this is why he is called ‘Samyakṣambuddha’.

His morality (śīla), his concentration (saṃādhi) and his wisdom (prajñā) are complete (saṃpanna): this is why he is called ‘Vidyācaraṇasaṃpanna, endowed with sciences and practices’.

He does not turn back: this is why he is called ‘Sugata’.

He cognizes the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) and the specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) of the world: this is why he is called ‘Lokavid, knower of the world’.

[234b] He skillfully preaches the path of supramundane salvation (lokottarakṣemamārga): this is why he is called ‘Anuttarapuruṣadamyasārathi, supreme leader of beings to be converted’.

He saves beings by the threefold teaching (śāsana): this is why he is called ‘Śāstā devamanuṣyāṇām, master of gods and men’.

He can awaken himself and awaken people from the sleep of all the afflictions (kleśa) of the world: this is why he is called ‘Buddha’.

He is endowed with all the aspirations (sarvaprāṇidhānopeta): this is why he is called ‘Bhagavat, endowed with qualities’.

He is endowed with the ten powers (daśabalasaṃpanna): this is why he is called ‘Dhīra, strong’.⁵⁹⁴

He has obtained the four fearlessnesses (caturvaiśāradya): this is why he is called ‘Puruṣasimha, man-lion’.

He has obtained immense profound knowledge (jñāna): this is why he is called ‘Mahāguṇasāgara, great ocean of qualities’.⁵⁹⁵

All these statements are without obstacles (apratihata): this is why he is said to be like the wind (vāyusama).

He has neither aversion (pratigha) nor fondness (anunaya) for all that is beautiful (suvarṇa) or ugly (durvarṇa): this is why he is said to be like the earth (prthivīśama).

He burns the kindling of all the fetters (sarvasaṃyojananendhana): this is why he is said to be like fire (tejaśsama).

He has skillfully destroyed all the lingering traces of the afflictions (sarvakleśavāsanā): this is why he is said to be fully liberated (vimukta).

His abode being supreme (uttarāvasatha), he is called ‘Bhagavat’.

Since the Buddha possesses such qualities, one should recollect the Buddha. This is why the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wants to attain the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) and the eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadhṛma) of the Buddhas should practice the Prajñāpāramitā.

3) Furthermore, at Rājagṛha on the Gṛdhrakūṭapārvata, when the Buddha was preaching the Prajñāpāramitā, the four communities (catuspariśad) and a great crowd of heretics (tīrthika), lay people (grhastha), monastics (pravrajita), devas, yakṣas, etc., gathered together. The Buddha entered into the concentration of the King of Samādhis and emitted great rays of light (raśmī) that illumined universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (gaṅgānadīvālukopama lokadhātu); the earth trembled in six ways (prthivī ṣaḍvikāram akampata);⁵⁹⁶ then the Buddha preached the Prajñāpāramitā from the six perfections up to the three faculties, [i.e., chapter XVII to chapter XXXVIII]. At this moment, some beings experienced doubts (saṃśayaajāta) and wondered by means of what powers and by means of how many strengths the Buddha could be of such inconceivable (acintya) and such moving service (upakāra). Knowing that these beings had such doubts, the Buddha said to them: “I possess the power of knowledge (jñānabala) of the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of all dharmas. This power has ten kinds of applications and thanks to these ten kinds of knowledges, I am able to carry out these moving miracles (prātihārya) and even surpass those that have been done.” This is why it is said [in the Prajñāpāramitā] that the bodhisattva who wants to attain the ten powers must exert himself in the perfection of wisdom.

4) Furthermore, some disciples of the Buddha (buddhaśrāvaka) who have planted the roots of good (avaropitakuśalamūla) lifetime after lifetime can, out of some fault, fall into heresy. Now heretics (tīrthika) often say: “The Buddha does not really have the power of the qualities (guṇabala): it is by magical powers (māyabala) that he seduces (āvartayati) the minds of beings.”⁵⁹⁷ And the disciples of the Buddha who have fallen into heresy have doubts and wonder if indeed the Buddha is not the Great Man (mahāpuruṣa). Wanting to counteract this insult (abhyākhyāna), the Buddha said: “I truly possess the ten powers (bala) and the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) with which I save beings: it is not magic (māyā).”

⁵⁹⁶ Events described and commented on above, p. 431F seq.

⁵⁹⁷ A spiteful insinuation often found in the mouths of heretics (Majjima, I, p. 375, 381; Anguttara, II, p. 190, 193): Samaṇo hi bhante Gotamo māyāvī, āvaṭṭaniṃ māyaṃ jānāti yāya aññatitthiyānaṃ sāvake āvaṭṭeti.

⁵⁹⁴ Mahāvvyut., no. 35.

⁵⁹⁵ Ibid., no. 36.

5) Finally, for the bodhisattvas who cultivate the bodhisattva path, the practice of austerities (duṣkaracaryā) is difficult to observe and difficult to realize and they have the tendency to laziness (kausīdya). This is why the Buddha says to them: “Practice the ten powers and you will obtain an immense fruit of retribution (vipākaphala).”

[236c] It is like the leader of a caravan (sārthavāka) who encourages his merchants by saying: “Be careful and avoid fatigue (klamatha): by means of energy, diligence effort and strength, you will arrive at the jewel mountain (ratnagiri) and there you will find the seven jewels (saptaratna) and the wish-fulfilling gem (cintāmaṇi).” In the same way, the Buddha encourages the bodhisattvas and says to them: “Do not be lazy; cultivate the bodhisattva path diligently and with energy; practice the ten powers and you will obtain an immense fruit of retribution.”

It is because of these many benefits that [the Prajñāpāramitā] deals with the ten powers, etc., here.

V. WHY ARE THERE ONLY TEN POWERS?

Question. – The Buddha possesses innumerable powers; why speak of only ten here?

Answer. – It is true that the Buddha possesses innumerable powers but in order to save beings, to speak of ten powers is sufficient to settle the question:

1) By the power of the knowledge of what is possible and what is impossible (sthānāsthānājñānabala), the Buddha distinguishes (vibhanakti) and evaluates (tulayati) those beings who can be converted (vaineayasattva) and those who cannot be converted (avaineya).

2) By the power of the knowledge of retribution of actions (karmavipākajñānabala), he distinguishes and evaluates in one given person the obstacle consisting of action (karmāvaraṇa), in another person the obstacle consisting of retribution (vipākāvaraṇa), in yet another person the absence of obstacles.⁵⁹⁸

3) By the power of the knowledge of the dhyānas, vimokṣas, samādhis and samāpattis, he distinguishes and evaluates those who are attached to the flavors of trance (rasarakta) and those who are not attached to them.

4) By the power of the knowledge of the moral faculties (indriyaparāparajñānabala), he distinguishes and evaluates the degree of peoples’ strength of knowledge.

⁵⁹⁸ By āvaraṇa is meant that which is an obstacle to the Path and to the roots of good preparatory to the Path (nirvedhabhāgīya). The Buddha said that there are three obstacles: i) the obstacle constituted by action (karmāvaraṇa), namely, the five sins of immediate (ānantarya) retribution; ii) the obstacle constituted by the conflicting emotions (kleśāvaraṇa), chronic (abhīkṣṇika) and violent (īkṣṇa) passion; iii) the obstacle consisting of retribution (vipākāvaraṇa): the three bad destinies and some good destinies: cf. Anguttara, III, p. 436; Kośa, IV, p. 201-203 and notes; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 79.

5) By the power of the knowledge of the various aspirations of beings (nānādhimuktijñānabala), he distinguishes and evaluates what is loved by beings.

6. By the power of the knowledge of the various dispositions acquired by beings (nānādhātujñānabala), he distinguishes and evaluates the progression of profound thoughts (gambhīracitta) of beings.

7. By the power of the knowledge of the route leading to the various destinies (sarvatragāminīpratipajñānabala), he distinguishes and evaluates the doors to deliverance (vimokṣamukha) among beings.

8. By the power of the knowledge of previous abodes (pūrvanivāsajñānabala), he distinguishes and evaluates the earlier comings and goings of beings.

9. By the power of the knowledge of birth and death (cyutyupapādjñānabala), he distinguishes and evaluates the places of birth of beings (upapattisthāna), beautiful (śuvvarṇa) or ugly (durvarṇa),

10. By the power of the knowledge of the cessation of the impurities (āsravakṣayajñānabala), he distinguishes and evaluates the attaining of nirvāṇa by beings.

By using these ten types of powers, the Buddha saves beings. True and free of error, all are perfected (sampanna). This is why, although the Buddha possesses innumerable powers, we speak only of these ten powers.

VI. WHY THE FIRST POWER INCLUDES THE OTHER NINE

1) Furthermore, by the power of the possible and the impossible, he knows exactly from what cause a certain fruit of retribution comes. This power includes the nine others to save beings. Nine different modalities occur in this first power. How is that?

2) Beings in the world see the grain grow from the seed with their eyes (pratyaṣaṃ), but they do not know it. How then would they know the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) caused by the mind and mental events (caitasikadharma)? The Buddha, however, knows clearly and fully the fruit of retribution in its inner and outer causes (adhyātmabāhyahetupratyaya): thus this is a ‘power’.⁵⁹⁹

The Buddha knows the beings who are bound (baddha) by actions (karman) and defilements (kleśa) and the beings who are freed (mukta) by the pure dhyānas, samāpattis, samādhis and vimokṣas. He knows fully and completely the three kinds of actions of all beings, past, future and present, the lightness or gravity, the depth or superficiality, the coarseness or subtlety of their afflictions: thus this is a ‘power’.

3. He knows fully and completely the depth or the shallowness of the dhyānas, samāpattis, samādhis and vimokṣas of all beings and the causes for their liberation (vimukti): this is thus a ‘power’. [237a]

⁵⁹⁹ Power (bala) here being taken in the sense of jñānabala ‘power consisting of knowledge’.

4. In view of the future lifetime (punarjanman), beings of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya) carry out shameful or meritorious actions; in view of not being reborn, people of keen faculties (tīkṣṇendriya) accumulate actions (upacinvanti). The Buddha knows fully and completely the beauty or ugliness of these superior or inferior faculties: thus this is a ‘power’.

5. The Buddha knows the two kinds of aspirations (adhimukti) in all beings that are the determining causes of their higher or lower faculties (indriya); he knows fully and completely the kindness, the malice and the various modalities of these two kinds of aspirations: thus this is a ‘power’.

6. These two kinds of aspirations (adhimukti) being cause and condition for the two kinds of acquired dispositions (dhātu), the Buddha knows fully and completely the progress of the profound thoughts (gambhīracitta) of beings: thus this is a ‘power’.

7. By reason of their various acquired dispositions (dhātu), beings follow two types of paths (pratipad), the good path and the bad path. The Buddha knows fully and completely the many gates and destinations: thus this is a ‘power’.

8-9. The unhindered knowledge of [the mechanism] of causes and results in past and future existences is called the power of the knowledge of previous abodes (pūrvanivāsajñāna) and the knowledge of death and rebirth (cyutyupapāḍajñāna).

10. To know the causes and results of the past and the future and, being fully aware of skillful means (upāya), to break the continuity (prabandha) of the mechanism of cause and effect, this is the power of the cessation of impurities (āsravaṣṣaya). The Buddha knows the twofold causality of the three times, distinguishes and evaluates the moral faculties (indriya), the aspirations (adhimukti) and the acquired dispositions (dhātu) of beings and, in order to break their impurities, he preaches the Dharma to them. This is what is called the power of cessation of the impurities (āsravaṣṣaya).

Second Section THE TEN POWERS IN PARTICULAR

I. THE POWER OF THE POSSIBLE AND THE IMPOSSIBLE

Question. – What is the power of the knowledge of the possible and the impossible (sthānāsthānajñānabala)?

Answer. – The Buddha knows all dharmas, their causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) and the mechanism of the fruit of retribution (vipākaphalanīyāma): from such and such causes and conditions there arises such and such a fruit of retribution; from such and such other causes and conditions there arises such and such another fruit of retribution. How is that?

[Bahudhātukasūtra].⁶⁰⁰ – As it is said in the To-sing king (Bahudhātukasūtra) in regard to things possible and impossible:

“It is impossible that a woman should be a noble cakravartin king” (aṭṭhānam etaṃ anavakāso yaṃ itthi rājā assa cakkavattī, n’ etaṃ thānaṃ vijjati). Why? Because any woman dependent on a man cannot obtain sovereignty (aiśvarya). And if a woman cannot be a noble cakravartin king, how then could she be Buddha? If a woman obtains liberation, nirvāṇa, it is thanks to a man that she obtains it. It is impossible that she could obtain Bodhi by herself (svataḥ).⁶⁰¹

“It is impossible that two noble cakravartin kings appear simultaneously in the world” (aṭṭhānam etaṃ anavakāso yaṃ ekissā lokadhātuyā dve rājāno cakkavattino apubbaṃ acarimaṃ uppajjeyyūṃ, n’ etaṃ thānaṃ vijjati). Why? Because a cakravartin king never encounters any rivalry (pratyarthikatva). And if two noble cakravartin kings cannot be in the same world, how could two Buddhas?⁶⁰²

“It is impossible that a bad action [of body, speech or mind] could result in a pleasant [agreeable] retribution.” (aṭṭhānam etaṃ anavakāso yaṃ kāyavacīmanoduccaritassa iṭṭho kanto manāpo vipāko nibbatteyya, n’ etaṃ thānaṃ vijjati). And if a bad action cannot bring worldly happiness (laukikasukha), how then could it bring supramundane happiness (lokottarasukha)?

“It is impossible that the person who is of bad conduct [of body, speech or mind] could, as a result of this fact, [at the dissolution of the body] be reborn in heaven” (aṭṭhānam etaṃ anavakāso yaṃ kāyavacīmanoduccaritasamaṅgī tannidānā tappaccayā kāyassa bhedaṃ paramaṇaṃ sugatiṃ saggaṃ lokaṃ uppajjeyya, n’ etaṃ thānaṃ vijjati). And if the person who is of bad conduct cannot be reborn in the heavens, how then could he obtain nirvāṇa? In fact, the five obstacles (pañcāvaraṇa) cover the mind, one is distracted (vikṣipta) and, without developing the seven factors of enlightenment (sambodhyaṅga), it is impossible to attain nirvāṇa. As long as the five obstacles cover the mind and one does not cultivate the seven factors of enlightenment, it is impossible to attain the Bodhi of the śrāvakas, not to speak of the Bodhi of the Buddhas. But when the mind is free of obstacles, the Bodhi of the Buddhas can be obtained and, all the more so, that of the śrāvakas.

All of these possibilities and impossibilities the Buddha has explained from his own mouth in the To-sing king (Bahudhātukasūtra) but, relying on the word of the Buddha, scholars have developed these possibilities and impossibilities at length.⁶⁰³

[237b] It is impossible that the Buddhas have defects and errors, that the saints (ārya) seek out heretical teachers, that the saints fall into the bad destinies (durgatī), that the fetters (saṃyojana), once destroyed by ⁶⁰⁰ An extract of the Bahudhātukasutta of Majjhima, III, p. 64-67 (Tchong a han, T 26, k. 47, p. 723c28-724b28), repeated in Anguttara, I, p. 26-30 as well..

⁶⁰¹ See also above, p. 134F, 545F.

⁶⁰² See above, p. 302-303F, 535F.

⁶⁰³ The Traité undoubtedly has in mind the Abhidharma authors who have considerably increased the list of possibilities and impossibilities drawn up by the Buddha: see, e.g., Vibhaṅga, p. 335-338; Kathāvatthu, p. 172; Puggalapaññatti, p. 11, 12.

the path of seeing the truths (satyadarśana), re-arise, that the saints hide their faults, and that the srotaāpannas are reborn twenty-five times.⁶⁰⁴ See what has been said at length in the classification of the saints (āryavibhaṅga).

It is impossible that people guilty of the five heinous crimes of immediate retribution (ānantarya), the five types of eunuchs (pañcavidhasandha), beings in the four bad destinies (caturdurgatipatitasatva), the inhabitants of Uttarāvati and the retinue of Māra (māraparivāra), being hindered by the three obstacles (āvaraṇa),⁶⁰⁵ can attain the Path...⁶⁰⁶ [237c]

There are innumerable impossibilities (asthāna) of this kind and it is the same for the possibilities. The Buddha knows the possible things and the impossible things; he distinguishes (vibhanakti) them and evaluates (tulayati) them. For beings able to be converted (vaineayasattva), he preaches the Dharma; for beings unable to be converted, it is the [free] play of causes. The Buddha is like a good physician (vaidya) who understands the curable and incurable illnesses.

On the other hand, the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas know very few things. Sometimes they want to convert beings unable to be converted, as was the case for the Cheou-lo (Asura?); sometimes they do not convert beings who ought to be converted, as was the case [for Śrīvṛddhi] who was not converted by Śāriputra.⁶⁰⁷ ⁶⁰⁴ The srotaāpanna is saptakṛtvah paramaḥ, i.e., he will be reborn a maximum of seven times: cf. Anguttara, I, p. 233, l. 13; IV, p. 381, l. 13; Nettippakaraṇa, p. 169, l. 27; p. 189, l. 28; Visuddhimagga, p. 611, l. 26; Kośa, VI, p. 200.

⁶⁰⁵ The obstacle consisting of action (karmāvaraṇa) bars the Path to people guilty of the five ānantaryas; the obstacle consisting of passion (kleśāvaraṇa) bars it to eunuchs; the obstacle consisting of retribution (vipākāvaraṇa) bars it to beings in the four unfortunate rebirths (nāraka, tiryagyonī, preta and asura) and to the inhabitants of Uttarakuru: cf. Kośa, IV, p. 201-213.

⁶⁰⁶ The Traité continues by mentioning still other possibilities.

⁶⁰⁷ Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 412-413: Śhāviraśāriputreṇa pravrajyāprekṣapurūṣapratyākhyānam:

“Śāriputra rejected a man who asked for the going-forth from home.”

The Kośavyākhyā, p. 644, tells the circumstances for this refusal: Āryaśāriputreṇa kila kasyacit pravrajyāprekṣasya puruṣasya ... dhatupāṣāṇivare nīlīnam iva kāñcanam //

Transl. – It is said that a man asked for admission into the monastic Order. The noble Śāriputra looked for some root of good in him before producing the deliverance but, as he saw none, he refused him and did not allow him into the Order. The Buddha, however, found one and allowed him into the Order. The monks questioned the Buddha about this man and the Blessed One said: Here is an action done by this man which will be worth arhathood for him. Actually, actions do not ripen in the elements earth, water, fire or wind, but indeed in the aggregates, the elements and the bases of consciousness appropriated by him. And the Buddha said: “I definitely see in him a very small seed of deliverance, like a speck of gold caught in the interstices of a mineral.”

This story is told in full in the following collections:

The Buddha himself makes no blunders. [His knowledge of the possible and the impossible] is intact (avyāhata) and invincible (prajānāti) and, since he knows fully and completely (prajānāti), it is called the first ‘power’.

II. THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE RETRIBUTION OF ACTIONS

The power of the knowledge of the retribution of actions (karmavipākajñānabala). – Whether it is a matter of actions carried out by the body or speech, of actions unaccomplished in the present lifetime, of actions resulting from discipline of vow (samādānaśīla),⁶⁰⁸ of bad actions, of actions to be carried out during one day and one night ⁶⁰⁹, of sinful or meritorious actions: the Buddha has summarily explained the threefold sphere of action of all of these, and this is what is called the natures of karman.

1) The Buddha knows the past (atīta) actions of all beings the retribution of which is also past, the past actions the retribution of which is taking place in the present (pratyutpanna), the past action the retribution of which is in the future (anāgata), the past actions the retribution of which is in the past and the present, the past actions the retribution of which is in the past and the future, the past actions the retribution of which is in the present and the future, the past actions the retribution of which is in the past, future and present. It is the same for present actions.

c. Hien yu king, T 202, no. 23, k. 4, p. 376b2-380a10.

The hero of the story was called Fou-tseng or Che-li-li-t’i (restored by P. Pelliot as Śrīvṛddhi). After having been refused by Śāriputra and some other disciples, he was finally admitted into the Order by the Buddha himself, the only one who found a minute seed of deliverance in him: in the past, when he had been attacked by a tiger, he had uttered the cry: Namo buddhāya.

It is perhaps of Śrīvṛddhi that the authors of the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 102, p. 530c19-27) were thinking when they noted the following: The Buddha and the venerable Śāriputra were walking somewhere and someone approached them. The Buddha asked Śāriputra: Can you see where this person was your friend? Then Śāriputra, passing from the first to the fourth dhyāna resorted to memories of his earlier abodes (pūrvanivāsānanusmṛti) in order to find this person, but saw nothing. Coming out of his samādhi, he said to the Buddha: The power of my concentration is unable to see him. The Buddha said to Śāriputra: Once in the past, during such and such a kalpa, this being was your friend, but the time is so distant that it is not within the range of śrāvakas or of pratyekabuddhas; this is why you cannot know him.

⁶⁰⁸ Discipline of vow, see above, p. 819-852F.

⁶⁰⁹ Also called discipline of upavāsastha: cf. p. 825-929F.

2) Furthermore, among the good minds (kuśalacitta), there are those that undergo the retribution of good (kuśala), bad (akuśala) or indeterminate (avyākṛta) actions.⁶¹⁰ It is the same for bad (akuśala) minds and indeterminate (avyākṛta) minds.

3) Furthermore, as a result of a salutary (kṣema) action, one undergoes a pleasant retribution (iṣṭavipāka); as a result of a pernicious (akṣema) action, one undergoes an unpleasant retribution (aniṣṭavipāka); as a result of an action that is neither salutary nor pernicious (naivakṣemanaākṣema) action, one undergoes a neither unpleasant nor pleasant retribution.⁶¹¹

As a result of an action to be experienced in the present lifetime (dr̥ṣṭadharmavedanīya), one undergoes a retribution in the present lifetime; as a result of an action to be experienced after having been reborn (upapadyavedanīya), one undergoes a retribution after having been reborn [i.e., in the very next lifetime to come]; as a result of an action to be undergone later (aparaparyāyavedanīya), one undergoes a retribution in a later existence [from the third onward].⁶¹²

As a result of an impure (aśubha) action, one undergoes a retribution of torment; as a result of a pure (śubha) action, one undergoes a retribution free of torment. As a result of a mixed (sambhinna) action, one undergoes a mixed retribution.

⁶¹⁰ Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 51, p. 263a6; Kośabhāṣya, p. 227, l. 5: Kuśalam akuśalam avyākṛtaṃ karmaṭi.

⁶¹¹ Kośabhāṣya, p. 227, l. 7-9: Kṣemaṃ karma kuśalam yad iṣṭavipākaṃ nirvāṇapāpakaṃ ca duḥkha-paritṛāṇāt tatkālam atyantam ca. akṣemaṃ akuśalam kṣema-pratidvandvabhāvena yasyāniṣṭo vipākaḥ. tābhyām itarat karma naivakṣemanaākṣemaṃ yat tatkuśalākuśalābhyām itarat vedītavyam.

Transl. – Good action is salutary whether it brings a pleasant retribution or whether it makes one obtain nirvāṇa; in the first case, temporarily, in the second case, once and for all. Bad action is pernicious, for it is, by nature, opposed to salvation: it is unpleasant retribution. An action different from the two preceding ones, namely, good and bad, is neither salutary nor pernicious.

⁶¹² Here it is a matter of determinate (niyata) action, i.e., action that must necessarily be experienced (niyatavedanīya). It is of three kinds: cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 229-230: Niyataṃ trividhaṃ dr̥ṣṭadharmavedanīyaṃ upapadyavedanīyaṃ aparaparyāyavedanīyaṃ... tatra dr̥ṣṭadharmavedanīyaṃ yatra janmani kṛtaṃ tatraiva vipacyate. upadyavedanīyaṃ dvitīye janmani. aparaparyāyavedanīyaṃ tasmāt pareṇa: “Determinate action is of three kinds: i) action to be experienced in the present lifetime or action that ripens in the same existence as it was accomplished in; ii) action to be experienced after having been reborn or action that ripens in the existence following the one in which it was accomplished; iii) action to be experienced later or action that ripens in a later existence, after the third.”

That is the canonical doctrine: cf. Anguttara, III, p. 415: Tividdhāhaṃ bhikkhave kammānaṃ vipākaṃ vadāmi: diṭṭh'eva dhamme upapajjaṃ vā pariyāye. See also Majjhima, III, p. 214-215; Anguttara, V, p. 294, 297; Visuddhimagga, p. 515; L. de La Vallée Poussin, Morale bouddhique, 1927, p. 177-181.

4. Furthermore, there are two kinds of actions: the action that must necessarily be experienced (niyatavedanīya) and the action that will not necessarily be experienced (aniyatavedanīya).⁶¹³

The action that must necessarily be experienced is that from which one cannot escape.

a. Sometimes the action that must necessarily be experienced depends (apekṣate) on the time (kāla), a person (pudgala) and the place (sthāna) in order to undergo its retribution.

Thus a person who is to enjoy happiness in the company of a noble cakravartin king awaits the moment when the noble cakravartin king appears in the world, and that is the moment when he attains his reward: therefore he depends on the time. He depends also on an individual, on the occurrence of the noble cakravartin king, and finally, he depends on the place, i.e., the place where the noble cakravartin king is born.

But there are actions that must necessarily be experienced which do not depend on any skill or any deed. Whether they are beautiful (suvarṇa) or ugly [238a] (durvarṇa), they present themselves without being sought. Thus for the person who has taken birth in the paradises, the happiness resulting from merit (punyaśukha) appears by itself, and for the person who is in hell (niraya), the suffering resulting from the sin (āpatti-duḥkha) follows him by itself. These actions do not depend on causes and conditions because they are especially serious (guru).⁶¹⁴

As actions inevitably to be experienced (niyatavedanīya), see for example the army of P'i-lieou-li (Virudhaka) that killed seventy-two thousand men who were in possession of the Path (mārgaprāpta) and innumerable lay practitioners (upāsaka) who were keeping the five precepts (pañcaśikṣāpada).⁶¹⁵

See also the great magicians (mahārddhika) like Mou-lien (Maudgalyāyana), etc., who could not be saved.⁶¹⁶

⁶¹³ See Kośa, IV, p. 241.

⁶¹⁴ In order to estimate the lightness or heaviness of an action, six causes must be considered: see Kośa, IV, p. 241.

⁶¹⁵ After having massacred the Śākya, Virudhaka (Viḍḍabha in Pāli) and his army established their encampment on the shores and the bed of the Aciravati river. During the night, a sudden flood drowned them and they all perished. See above, p. 508-509F, note.

⁶¹⁶ Although he was the most powerful of the magicians, Maudgalyāyana ended his last lifetime tragically: he was beaten like sugar-cane by heretics who reduced his bones to powder, and this resulted in his death. The great disciple thus expiated a sin he had committed against his parents in an earlier lifetime.

According to some sources, this was a matter of a simple mental sin: Anavatapta-gāthā (ed. Bechert, p. 94-97; transl. Hofinger, p. 199-202, p. 190c15-191a16; T 1448, k. 16, p. 78c22-79a28; T'chong king sūan tsa p'i yu, T 208, no. 15, k. 1, p. 535a23-b4); Pāli Jātaka, V, p. 125-126.

According to others, on the other hand, Maudgalyāyana really assassinated his blind parents in a pretended attack by robbers: Pāli Apadāna, I, p. 31-33; Commentary of the Dhammapada, III, p. 65-69

See also Po-kiu-lo (Bakkula) who was thrown by his step-mother into the fire, into boiling water and into water, but who did not die.⁶¹⁷

Finally, the Buddha, when he was traveling through the kingdoms as a wandering mendicant (pravrajita), was begging and did not lack for offerings of food. However, five hundred carts brought him kingly food; in the foliage [alongside of which] he was walking, there grew seeds of rice (sāli, taṇḍula) and in his cooked rice (odana) there was an emulsion of a hundred flavors (ojaḥ śatarasam).⁶¹⁸

Good or bad, actions of this kind are to be experienced (niyatavedanīya) necessarily; the others do not necessarily have to be experienced (aniyatavedanīya).

5) The desire realm (kāmadhātu) is the place (sthāna) where one undergoes the retribution (vipāka) for three kinds of actions, namely, action to be experienced pleasantly (sukhavedanīya), action to be experienced unpleasantly (duḥkhavedanīya) and action to be experienced neither unpleasantly nor pleasantly (aduḥkhāsukhavedanīya).

The form realm (rūpadhātu) is the place where one undergoes the retribution of two types of actions, namely, the action to be experienced pleasantly (sukhavedanīya) and the action to be experienced neither unpleasantly nor pleasantly (duḥkhāsukhavedanīya).

(transl. Burlingame, II, p. 304-307); W, Rockhill, Life of the Buddha, p. 109-110; P. Bigandet, Vie en Légende du Gaudama, p. 266-267.

⁶¹⁷ For Bakkula, see above, p. 1386F. The detail given here appears, to my [Lamotte's] knowledge, only in the King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 37, p. 201a1-9 (transl. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 229-230): Bakkula lost his mother at the age of seven and his father took another wife who hated the son of her predecessor. While she was steaming some cakes in an earthenware jar, the child asked his step-mother for some and she threw him into the jar; then she closed the opening with a plate in the hope of killing the boy; but the latter, finding himself inside the jar, ate the cakes and did not die.

At another time, she took the child and put him on a red-hot baking-sheet; but he ate the cakes on the sheet and did not die.

Later, having gone to the river bank to wash clothes, the woman threw the boy into the river; a fish swallowed him, etc.

⁶¹⁸ On the Buddha's food (ojas or ojā) of a hundred flavors (śatarasa), see above, p. 125F, note 1. The Mūlasarv. Vinaya (Gilgit Manuscript, III, part 1, p. 38-39; T 1448, k. 10, p. 47a9-23) also tells the following: When the Bhagavat began to eat the barley (yava) at Verañja, the venerable Ānanda, completely upset, began to weep: The Bhagavat, he said, in the course of his existences, gave the gift of his hands, his feet and his head; at the end of three incalculable periods, he attained omniscience and now here he eats barley growing in holes! The Bhagavat said to him: Ānanda, do you want to eat these barley grains stuck between the teeth of the Tathāgata? When Ānanda said yes, he gave him one of these grains and said: This, O Ānanda, is the very pure food of the Tathāgata; it eclipses the the best of all flavors. If the Tathāgata eats no matter how coarse a food, this food changes for the Tathāgata into food of a hundred flavors (yadi tathāgataḥ prākṛtam apy āhāraṃ paribhunkte tad api tathāgatasyānnaśatarasam saṃparivartate).

The formless realm (ārūpyadhātu) is the place where one undergoes the retribution of one single kind of action, namely, the action to be experienced neither unpleasantly nor pleasantly (adhukhāsukhavedanīya).⁶¹⁹

6) There are retributions dependent on an object (vastupekṣa) and it is thanks to this object that one obtains the retribution of action. Thus, in the pools (taḍāga) of king Fou-kia-lo-p'o [erroneous transcription for Fou-kia-lo-so-li = Pukkusāti⁶²⁰] there grew thousand-petaled golden lotuses (sahasrapatṛāṇisuvarnāvabhāsani padmāni), as large as chariot wheels⁶²¹ and, because of them, a large crowd of people were overjoyed and many went forth from home (pravrajita) and obtained Bodhi.

7) The Buddha knows the places (sthāna) where beings carry out their actions, whether in the desire realm (kāmadhātu), the form realm (rūpadhātu) or the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu).

If it is in the desire realm, he knows in what destiny (gati); if it is in the divine destiny (devagati), he knows among which gods; if it is among humans (manuṣya), he knows in what continent (dvīpaka); if it is in Jambudvīpa, he knows in what kingdom (rāṣṭra); if it is in a kingdom, he knows in what city (nagara) or village (nigama); if it is in a vihāra, he knows in what place; if it is in a city (naga), he knows in what quarter (vāṭa), in what street (vīthi), in what house (prāsāda) and in what room (sthāna).

8) The Buddha knows at what time a given action has been carried out, whether it was one generation ago, two generations ago, up to a hundred thousand generations ago.

9) He knows the number of times the retribution of a given action (karmavipākaphala) has been undergone, has not yet been undergone, will necessarily be undergone or not necessarily undergone.

10) He knows the good or bad tools that have been used [to carry out an action]; a knife (śastra), a stick (daṇḍa), an order for an execution (vadhaśāsana), etc.; he knows if one has killed oneself or if one has ordered someone else to kill. It is the same for all other bad actions and also all good actions.

11) The Buddha knows what generosity (dāna) and what disciplines (śīla) have been cultivated.

⁶¹⁹ All of this is fully explained in Kośa, IV, p. 109.

⁶²⁰ Pukkusāti, king of Takṣaśilā, a contemporary and friend of Bimbisāra, king of Magadha. Having read the description of the Three Jewels on a golden plaque sent to him by Bimbisāra, Pukkusāti renounced his throne, put on the yellow robe of a monk and went to search for the Buddha. Stage by stage he came to Rājagṛha and took his lodging at the home of the potter Bhaggava. The Buddha himself joined him there and during the night preached the Dhātuvibhaṅgasūtra (Majjhima, III, p. 237-247) to him. Pukkusāti requested and obtained ordination. Leaving immediately to seek for an alms- bowl and robe, he was attacked and killed by a cow. The Buddha disclosed to his monks that Pukkusāti had attained the fruit of anāgamin and has taken rebirth in the Avṛha heaven.

The history of this disciple is fully told in the Commentary of the Majjhima, V, p. 33 seq.
⁶²¹ These giant lotuses have been described above, p. 571F.

In regard to generosity, if a thing has been given, he knows if it is land, a house (grha), a garment (cīvara), food (piṇḍapāta), medicine (bhaiṣajya), a bed or seat (śayanāsana), an object made of the seven jewels (saptaratnamaya vasu).

In regard to discipline (śīla), the Buddha knows if it is a discipline of vow (samādānaśīla), a discipline acquired naturally (dharmatāprātilambhikaśīla),⁶²² a discipline of mental order (caitasikaśīla), a discipline of speech (vākśīla), an ekadeśakārīn discipline, a pradeśakārīn discipline, a yadbhūyaskārīn discipline, a paripūrṇakārīn discipline,⁶²³ a discipline of a single day (ekadivasaśīla),⁶²⁴ a discipline of observing the seven good paths of action (saptakuśalakarmapatha),⁶²⁵ a discipline observing the ten precepts fully (daśaśikṣāpada), or a discipline joined with concentration (samādhi).

12) In regard to meritorious works (puṇya), the Buddha knows those who cultivate the first, second, third or fourth dhyāna, the four immeasurables of loving-kindness (maitrī), compassion (karuṇā), joy (muditā) and equanimity (upekṣa) and other similar causes and conditions of good actions.

13) The Buddha knows the various causes and conditions of bad actions, such as greed (mātsarya), malice (vyāpāda), fear (bhaya), bad views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi), [238b] bad friends (pāpamitra), etc. He knows the various causes and conditions of good actions such as faith (śraddhā), compassion (karuṇā), respect (satkāra), trance (dhyāna) and absorption (samāpatti), wisdom (prajñā), good friends (kalyāṇamitra), etc.

Actions are dominant (adhipati): there is no one among gods or men who is able to change the nature of actions.

For thousands of years, myriads, hundreds of thousands of existences, action always follows its perpetrator without release, like a creditor (ṇāyika) pursuing his debtor.⁶²⁶ ⁶²² See the list of disciplines in Pañcaviṃśati (T 223, k. 23, p. 390b13-14; T 220, vol. VII, k. 467, p. 15-17). As the Kośa says, the discipline of vow (samādānaśīla) depends on a vijñāpti, on an information, whereas the discipline acquired naturally (dharmatāprātilambhikaśīla or dharmatāśīla), i.e., arisen from samādhi, is just avijñāpti, non-information.

In Kośa, IV, p. 49, n. 3, L. de La Vallée Poussin explains: We distinguish the samādhiśīla, the discipline obtained by making a vow, a resolution: “I will not do this or that” (type: Pratimokṣa discipline) and the dharmatāprātilambhikaśīla, the discipline acquired either without vow or act of speech: this is the discipline acquired just by the fact of possessing a dhyāna (for one possesses a dhyāna only by becoming detached from the afflictions of kāmadhātū) or by entering into the Path (pure discipline involving abstention from certain actions).

⁶²³ These four disciplines, ekadeśakārīn, etc., in regard to the layperson have already been defined above, p. 821F and note.

⁶²⁴ See above, p. 825F.

⁶²⁵ The discipline consisting of the observing of the seven good paths of material (rūpin) action (karmapatha): abstaining from the three misdeeds of body and the four misdeeds of speech.

⁶²⁶ The comparison of the creditor is canonical: cf. Saṃyutta, I, p. 170, 171: Paccūsamhi ṇayikā detha dethā ti codenti.

When the action meets the combination of causes and conditions (hetupratyāyasāmagrī), it produces its fruit of retribution (vipākaphalaṃ dadāti), like a seed (bīja) planted in the soil, encountering the complex of causes and conditions and the right time (hetupratyāyasāmagrīṃ prāpya kālaṃ ca), germinates anew.⁶²⁷

Action projects the being into an existence of the six destinies with the speed of an arrow..

All beings are heirs to their actions (karmadāyāda) in the way that sons inherit the wealth of their fathers which is bequeathed to them.⁶²⁸

When the fruit of action is in progress, it cannot be stopped, like the fire at the end of the kalpa (palpoddāha).

Action distributes beings among the various places where they are to be reborn, like the great king of a country distributes administrative posts according to the services rendered.

When a man dies, action covers up his mind like a great mountain extending its shadow over things.

Action assigns various bodies [to beings] like the master artist (citrakara) who makes different images (pratimā).

If a person acts well, action procures a fine reward for him; if the person acts badly, action procures a bad punishment for him, like the man who serves a king and is rewarded according to his services.

This is a classification of actions and their retribution.

14. [Mahākarmavibhaṅgasūtra].⁶²⁹ – Moreover, in the Fen-pie-ye-king (Karmavibhaṅgasūtra), the Buddha said to Ānanda: “[It may happen] that a man who does bad deeds is reborn in a good place (sugatim utpadyate) and that a man who does good deeds is reborn in a bad place (durgatim utpadyate).”

Ānanda asked: “How is that possible?”

The Buddha replied: “If the bad action (pāpakarman) done by the evil man during the present lifetime (dr̥ṣṭa eva dharme) has not yet ripened (aparipakva) and if a good action done by him during a previous ⁶²⁷ Paraphrase of the classical stanza:

*Na prañāyanti karmāṇi kalpakoṭīṣatair api /
sāmagrīṃ prāpya kālaṃ ca phalanti khalu dehinām //*

⁶²⁸ Cf. Saṃyutta, II, p. 101-102; III, p. 152: Seyyathāpi bhikkhave rajako vā cittakāro vā sati rajanāya vā lakkhāya vā haliddiyā vā nīliya vā mañjeṭṭāya vā suparimaṭṭhe va phalake bhittiyā vā dussappaṭṭhe vā iṭṭhīrūpaṃ vā abhinimmineyya sabbaṅgapaccaṅgaṃ... “Just as a painter, using colors, lacquer, ginger, indigo or madder, using a well-polished piece of wood, a wall or a cloth, draws a picture of a woman or man with all its members and limbs...” so action, which is mind (citta), in imitation of the painter (citraka), creates all the destinies of beings.

The Saddharmasmṛtyupasthāna (T721, k. 5, p. 23b18-c25) is inspired by this canonical passage in the parable dedicated to the mind of the painter. This parable has been commented learnedly and fully by Lin Li-Kouang, L'Aide-mémoire de la Vraie Loi, 1949, p. 65 seq.

Or again if, at the moment of his death (maraṇakāle), a good mind (kuśalacitta) and good mental events (kuśalacaitasikadharma) arise in him, then for this reason, he takes rebirth in a good place.”⁶³⁰

“[It may also happen] that a man who has done a good deed takes rebirth in a bad place. If the good action (kalyāṇakarmaṇ) done by the honest man during the present lifetime (dr̥ṣṭa eva dharme) has not yet ripened (aparipakva) and if a bad deed done by him during an earlier lifetime (pūrvē kṛtaṃ kalyāṇakarma) is already ripe (paripakva), then, for that reason and although he is doing good actions presently, he is reborn in a bad place. Or also if, at the moment of his death (maraṇakāle), a bad mind (akuśalacitta) and bad mental events (akuśalacaitasikadharma) arise in him, then, for that reason he takes rebirth in a bad place.”⁶³¹

This is why, at the dissolution of the body after death, he is reborn in a good destiny, in a paradise world. But being actually a murderer, a thief and of wrong view, he undergoes the retribution of this action either in the present existence or in the existence following [the one in which he had done that], or in a later existence [starting from the third].

This is why, on the dissolution of the body after death, he is reborn in misfortune, the bad destiny, the abyss, hell. Question. - This way of seeing in regard to action already ripened (paripakva) and action not yet ripened (aparipakva) is acceptable. But how can the mind at death (maraṇacitta), which lasts only a short time, prevail over the power of actions (saṃskārabala) that extend over an entire lifetime?⁶³² being of right view, he receives the reward either in the present lifetime, or in the next lifetime, or in a later lifetime [from the third onwards].

⁶³² This is the objection made by Milinda to Nagasena in the Milindhapaṇṇa, p. 80: Tumhe evaṃ bhaṇata: yo vassasataṃ akusalaṃ kareyya maraṇakāle ca ekaṃ Buddhagataṃ satim paṭilabheyya so deveṣu uppaṇijeyyāti; etaṃ na saddahāmi: You say: “The one who has done bad deeds for a hundred years but who, at the moment of death, has even one single thought of the Buddha, is reborn among the gods”, that I do not believe.

But every Indian - and not just Buddhists - puts great importance on the last mind, the ‘mind at death’ (maraṇacitta). We read in the Bhagavadgīta, VIII, 6: “Whatever existence is conceived of by the person who, at the end of his life, is separated from his body, this is the existence into which he passes; it is always in this condition that he is reborn.”

Buddhists, it is true, deny the existence of a soul, but, nevertheless, they recognize that the mind at conception (upapatticitta) is the continuation of the mind at death (maraṇacitta). Hence the necessity of properly preparing the dying person for death.

Well-meaning rather than enlightened, the deities of gardens, forests and trees invite the householder Citta to wish to become a cakravartin king, but the dying person refuses because that is a transitory (anicca) unstable (addhiva) situation destined to pass away (Saṃyutta, IV, p. 302-304).

The Buddha entrusts to the Upasāka the duty of consoling the sick and maintaining the dying (Saṃyutta, V, 408-410). “Have you not heard”, he asks his cousin Mahānāman, “that an upāsaka endowed with wisdom should encourage an upāsaka endowed with wisdom who is sick, who is suffering, who is gravely ill?” He is reminded that he has intelligent faith (aveccappasāda) in the Three Jewels and the moral precepts dear to the saints. If he is troubled about the outcome of his affairs, he is invited to lay aside such worries inasmuch as his death is near and he will be unable to do anything more about them. If he remains attached to the five objects of sense enjoyments (colors, sounds, smells, tastes and tangibles), he is asked to renounce these human pleasures, scorned by the gods. If he aspires to the bliss of the paradises, he is told to notice that even Brahmā’s heaven is impermanent and not final, because it involves the idea of self (sakkāyapariyāpanna). Finally, a pressing invitation is made: “Lift you mind up and apply it to the cessation of the self (cittaṃ vuṭṭhāpetvā sakkāya nirodhe cittaṃ upasaṃhara).” Indeed, the Buddha has stated that there is no difference as to the deliverance of the mind between such an upāsaka and a bhikṣu whose mind is liberated from the afflictions. If the upāsakas must assist one another, what can be said of residential monks (āvāsika bhikṣu) specially charged with the care of the householders? According to the Anguttara, III, p. 263-264, the resident monk is held to five services: “He leads them to a high morality (adhisīla). He causes them to live in the mirror of the Dharma (dhammadassana). He visits the sick and encourages them to fix their attentiveness (satī), the most important thing of all. He encourages the populace to welcome strangers who are monastics properly, for their coming is an occasion to gain merit. He eats good or bad food offered to him in order not to spoil a gift given in faith.”

The Buddha’s concern for the sick and the dying has been shared by his disciples in the course of the centuries:

a. Already at the time of the Buddha, the housewife Nakulamātā addressed admirable advice to her dying husband, the purports of the texts of which have been preserved for us (cf. Anguttara, III, p. 295-298).

b. Several centuries later, the emperor Aśoka was concerned about the salvation of those whom he had condemned to death. In his fourth pillar edict (cf. J. Bloch, Les Inscriptions d'Aśoka, p. 165), he proclaimed: “For prisoners whose penalty is fixed and who are condemned to death, I reserve three days for their use. Their relatives will intercede to save their lives, or if there is nobody to intercede, they will do charitable deeds or will carry out a fast in view of the next world. For this is what I desire: that even after the expired time limit, they will gain the other world.”

c. In Ceylon at the time of Buddhaghosa (cf. Visuddhimagga, p. 469), a kind of sacrament for the dying was carried out. Friends came to the sick person and said to him: A worship of the Buddha is going to be carried out according to your wishes; be of peaceful mind therefore (taṃ atthāya Buddhapūjā kariyati, cittaṃ pasādehi). Five kinds of offerings are prepared: flowers, garlands, flags and banners for the eye, recitations of the text and music for the ear, incense and perfume for the smell, honey and cakes for the taste, cloth for the touch. “Touch these objects”, the dying person is told; “these are the offerings that will be given by you.” The mind at death thus represents a complete sacrifice to the Buddha and will determine the future mind at conception favorably.

In Buddhist pietism, the last thought will preferably be a final invocation to a Buddha or a bodhisattva of choice. The invocation itself is indispensable. An enviable fate is promised to those who have heard the name of the Tathāgata Bhaiṣajyaguru: “At the time of their death, eight bodhisattvas miraculously present themselves and show them the path” (Bhaiṣajyagurusūtra cited in Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 175: teṣāṃ maraṇakālasāye 'ṣṭau bodhisattvā ṛddhyāgatya mārgam upadarśayanti). Surrounded by magical monks, Amitabha is present at the death of his devotees who, in ecstasy on seeing this Tathāgata and without detaching their minds from him, leave this world to take rebirth in Sukhāvatī (Sukhāvatīvūha, p. 48: te tena tathāgatadarśanaprasādāmbanena samādhināpramuṣitayā smṛtyā cyutās tatraiva buddhaṣetre pratyājaniṣyanti). No matter how great his crimes, the devotee of Avalokiteśvara is comforted in his last moments by twelve Tathāgatas: “Fear not, O son of good family; you have heard the Kāraṇḍavyūha, you will wander in saṃsāra no longer; there will be no further birth, old age or death for you” (Kāraṇḍavyūha, p. 23, 95).

But the problem that arises is to know whether the mind at death is able to wipe out completely a life of sin. This is what the Traité maintains here by emphasizing the primordial role of the last mind, abandoning the body and the organs. Nevertheless a few comments may be made:

1) The state of death (maranāvasthā) is physically and mentally lifeless (mandika), and at death as at birth, the mental consciousness (manovijñāna) is associated with the feeling of indifference (see Kośa, III, p. 118, 131). Therefore the last mind is not as sharp (paṇu) as is claimed.

Answer. – Although this mind may be very short, its power (bala) is intense (paṇu). It is like fire (agni) or poison (viṣa) that, although small, can accomplish great things. The mind at death is so determinate (niyata) and so strong (dhṛta) that it prevails over the power of action (saṃskārabala) extending over a century.

This last mind is called ‘the great mind’ (mahācitta) for it has, as its urgent task, the abandoning of the body (svadehaparitṛyāga) and the organs (indriya).⁶³³ Thus the man in battle (raṇa), who does not spare his life, is called a hero (śūra), and the arhat, who gives up attachment to life, attains arhathood. [238c]

Those are the various retributions of sinful and meritorious actions as well as their functioning (pravṛtti).

The śrāvakas know only that bad action is punished and good action rewarded, but they are unable to analyze the problem with such clarity.⁶³⁴ The Buddha himself understands fully and completely both action and the retribution of action. The power of his knowledge (jñānaprabhāva) is without obstacle (avyāhata), is indestructible (akṣaya) and invincible (ajeya): this is why it is described as the second ‘power’.

2) The person is not the master of his last mind. Practically and logically, is good death is possible only if one has lived well, for, according to the fortunate expression of the Buddha, “the tree falls to the side in which it was leaning” (see above, p. 1082-1083F and notes).

3) According to orthodox opinion, every volitional past action entails a retribution. Therefore the last mind in no way prevents the other mind-actions from bearing their fruit: in some circumstances, however, it can be rewarded before the others. In regard to the order in which actions are rewarded, we are reduced to hypotheses. A stanza by the sthāvira Rāhula cited by the Kośabhāṣya, p. 477, l. 20-21, and commented on in Kośavyākhyā, p. 719, presents it as follows:

Yad guru yac cāsannaṃ yac cābyastaṃ kṛtaṃ ca yat / pūrvam pūrvam pūrvam vipacyate karmasaṃsāre //

In other words, the following are rewarded in order: the grave (guru) action; in its absence, the recent (āsanna) action that perfumes the dying mind; in its absence, the habitual (abhyasta) action; lacking the preceding ones, an action from an earlier life (pūrvakṛtaṃ) the efficacy of which has been delayed by those of more serious actions.

This present note is especially inspired by the works of L. de La Vallée Poussin on the last mind: see Death in HERE, IV, p. 448-449; Notes bouddhiques, Bull. Cl. Lett. Acad. Roy. De Belgique, 1925, p. 18-20; Morale bouddhique, 1927, p. 55, 181, 233.

On “One Mind” in Amidism, see P. Demiéville, Les versions chinoises du Milindapañha, BEFEO, 1924, p. 166, 231-246.

⁶³³ See Kośa, II, p. 133.

⁶³⁴ The Buddha declared that the retribution of actions is incomprehensible and forbids trying to understand it: Kammavipāko bhikkhave acinteyyo na cintetabbo yaṃ cintento ummāḍassa vighātassa bhāgī assa (Anguttara, II, p. 80).

III. THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE DHYĀNAS, ETC.

The power of the knowledge of defilement, purification and the types of trances, liberations, concentrations and absorptions (dhyānavimokṣasamādhisamāpattīnāṃ saṃkleśo vyavadānaṃ vyavasthānaṃ).

By trance (dhyāna) is meant the four dhyānas.

The Buddha knows these dharma auxiliary to the Path: he knows their name (nāman) and their characteristics (lakṣaṇa), their order and their practice; he knows if they are impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), in the course of being practiced (śikṣita) or already practiced (aśikṣita), purified (vyavadāta) or defiled (saṃkliṣṭa), with flavor (sarasa) or without flavor (arasa), profound (gambhīra) or superficial, and other distinctions of this kind.

The eight liberations (vimokṣa) have been explained in detail in reference to the dhyānas (above, p. 1291F). The dhyānas include all the meditative stabilizations of the form realm (rūpadhātu); the liberations include all the absorptions (samāpatti) and the perfection of trance (dhyānapāramitā).⁶³⁵ The vimokṣas, dhyānas, samāpattis and samādhis are ‘concentrations’, and by concentrations is meant the non-distraction of the mind (cittāvikṣepa).

[The Buddha knows their defilement] and by defilement (saṃkleśa) is meant the conflicting emotions (kleśa) such as affection (anunaya), wrong view (dṛṣṭi), pride (māna), etc.

[The Buddha knows their purification] and by purification is meant the true concentrations: those that are not mixed with the conflicting emotions – affection, wrong view, pride, etc. – and that are like real gold.

[The Buddha knows] the types (vyavasthāna): among these concentrations, we must distinguish those where only one mind is functioning, those where several minds are functioning, those that are always functioning and those that do not always function, the concentrations into which it is difficult or easy to enter, difficult or easy to come out of, the concentrations that grasp the characteristics of the object separately or those that grasp them inclusively, the concentrations to be avoided and those not to be avoided.

As concentrations to be avoided, we may cite for example the mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta) if one is full of passion, the meditation on the horrible (aśubhabhāvana) if one is full of hate, the meditation on the finite and infinite (antānantabhāvana) if one is stupid, the use of the knowledge and discrimination of dharma if one is excited, the desire to concentrate the mind if one is depressed. But in the reverse cases, the cited concentrations are not to be avoided.

Furthermore, in regard to the concentrations, time (kāla) and place (sthāna) must be distinguished. If the body is exhausted, that is not the time to practice concentration. This is what the Bodhisattva said when he was practicing austerities (duṣkaracaryā): “Now I am incapable of producing a meditative stabilization.” Also, places where there are crowds are not desirable places to practice concentration.

⁶³⁵ The text here seems to be corrupt.

Furthermore, the Buddha knows the loss (dhvaṃsa) of the dhyānas, the duration (sthiti) of the dhyānas, the increase (vardhana) of the dhyānas and the dhyānas that end up in nirvāṇa.

Furthermore, the Buddha knows those who enter into and come out of concentration with difficulty, those who enter and come out of concentration easily, those who enter easily and come out with difficulty, and, finally, those who enter with difficulty and come out easily.⁶³⁶

The Buddha knows that such and such a man should obtain such and such a dhyāna. He knows that such and such a man who has lost the dhyāna is enjoying the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa). He knows that such and such a man, having enjoyed the five objects of enjoyment, will obtain the dhyāna anew and depending on this dhyāna, he will attain arhathood.

By means of his profound knowledge, the Buddha knows fully these dhyānas, vimokṣas, samādhis and samāpattis, and as this knowledge is intact (avyāhata) and invincible (ajeya) [in him, it is called the third ‘power’].

IV. THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE DEGREE OF THE MORAL FACULTIES

The power of the knowledge of the degree of the moral faculties of beings (parapudgalānām indriyaparāparajñānabalam). - The Buddha knows the beings who are of sharp faculties (tīkṣhendriya), of weak faculties (mṛdviendriya) or of medium faculties (madhyendriya). The strong knowledge (tīkṣṇajñāna) is called superior (para); the weak knowledge (mṛdujñāna) is called inferior (apara). [239a]

Using this awareness of the degree of the faculties of beings, the Buddha distinguishes (vibhanakti) the beings who are of keen, medium or weak faculties:

Such and such an individual who has such and such faculties can, in the present existence (ihajanma), obtain only the first fruit (phala), i.e., the fruit of srotaāpanna, but cannot obtain the other fruits; such and such another individual can obtain only the second, the third or the fourth fruit.

Such and such an individual can obtain only the first dhyāna; such and such another can obtain only the second, third or fourth dhyāna, etc., up to the absorption of the cessation of discrimination and feeling (saṃjñāvedayitanirodhasamāpatti).

Such and such an individual will become conditionally liberated (samayavimukta); such and such another individual will become unconditionally liberated (asamayavimukta).⁶³⁷

⁶³⁶ In Saṃyutta, III, p. 272, the Buddha distinguishes four kinds of meditators (jhāyin): the person who is skillful in staying in concentration and unskillful in coming out of concentration (samādisimṇi ṭhitikusalo na samādhismṇi vuṭṭhānakusalo), etc.

⁶³⁷ See Kośa, VI, p. 251-252.

Such and such an individual can obtain the first rank (agratā) among the śrāvakas; such and such another can obtain the first rank among the pratyekabuddhas; such and such another, completely fulfilling the six perfections (pāramitā), can obtain supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarā samyaksambodhi).

Knowing all this, the Buddha also knows those who pass to the other shore (pāra) if [the Dharma] is preached to them in brief (saṃkṣeṇa), fully (vistareṇa), or in brief and fully at the same time. He knows which beings are to be instructed by means of gentle words (ślakṣṇavacana), which by means of rough words (paraṣavacana), or which by means of both gentle and rough words.

Such and such an individual who already possesses the other faculties (indriya) should act so as to increase further his faculty of faith (śraddhendriya); such and such another should act so as to produce the faculties of exertion (vīrya), mindfulness (smṛti), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā).

By using his faculty of faith (śraddhendriya), such and such an individual enters into certitude [of the acquisition] of the supreme good (samyaktvaniyāmam avakrāmati); such and such another individual, by using the faculty of wisdom (prajñendriya), enters into the certitude [of the acquisition] of the supreme good.

These people, of keen faculties (tīkṣṇendriya), are hindered by the fetters (saṃyojana): for example Yang-k'iu-li-mo-lo (Aṅgulimāla),⁶³⁸ etc. Certain others, of keen faculties, are not hindered by the fetters, for example Chō-li-fou (Śāriputra), Mou-lien Maudgālyana), etc.

638 Aṅgulimāla, son of the brāhmin Bhaggava, chaplain of king Pasenadi of Kosala, studied at the university of Takkaśilā and soon became the favorite of his teacher. But the latter suspected him of having failed to respect his wife and demanded fees of a very special kind from his disciple: a thousand fingers cut from the right hand of a human. To acquit himself of his debt, the young man lay in ambush in the Jālinī forest at Kosala, killed all those who tried to cross through it, cut off a finger from each corpse and from the cut fingers he made a garland which he wore around his neck. Hence the nickname Aṅgulimāla, meaning 'Finger Garland'.

In order to complete the number of a thousand demanded by his teacher, there remained only one more finger to be cut. And so, when his mother came to warn him that he was being hunted by the king, Aṅgulimāla prepared to kill her. But the Buddha, foreseeing his destiny, came in person towards him, prevented him from committing this last crime and, having won him over, admitted him into the Order according to the swiftest procedure. Subsequently Aṅgulimāla showed himself to be an exemplary monk.

Quite a body of literature has grown up around Aṅgulimāla, but the main source remains the Aṅgulimalasutta in Majjhima, p. 97-105, translated many times into Chinese: Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1077, k. 38, p. 280c18-281c2; Pie yi tse a han, T 100, no. 16, k.1, p. 378b17-379a22; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 31, p. 719b20-722c22; three separate versions (T 118-120) of which the oldest, entitled Yang kiue mo king, is by Dharmarakṣa.

The Buddha knows the individuals of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya) but who are not hindered [by the fetters], for example Tcheou-li-pan-t'o-k'ie (Cūḍapanthaka).⁶³⁹ But there are people of weak faculties who are hindered by the fetters.

Aṅgulimāla occupies an important place in the Pāli commentaries: Comm. on Majjhima, III, p. 328-344; on Dhammapada, III, p. 169-170 (tr. Burlingame, III, p. 6-14); of the Theragāthā, (tr. Rhys Davids, Brethren, p. 318-325); of the Jātakas, V, p. 456 seq.

In the neighborhood of Śrāvastī, a stūpa marked the place where Aṅgulimāla was converted. This monument was mentioned by the Chinese pilgrims Fa hien (T 2085, p. 860b11) and Huan-tsang (T2087, k. 6, p. 899a19).

639 He recognizes his own stupidity in the Anavatapta-gāthā (ed. Bechert, p. 163-166; transl. Hofinger, p. 249-250); Fo wou poi tseu, T 199, p. 197c16-198a3; Mūlasarv. Vinaya, T 1448, k. 17, p. 85b21-c12). His last life and his earlier existences are told in full in the Cūḍapanthakāvadāna in the Mūlasarv. Vinaya (Dīvyavadāna, p. 483-515; T 1442, k. 31-32, p. 794c26-803c21), a northern source in which H. Bechert (l.c.) has revealed a borrowing from the golden legend of the Jains.

Mahāpanthaka and Cūḍapanthaka were born from the union of a wealthy young girl in Rājagṛha and a slave. They were born at the side of a great highway which is why they were named Great Path and Lesser Path respectively. Raised by their grandparents, they embraced the Buddhist faith. Mahāpanthaka was the first to become a monastic and, shortly thereafter, welcomed his brother into the Order. Entrusted with his religious instruction, he gave him a very simple stanza to learn by heart: Pāpaṃ na kuryān manasā na vācā, etc., but Cūḍapanthaka was so dim-witted (duṣprajñā) that at the end of three months, he had not yet succeeded in memorizing it. Then he passed into the service of the ṣaḍvargyā monks, which did not make him any smarter. At the instigation of the latter, he requested a subject of study (svādhyāyanikā) from this elder brother, but Mahāpanthaka, judging that he would be cured only by scorn, grabbed him by the neck and threw him out of the monastery. Weeping, Cūḍapanthaka went to the Buddha and confided the reason for his tears: "I am neither a monk nor a lay-man; I am a great idiot (paramacūḍa), a great fool (paramadhandha).” The Buddha replied: "There is no fool but the one who thinks he is smart" (cf. Udānavarga, XXV, v. 22), gave him two lines to meditate on "I remove the dust, I remove the dirt" (rajo harāmi malaṃ harāmi) and sent him to clean the monks' shoes (upanāhāṇ poṇccchitum), an important detail which the Traité will mention below (k. 28, p. 268a6-7).

While he was busy with this simple task, Cūḍapanthaka discovered the mystery: To remove the dust is to suppress desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and ignorance (moha). At once, all his passions were cut through and he attained arhathood.

To test his new qualities, the Buddha appointed him instructor (avavādaka) of the nuns. Those who thought him to be a fool were expecting the worst, but the new arhat accomplished such feats of magic and preached the Dharma with such eloquence that they were forced to change their minds. Swept along by his zeal, he kept his listeners until late in the night, a violation which the Buddha condemned by proclaiming the 22nd pācittiya (see Pāli Vinaya, IV, p. 54-55; Dharmaguptaka Vin. T 1428, k. 12, p. 647b9-648a17; Sarv. Vin., T 1435, k. 11, p. 80b2-81a11).

The Buddha knows the people whose [passions] have been destroyed by seeing the truths (satyadarśanaḥiṇa) and whose faculties are weak, the people whose [passions] have been destroyed by meditation (bhāvanāḥiṇa) whose faculties are keen, the people whose passions have been destroyed by meditation and whose faculties are keen, the people whose passions have been destroyed by meditation and whose faculties are weak, and finally, the people whose passions have been destroyed by seeing the truths and whose faculties are keen.

In such people, all the faculties (indriya) are equally weak (mṛdu) or equally keen (tīkṣṇa); in others all the faculties are neither equally weak nor equally keen.

A given person is of great strength as a result of previous causes (pūrvahetu); another person is of great strength as a result of present conditions.

A given person, while searching for bondage (bandhana), finds liberation (mukti); another person while searching for liberation, finds bondage. Thus, Aṅgulimala, who wanted to kill his mother and torment the Buddha, found liberation, whereas a bhikṣu who had obtained the four dhyānas and developed pride (abhimāna) because of that, fell into hell.⁶⁴⁰

Finally, the Buddha knows that such and such an individual will fall into the bad destinies (durgati), that a second individual will come out only with difficulty, that a fourth will come out easily, that a fifth will come out quickly and that a sixth will come out after a long time.

The Avadāna also mentions an episode concerning the future arhat. The day that Cūḍapanthaka became a monk, the famous physician Jīvaka invited the Buddha and the Saṃgha except for Cūḍapanthaka whom he deemed to be too stupid. The Buddha accepted the invitation, but noticing that the Saṃgha was not complete, he refused to partake of the meal. Jīvaka sent someone to look for Cūḍapanthaka in the monastery, but the latter created thirteen hundred fictive monks exactly like himself magically and by this trick made himself invisible. A formal order by the Buddha was necessary for him to consent finally to come to Jīvaka's house.

Since Cūḍapanthaka had created fictive monks to confuse Jīvaka and since he had also triumphed over the distrust of the monks, the Buddha proclaimed him the foremost among those who create spiritual shapes and change minds (see also Anguttara, I, p. 24; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 3, p. 558a15-17; T 126, p. 831b29).

Besides the Cūḍapanthakāvadāna, which has just been summarized here, we should also mention the Mahākarmavibhaṅga (p. 43) which briefly tells the story of the arhat, and especially the Vibhāṣā (T 1545, k. 180, p. 902) which analyzes the story precisely and in detail.

The Pāli sources are in agreement with the northern sources, at least in regard to the last lifetime of Cūḍapanthaka. Among the main texts, we may mention the Theragāthā, v. 557-566; the Apadāna, I, p. 58; the commentaries of the Jātakas, I, p. 114-20, of the Anguttara, I, p. 209-220, and above all of the Dhammapda, I, p. 239-255 (transl. Burlingame, I, p. 299-310).

⁶⁴⁰ See above (p. 1052-1053F) the story of the bhikṣu who confused dhyāna and fruits of the Path and fell into the Avīci hell.

The Buddha knows fully and completely (prajāñāti) all these various degrees of the faculties of beings and since this knowledge is intact (avyāhata) [in him] and invincible (ajeya), it is called the fourth 'power'.

V. THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE ASPIRATIONS OF BEINGS

The power of knowledge of the various aspirations of beings (nānādhimuktijñānabala). -

By aspiration (adhimukti) is meant trusting joy (prasāda), inclinations (ruci).

[Beings] love the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaguṇa), as did Souen-t'o-lo-nen-t'o (Saundarananda).⁶⁴¹

They love fame (yaśas), as did T'i-p'o-ta (Devadatta).⁶⁴²

They love worldly goods (lokadhana), as did Siu-mi (var. na)-tch'a to-lo (Sunakṣetra).⁶⁴³

They love the life of a monk (pravrajyā), as did Ye-chō (Yaśas).⁶⁴⁴

[239b] They love faith (śraddhā), as did Po-kia-li (Vakkhali).⁶⁴⁵

⁶⁴¹ Nanda surnamed Nanda the Handsome, ordained as the result of a trick and who mourned for his young wife. See p. 118F, 226F, 286F.

⁶⁴² See p. 868-878F.

⁶⁴³ Sunakṣetra, a Licchavi of Vaiśālī, who entered into the Order and for a time was the Buddha's assistant (upasthāyaka), but who later became attached to the bad teachers, Khorakkhattiya, Kandaramasaka and Pātiputta. According to the Traité (k. 100, p. 755a12-14), he had been a disciple of the Buddha out of greed.

⁶⁴⁴ Later the Traité (k. 49, p. 411b20-22) summarizes his story in a few words: "Yaśas, son of a śreṣṭhin [of Benares], having seen in the middle of the night that all the courtesans resembled corpses, left his precious sandals (maṇipādūkā) worth a hundred thousand kāṣāpanas on the bank of a river and, crossing it by means of a ford, went to find the Buddha." The following is known: Yaśas, also known as Yaśoda, taught by the Buddha, attained arhathood and entered into the Order while his aged parents entered into the lay community. Cf. Catuspariṣad, p. 172-202; Mūlasarv. Vinaya, T 1450, k. 6, p. 128c-129b; Pāli Vinaya, I, p. 15-18; Mahīśasaka Vin., T 1421, k. 15, p. 105; Dharmaguptaka Vin., T 1428, k. 32, p. 789b-790a; Mahāvastu, III, p. 402-413; Nidānakathā, p. 82; Comm. on Dhammapada, I, p. 87; Yin kouo king, T 189, k. 4, p. 645; Fo pen hing tsi king, T 190, k.35, p. 815-824; Tchong hui mo ho ti king, T 191, k. 8, p. 954c-955a; Fo so hing tsai, T 192, k. 4, p. 30c (cf. E. H. Johnston, Buddha's Mission and Last Journey, Acta Orientalia, XV, 1937, p. 12; Tchong pen k'I king, T 196, k. 1, p. 149a-b; Tchou yao king, T 212, k. 29, p. 769a-b).

⁶⁴⁵ According to the Mūlasarv. Vinaya (T 1448, k. 4, p. 15b11-c3; Divyāvadāna, p. 49), Vakkhali, whose name means 'Clothed in bark', was a ṛṣi dwelling on Mount Musalaka, not far from Śūrpāraka in Aparānta. Having seen the Buddha from the top of this mountain, he felt great admiration for him and

They love the rules (śikṣā), as did Lo-heou-lo (Rāhula), etc.

They love generosity (dāna) as did Che-po-lo (Śaivala),⁶⁴⁶ [a note in red says that he was the son of Kan-lou (Amṛtā, aunt of the Buddha)].⁶⁴⁷ felt strongly drawn to him and, so as to join him more quickly, he threw himself into the void. The Buddha caught him by his magical power, taught him the Dharma and ordained him by the quick method. He declared Vakkhali to be the foremost of those who feel faith toward him (agro me śraddhādhimuktānām).

The same episode is told in the Pāli sources (Apadāna, II, p. 467, v. 26-33; Comm on Anguttara, I, p. 248-251; Comm. on Dahammapada, IV, p. 119), but these make Vakkhali to be a brāhmin native of Śrāvastī who, long after his ordination, threw himself from the top of Gr̥dhrakūṭapārvata in despair of being deprived of seeing the Buddha. The latter, wearied by the constant attendance of his disciple, had momentarily gone away from him saying: “It is enough for you, O Vakkhali, to contemplate my rotting body: he who sees the Dharma sees me, and he who sees me sees the Dharma.”

Vakkhali having fallen gravely ill, the Buddha consented to visit him. Vakkhali confided to the Master that he had no twinges of conscience and that his only regret was the lack of enough strength to go himself to the Buddha. Beyond that, he was deeply convinced of the impermanent nature, painful and ever-changing, of the five aggregates of existence.

After the Buddha’s visit, Vakkhali had himself carried in a litter to the Black Rock on Mount R̥ṣigiri. The next day at dawn, he “took the knife” (satthaṃ āhāresi) and killed himself. The Buddha revealed to the monks that Vakkhali had entered nirvāṇa.

Vakkhali’s suicide is told in the canonical sources: Saṃyutta, III, p. 119-124; Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1265, k. 346b7-347b13; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 19, p. 642b29-643a22.

⁶⁴⁶ Śaivala, Sivali in Pāli, was proclaimed by the Buddha (Anguttara, I, p. 24) to be the foremost of those who receive (aggaṃ lābhīnam) and his generosity equaled his wealth. In the Anavataptagāthā (ed. Bechert, p. 142), he explains the ‘fabric’ of his actions:

Abhāvaṃ jyeṣṭhaputro ‘ham Kṛkīrājñō yaśvinaḥ / prathamam ca mayā chattraṃ jinastāpaṃ pratiṣṭham //
tat karma kuśalaṃ kṛtvā yatra yatropapannavān / devabhūto manuṣyad ca kurtapūṇo virocitaḥ // bhavāmy ādhyo mahābhāgas tāsu tāsūpattiṣu / mahādānapatiś cāhaṃ bhavāmi dhanadhānyavān //

Transl. – I was the eldest son of the glorious king Kṛkin (of Benares), and the first parasol was planted by me on the stūpa of the Victorious (Kāśyapa).

Having done this good deed, everywhere that I was born, as god or as man, I gained merit and I was famous.

I was rich, opulent in all these existences. I was a great master of generosity, loaded with wealth and rice.

⁶⁴⁷ See above, p. 227F, where it is said that Amṛtā, daughter of Saṃhahanu and sister of Śuddhoddhana, had a son named Che p’o lo (Śaivala, and not Dānapāla as I [Lamotte] have erroneously

They love the strict observances (dhūta) and solitude (viveka), as did Mo-ho-kia-chō (Mahākāśyapa).

They love solitary meditation (pratisaṃlayana), as did Li-po-to (Revata).⁶⁴⁸

They love wisdom (prajñā), as did Chō-li-fou (Śāriputra).

They love learning (bahuśrautya), as did A-nan (Ānanda).

They love to understand the discipline (vinaya), as did Yeou-p’o-li (Upāli), etc.

All these disciples of the Buddha each had their preferences, and the worldly people (prthagjana), they too, each have their own tastes: some are pleased with desire (rāga), others with hatred (dveṣa).

Furthermore, the Buddha knows those who abound in lust (rāgabahula), those who abound in hatred (dveṣabahula) and those who abound in ignorance (mohabahula).

Question. –What are the characteristics (lakṣaṇa) of those who abound respectively in lust, hatred or ignorance?

Answer. – Here it is necessary to cite fully the characteristics of the threefold poison (triviṣa) described in the Tch’an king (Dhyānasūtra). Knowing these characteristics, the Buddha corrects especially lustful people by means of a sermon (paryāya) on the horrors of the body (aśubha); he corrects those who are especially hateful by means of a sermon on the mind of loving-kindness (maitrīcitta); and he corrects those who are especially stupid by means of a sermon on dependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda).

In this way, he preaches the Dharma according to the aspirations (adhimukti) of beings. If these aspirations are good (kuśala), he preaches in accordance with the minds of the beings, like a boat going along with the current (naur anusrotogāminī); if these aspirations are bad (akuśala), he addresses them with rough words restored it). For the geneology of the Buddha, see the notes above, p. 226-227F, and A. Bureau, La légende de la jeunesse du Budha dans les Vinayapiṭaka anciens, Oriens Extremus, IX, 1962, p. 8-11.

According to the Pāli sources (Udāna, p. 15-18; Comm. on Anguttara, I, p. 243-248, of Dahammapada, IV, p. 192-194, tr. Rhys Davids, Brethren, p.60-62, and Jātaka, I, p. 407-409), Sīvali was the son of Suppavāsā, princess of the Koliyas, who carried him in her womb for seven years. At his birth, the baby was able to speak. Śāriputta spoke with him and, with the approval of his mother, proceeded to ordain him. During the ceremony of his tonsure at each snip of the scissors, the child attained a new fruit of the religious life, becoming successively srotaāpanna, sakṛdāgāmin, anāgāmin and finally arhat.

⁶⁴⁸ Revata surnamed Khadiravaniya “Of the acacia forest”. He was the youngest brother of Śāriputra, and the Buddha proclaimed him to be the foremost of those who live in the forests (aggaṃ āraññikānaṃ): cf. Anguttara, I, p. 24. His taste for retreat was well known. A lay disciple named Atula, accompanied by five hundred upāsakas, visited him one day in hopes of receiving his teachings. Revata who was enjoying meditation like a solitary lion (paṭisaṃlānārāmo siho viya ekacāro) did not gratify their wishes with even a single word (Comm. on Dhammapada, III, p. 326).

(paruṣavacana) according to the method of driving out a peg by means of a counter-peg (āṇīpratyāñīrnhārayogena).⁶⁴⁹

⁶⁴⁹ An expression recorded in the Mahāvvyutpatti (ed. Sakaki, no. 6865; ed. Wogihara, chap. 245, no. 460). The meaning presents no problem. It results from a passage in Majjhima, I, p. 119: Seyyathā pi bhikkhave dakkho palagaṇḍo vā palagaṇḍantevāsi vā sukhumāyaāñiyā oḷārikaṃ āṇīṃ abhinīhaneyya abhinīhareyya abhinivarajeyya... “Jut as, O monks, a skillful carpenter or his apprentice, by means of a small peg, is able to take out, drive out, tear out, a big peg... ”

But the corresponding passage in Madhyamāgama (T 26, k. 25, p. 588a14-15) is completely different: “Just as a master carpenter or his apprentice, taking a line (kālasūtra), places it on a piece of wood, then with a sharp axe, hacks along it and smoothes it out to make it straight.”

Chinese scholars have always rendered the expression āṇīpratyāñīrnhārayogena by means of the characters jou yi sie tch'ou sie fang pien “a way of taking out a wedge by means of a wedge”. This is the phrase used by Bodhisuci (T 675, k. 3, p. 679a8), by Paramārtha (T 1593, k. 3, p. 127a29; T 1595, k. 11, p. 235b6), by Dharmagupta (T 1596, k. 8, p. 305c6) and by Hiuan-tsang (T 676, k. 3, p. 702b11; T 1594, k. 3, p. 146c18; T 1597, k. 8, p. 361c27-28; T 1598, k. 8, p. 427b10-11).

On the other hand, the Tibetan translations present difficulties: here are some differences:

Mahāvvyut., ed. Sakaki, no. 6865: khye ḥus khye ḥu ḥbyun baḥI tshul du.

Transl of the Samdhinirmocana ed. in Explication des Mysteres, 1935, p. 115, l. 28-30: khye ḥus khye ḥu dbyun tshul du.

Transl of the Mahāyanasamgraha ed. in Somme du Grand Véhicule. I, 1938, p. 70, l. 26-27: khe ḥus khye ḥu dbyun baḥI tshul du, with the variant khyi ḥus khyi ḥu sbyun baḥi tshul du.

But khye ḥu means a boy and khyi ḥu a little dog, which would give the expression an unsatisfying meaning: “As one drives out a boy by means of a boy” or “As one drives out little dog by means of a little dog”. See Tibetan-English Dictionary, S. C. Das, p. 160, v. khiḥuḥi-khyiḥu.

My [Lamotte] respected colleague, Walter Simon, has examined the question and proposes to correct khye ḥu by ke ḥu, “wedge”, a word mentioned in the Manual of Colloquial Tibetan by Sir Charles Bell, 1905, p. 438. The phrase would then mean: “As one drives out a peg by means of a peg”, in perfect agreement with the original Sanskrit and the Chinese translation.

Consulted in turn by W. Simon, Prof. J. Brough comes to the following conclusion: [In English] As an alternative for consideration, I would like to suggest that khye ḥu might be the correct reading, but that the word is used as a technical term in ‘carpenter’s language’ for ‘peg’ or ‘pin’. The semantic situation would then be similar to that of English ‘male screw’.

Information gathered in the Tibetan culture would confirm Prof. Simon’s conjecture. In a letter dated July 3, 1967, P. Denwood writes from Kathmandu: [In English] “I have been asking my Tibetan friends about your ke ḥu. Both Tashi and Pasang Khambache know the word. Tashi knows it as a piece of ‘carpenter’s language’, Pasang as a word in Sherpa language, and both agree that it means a wedge of hard wood or metal used for splitting wood. First an axe cut is made, then the wedge driven in with a hammer. A wedge for holding open a door or other static use is known to all Tibetans I have asked as ‘tsab’ This word is given as rtsabs on pg. 957 of Lama Dawa Ssamdup Kazi’s English-Tibetan These aspirations are fully and completely known (prajāñāti) by the Buddha and as this knowledge is intact (avyāhata) and invincible (ajeya) [in him], it is called the fifth ‘power’.

VI. THE KNOWLEDGE OF ACQUIRED DISPOSITIONS

The power of the knowledge of acquired dispositions (dhātuññābala). The Buddha knows the world with its many varied acquired dispositions (nānādhātukaṃ lokam anekadhātukaṃ prajāñāti).

By acquired disposition (dhātu) is meant an accumulated habitual pattern (ācītavāsana). The characteristics (lakṣaṇa) arise from the dhātu. The aspiration (adhimukti) functions in accordance with the dhātu. Sometimes the dhātu results from the adhimukti. Habitual patterns (vāsana) and aspirations (adhimukti) realize the dhātu. Dhātu is the lofty resolution (adhyāśaya), adhimukti arises as a result of the conditions (pratītyasamutpanna). These are the differences between adhimukti and dhātu.⁶⁵⁰

The Buddha knows “the world with its many various acquired dispositions”; indeed, each being has many dispositions, infinite (apramāṇa) and incalculable (asaṃkhyeya) dispositions. This is what is called the many dispositions of the world.

There are two kinds of world (loka): the world as universe (lokadhātu) and the world of beings (sattvadhātu). Here it is a question of the world of beings only.

The Buddha knows that beings have such and such acquired dispositions (dhātu), such and such aspirations (adhimukti) and that they come from such and such a place (sthāna). He knows the beings endowed with good roots (kuśalamūla) or bad roots (akuśalamūla), those who are able to be converted (vaineya) or incapable of being converted (avaineya), determinate (niyata) or indeterminate (aniyata), destined or not Dictionary which also has ka-ru and skyeg-bu for ‘wedge’. Tashi pronounces ‘kiu’ (unaspirated) and Pasang ‘khiu’ (aspirated). Other Tibetans have not heard the word. The shape seems to be normal wedge-shape.”

This digression may perhaps be of some use to many readers of Buddhist-Hybrid Dictionary by Edgerton where the innocent phrase āṇīpratyāñīrnhārayogena which appears on p. 91 is interpreted as ‘by homosexual procedure’.

⁶⁵⁰ Kośavyākhyā, p. 385: Pūrvañjanmasu guṇadoṣavidyāśīlpakarmābhyaśebhyo yā vāsana tās khale iha dhātavo viśeṣeṇa bodbhavyāḥ: “Here in particular, by dhātu we should understand the traces resulting from the qualities, faults, sciences and arts, actions and habitual patterns in the course of previous rebirths.”

Dhātu should be interpreted in the same way in the canonical passage (Saṃyutta, II, p. 154, 157): Dhātuso sattā saṃsandanti samenti: “It is because of their acquired dispositions that beings come together, marry.” The hīnādhimuktikas join with the hīnādhimuktikas, the kalyānādhimuktikas with the kalyānādhimuktikas.

There is a slight difference between adhimukti, dhātu and āśaya, as the Traité says here.

destined; he knows in what practices they are engaged, in what places they are born, in what lands they are to be found.

Furthermore, the Buddha knows the various dispositions particular to beings. According to the place where they are led, they have such and such inclinations, such and such evaluations, such and such high resolutions, such and such actions, such and such conduct, such and such emotions, such and such knowledge of life, determination, attitude, ways of seeing, ways of thinking; they do or do not acquire such and such fetters (saṃyojana).

Among them, attachment rules aspiration, aspiration rules defiled mind (variant: profound), defiled mind rules direction, direction rules evaluation, [239c] evaluation rules inquiry (vitarka), inquiry rules judgment (vicāra), inquiry and judgment rule speech (bhāṣā),⁶⁵¹ speech rules mindfulness, mindfulness rules activity, activity rules action and action rules retribution.

Furthermore, using this power of knowledge of the various acquired dispositions, the Buddha knows the beings capable or incapable of being converted, the beings to be converted in the present existence or in a future existence, the beings to be converted at this very moment or at another time, the beings to be converted publicly or without being seen, the beings to be converted by the Buddha, by a śrāvaka or by both together, the beings to be necessarily converted or not, the beings to be converted by a short discourse, by a developed discourse or by a discourse first shortened and then developed, the beings to be converted by praise or by blows, the beings to be converted by seeing them frequently or by leaving them alone, the beings to be converted by a subtle teaching or by an obvious teaching, the beings to be converted by suffering, by gentleness, or by both suffering and gentleness.

The Buddha knows those who have wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) and those who have right views (samyagdr̥ṣṭi), those who are attached to the past (atīta) or the future (anāgata), attached to nihilism (uccheda) or eternalism (śāśvata), attached to the view of existence (bhavadr̥ṣṭi) or the view of non-existence (vibhavadr̥ṣṭi), wanting to be reborn or disgusted with rebirth, seeking happiness in wealth and fame or attached to dull wrong views.

The Buddha knows those who profess the non-existence of causes and conditions; those who profess wrong causes and conditions or right causes and conditions; those who profess non-action, bad action or right action; those who advocate non-seeking, wrong seeking or right seeking; those who esteem the self, the five objects of enjoyment, gain, drink and food, joking; those who like crowds, company (samsarga) or solitude (parivarjana), those who indulge especially in pleasures (rāgacaritra) or those who indulge especially in wrong views (dr̥ṣṭicarita); those who love faith or those who love wisdom; those who should be kept or those who should be left behind; those who esteem discipline (śīla), concentration (samādhi) or wisdom (prajñā); those who understand easily or those who understand with difficulty by means of explanations; those whom it is enough to guide and those to whom it must be explained word by word; those who are of keen faculties (tikṣṇendriya), of weak faculties (mṛdvindriya) or of medium faculties (madhyendriya); those who are easy to pull out or tear out and those who are difficult to pull out or tear out; those who are afraid of wrong-doing and those who have heavy faults; those who fear saṃsāra and those who do not fear saṃsāra; those who abound in desire (rāga), in hatred (dveṣa) or in ignorance (moha); those who abound in both desire and hatred, or in desire, hatred and ignorance; those whose emotions are slight and those whose emotions are heavy; those who have few afflictions (mala) and those who have many; those who have a clouded wisdom, a shallow wisdom or vast wisdom.

The Buddha knows the people who understand well the five aggregates (skandha), the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana), the eighteen elements (dhātu), the twelve-membered dependent origination (dvādaśāṅgapratītyasamutpāda), the things that are possible (sthāna) and the things that are impossible (asthāna), suffering (duḥkha), its origin (samudaya), its cessation (nirodha) and the path to its cessation (mārga); who understand well how to enter [240a] into meditative stabilization (samādhipraveśa), come out of it (vyuṭṭhāna) or remain in it (sthiti).

Furthermore, the Buddha knows the beings belonging to the desire realm (kāmadhātu), the form realm (rūpadhātu) or the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu); the beings [in the realms of the] damned (naraka), animals (tiryagyoni), hungry ghosts, humans (manuṣya) or gods (deva): born from eggs (aṇḍaja), from the womb (jarāyuja), from moisture (saṃsvedaaja) or of apparitional birth (upapāduka); with form (rūpin) or formless (arūpin); aware (saṃjñika) or unaware (asaṃjñika); of short life (alpāyuṣa) or of long life (dīrghāyuṣa); simple ordinary people (prthagjana) who have not yet destroyed desire (avītarāga) or ordinary people who have destroyed the desire of the lower levels (avarabhūmi) but have not yet destroyed the desire of the dhyānas. The Buddha knows all these beings up to and including the beings who are neither discriminating nor non-discriminating (naivasamjñānāsamjñā), the holy candidates [for the fruits] of the path (mārgaphalapratipannaka) or in possession of the fruits of the path (phalaprajñā), the pratyekabuddhas or the buddhas at unhindered liberation and various other categories of this type: the five destinies (gati), the four modes of birth (yoni), the three categories (rāsi),⁶⁵² the designations (prajñapti), the obstacles (āvatana), the aggregates (skandha), the bases of consciousness (āyatana), the elements (dhātu), the roots of good (kuśalamūla), the roots of bad (akuśalamūla), the fetters (saṃyojana), the levels (bhūmi), actions (karman), the fruits (phala), the beings capable of being converted (vaineya) or incapable of being converted, the knowledge of the destruction of suffering (nirodhajñāna), etc.

These are all the distinctions that “the Buddha knows the world with its many and varied acquired dispositions” and its deliverance is without obstacle. The Buddha knows completely and fully these many diverse dispositions and, since this knowledge is intact (avyāhata) and invincible (ajeya) [in him], it is called the ‘sixth power’.

⁶⁵¹ According to the principle Vitarkaṃ vicārya vācam bhāṣate nāvitarkaṃ nāvicārya. Cf. Majjhima, I p. 301; Samyutta, IV, p. 293.

⁶⁵² The category predestined for salvation (samyakvāṇiyatarāsi), the category predestined to bad rebirths (mithyāṇiyatarāsi), the category foreign to the two previous ones (anīyatarāsi): see Dīgha, III, p. 217; Dhammasaṅgaṇī, p. 186; Kośa, III, p. 137.

VII. THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE WAY LEADING TO THE VARIOUS DESTINIES

The power of the knowledge of the way leading to the various destinies (sarvatragāminīpratipajñānabala).⁶⁵³

1) Some say that action (karman) is this way (pratipad). Why? It is because of action that one circulates through the destinies (pañcagati). If action exists, there is the possibility of destroying it and putting an end to it. This ending consists of the three elements of the noble Path (āryamārga)⁶⁵⁴ and pure intention (anāsravacetanā). This is why actions are the way leading to the various destinies.

2) Others say that it is the concentration of five members and five knowledges. [A note in red says that this is pure concentration (anāsravasamādhi) and the five factors of trance (dhyānāṅga).] In all cases, it realizes profitable things (upakāra).

3) Others say that the fourth dhyāna is the way in question. Why? The fourth dhyāna is the culmination of all the concentrations; as is said in the sūtras, the good minds (kuśalacitta), concentrated (samāhita), free of distraction (avikṣipta), collected (saṃgrhita), all enter into the fourth dhyāna.⁶⁵⁵

4) Others say that mindfulness of the body (kāyasmṛtyupasthāna) is the way leading to the various destinies (sarvatragāminī pratipad), for it is the origin (mūla) of the benefits (upakāra) resulting from the Path.

⁶⁵³ Pratipad, ‘way’, should be understood as the cause determining the five destinies (naraka, tiryagoni, preta, manuṣya, deva-gatī) and nirvāṇa: cf. Vibhaṅga, p. 339. l. 8-10. We may note, with Kośa, VII, p. 70, that pratipad is the cause of the destinies but not of nirodha.

⁶⁵⁴ Śīla, samādhi and prajñā.

⁶⁵⁵ Entry into the dhyānas is the natural culmination of a state of mental concentration. Śākyamuni had this experience on the night of his awakening: Vin., III, p. 4; Majjhima, I, p. 21, 117, 186, 242-243; III, p. 85-87; Saṃyutta, IV, p. 125; V, p. 68, 76, 331, 332; Anguttara, I, p. 148, 282; II, p. 14; Itivuttaka, p. 119-120: Āraddhaṃ kho pana me viriyaṃ ahoṣi asallīnaṃ, upaṭṭhiṭṭaṃ sati asammūṭṭhā, passaddho kāyo asāradḍho, samāhitaṃ cittaṃ ekaggam. So kho ahaṃ... pathamaṃ... dutiyaṃ... tatiyaṃ... catutthaṃ jhānaṃ upasampajja vihāsim: “There opened within me an energy without laziness; present, an unfailing mindfulness; my body was relaxed and impassive; my mind, concentrated and one-pointed. This is how I attained and remained in the first... second... third... fourth dhyāna.”

The fourth dhyāna is the best way to nirvāṇa. According to the canonical scriptures (Dīgha, III, p. 106, 228; Anguttara, II, p. 149-152; V, p. 63) there are four ways: i) the difficult way for slow intellects (pratipad duḥkhā dhandhābhijñā), ii) the difficult way for quick intellects (pratipad duḥkha kṣiprābhijñā), iii) the easy way for slow intellects (pratipad sukhā dhandhābhijñā), iv) the easy way for quick intellects (pratipad sukhā kṣiprābhijñā). And the Kośabhāṣyā, p. 382, explains: Caturdhyāneṣu mārگاḥ pratipad aṅgaparigrahaśamathavipaśyanāsamatābhyām ayatnavāhitvāt: “The path followed in the dhyānas is the easy path for it proceeds effortlessly, being furnished with the factors [of the dhyānas] and having a complete balance of quietude and insight.”

5) Others say that it is a question of all the noble paths (āryamārga) for, by using these noble paths, one obtains the benefits at will (yatheṣṭam).

6) Finally, there are teachers who have explained all the good paths, all the bad paths, all the noble paths, and for each of them, [the Buddha] knows the culmination as is said in the Mao-chou king (Romaharṣaṇīyasūtra).⁶⁵⁶

The Buddha knows all of this fully and completely (prajānati) and, since this wisdom is intact (avyāhati) and invincible (ajeya) [in him], it is called the ‘seventh power’.

VIII. THE KNOWLEDGE OF FORMER ABODESS

The power of the knowledge of former abodes (pūrvanivāsajñānabala).

Former abodes⁶⁵⁷ are of three types: i) those of which one has the awareness (abhijñā), ii) those of which one has the knowledge (vidyā), iii) those that are the object of the power of knowledge (jñānabala).

The ordinary person has only the awareness of them. The śrāvaka has both the awareness and the knowledge of them. The Buddha has the awareness, the knowledge and the power [of the knowledge] of them. Why is that? The ordinary person knows only through which former abodes he has passed but does not know what sequence of karmic causes and conditions (karmahetupratyayabandha) provoked them.

⁶⁵⁶ The Hair-raising Sūtra, understood here not as a sign of fear but as a sign of joy. This is the Mahāsihanāda of the Majjhima, I, p. 68-83. At the end of this text, Nāgasamāla asks the Bhagavat how to name this sūtra, and the Buddha gives him the title, in Sanskrit, Romaharṣaṇīyasūtra, cf. Karmavibhaṅgopadeśa, p. 158, l. 11), in Pāli, LomahaŌanapariyāya (cf. Majjhima, I, p. 83, l. 25; Milindapañha, p. 396, l. 2) or Lomaḥsaṃsanassutta (Sumaṅgala, I, p. 179, l. 3).

This is one of the rare cases where a Hīnayāna sūtra itself gives its own title. On the other hand, the Mahāyānasūtras generally end by allocating two or three titles to themselves. Cf. Vimalakīrti, p. 392, n. 42.

The Mahāsihanāda, alsias Lomaḥsaṃsana, has been the object of several Chinese translations, the oldest of which were incomplete: Tsa a han, T 99, no. 684, k. 26, p. 186b26-187b6; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 23, p. 670c2- 672b3; k. 42, p. 776b14-777a14; k. 48, p. 811a29-812b13; Chen mao hi chou king, T 757, p. 591c-600b; Sin kiai tcho li king, T 802, p. 747a-748c.

This sūtra alludes to a number of śrāmaṇas and brahmaṇas searching for the path of deliverance and purity (śuddhi) in food (āhāra), saṃsāra, rebirths (upapatti), dwellings (āvāsa), sacrifice (yajña) or sacrifices (agniparicāraṇa). The Buddha, who has followed all these paths in the course of innumerable existences which he remembers, declares that they are not the true Path.

⁶⁵⁷ We may recall that former abodes (pūrvanivāsa) form the object of the fifth abhijñā (within the range of the ordinary person as well as the saint), of the first vidyā (reserved for the śrāvaka) and the eighth jñānabala (belonging to the Buddha).

This is why the ordinary person has only awareness (abhijñā) of former abodes, but does not have knowledge (vidyā) of them.

Because he knows the truth of the origin of suffering [240b] (samudayasatya), the śrāvaka knows clearly the sequence of causes and conditions from which the previous abodes derived. This is why the śrāvaka has the awareness (abhijñā) and the knowledge (vidyā) of them.

If at the start, when he was still an ordinary person (prthagjana), the śrāvaka had awareness of his previous abodes and later, having entered into the path of seeing the truths (satyadarśanamārga), he recognized the causes and conditions of their origins, it is during the eighth pure mind (aṣṭamaṇī 'nāsravacitte') that he succeeds in cutting off wrong views (dṛṣṭi) and from then on the [simple] awareness (abhijñā) [that he had of his previous existences] changes into knowledge (vidyā). Why? Because knowledge (vidyā) is the root of seeing (darśanamūla).

On the other hand, if the śrāvaka first obtains the noble path [of seeing the truths] and only later does the knowledge of former abodes arise in him, he has already recognized the power of the causes and conditions which are the origin [of suffering] and, from then on, the awareness (abhijñā) that he has of his former abodes changes into knowledge (vidyā).

Question. - But at the beginning, when he was still the Bodhisattva, the Buddha had awareness of his earlier abodes, then cut off the passions inherent in the sphere of nothingness (ākimcanyāyatana) and finally entered into the noble path [of seeing the truths].⁶⁵⁸ [In these conditions], why did the Buddha say: "In the first watch of the night [of the enlightenment, when I was still a worldly person], I obtained the first knowledge (vidyā), [i.e., the knowledge of former abodes]"?⁶⁵⁹

[According to your reasoning, the Buddha should have said that he obtained the awareness (abhijñā) of former abodes and not their knowledge (vidyā).]

Answer. – At that time, [during the first watch of the night of enlightenment], it was not yet a knowledge (vidyā). But later, when the Buddha was in public, he said: "It was at that time that I attained this knowledge", and he declared to people: "This knowledge was obtained by me during the first watch."

⁶⁵⁸ When he was seated under the Bodhi tree, Śākyamuni was still only a worldly person (prthagjana).

He attained enlightenment in 34 moments of mind: 16 moments of the Path of seeing and 18 moments of the path of meditation. See above, p. 434F, 1036F; Kośa, II, p. 206; VI, p. 137, n. 3; J. May, Candrakīrti, p. 216-217 and notes.

⁶⁵⁹ Majjhima, I, p. 22, l. 23-25; 248, l. 13-15; Mahāvastu, II, p. 283, l. 13-14; Lalitavistara, p. 344, l. 5-8. Although at that very time the future Buddha was still an ordinary person, all the sources agree in saying that he had acquired the knowledge (vidyā) - not the awareness (abhijñā) - of former abodes (pūrvanivāsa), also called the divine eye (divyacakṣus).

On the acquisition of the three knowledges by the bodhisattva, see Majjhima, I, p. 22, l. 9-23, l. 28; p. 117; p. 247, l. 36-249, l. 22; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 25, p. 589c14-23; Tsaeng yi a han, T 125, k. 23, p. 666b22-666c20; Dharmagupataka Vin., T 1428, k. 31, p. 781b5-c11; Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1450, k. 5, p. 124a9-b7; Mahāvastu, II, p. 283, l. 13-285, l. 21; Lalitavistara, p. 344, l. 5-345, l. 22.

He may be compared to the king who, before exerting his kingship, had fathered a son. Only later, when this king was exerting his kingship, people questioned him about his son and asked when he had been born. The king replied: "The king's son was born at such and such a date." However, at the time when his son had been born, the king was not yet exerting his kingship, but as now he is the king, he considers his son as son of the king and he affirms that 'the king's son' was born at that particular date.

It is the same for the Buddha. At the time when he knowledge of former abodes (pūrvanivāsajñāna) arose in him, it was not yet a knowledge (vidyā) but was only an awareness (abhijñā). But in the course of the last watch [of enlightenment], the Buddha recognized the causes and conditions of the origin [of suffering] and from then on this 'awareness' [of former abodes] changed into 'knowledge'. And later in public, the Buddha declared: "During the first watch, I obtained this knowledge."

Question. – That is what should be understood by awareness (abhijñā) and knowledge (vidyā) [of former abodes]. Then what is the power (bala) [consisting of awareness of these abodes]?

By using this knowledge (vidyā), for himself as well as for other people, the Buddha knows the former abodes occupied during innumerable and infinite generations as well as the many causes and conditions from which they derive. The Buddha knows this fully and completely (prajānati), and as this knowledge is intact (avyāhata) and invincible (ajeya)⁶⁶⁰ in him, it is called the 'eighth power'.

IX. THE KNOWLEDGE OF DEATH AND REBIRTH

The power of the knowledge of death and rebirth (cyutyupapādajñānabala). Using the divine eye, the Buddha sees the place of deaths and rebirths of beings.

The worldly person (prthagjana) using the divine eye sees, at the maximum, one universe of four directions (caturdvīpaka). The śrāvaka, at the maximum, sees about a small chiliocosm (sāhasracūḍika lokadhātu); he sees it entirely from top (ūrdhva) to bottom (adhas).⁶⁶¹ ⁶⁶⁰ According to the variant no. 9 in the Taisho edition, p. 240.

⁶⁶¹ Cf. Kośabhāṣya, p. 419-430: Kiyad dūraṃ punar divyena cakṣuṣā paśyati. yasya yādṛṣaṃ cakṣur bhavati. śrāvakapratyekabuddhabuddhās tv anabhisamṣkāreṇa sāhasradviśāhasrakāṇ lokadhātūn yathāsamākhyam paśyanti... savābhisamṣkāreṇa saha śrāvakao 'pi divisahasraṃ lokadhātūn divyena cakṣuṣā paśyati, trisāhasra ṃ khadgaviṣāṇkalpaḥ, buddhas tu bhagavān asamākhyeyāṇ lokadhātūn paśyati yāvadevecchati.

Transl. – To what distance does one see with the divine eye? That depends on who possesses the eye and the eye itself. The śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and the Buddhas, without any effort, see sāhasra, divisāhasra and trisāhasra universes respectively. With effort, with the divine eye, the śrāvaka sees up to one divisāhasra, the rhinoceros-like [pratyekabuddha] sees a trisāhasra, and the Buddha Bhagavat sees as many innumerable universes as he wishes.

The sāhasra, divisāhasra and trisāhasra universes have been defined above, p. 337-448F.

Question. – But the great Brahmarāja, he too is able to see a chiliocosm. How does the śrāvaka differ from him?

Answer. – The great Brahmarāja, standing in the middle (madhya) of the chiliocosm, sees it all, but standing at the edge (pārśve), he does not see the other parts. This is not so for the śrāvaka: wherever he is, he always sees [all of] the chiliocosm.⁶⁶²

The pratyekabuddha sees a hundred thousand universes (lokadhātu); the Buddhas see innumerable (apramāṇa) and infinite (ananta) universes.

In worldly people (prthagjana), the knowledge of the divine eye (divyacakṣurjñāna) is an awareness (abhijñā) but not yet a knowledge (vidya). He sees only the things (vastu) that exist, but he cannot see for what karmic causes and conditions (karmahetupratyaya) they have taken birth. See what has been said in regard to former abodes (p. 155F).

Furthermore, in A-ni-lou-teou (Aniruddha), the foremost of those who possess the divine eye, the material derived from the four great elements (caturmahābhautikarūpa) of the form realm – the matter constituting his divine eye – was only semi-pure (prasanna). On the other hand, in the Buddha, the divine [240c] eye, material derived from the four great elements, is completely pure: this is the difference.

Furthermore, it is in the concentrations (samādhi) in which he is dwelling (viharati) that the śrāvaka obtains the divine eye and it is in the concentrations in which he is dwelling that he can see, and this is a matter of concentration with investigation and analysis (śavitarakasavicārasamādhi), of concentration without investigation but with analysis (śavitaraka vicāramātra samādhi), or of concentration with neither investigation or analysis (śavitarakāvicārṣasamādhi). On the contrary, as soon as he enters (praviśati) into concentration, the Buddha, if he so wishes, is able to see everything. Abiding in concentration without investigation or analysis, he obtains the divine eye; entering into concentration with investigation and analysis, or into concentration without investigation but with analysis, he can see equally.

Furthermore, when the śrāvaka sees by means of the divine eye and if his mind in concentration (samādhicitta) enters into another concentration, his divine eye disappears. This is not the case in the Buddha: even if his mind enters into another concentration, his divine eye does not disappear.

By means of this knowledge, the Buddha knows the places of birth and death of all beings and since this knowledge is intact (avyāhata) and invincible (ajeya) [in him], it is called the ‘ninth power’.

X. THE POWER OF THE DESTRUCTION OF THE IMPURITIES

The power of the knowledge of the destruction of the impurities (āśravakṣayajñānabala).

⁶⁶² Being natural and acquired by birth, the divine eye of the gods, including Brahmarāja, is defiled by eleven apakṣāla; as it is acquired by abhijñā, the eye of the śrāvaka is free of defilement and is very pure (suviśuddha). Cf. Kośavyākhyā, p. 279, l. 5-9.

Question. – There are differences in the degrees of knowledge for the first nine powers: [namely, of the śrāvakas, the pratyekabuddhas or the Buddha]; but here the destruction of the impurities (āśravakṣaya) is the same [for all]. How is [the knowledge of the Buddha] different here from that of the śrāvaka and the pratyekabuddha?

Answer. – Although the destruction of the impurities (āśravakṣaya) is the same [in all], the various knowledges (jñānaviśeṣa) [which recognize them] is very different.⁶⁶³

In the śrāvaka, the very strong fetters to be destroyed by meditation (bhāvanāheyaśamyojana) are destroyed at three times: i) the time of arising (utpādashāga), ii) the time of duration (sthitiśhāga) and iii) the time of disappearance (bhaṅgaśhāga). This is not the case in the Buddha: it is at the very moment of their arising that they are completely destroyed.

⁶⁶³ It is acknowledged in both Vehicles that liberation (vimukti), in other words, the destruction of the impurities (āśravakṣaya), is the same in the śrāvaka, the pratyekabuddha and the Buddha (cf. Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 31, p. 62b-c; Kośa, VI, p. 282; Vasumitra, transl. Masuda, p. 49 (thesis 37 of the Sarvāstivādin), p. 62 (thesis 22 of the Mahīśāsaka), p. 64 (thesis 3 of the Dharmaguptaka); Saṃdhinirmocana. X, §2; Sūtrālamkāra, XI, v. 53 (vimokṣatulyatva); Saṃgraha, p. 327-328; Buddhahūmiśāstra, T 1530, k. 5, p. 312b7-15.

No matter that there are many differences between the bodhi of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas on the one hand and the anuttarasamyakśambodhi of the Buddhas on the other hand. They are noted in many texts: Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 143, p. 735b; Traité here and at k. 53, p. 436b. The latter is perhaps inspired by the Upāsakaśīlasūtra, T 1488, k. 1, p. 1038a-c (analysed in Hobogirin, p. 87):

The śrāvakas obtain bodhi by debating, the pratyekabuddhas by reflecting, and they understand only a part of the truth; the Buddhas understand everything without a teacher, without listening, without meditating, as a result of their practices.

The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas know the general characteristics (sāmānyalakṣaṇa) of things; the Buddhas know the specific characteristics (śvalakṣaṇa) and only they are omniscient.

The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas know the four noble truths (saṭya) but not causes and conditions (hetupratyaya); the Buddhas know the causes and conditions. The water of the Ganges being compared to the river of pratiṭyasamupāda, the śrāvaka is like a rabbit that crosses the river without knowing its depth; the pratyekabuddha is like a horse that knows the depth when it touches the bottom; the Buddha is like the elephant that knows its full depth.

The śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have cut off the passions (kleśa) but not their habitual tendencies (vāśanā); the Buddha has cut off everything at the root.

- We should recall once more that all these differences are of interest only to the scholar of the Lesser Vehicle of whom the Traité here is only a spokesman without sharing his opinions. From the Mahāyāna point of view to which the Traité subscribes, bodhi is only a name and, in the true sense, śrāvaka, pratyekabuddha and Buddha do not exist: see Vimalakīrti, p. 195-196, 423-425.

In the śrāvaka, the fetters to be destroyed by seeing the truths (satyadarśanaheyaśaṃyojana) are destroyed at the moment of their arising, but the fetters to be destroyed by meditation (bhāvanāheyaśaṃyojana) are destroyed at three times. For the Buddha there is no difference between the fetters to be destroyed by seeing the truths the fetters to be destroyed by meditation.⁶⁶⁴

When the śrāvaka enters the noble path [of darśanamārga] for the first time, the moment of entry (praveśakāla consisting of the duḥkhe dharmajñānakṣānti) is distinct from the moment of understanding (abhisamayakāla consisting of the duḥkhe dharmajñāna). In the Buddha, it is in a single moment of mind that the entry (praveśa) and the understanding (abhisamaya) occur. He obtains omniscience (sarvajñāna), destroys all the obstacles (āvaraṇa) and obtains all the attributes of Buddha in a single moment of mind.

The śrāvakas have two kinds of liberation (vimukti): i) liberation from the passions (kleśavimukti) and ii) liberation from the obstacles to the Dharma (dharmāvaraṇavimukti). The Buddha possesses liberation from all the conflicting emotions and also liberation from all the obstacles to the Dharma.⁶⁶⁵ ⁶⁶⁴ The passions to be abandoned during the Path of meditation are called bhāvanāheyaśaṃyojana, bhāvanākleśa or also savastukakleśa ‘passions with point of support’ (Kośa, VI, p. 257). Each of the nine levels – kāmadhātu, four dhyānas, four samāpattis – making nine categories: strong-strong, strong-medium, strong-weak, medium-strong... (Kośa, VI, p. 199). Thus there are in all 81 categories of bhāvanāheyaśaṃyojana of which each is destroyed by one moment of abandoning or expelling (prahāna or ānantaryamārga) and one moment of liberation (vimuktimārga) (Kośa, VI, p. 198-199); in all, 162 moments of mind.

The passions to be abandoned in the course of the Path of seeing the truths are called darśanaheya, dr̥gheya or also avastuka ‘passions without point of support’ In their nature they are ‘wrong view’ (dr̥ṣṭi), belief in a self, etc. (Kośa, VI, p. 257). They are destroyed by seeing the four noble truths, suffering, its origin, its cessation and the path to its cessation. The ascetic takes possession of each of these truths by two moments of mental acceptance (kṣānti) and by two moments of knowledge (jñāna): in all, sixteen moments of mind. The mental acceptances are the path of destruction (prahāṇamārga) or the uninterrupted path (ānantaryamārga) because they cut through doubt; the knowledges are possession of the cessation of doubt (Kośa, VI, p. 183-185, 189-191). For a succinct explanation of the Path, refer to my [Lamotte’s] Histoire du bouddhisme indien, p. 677-686.

For the ordinary practitioner, the bhāvanamārga is long, whereas the darśanamārga is quick (Kośa, VII, 8). This is why it destroys the passions to be destroyed by meditation in three times and the passions to be destroyed by seeing in one time. The Buddha destroys all the categories in one single moment. This does not prevent the scholastic from attributing 34 moments of mind to the enlightenment of a Buddha (see above, p. 1556F, n. 1).

⁶⁶⁵ A passage the extreme conciseness of which makes it obscure. If I [Lamotte] understand it well, the śrāvaka is liberated from the obstacle consisting of the conflicting emotions (kleśāvaraṇa) and only a part of the obstacle to knowledge (jñeyāvaraṇa), that which opposes awareness of the Dharma and the four noble truths. The Buddha is free of the obstacle consisting of the passions and the obstacle opposing the grouping of knowledge, of awareness of all things in all their aspects (sarvākārajñāna).

It is by himself (svatas) that the Buddha attains wisdom (prajñā). The śrāvakas, on the other hand, obtain it by following the teachings (deśanā) of another.

Furthermore, some say: When the Buddha cuts off the defilements (kleśa) of all beings by means of his wisdom, his own knowledge is neither dulled nor diminished. Just as a red-hot iron ball (ādīptāyogudā) set down on a cotton cloth (nīlapaṭṭikā) burns the cotton without its power of combustion being diminished, so the Buddha’s wisdom burns all the defilements without the power of his knowledge (jñānabala) being thereby diminished.

Furthermore, the śrāvakas know only if their own impurities are destroyed. The Buddhas know that their own impurities are destroyed and also know if those of others are also destroyed. On this subject see the Tsing king (Prašāntasūtra).⁶⁶⁶

Above (p. 346F), the Traité has mentioned the triad of obstacles consisting of the passions (kleśa), action (karma) and retribution (vipāka). This triad is of canonical origin (Anguttara, III, p. 435; Vibhaṅga, p. 341). The Adhyadhaśatikā (T 240, k. 1, p. 776b6-7; T 243, k. 1, p. 784b14; T 244, k. 1, p. 786c22-23) and the Laṅkāvatāra, p. 241, propose another triad: kleśa-, karma-, and dharma-āvaraṇa, but do not define the last one.

⁶⁶⁶ A sūtra presenting, beside the Buddha, the bodhisattva Mañjuśrī and the devaputra Praśastavinayeśvara (in Tibetan, Rab tu Āi ba rnam par dul baḥi dban phyug), a name usually misinterpreted in Chinese as Praśanta-vinaya-avara: Tsi chouen liu yin according to Dharmarakṣa, (T460, p. 448b3), Tsi tiao fou yin according to Kumārajīva (T 1489, p. 1075c10), Tsi tiao yin according to Fa hai, (T 1490, , p. 1081a19). The Chinese have maltreated the name of Avalokiteśvara in the same way, which they most often render as Avalokita-svara. The sūtra in question here deals with conventional and absolute truth (saṃvṛtiparamārthasatya) in its first section. This explains the many titles under which it has been cited. It was translated into Chinese four times (but the second translation has been lost) and into Tibetan once.

1) T 460: Wen chou che li tsing liu king (Mañjuśrīpraśantavinayasūtra), tr. by Dharmarakṣa of the Si Tsin. The colophon of this translation is preserved in the Tch’ou (T 2145, k. 7, p. 51b8-13): The śramaṇa Tchou Fa-hou (Dharmarakṣa), at the capital (Lo-yang), met Tsi-tche of the Western Land who issued this sūtra orally. The sūtra still contained many chapters which this man had forgotten, but what he did issue was soon translated into the language of the Tsin. Having recovered the original, Dharmarakṣa corrected and completed the translation on the 8th day of the 4th month of the ‘ai-k’ang year (May 14, 289) at the Po-ma sseu [of Lo-yang]. Nie Tao-tchen wrote it down with the brush.”

This translation was listed in the Tchong king lou (419) of Tchou Tao-tsou (Li, T 2034, k. 6, p. 63a11-12; K’ai, T 2154, k. 2, p. 495a1-2).

2) T 1489: Ts’ing-tsing p’i-ni fang-kouang king (Praśantavinayaivaipulyasūtra), tr. by Kumārajīva of the Later Tsin, at an undetermined date between 402 and 409. This was the third translation, also called Tsing liu king (Praśantavinayasūtra): cf. K’ai. T 2154. k. 4, p. 513a3; k. 12, p. 606b19.

Finally, the Buddha is the only one who knows the modalities inherent in the minds of beings with their ninety-eight perverse tendencies (anuśaya)⁶⁶⁷ and their ninety-six errors (pariyavasthāna).⁶⁶⁸ no one but the Buddha knows them. [241a]

The Buddha is also the only one who knows the nature of the fetters destroyed in the course of the dukkhe dharmajñāna, the dukkhe 'nvayañāna and so on up to the mārga 'nvayañāna. Similarly, he knows [the fetters] destroyed by meditation (bhāvanāhīna) in the course of the nine moments of liberation (vimuktimārga).⁶⁶⁹

The Buddha knows these things about beings fully and completely (prajānāti). The little that the śrāvaka knows of them or says about them may be ascribed to the Buddha's teachings.

This is the power in the Buddha of the knowledge of destruction of the impurities (āśravaṣṭayajñānaprabhāva) and, since this knowledge is intact (avyāhata) and invincible (ajeya) [in him], it is called the 'tenth power'.

At the end of the sūtra (T 1489, p. 1081a7-9), Ānanda asks the Buddha what he should call it, and the Buddha proposes three titles to him: i) Tsi tiao fou yin t'ien tseu so wen (Prašāntavinayasvaradevaputrapariprcchā); ii) Ts'ing tsiung p'i ni (Prašāntabinaya); iii) Yi ts'ie fo fa (Sarvabuddhadharma).

3) T 1490: Tsi tiao yin so wen king (Prašāntavinayasvarapariprcchāsūtra), tr. by Che Fa hai of the Lieou Song (420-479) from an original identical with that of Dharmarakṣa. This was the fourth translation and it was also called Jou-lai so chou ts'ing tsiung tiao fou king (Tathāgatokṛtām Praśāntavinayasūtram): cf. Nei, T 2149, k. 4, p. 261b26; K'ai, T 2154, k. 1, p. 484c3-4; k. 5, p. 532b23-24.

4) Tib. Trip. no. 846, vol. 34, p. 104-2-7 to 113-5-6: Kun rdzob dan don dam paḥi bden pa bstan pa (Saṃvṛtiparamārthasatyanirdeśa. – In Mahāvvyut., no. 1368: Paramārthasaṃvṛtisatyanirdeśa), tr. by Śākyaprabha, Jinamitra and Dharmatāṣhila, in the first quarter of the 9th century.

On p. 113, fol. 279a3, the Buddha proposes as the only title of the sūtra: Kun rdzob dan don dam paḥi bden pa bstan pa.

This sūtra contrasts the śrāvaka Vinaya with that of the bodhisattva and it particularly notes: "Personally cutting one's own bonds of the passions (kleśabandhana) is the Śrāvakavinaya; wanting to cut the passions of all beings is the Bodhisattvinaya" (cf. T 1489c7-8; T 460, p. 450b16-18; T 1490, p. 1083b1-2; OKC, 846, p. 107, fol. 263a7-8).

This is the passage referred to here by the Traité.

⁶⁶⁷ Cf. Vibhāṣā, T 1545, K. 46, p. 237b-238a; Kośa, V, p. 9.

⁶⁶⁸ For this expression, see Kośa, V, p. 3-5 and notes.

⁶⁶⁹ The Buddha knows the darśanaheyakleśa that are destroyed during the sixteen moments of mind of the Path of seeing, and the bhāvanāheyakleśa from which the practitioner is liberated during the 81 vimuktimārga of the Path of meditation, nine vimuktimārgas for each of the nine levels.

Third Section APPENDICES TO THE TEN POWERS

I. THE BEST OF THE TEN POWERS

Question. – Which is the best (śreṣṭha) of these ten powers?

Answer. – Each is great in its own domain (svadeśa), just as water (vāri) that moistens and fire (agni) that burns each has its own power.

1) Some say that the first is the greatest because it includes all the ten at once (cf. p. 1522F).

2) Others say that the power bearing on the destruction of the impurities (āśravaṣṭaya) is the greatest because it contributes to the attainment of nirvāṇa.

3) Some scholars say that the ten forces together constitute the root (mūla) of unhindered liberation (avyāhatavimukti) and that this unhindered liberation is sovereign (adhipati).

II. WHY THE BUDDHA THINKS HIGHLY OF HIS TEN POWERS

Question. – The ten powers are exclusive to the Buddha and, in the course of the present lifetime (ihajanmani), none of his disciples (śrāvaka) is able to obtain them.⁶⁷⁰ Then why does the Buddha speak of them?

Answer. – The Buddha wants to cut off peoples' doubts (saṃśaya) about these ten powers, to strengthen the minds of the ignorant and lead the fourfold assembly (catuspariṣad) to rejoice and to say: "Our great teacher (mahācārya) is the only one to possess such powers which he does not share with anyone."

Furthermore, the heretics (tīrthika) say: "The śramaṇa Gautama dwells always in peace (vyupaśama) and his wisdom (prajñā) is decreasing." This is why the Buddha makes this statement of truth (satyavacana): "In me, the ten powers (jñānabala) and the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) are well-established (supraṭiṣṭha) and complete (saṃpanna)." In the great assembly, the Buddha speaks of his perfect wisdom (saṃpannaprajñā), converts beings (sattvān paripācayati), utters the lion's roar fully (samyak simhanādaṃ nadati) and turns the wheel of Brahmā (brahmacakram pravartayati) which no heretic, god or human, can turn. Therefore it is to arrest criticism that the Buddha speaks of his ten powers.

⁶⁷⁰ This is the matter of a controversy among the Sarvāstivādins which the Traité refrains from discussing. As will be seen the following chapter, the Traité does not include the ten powers among the attributes exclusive to the Buddha.

III. THERE IS NO BOASTFULNESS IN THE BUDDHA

This has been a brief explanation of the ten powers according to the śāravaka system.⁶⁷¹

Question. – According to a rule of human decency, even the sage cannot boast. How then (kaḥ punarvādah) could a being free of egotism boast of his ten powers? Indeed, it is said:

To boast about oneself (ātmotkarṣaṇa), to blame oneself (ātmapaṃsana),

To boast about another (parotkarṣaṇa) and to blame another (parapaṃsana)

Those are four things

Which the sage does not do.

Answer. – Although free of egotism and attachment, the Buddha possesses innumerable powers and, out of his great compassion (mahākaruṇā) to save beings, he speaks of only ten powers: that is not boasting.

Thus, the good caravan leader (sāṛthavāha), seeing robbers (caura) deceiving his merchants and inviting them to take the wrong road, is moved by compassion and says to his merchants: “It is I who am truthful (satyavādīn); do not follow these hypocrites (śaṭha)!” And also, when charlatans are deceiving the sick (glāna), the good physician (vaidya), out of compassion for these [sick people], tells them: “I have the good remedy (bhaiṣajya) and I am able to cure your illness; do not believe these impostors! You will become even more sick.” [341b]

Furthermore, the qualities (guṇa) of the Buddha are profound and distant; if the Buddha did not speak about himself, nobody would know him, and the little that he does say is very useful to beings. This is why the Buddha himself speaks about his ten powers.

Furthermore, there are beings to be converted (vaineya) to whom it is necessary to speak, and among the things to say to them, he must, at the proper time, speak of the ten powers. If one did not speak about them, [these people] would not be converted. This is why the Buddha himself tells them about them.

Thus when the sun (sūrya) and the moon (candra) rise, they do not think: “By lighting up the world, we will have glory.” The mere fact of their rising is worthy itself of glory. It is the same for the Buddha: he thinks not at all about collecting glory when he speaks about his own qualities. When the Buddha is preaching the Dharma in a pure voice and the brilliance of his rays (raśmiprabhasa) destroys the shadows of ignorance among beings (mohatamas), he derives great glory from that automatically. Therefore there is nothing wrong in the Buddha himself speaking of his ten powers and his other qualities.

Power can have results. By using the ten powers, the Buddha increases wisdom (prajñāṃ vivardhayati): this is why he can confound the scholars (upadeśacārya). By using the ten powers, he increases wisdom: this is why he preaches the Dharma. By using the ten powers, he increases wisdom: this is why he triumphs over his adversaries. By using the ten powers, he increases wisdom; this is why he attains sovereignty (aiśvarya) over all the dharmas, just as the great master of a kingdom gets sovereignty over the ministers, the people and the populace.

⁶⁷¹ The Mahāyāna system on the ten powers will be explained in the following chapter.

CHAPTER XL: THE FOUR FEARLESSNESSES AND THE FOUR UNOBSTRUCTED KNOWLEDGES (p. 1567F)

First Section THE FOUR FEARLESSNESSES OF THE BUDDHA ACCORDING TO THE ABHIDHARMA

PRELIMINARY NOTE

This chapter is poorly entitled and poorly divided. The previous chapter dealt with the ten powers (bala) of the Tathāgata according to the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma. The present chapter consists of three sections:

1. The four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) of the Buddha according to the Abhidharma.
2. The ten powers and the four fearlessnesses of the Buddha and the bodhisattva according to the Mahāyāna.
3. The four unobstructed knowledges (pratisaṃvid) according to the Abhidharma, then according to the Mahāyāna.

I. THE VAIŚĀRADYASŪTRA

The basic canonical text is the sūtra on the fearlessnesses vouched for by numerous sources:

1. Pāli wording in the Vesārajjasutta: Anguttara, II, p. 8-9; Majjhima, I, p. 71, l. 32-72, l. 14:

Cattār' imāni Sāriputta tathāgatassa vesārajjāni yehi vesārajjehi samannāgato tathāgato āsabhan ṭhānam ... dukkhakkhayāyāti, tatra vata maṃ...na samanupassāmi... etaṃ p'ahaṃ... viharāmi.

2. Sanskrit wording in Kośavyākhyā, p. 645, l. 30– 646, l. 13; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 211, l. 1-15; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1448, l. 6–1449, l. 17; Arthaviniścaya, p. 578-579:

Catvārimāni Śāriputra tathāgatasya vaiśāradyāni yair vaiśāradyaiḥ samanvāgatas tathāgato 'rhan ... na samanupaśyāmi, idam ātra nimittam... sahadharmaṇa.

3. Chinese translations: Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 19, p. 645b17; k. 42, p. 776c21-777a2; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 31, p. 158a17-b13; Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 5, p. 155b23-c20; T 220, vol. VII, k. 415, p. 81a-b20.

Transl. of the Sanskrit. – Here, O Śāriputra, are the four fearlessnesses of the Tathāgata; endowed with these fearlessnesses, the Tathāgata, the holy One, fully and completely enlightened, who claims the noble place of the bull (var. of the Rṣi), rightly utters the lion's roar in the assembly and turns the wheel of Brahmā. What are these four?

1. While I claim to be fully and completely enlightened, I see no reason to fear that a śramaṇa, a brahmaṇa, a god, Māra, Brahmā or anyone in the world can legitimately object that such and such dharmas are unknown to me. Seeing no reason to fear that, I have obtained security, absence of fear, certainty, and I abide there; I claim the noble place of the bull (var. Rṣi), I rightly utter the lion's roar in the assembly and I turn the wheel of Brahmā never yet set in motion legitimately by a śramaṇa, a brāhmaṇa, a god, Māra, Brahmā or anyone in the world.

2. While I claim to have destroyed the impurities, I do not see any reason to fear that a śramaṇa... can legitimately object that such or such impurities have not been destroyed by me. Not seeing any reason to fear that...

3. I see no reason to fear that a śramaṇa... can legitimately claim that the dharmas presented by me as obstacles to the Path do not constitute obstacles in the person who brings them into play. Seeing no reason to fear that...

4. I see no reason to fear that a śramaṇa... can legitimately claim that the way shown by me as the noble path leading to release does not lead the person who follows it to the proper cessation of suffering, to the suppression of suffering. Seeing no reason to fear that, I have obtained security, absence of fear, certainty, and I remain there; I claim the noble place of the bull (var. of the Rṣi), I utter the lion's roar rightly in the assembly and I turn the Wheel of the Dharma never yet legitimately set in motion by a śramaṇa, brāhmaṇa, god, Māra, Brāhma or anyone in the world.

II. THE VAIŚĀRADYAS IN THE ABHIDHARMA AND THE ŚĀSTRAS

The Pāli Abhidhamma mentions them often but with scarcely any explanation. In contrast, the Abhidharma treatises and the śāstras of both Vehicles have analyzed them plentifully and commented upon the sūtra of the fearlessnesses. Here I [Lamotte] will limit myself to indicating the ones that seem to me to be most instructive:

1. Among the Sarvāstivādin treatises: Saṃyuktābhidharmasāra, T 152, k. 6, p. 922c; Abhidharmāmṛta, T 1553, k. 2, p. 974c20-23 (reconstr. Sastri, p. 93, l. 4-8); Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 31, p. 158a17-159b13; Kośa, VII, p. 74-75; Kośabhāṣya, p. 414; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 75, p. 748b23-749a15; Abhidharmadīpa, p. 389-390.

2. Among the Yogācāra treatises: Sūtrālamkāra, XXI, v. 52 (p. 186); Bodh. bhūmi, p. 402; Saṃgraha, p. 286-287, 298-299; Abhidharmasamuccaya, T 1605, k. 7, p. 691c4-14 (reconstr. Pradhan, p. 98, l. 6-14); T 1606, k. 14, p. 760c13-761a18.

In the Kośa (l.c.) the four vaiśāradyas are designated in the following way:

1. Sarvadharmābhisambodhivaiśāradya.

2. Sarvāsravaḥṣayajñānavaiśāradya.

3. Āntarāyikadharmavyākaraṇavaiśāradya.

4. Nairyāṇikapratipadvyākaraṇavaiśāradya.

Compare the readings in Dharmasamgraha, § 77, and in Mahāvvyut., no. 131-134.

1. Definition of the Four Fearlessnesses in the Vaiśāradyasūtra

Here are the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya):

1. The Buddha makes the following proclamation (pratijñā): I am fully and completely enlightened (samyaksaṃbuddha) and I see not the slightest reason to fear that a śramaṇa, a brāhmaṇa, a god, Māra, Brahmā or anyone else can say truthfully that I do not know certain dharmas. This is why I have obtained security (kṣemaaprāpta), I have obtained absence of fear (abhayaaprāpta), I occupy the place of the Holy Teacher (viharāmy āṛṣaṃ sthānam) like that of the royal bull (āṛṣabha),⁶⁷² in the great assemblies I utter the lion's roar (pariṣatu śiṃhanādaṃ nadāmi) and I turn the Wheel of Brahmā (brāhmaṇaṃ cakram pravartayami) which no śramaṇa, brāhmaṇa, god, Māra, Brahmā or anyone [241c] else is truly able to turn. This is the first fearlessness.

2. The Buddha makes this proclamation: I have destroyed the impurities (kṣiṇāsrava) and I see not the slightest reason to fear that a śramaṇa, brāhmaṇa, deva, Māra, Brahmā or anyone else can say truthfully that I have not destroyed these impurities. This is why I have obtained security, I have obtained absence of fear, I occupy the position of Holy Teacher like that of a king-bull, in the great assemblies I utter the lion's roar, and I turn the wheel of Brahmā which no śramaṇa, brāhmaṇa, deva, Māra, Brahmā or anybody else is truly able to turn. This is the second fearlessness.

3. The Buddha makes this proclamation: I have expounded the dharmas that create obstacles (āntarāyikadharma) and I do not see the slightest reason to fear that a śramaṇa, brāhmaṇa, god, Māra, Brahmā, or anyone else can say truthfully that these dharmas which create obstacles are not obstacles to the Path. This is why I have obtained security, I have obtained absence of fear, I occupy the place of the holy Teacher like that of the bull-king, in the great assemblies I utter the lion's roar and I turn the wheel of Brahmā that no śramaṇa, brāhmaṇa, deva, Māra, Brahmā or anyone else can truly turn. This is the third fearlessness.

4. The Buddha makes this proclamation: The noble path shown by me can lead out of the world (yā mayā pratipad ākhyatā āryā nairyāṇikī niriyāti) and the one who follows it is able to destroy all the sufferings (tatkarasya samyag duḥkhaṣayāyati), and I see not the slightest reason to fear that a śramaṇa, bhrāmaṇa, god, Māra, Brāhma or anyone else can say truthfully that the one who follows this path cannot get out of the world or destroy suffering. This is why I have obtained security, I have obtained the absence of fear, I occupy the place of the holy Teacher like that of the king-bull, in the great assemblies I utter the lion's roar, and I turn the wheel of Brāhma which no śrmamṇa, brāhmaṇa, deva, Māra, Brāhma or anyone else is able truly to turn. This is the fourth fearlessness.

2. Why the Buddha Mentioned His Four Fearlessnesses

Questions. – For what reasons does the Buddha speak of his four fearlessnesses?

Answer. – The Buddha calls himself omniscient (sarvajñā) and omnivoyant (sarvadarśin). But in the world, there are infinite treatises, arts (kalā), sciences (vidhi), knowledges (jñāna), crafts (śilpa), methods (upāya). For all the beings taken together to know all these things would already be difficult: it would be more difficult still for the Buddha himself alone to possess omniscience. So many things, so many difficulties!

The Buddha, who experiences no fear, wishes to destroy incorrect suspicions and, in order to refute objection, he speaks of the four fearlessnesses.

Furthermore, before the Buddha appeared in the world, heretics (tīrthika) in various ways deceived people who were searching for the Path or seeking merit. There were those who ate all kinds of fruits (phala), all kinds of vegetables (vyāñjana), all kinds of plants (tṛṇa) and roots (mūla), cow-dung (gomaya) or false millet, who ate once a day, every second day, every tenth day, once a month or once every two months, who swallowed smoke, drank water, ate moss and other things of this kind, who dressed themselves in tree bark, leaves or grass, deer-skins or wooden planks, who slept on the ground, on branches, on ashes or spines, who, in the cold season went into the water, or in the hot season scorched themselves between five fires, who died by going into the water, entering into the fire, by throwing themselves on picks or by starving themselves to death.⁶⁷³ In the course of these different austerities (duṣkaracaryā), they were seeking paradise (svarga) or they were seeking nirvāṇa. They also recommended their disciples not to renounce these practices and, by leading people of little intelligence in this way, they collected homage (pūjā).

As long as the sun (sūrya) has not risen, the firefly (khadyotaka)⁶⁷⁴ gleams somewhat; but when the sun has risen and is shining, the moon (candra) and stars (tāraka) no longer shine and even less so, the firefly. Similarly, as long as the Buddha had not yet appeared in the world, the heretics were illuminating the world with a feeble light and receiving homage; but as soon as the Buddha has appeared in the world, he eclipses the heretics and their disciples by the brilliance of his great knowledge (mahājñānāloka) and none of them ⁶⁷³ The austerities described here are those of the naked ascetics (acelaka) already described by the Buddha in the Udumbarika-Sihanādasuttanta (Dīgha, III, p. 40-42; Tch'ang a han, T 1, k. 8, p. 47c; Ni keou t'o fan tche king, T 11, k. 1, p. 223b; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 26, p. 592b).

⁶⁷⁴ The example of the firefly or the shining worm (Sanskrit khadyotaka, Pāli khajjopanaka) is classic: cf. Majjhima, II, p. 34, 41; Visuddhimagga, p. 347; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 41.

receive homage.⁶⁷⁵ Having lost homage and profits, they increase their lies (mṛṣāvāda) against the Buddha and his disciples.

[Sundarīsūtra].⁶⁷⁶ - As has been said in the Souen-t'o-li-king (Sundarīsūtra), they accused the Buddha of having killed Sundarī. They said to people: “The lowest man in the world would not do that, and the person who is mistaken about human laws on this point is even more mistaken about nirvāṇa.”

Wishing to destroy such slander, the Buddha himself proclaimed his own true qualities (guṇa) and his four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya), saying:

“I alone am omniscient (sarvajñā) and nobody can truthfully say that I am not cognizant. I do not fear that.”

“I alone have destroyed all the impurities (āsrava) and their traces (vāsanā) and nobody can truthfully say that the Buddha has not destroyed the impurities. I do not fear that.”

“I have proclaimed the dharma that create obstacles to the Path to nirvāṇa (nirvāṇamārgāntarāyikadharmā) and nobody can truthfully say that these dharma do not create obstruction to nirvāṇa. The Buddha does not fear that.”

“The Buddha has stated the path to the destruction of suffering (duḥkhanirodhapratipad) that leads to nirvāṇa and nobody can ruthfully say that this path does not lead to nirvāṇa. The Buddha does not fear that.”

In summary (saṃkṣepeṇa), here is the nature of these four fearlessnesses:⁶⁷⁷

1. Complete knowledge of all the dharma (sarvadharmābhisambodhi).
2. Destruction of all the impurities (sarvāsravakṣaya) and their traces (vāsanā).
3. A report of the dharma that create obstacles to the path (mārgāntarāyikadharmavyākaraṇa).
4. A report of the path of the cessation of suffering (duḥkhanirordhapartipadvyākaraṇa).

The Buddha does not fear that anyone can truthfully say that he does not fully know these four things. Why? Because he knows them precisely and fully.

The first two fearlessnesses are personal qualities or perfections [for the Buddha]; the last two fearlessnesses are qualities useful to beings.⁶⁷⁸

In the first, third and fourth fearlessness, it is a matter of knowledge; in the second, it is a matter of destruction (kṣaya). The matter is governed by the perfection of wisdom and cessation.

3. Similarities and Differences Between Powers and Fearlessnesses

[242b] Question. – The ten powers (bala) are knowledges (jñāna) and the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) are also knowledges. What are the similarities and the differences?⁶⁷⁹

Answer. – When the qualities (guṇa) of the Buddha are explained at length (vistareṇa), this is bala; when they explained in brief, this is vaiśāradya.

Furthermore, when there is activity (kriyā), this is bala; when there is neither doubt (saṃśaya) nor difficulty (duṣkara), this is vaiśāradya.

When wisdom (prajñā) is accumulated, this is bala; when ignorance (avidyā) is dispersed, this is vaiśāradya.

Accumulating good dharma (kuśaladharmā) is bala; destroying bad dharma (akuśaladharmā) is vaiśāradya.

Possessing wisdom personally is bala; there being no one who can destroy you is vaiśāradya.

The vigor of wisdom is bala; being able to respond to objections (praśna) is vaiśāradya.

Accumulating the wisdoms is bala; using them outwardly is vaiśāradya.

Similarly, when the noble cakravartin king is endowed with his seven jewels (saptaratnasamanvāgata), this is bala; having obtained these seven jewels, when he travels through the four continents (caturdvīpa) subduing the entire world, this is vaiśāradya.

Similarly also, when the good physician (vaidya) knows the remedies (bhaiṣajya) well, this is bala; when he mixes the remedies to give them to people, this is vaiśāradya.

Realizing one's own personal (svārtha) benefit is bala; realizing the benefit of others (parārtha) is vaiśāradya.

Destroying one's own disturbing emotions (kleśa) is bala; destroying the disturbing emotions of others is vaiśāradya.

Not wasting away is bala; being without difficulty or decline is vaiśāradya.

Being able to realize one's own good is bala; being able to realize the good of others is vaiśāradya.

The knowledge of good planning (suvīdhiñātā) is bala; the application of this knowledge is vaiśāradya.

Omniscience (sarvajñatā) and the awareness [of things] in all their aspects (sarvākārajñātā) is bala; the manifestation of this omniscience and this awareness of all the aspects is vaiśāradya.

⁶⁷⁹ Cf. Saṃyuktābhidharmaśāra, T 1552, k. 6, p. 922c12 seq.; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 31, p. 159a23 seq.; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 75, p. 749a6 seq.

The eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā) of the Buddhas are bala; the outward manifestation of these eighteen special attributes is vaiśāradya.

Completely penetrating the nature of things (dharmatā) is bala; if one asks all kinds of questions (praśna) and does not think any more and if one replies in the very same moment, this is vaiśāradya.

Possessing the Buddha eye (buddhacakṣus) is bala; seeing beings to be converted (vaiṇeya) with this Buddha eye and preaching the Dharma to them is vaiśāradya.

Obtaining the [first] three unobstructed knowledges (pratisaṃvid) is bala; obtaining the unobstructed knowledge of elocution (pratibhānapratisaṃvid) is vaiśāradya.

Mastery of omniscience (sarvajñatāvaśīta) is bala; adorning one's speech with all kinds of stories (avadāna) and apologues (nidāna) and preaching the Dharma is vaiśāradya.

Destroying the troops of Māra is bala; destroying the heretics (tīrthika) and the scholars (upadeśācārya) is vaiśāradya.

These are the various ways of distinguishing bala and vaiśāradya.

Question. – What is fearlessness called?

Answer. – The absence of doubt (niḥsaṃśaya), the absence of fear (nirbhaya), the non-decline of wisdom, not becoming discouraged (anālīnatā), not becoming exasperated (aromaharṣa), acting in all ways as has been said (yathāvādī tathākārī), all that is vaiśāradya.

4. How Do We Know That The Buddha is Fearless?

Question. – How do we know that he was fearless?

Answer. – 1) Had he had fear, he would not have led the great assemblies by welcoming, dismissing, roughly reprimanding or teaching by means of gentle [242c] words.

Thus, one day the Buddha sent Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana away but then, out of compassion (karuṇā) received them back again.⁶⁸⁰

⁶⁸⁰ Cātumasutta in Majjhima, I, p. 456-457 (Tseng yi a hab, T 125, k. 41, p. 770c; Chō li fou... yeou sseu k'iu king, T 137, p. 860a-b):

One day the Bhagavat was in Cātumā, in the Myrobalan Garden. At that time, five hundred bhikṣus headed by Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana came to Cātumā to see the Bhagavat. The newcomers exchanged greetings with the resident monks, prepared their lodgings, arranged their bowls and robes, uttered loud cries and shouted at the tops of their voices (uccāsaddā mahāsaddā ahesum). Then the Bhagavat asked Ānanda: What are these loud shouts, these loud cries? One would say they were fishermen catching fish (kevaṭṭā maññe macchavilopa). [Chinese transl.: One would say that somebody was cutting wood or stones.]

2) There were formidable people, such as these scholars (upadeśācārya) who were absorbed in the height of pride (mānastambha). Intoxicated by their false wisdom, they presented themselves as unique in the world and unrivalled. Knowing their own books deeply, they refuted others' books and criticized all the systems with wicked words. They were like mad elephants caring for nothing. Among these madmen, we cite: Ngan-po-tcha (Ambaṭṭha), Tch'ang-tchao (Dīrghanakha), Sa-tchō-tche Ni-k'ien (Satyaka Nirgranthīputra), P'i-lou-tch'e (Pilotika), etc.⁶⁸¹

The Buddha subdued all these scholars. Had he been afraid, this would not have been the case.

The five wandering mendicants (parivrājaka) beginning with Kiao-tch'en-jou (Kaundinya),⁶⁸² the thousand Jāṭila ṛṣis beginning with Ngeou-leou-p'in-louo Kia-chō (Uruvilva Kāśyapa),⁶⁸³ Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, Mahākāśyapa, etc., all entered into religion (pravrajita) in the Buddha's Dharma.

A hundred thousand Che-tseu (Śākya) who all were great kings in Jambudvīpa, king Po-sseu-ni-che (Prasenajit), king P'in-p'o-so-lo (Bimbisāra), king Tchan-t'o Po-chou-t'i (Caṇḍa Pradyota), king Yeou-t'ien (Udayana), king Fou-kia-lo-p'o-li (Pukkusaṭi), king Fan-mo-to (Brahmadatta), etc., all became his disciples.⁶⁸⁴

The Bhagavat summoned the perpetrators and said to them: "Go away, O bhikṣus; I send you away; you cannot stay in my presence (gacchatha bhikkhave paṇāmevi mo, na vi mama santike vatthabham)."

Below (k. 26, p. 247c), the Traité will return to this event. Yet another time, five hundred monks meeting at Śrāvastī were similarly driven away by the Buddha (cf. Udāna, p. 24-25).

⁶⁸¹ Ambaṭṭha was a young brāhmin of the Ambaṭṭha clan, versed in the three Vedas and auxiliary sciences. He lived at Ukkaṭṭhā in Kosala and had as teacher Pokkharasādi. The Buddha preached the Ambaṭṭhasutta for him (Dīgha, I, p. 87-110), but in contrast to his master, he was not converted.

For Dīrghanakha, also called Mahākauṣṭhila, see above, p. 46-51F and notes, 184F, 633F, 639F.

For Satyaka Nirgranthīputra, see above, p. 46-47F and notes: below, k. 26, p. 251c10; k. 90, p. 699a9.

Pilotika, already mentioned above (p. 221F) was a parivrājaka sage (Majjhima, I, p. 175 seq.).

⁶⁸² Ājñāta Kaundinya, the foremost of the group of five (pañcavargīya) who were witnesses of the Buddha's austerities and were present at the sermon at Benares. They became arhats when the Buddha preached the Anattalakkhaṇasutta to them (Vinaya, I, p. 14; Catuspariśad, p. 170). The Traité has already mentioned them above, p. 102F, 1426F.

⁶⁸⁴ According to some sources mentioned above (p. 177F, note) five hundred Śākyas were forced to enter the religious life by an edict of king Śuddhodana.

Prasenajit, king of Kosala, became upāsaka after the preaching of the Daharasutta (Saṃnyutta, I, p. 70; Mūlasarv. Vin, T 1450, k. 9, p. 142b-143a). The Traité has already mentioned this king and will return to him later, k. 27, p. 261a18; k. 33, p. 305a8; k. 58, p. 470b15.

Bimbisāra, king of Magadha, had two well-known meetings with the Buddha. The second took place at the Supatīṭhacetiya of the Laṭṭhivanuyyāna; it was then that the king was converted with all his Brāhmin householders (grhsatha), having gone through all the worldly sciences and respected by great kings such as Fan-mo-yu (Brahmāyus), Fou-kia-lo-p'o-li (Puṣkarasārin), Kieou-lo-t'an-t'o (Kūṭadanta), etc., all became his disciples. Some obtained the first [fruit] of the Path; others the second, third or fourth fruits.⁶⁸⁵ people and became srotaāpanna (references above, p. 30F as note). Further mentions in the Traité at p. 93F, 147F, 175F, 186F 637F, 990-992F and notes.

Caṇḍa Pradyota, king of Avanti, was converted by the disciple Mahākātyāyana specially sent to him. The stanzas that the disciple addressed to him on this occasion are preserved in the Theragāthā, p. 52, v. 496-499.

After having been noted for his great cruelty (cf. above, p. 993F and note), Udayana, king of Kauśāmbhī, during a friendly visit to the disciple Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja, was converted and entered into the brotherhood of the upāsakas (Saṃyutta, IV, p. 110-113).

For Pukkhusāti, king of Takṣaśilā before his entrance into the religious life, see above, p. 1531F.

Brahmadatta is the dynastic name of the kings of Benares: many jātakas in which they make an appearance concern early times. At the time of the Buddha, Kāśī (Benares) was incorporated into the kingdom of Kosala, and Prasenajit reigned over both countries.

⁶⁸⁵ Brahmāyus was a brāhmin from Mitilā in Videha. He was versed in the three Vedas and the auxiliary sciences. At the age of 108 years, he sent his disciple Uttara to the Buddha to learn if the latter indeed possessed all the physical marks of the Mahāpuruṣa. The disciple was able to reassure him not only on the physical integrity of Śākyamuni but also on his perfect deportment. Shortly afterwards, the Buddha came to Mithila and settled at Makhādevambavana. Brahmāyus went to visit him and confirmed de visu the secret signs of the Buddha. Prostrating at his feet, he begged the Teacher to come to his home with the monks and he entertained them for a week. After the departure of the Community, Brahmāyus died and the Buddha declared that the old brāhmin had found the fruit of anāgāmin. – This is told in the Brahmāyusutta of the Majjhima, II, p. 133-146 (Tchong a han, T 26, k. 41, p. 685a-690a; Lao p'o lo men king, T 75). See also Vibhāṣā, T 1546, k. 1, p. 3a4; Mahāvastu, II, p. 76-82.

Puṣkarasārin according to the Divyāvadāna, p. 620, Pokkharasāti or Pokkharasādi according to the Pāli sources, was a brāhmin of high lineage, famed for his science, his wealth and his beauty. He lived at Ukkatṭhā in Kosala on some property that he had been given by king Prasenajit. He presided over the brāhmin assemblies and had many disciples, Ambatṭha, Vasetṭha, Dubha Todeyya, etc. Wanting to find out the real merit of the Buddha, he sent his disciple Ambatṭha to him, but as the latter had presented himself in a boorish manner to the Teacher, Puṣkarasārin came himself to apologize and invited the Buddha to a meal. Impressed by the teachings of the Teacher, he declared himself his follower and obtained the fruit of srotaāpanna (Dīgha, I, p. 110). – Puṣkarasārin appears in various sūtras: Ambatṭha (Dīgha, I, p. 87-110), Subha (Majjhima, II, p. 200-201), Vāsetṭha (Suttanipāta, p. 115), Tevijja (Dīgha, I, p. 235); he is mentioned in Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 16., p. 77b26-27.

Kūṭadanta, another learned brāhmin dwelling at Khānumata in Magadha, was a feudatory of king Bimbisāra. The Buddha, passing through that area, was interrogated by the brāhmin on the way of Great yakṣas such as A-lo-p'o-kia (Āṭavaka),⁶⁸⁶ Pi-cho-kia (Viśvakarman?),⁶⁸⁷ etc., great nāga-kings such as A-po-lo (Apālāla),⁶⁸⁸ Yi-lo-po-to-lo (Elapatra),⁶⁸⁹ etc., evil men such as Yang-k'iun-li-mo-lo (Aṅgulimāla). etc., submitted and took refuge in him.

correctly carrying out “the sacrifice with its threefold methods and its sixteen accessory instruments” (tividhayaññasampadaṃ soḷasaparikkhāraṃ). The Teacher preached the Kūṭadantasutta (Dīgha, I, p.127-149) for him and, at the end of the sermon, Kūṭadanta obtained the fruit of srotaāpanna.
⁶⁸⁶ Dwelling in the Āṭavī forest, between Śrāvastī and Rājagṛha, the yakṣa Āṭavaka ate the humans beings whom the king of the country had pledged to provide for him. The population was rapidly decimated and the time came when the only prey to be offered to the yakṣa was the king’s own son, prince Āṭavika. The Buddha wanted to save him and appeared at the yakṣa’s dwelling without having been invited. Āṭavaka used his magical power to try to drive him away. The Buddha resisted all his attacks victoriously, but agreed to solve eight puzzles that intrigued the yakṣa (Saṃyutta, I, p. 213-215; Suttanipāta, p. 31-33). Satisfied with this solution, Āṭavaka was converted and attained the fruit of srotaāpanna. Also, when the young prince was brought to him as food, he took him and offered him to the Buddha who, in turn, gave him back to his parents (Comm. on the Suttanipāta, I, p.230). As the young Āṭavika had thus been passed from hand to hand, he was surnamed Hastaka Āṭavika (see above, p. 562-565F and note).

⁶⁸⁷ If this transcription is correct, this would be Viśvakarman, in Pāli Vissakamma, the architect appointed by the Devas: cf. Akanuma, p. 774.

⁶⁸⁸ The Traité has already twice mentioned the nāga Apālāla whom it places sometimes in Magadha (p. 187-188F) and sometimes in the north-west of India, in the kingdom of the Yue-tche (p. 547F). To tame him, the Buddha called upon the yakṣa Vajrapāṇi. For details, see my [Lamotte’s] article Varapāṇi en Inde, in Mélanges de Sinologie offerts à Paul Demiéville, I, 1966, p. 130-132.

⁶⁸⁹ A famous nāgarāja, called Elapatra, Elāpatra, Airāvaṇa in Sanskrit, Erapata in the inscriptions at Bhārhut, Erāpatha, Erakapatta, Erāvana, Erāvaṇa in Pāli, a name invoking both the eraka plant, ‘cardamom’, used to make blankets, and Airāvaṇa, Indra’s mount, who was an elephant and not a snake.

The monster animal still merits a monograph although it has already claimed the attention of historians: see H. Lüders, Bhārhut, p. 165 seq.; J. Ph. Vogel, Indian Serpent Lore, p. 207 seq.; and especially the Bhārhut Inscriptions, Corpus Inscriptionum Indicarum, vol. II, part II, 1963, p. 110 seq. I [Lamotte] will limit myself to adding a few more to an already heavily loaded dossier.

A. Elapatra in folklore.

A late source, the Commentary on the Dhammapada, III, p. 230-236 (tr. Burlingame, III, p. 56-60) tells that at the time of the Buddha Kassapa, the young monk Erakapatta, traveling along the Ganges, passed by a thicket of cardamom (eraka) and seized a leaf which tore off while the boat was passing by. This was a serious wrong-doing, but he neglected to confess it; the result was that he was reborn in the Ganges in the form of an enormous snake-king called Erakapatta. Waiting for the future Buddha, he tried to find out when the latter would appear in the world. To this end, he taught his daughter a gāthā containing questions which only a buddha would be able to answer. Each evening he had her dance on his hood and sing this gāthā, promising his daughter and all his goods to whoever could solve the questions asked. In the long space of time separating the Buddha Kassapa from his successor Śākyamuni, many attempted to decipher the enigma, but without success. One day however, Śākyamuni was sitting in a grove of seven śrīṣa trees not far from Benares and heard that a young brāhmin, Uttara, had resolved to attempt it and, wanting to help him, he revealed the correct answers to him. Uttara communicated these to Erakapatta who thus knew that a new Buddha had appeared. Joyfully, he struck the waters of the Ganges with his tail, not without causing a flood. Then the nāga went to visit the Buddha, received his teachings and, but for his animal shape, he would have attained the fruit of srotaāpanna.

A fragment of this legend has passed into the Mahāvastu, III, p. 383, l. 19 – 386, l. 7. It is found, in a much more developed form, in the Chinese sources, with the difference that the young brāhmin who communicated the solution of the enigma to Elapatra was not Uttara but his brother Nārada (Naradatta), nephew of Asita and sometimes identified with Kātyāyana. Among these sources are:

1. Abhiniṣkramaṇasūtra, T 190, k. 37-38, p. 825a138-831b9 (transl. Beal, Romantic Legend, p. 275-280).

4. Mūlasarvast. Vin., T 1451, k. 21, p. 303a6-305a17 (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 46-47).
5. Fou kai tcheng hing so tsi king, T 1671, k. 11, p. 741b6-742a9, sūtra attributed to Nāgārjuna.

The legend is represented on the balustrade of the Bhārhut stūpa with two inscriptions: Erapato nāgarājā and Erapato nāgarājā bhagavato vadate; cf. Bhārhut Inscriptions (Corpus), p. 110, pl. 19 and 39; A. Coomaraswamy, La sculpture de Bhārhut, p. 48-49, pl. 8, fig. 25 center. It appears also on a bas-relief at Gandhāra; Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, I, p. 505, fig. 251a.

Prof. Waldschmidt has pointed out the complete agreement between the Bhārhut sculpture and the Pāli version of the legend.

B. Elapatra in magical phrases.

In the words of the earliest sources, this nāga king is invoked in the case of snake bites. Three groups of texts are to be considered: the texts telling of the death of Upasena, Śāriputra's younger brother; the texts about the death of an anonymous bhikṣu; a passage of the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya.

I. Texts about the death of Upasena.

1. Upasenāsutta, of Saṃyutta, IV, p. 40-41. – In a cave of the Sitavana at Rājagaha, Upasena was bitten by a snake. Since he had long ago eliminated notions of me and mine, the snake-bite in no way changed his body or his senses. Nevertheless, he caused himself to be borne up into the sky, and there his body was scattered like a fistful of straw (bhūsamuṭṭhi).

2. Hien yu king, T 202, k. 10, p. 417b10-418a5. – Story of the death of Upasena along with a jātaka giving an explanation.

3. Upasenāsūtra of Saṃyuktāgama, T 99, no. 252, k. 9, p. 60c14-61b28; original Sanskrit published by E. Waldschmidt, Das Upasenāsūtra, ein Zauber gegen Schlangenbiss aus dem Saṃyuktāgama, Nachrichten der Akad. Der Wissens. in Göttingen, 1957, no. 2, p. 27-44. – Corresponds to the Pāli Upasenāsutta, but with an important addition: Informed of Upasena's death, the Buddha declared that he would not have died if he had recited certain stanzas (gāthā) and certain magical syllables (mantapada).

The stanzas, nine in number, express the loving-kindness (maitrī) of the wounded one towards all beings in general and to eight families of snakes in particular: 1) Dhṛtirāṣṭra, 2) Airāvaṇa, 3) Chibbāputra, 4) Kaṃbalāśvatara, 5) Karkoṭaka, 6) Kṛṣṇagautamaka, 7-8) Nandopananda.

The magical syllables are a dhāraṇī: Oṭumbile, tumbile, etc.

4. Mūlasarv. Vinayavibhaṅga, T 1442, k. 6, p. 654b28-657b22. – Corresponds essentially with no. 3, with the same gāthā and the same mantrapada.

5. Souei jong tsouen tchō king, p. 773. – Same comment as for the preceding.

II. Texts about the death of the anonymous bhikṣu.

1. Anguttara, II, p. 72-73. – At Sāvattī, a bhikṣu whose name is not given is bitten by a snake and dies. The Buddha declares that he would not have died if he had included in his loving-kindness four families of snake-kings (ahirājakula): 1) Virūpakka, 2) Erāpatha, 3) Chabyaputta, 4) Kaṇhāgotamaka. The Buddha then formulates a Parittā 'charm' to ward off snake bites.

2. Vinaya, II, p. 109-110. – Same as preceding.

3. Mahīśāsaka Vin., T 1421, k. 26, p. 171a16-28. – Similar to the two preceding texts with the difference that eight, not four, families of snakes must be invoked: 1) Dhṛtirāṣṭra, 2) Tan-tch'e (?), 3) Airāvaṇa, 4) Chibbā, 5) Kaṃbalāśvatara, 6) Virūpākṣa, 7) Gautamaka, 8) Nandopananda.

4. Dharmagupta Vin., T 1428, k. 42, p. 870c22-871a7. Here also eight families of snakes are to be invoked: 1) Virūpākṣa, 2) K'ie-ning (?), 3) Gautamaka, 4) Chibbāmitra, 5) To-che Airāvaṇa, 6) Kaṃbalāśvatara, 7) Dhṛtirāṣṭra, 8) (missing).

All these texts propose gāthās to be recited as Parittā, but none make any mention of mantrapada.

III. A passage of the Mūlasarvāst. Vin., in Gilgit Manuscripts, III, Part 1, p. 285, l. 8-2888, l. 20.

The hero of the story is a newly ordained monk named Svāti (cf. Anavataptagāthā, ed. Bechert, p. 158-161). Wishing to be of service to the Buddha, he went to cut wood in the forest and was bitten on the big toe by a snake. The physician prescribed a vile food (vikṛtabhojana), i.e., excrement and urine of young calves, ash from five kinds of trees, earth taken from a depth of four fingers. The unfortunate Svāti derived no relief from it. The Buddha was consulted and the latter, without mentioning any nāgarāja to be conjured by these stanzas, advised Ānanda to memorize and to go and recite the Mahāmāyūrī vidyā near the sick monk. It consisted of an homage to the Buddha, the Dharma and the Community, followed by a dhāraṇī: amale, vimale, nirmale, etc. Svāti was cured immediately.

C. Elapatra's residence and treasure.

Fa-hien (T 2085, p. 864a10-20) locates the place where the nāga Elapatra asked the Buddha when he would be free of his dragon form at Mrgadāva in Benares, but Elapatra had his usual home in the north-west of India. The evidence of Huian-tsang (T 2087, k. 3, p. 884c4-12) is formal: The pool where the nāga-king Elapatra lives is more than 70 li north-west of Takṣaśilā. This nāga is the bhikṣu who, at the time of the Buddha Kāśyapa, had torn off a caradamom (eraka) leaf. From then on, when the native people pray for rain or fine weather, they should go to the pool in question with a śramaṇa: by addressing the Nāga, they are sure to see their prayers answered in the time of a finger-snap. More than 30 li south-east of the pool, a stūpa built by Aśoka marks the place where, at the coming of Maitreya, one of the four great treasures is to appear. We may add that archeologists identify this stūpa with the ruins at Baoti Pind (cf. Marshall, Taxila, I, 1951, p. 348).

The four great treasures (mahānidhāna, mahānidhī) which the Buddhist tradition speaks of bear the names of their guardians, the catvāra mahārājās caturmahānidhisthāḥ (Divyāvadāna, p. 61, l. 1-2) or catvāro nidhānādhipatayo nāgārājānaḥ (Mahāvastu, III, p. 383, l. 20). According to most sources (no. 4 and 5 below), they still exist and are used by the indigenous people on the 7th day of the 7th month:

1) A stanza locates them:

Piṅgalaś ca Kalingeṣu, Mithilāyām ca Pāṇḍukaḥ /

Elāpatraś ca Gāndhāre, Śaṅkha Vārāṇasīpure //

Cf. Divyāvadāna, p. 61, l. 3-4; Mūlasarv. Vin., T 1448, k. 6, p. 25a12-15; Maitryavyākaraṇa, T 455, p. 426c1-4.

2) As in 1), except that Piṅgala is placed at Surāṣṭra: cf. Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 44, p. 788a14-18; k. 49, p. 818c6-18; 819a16-17; Maitreyavyākaraṇa, T 453, p. 421b19-22; T 454, p. 424a25-28; T 456, p. 430a10-13.

3) As in 1), except that Pāṇḍuka is located at Bcom-brlag = Mathurā: cf. the Tibetan version of Maitreyavyākaraṇa, ed. S. Lévi, Mélanges Linossier, II, p. 384, v. 25; ed. N Dutt, Gilgit Manuscripts, IV, p. 194, l. 13-14.

4) As in 1), except that Pāṇḍuka is located at Vidiśa: cf. Upāsakaśīlassūtra, T 1488, k. 5, p. 1063.a.

5) As in 1), except that Elapatra is located at Takṣaśilā: cf. Mahāvastu, III, p. 383, l. 18-19: catvāro mahānidhāyo: Saṅkha Vārāṇasīyāṃ, Mithilāyām Padumo, Kalingeṣu Piṅgalo, Takṣaśilāyām Elapatro.

6) Elāpatra in the northern region, at the city of Takṣaśilā; Pāṇḍuka in the land of the Kalingas in the city of Mithilā; Piṅgala in the land of Vidiśā, in the city of Surāṣṭra; Śaṅkha in the country of Kāśī in the city of Vārāṇasī: cf. Sūtra of the conversion of the seven sons by Anāthapiṇḍada, T 140, p. 862b.

7) Treasure of gold at Gandhāra, guarded by the nāga Elāpatra; treasure of silver guarded by the nāga Pāṇḍuka; treasure of maṇi at Surāṣṭra guarded by the nāga Piṅgala; treasure of vaiḍūrya at Vārāṇasī: cf. Maitreyavyākaraṇa, T 457, p. 434c.

8) Simple mention of four treasures in Pūrvāparāntasūtra in the Tchong a han, T 26, k. 14, p. 53a15.

According to the Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, p. 278, the four great inexhaustible treasures (akṣayamahānidhāna) were also found in the house of Vimalakīrti in Vaiśālī. The same text compares the bodhisattvas as well to inexhaustible treasures.

Daridrāṇāṃ ca satvānāṃ nidhānā bhonti akusayāḥ / teṣāṃ dānāni darvā ca bodhicittam janenti te //

This is a well-known stanza often quoted by the Madhyamika scholars such as Śāntideva (Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 326, l. 5-6; Bodhicaryāvatāra, III, v. 9).

Had the Buddha been afraid, he could not have sat by himself on the lion seat (siṃhāsana) at the foot of a tree.

When he was about to attain supreme complete enlightenment (anuttara samyakṣambodhi), king Māra and his army (senā) created heads of lions (siṃha), tigers (vyāghra), wolves, bears (rkṣa): some had but a single eye, others had many eyes; some had but a single ear, others, many ears. Carrying mountains and spitting fire, they surrounded the Buddha on all four sides.⁶⁹⁰ The Buddha struck the earth with his fingers (mahūṃ parāhanati sma) and in the blink of an eye, everything vanished.⁶⁹¹

He guided the minds of the great asuras such as Pi-mo-tche-ti-li (Vemacitrin),⁶⁹² Che t'i p'o-na-min (Śakra devānām indra), Fan-t'ien-wang (Brahmā devarāja), etc., and all became his disciples.

Had he been afraid, in the middle of the great assemblies he could not have preached the Dharma. Because he had no fear, he was able to preach the Dharma in these great assemblies of devas and yakṣas. This is why he is said to have no fear (viśārada).

3) Furthermore, the Buddha is the most venerable and the highest of all beings. He has reached the other shore of all the dharmas (sarvadharmāṇāṃ pāraṃ gataḥ). Having obtained great glory (yaśas), he himself proclaimed his vaiśāradya. [243a]

4) But let us put aside these [supernatural] qualities of the Buddha. In regard to his mundane qualities (laukikaguṇa), no one is able to attain them because he has rooted out dreadful things at their very roots. These dreadful things are: i) being born into a low family (nīcakulajanman); ii) a low place of birth (nīcajātisthāna); iii) ugliness (durvarṇatā); iv) lacking right attitudes (īryāpatha); v) coarse speech (pāruṣyavāda).⁶⁹³

i). Birth in a low family (nīcakulajanman). – Those of the śūdras for example who take birth in low families of the eaters of dead flesh, night-soil men, chicken or pig farmers, hunters, executioners, tavern-keepers, mercenaries, etc. Such people are very fearful in the great assemblies.

The Buddha himself from the very beginning (ādita eva) has always taken birth in the lineage of noble cakravartin kings. He was born into the families of the lineage of ‘sun kings’: king Ting-cheng (Māndhātṛ

The Chinese have taken it literally and are entitled by it to institute currency of the Inexhaustible Treasure (wou tsin tsang yuan): see J. Gernet, Les aspects économiques du bouddhisme, 1956, p. 210.

⁶⁹⁰ See the description of Māra’s armies in Lalitavistara, p. 305-307.

⁶⁹² Vemacitra asurinda: see above, p. 610-612F and notes.

⁶⁹³ Variation on a canonical theme (Samyutta, I, p. 93; Anguttara, I, p. 107; II, p. 85; III, p. 385): Idha ekacco nīce kule paccājāto hoti caṇḍalakula vā nesādakule vā veṇakule vā rathakarakule vā pukkusakule vā dalidde appannapānabhojane kasiravuttike, yattha kasirena ghāsacchādo labbhati; so ca hoti dubbhaṇṇo... “Here one may be reborn in a low family, a family of outcasts, of hunters, of basket-makers, cartwrights or road-sweepers, in a poor family where the food and drink is scarce, where life is difficult and where food and clothes are hard to get; one is ugly...”

or Mürdhāta), king K'ouai-kien (Sudarśana), king So-kie (Sāgara), king Mo-ho-t'i-p'o (Makhādeva), etc.⁶⁹⁴
This is why he has no fear.

ii) Low place of birth (nīcājātiṣṭhāna). – For example:

Ngan-t'o-lo (Andhra),⁶⁹⁵

Cho-p'o-li (Śavara). – [Note by Kumārajīva: The Land of the Naked Ones].

Chō-k'ie'lo (Tukhāra).⁶⁹⁶

⁶⁹⁴ All these names appear in the genealogy of king Mahāsammata listed, among other sources, by the Dīpavamsa, III, v. 1-50, and the Mahāvamsa, II, v. 1-33. On Māndhātṭ or Mürdhāta, see above, p. 930-931F; later, k. 73, p. 576b21.

⁶⁹⁵ The territory included between the Godāvari basin and the Kistna basin, occupied by people of Dravidian race and of Telugu language and called Andhradeśa nowadays. The Śavara are probably represented by the Saravali or Saura of the Vizagapatam mountains and the Savari of the Gwalior territory. On the Andhra whose territory has been incessantly modified, see L. de La Vallée Poussin, L'Inde aux temps des mauryas, p. 203-219 and Lamotte, Histoire du bouddhisme indien, p. 373-384.

According to the sources mentioned above (Preface to vol. I, p. xii seq.), Nāgārjuna, the presumed author of the Traité, lived part of his life in Andhra at Śrīparvata, and had friendly relations with the Śatavāhana or even the Ikṣvākus who reigned over the region in the 2nd and 3rd century C.E. In that case, it is hard to see why the writer of the Traité shows so much scorn for Andhradeśa by putting it at the top of the list of bad places to be born.

⁶⁹⁶ The Tukhāras were designated by Hiuan-tsang (T 2087, k. 1, p. 872a6) under the name Tou-houo-lo (formerly T'ou-houo-lo) according to Kumārajīva's note, the land of the Lesser Yue-tche: an important piece of information in S. Lévi, Les Tokharien, JA, 1933, p. 1-30 and commented upon by P. Pelliot, Tokharien et koutchéen, JA, 1934, p. 23-106.

At the beginning of the 2nd century B.C.E., the Yue-tche were living between Touen-houang and the K'i lien-chan, in western Kan-sou. Towards 176 C.E., driven out of eastern Mongolia by the Hiong-nou, most of them turned westward and ended up reaching Ta-hia, i.e., Bactriana. Nevertheless, as Seu-m Ts'ien tells us (Che-ki, chap. 123), "their other small tribes, who did not leave, settled among the K'iang of the Nan-chan and they are called the Lesser Yue-tche."

But P. Pelliot has commented rightly: "These are the Lesser Yue-tche of north-western India and not those remaining in the region south of Touen-houang, who should, in my eyes, be the 'Lesser Yue-tche' whom Kumārajīva says are identical with the Tukhāras". I [Lamotte] would like to add a comment: Kumārajīva here does not mean the Tukhāras speaking a language foreign to and unaffected by Buddhism, not these Tukhāras of "northern India in the kingdom of the Yue-tche" to which the Traité alludes above (p. 547F) and which it evidently considers as the second sacred land of Buddhism.

During the first five centuries of our era, the dynasties of Yue-tche origin played an important role in the history of India and Iran. The Kuṣāṇa built a powerful empire extending from the Oxus to the Ganges with Bactriana and Kabul as center and extensions into Sogdiana and Central Asia. They respected and even favored the beliefs of their subjects and some of them, such as Kaniṣka and Vāsudeva, became benefactors of Buddhism in the Indian portion of their territories. They were no strangers to it and the Buddhist texts compare the Sons of Heaven of China, the Mediterranean west and the Yue-tche, to the 'devaputras of India' (Che eul yeou king, T 195, p. 147b; P. Pelliot, La Théorie des Quatre Fils du Ciel, T'ouan Pao, 1923, p. 97-199; S. Lévi, Devaputra, JA, 1934, p. 1-21). A Buddhist prediction often repeated attributes the future disappearance of the Holy Dharma to foreign kings of western origin, Scythian, Parthian, Greek and Tuṣāsa, variant of Tukhāra (Prediction to Kātyāyana, T 2029, p. 11b12; T 2028, p. 8c24; Aśokāvadāna, T 2042, k. 6, p. 126c; Saṃyuktāgama, T 99, k. 25, p. 177c; Candragarbhasūtra, T 397, k. 56, p. 377b; sources translated in Histoire du bouddhisme indien, p. 217-222).

Those who are born in the border-lands (pratyantajanapada)⁶⁹⁹ are very frightened when they are in the middle of the great assemblies.

⁶⁹⁷ The Sieou-li of the Traité, of the north of the Tukhāra domain, are the Sogdians, the Sou-li of Hiuan-tsang (T 2087, k. 1, p. 871a11), possessing a special scripture and a definite literature.

⁶⁹⁸ Ngan-si (Arsak) designates Parthia proper, or Arsadian Persia, since the year 224 C.E. under the Sassanid dymasty. Buddhists have not hidden their scorn for the Persians (Pārasika) and their seers (the Mou-kia) who advised the killing of aged father and mother, the sick, and authorized sexual intercourse with mother, sister or a woman of one's own gotra (cf. Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 116, p. 605c17-22; 606a17-22; Kośabhāṣya, p. 240, l. 23; 241, l. 8; Kośavyākhyā, p. 394, l. 6; T 1558, k. 16, p. 85b23-24; T 1559, k. 12, p. 241a25-27; Nyāyānusāra, T 1562, k. 41, p. 576c20-22; 577a11; Kārikāvibhāṣā, T 1563, k. 22, p. 879b28-29). Besides, as the Traité will note later (k. 91, p. 705a22-23), all those born in the border-lands such as the Ngan-si are by nature fools and unable to be converted.

Despite its wealth and military power, the Ta-Ts'in, the Mediterranean west, did not enjoy a good reputation.

⁶⁹⁹ At all times, Buddhists have distinguished two kinds of territories: the Central Land (madhydeśa) where the religious discipline is carried out in all its rigor, and the Frontier Lands (pratyantajanapada) enjoying ease and indulgences. In the early sources, the Central Land, roughly corresponding to Āryāvarta, was limited in the east by the Puṇḍravardhana (northern Bengal) and the city of Kacāṅgalā (see above, p. 170F note), to the south by the Śārāvati river, to the west by the villages of the Śthūnopasthūṅka brāhmins, to the north by the Śrāgiri (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 197; Dharmagupta Vin., T 1428, k. 30, p. 846a; Sarvāstivād. Vin., T 1435, k. 25, p. 181c; Mūlasarv. Vin. in Gilgit Manuscripts, III, part IV, p. 190, and Divyāvadāna, p. 21; Yeou-pou-p'i-ko-che, T 1447, k. 1, p. 1053a; E. Waldschmidt, Zur Śronakoṭikarṇa-Legende, NAWG, 1952, p. 137). Bounded in this way, this Land included fourteen of the sixteen mahājanapada recorded in the 6th century B.C.E. (see Histoire du bouddhisme indien, p. 8-9) and was 500 leagues long, 250 leagues wide with a perimeter of 900 leagues; its inhabitants were virtuous; noble persons, including the Buddhas, gladly chose it as a cradle (cf. Sumaṅgala, I, p. 173; Jātaka, III, p. 115-116; Comm. on Dhampada, p. 248). It included seven major cities: Śrāvastī, Śāketa, Campā, Vārāṇasī, Vaiśālī, Rājagṛha and Kauśāmbī (Dīgha, II, p. 146; Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, p. 304; Tch'ang-a-han, T 1, k. 3, p. 21b; T 5, k. 2, p. 169c; T 6, k. 2, p. 185b; T 7, k. 2, p. 200c).

In my introduction to Vimalakīrti, I [Lamotte] think I was able to show that Kumārajīva and the Kaśmīr school, Nāgārjuna, the author of the Madhyamakāśāstra, must have lived in the 3rd century, between 243 and 300 C.E., and everything leads one to believe that, strictly based on these works, the Traité must have been produced during the 4th century. At that time, the religious map of India had been transformed considerably and Buddhist propaganda had reached central Asia and China. Its spokesmen were not only Indians but also the foreign Yue-tshe, Sogdians and Parthians. Under the Han, during the second half of the 2nd century C.E., missionaries and translators who worked at Lo-Yang consisted of a true mosaic of nationalities: it consisted of two Parthians, the bhikṣu Ngan Che-kao and the upāsaka Ngan Hiuan; three Yue-tche, Tche Leou-kia-tch'an (Lokakṣema?), Tche Yuan and Tche Leang, two Sogdians, K'ang Mong-siang and K'ang kiu; and three Indians Tchou Fo-che, Tchou Ta-li (Mahābala?) and T'an-kouo (Dharmaphala?).

Later, at the time of the Three Kingdoms (220-280), the Wou empire, in the Blue River basin, welcomed the Yue-tche Tche K'ien, the Sogdian K'ang Seng-houei and the Indians Wei-k'i-nan (Vighna?) and Tchou Tsiang-yen to Wou-tch'ang and Kie-ye (Nanking). The Wei empire in the Yellow River basin did not lag behind and at Lo-yang had the Indian T'an-ko-kia-lo (Dharmakāla), the Sogdian K'ang Seng-k'ai (Dharmavarman) and the two Parthians T'an-wou-ti (Dharmastaya?) and Ngan Fa-hien (Dharmabhadra?).

It is impossible that the disciples of Nāgārjuna, writers of the Traité - and especially Kumārajīva, his official translator-annotator - were unaware of this internationalization of the Buddhist propaganda in the first centuries of our era. If they passed over in silence this passage on the merits of the foreigners with which we are here concerned, it was from an Indian reaction. From their point of view, the Buddhist Madhyadeśa is purely Indian; the frontier regions where Aryan is not spoken are low places of birth (nīcajātisthāna). A list of foreign languages appears in the three versions of the Vibhāṣā which have come down to us: 1) translation by Saṃghabhadra made at Tch'ang-ngan in 383 (T 1547, k. 9, p. 482c18-21); 2) translation by Buddhavarman and his group made at Leang-tcheou in 435 (T 1546, k. 41, p. 306c26-29); 3) translation by Hiuan-tsang made at Tch'ang-ngan (T1545, k. 79, p. 410a19-21). These languages are the tche-na (Chinese), cho-kia (Śāka, Scythian), ye-fa-na (Yavana, Greek), ta-la-t'o (Drāvidian), mo-lo-p'o (Mar-po, perhaps Ladakh: cf. Si-yu-ki, T 2087, k. 4, p. 890a9), k'ie-cha (Kāśgar), tou-houo-lo (Tukhāra), po-ho-lo (Bakhla, Bactrian).

There is some similarity between this list of foreign languages and the list of low places of birth presented by the Traité.

It goes without saying that the ideas developed here lose their value if the passage under discussion is an interpolation attributable to an author unaware of affairs in India and leading a life of luxury in Kucha or in China as was the case for Kumārajīva. This is the opinion of R. Hikata (Suvikrāntavikrāmin, Introduction, p. LV).

The Buddha himself, who was born at Kia-p'i-lo-p'o (Kapilavastu), has no fear.

iii) Ugliness (durvarṇatā). – There are people whose physical form is worn-out, ruined, thin, and whom no one wants to look at. In the middle of the great assemblies, they too are afraid.

The Buddha with his golden color (suvarṇavarṇa) and his brilliance (prabhā) is like the fire that illumines the Mountain of Red Gold (kanakagiri). Having such beauty, he is not afraid.

iv) Absence of proper bodily positions. – In their way of entering, of standing, moving, sitting or rising up, there are people who lack etiquette and they too are afraid. The Buddha does not have any of these defects.

v) Coarse speech (pāruṣyavāda). – There are people who pronounce badly, stammer, repeat themselves and lack coherence. As they displease people, they have fear.

The Buddha has no such fear. Why? The voice of the Buddha (buddhavāc)⁷⁰⁰ is truthful (satya), gentle (mṛduka), continuous (sahita), easily understood, neither too fast nor too slow, neither too concise nor too prolix, without subsiding (alīna), stainless (vimala), without bantering. It surpasses the (harmonious) sounds of the kia-ling-p'i-k'ie bird (kalaviṅka).⁷⁰¹ Its letter (vyāñjana) and its meaning (artha) are clear (viśpaṣṭa); it causes no harm. Free of passion (rāga), it is without blemish (anupalīpta); having destroyed hatred (dveṣa), it is without conflict (apratigha); having eliminated error (moha), it is easy to penetrate. Since it increases joy in the Dharma (dharmarati), it is pleasant (premañña). Since it opposes wrong-doing (āpatti), it is safety (kṣema). It follows another's mind (paracitta) and favors liberation (vimukti); its meaning (artha) is profound (gambhīra) and its expression (vyāñjana) marvelous. Having its reasonings, it is logical (yukta). Thanks to its examples (upāmā), it is well-expressed. Its work over, it reviews it well. Since it takes into account the various minds of others, it is expressed with variety. Finally, all its words lead to nirvāṇa; this is why they are of one taste (ekarasa).⁷⁰²

Adorning his speech in multiple and innumerable ways, the Buddha has no fear when he speaks. And if, thanks to these purely worldly attributes (laukikadharma), the Buddha is without fear, what can be said then about his supramundane attributes (lokottaradharma)? This is why it is said that the Buddha possesses the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya).

⁷⁰⁰ In the list that follows, the Traité is inspired in part by a topic related to "The Speech of the Tathāgata endowed with sixty aspects" (tathāgatasya ṣaṣṭyākāropetā vāk), a subject appearing in the Tathāgatacintyaguhyanirdeśa (T 310, k. 10, p. 55c20-56a5; T 312, k. 7, p. 719c7-720a29) of which the original text is preserved in the Sūtrālamkāra, p. 79-81 and the Mahāvvyut, no. 445-504.

For other qualities of the Buddha's voice, see Hobogirin, s.v., Bonnon (p. 133-135); Butsugo, p. 207-208; Button, p. 215-217.

⁷⁰¹ A bird with melodious song, not to be confused with the kācilindika famed for the softness of its down (cf. Śūraṅgamasamādhi, p. 261 note).

⁷⁰² Cf. Vinaya, II, p. 239; Anguttara, IV, p. 203; Udāna, p. 56; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 8, p. 476c11; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 37, p. 753b1): Seyyathā pi mahāsamuddo ekaraso loṇaraso evam eva ayaṃ dhammavinayo ekaraso vimittiraso: "Just as the ocean has but one taste, the taste of salt, so this Dharma and this discipline have but one taste, the taste of deliverance."

5. Why Distinguish Between the Powers and the Fearlessnesses?

Question. – Do the ten [powers (bala) of the Buddha not contain the fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya)? If they do contain the fearlessnesses, one should not speak only of four fearlessnesses, [but of of ten]. If they also contain the subjects of [243b] fear, why is it said that the Buddha is endowed with fearlessnesses (vaiśāradyasamanvāgata)?

Answer. – One and the same knowledge (jñāna) in ten places (sthāna) means that the Buddha is endowed with ten powers, in the same way that one and the same man who knows ten things is called after these things.

When the ten powers (bala) appear and function in four places, these are the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya).

[The first power], the knowledge of things possible and things impossible (sthānāsthānājñāna) and [the tenth power], the knowledge of the cessation of the impurities (āsravakṣayajñāna) constitute the first fearlessness [i.e., sarvadharmābhisambodhi] and the second fearlessness [i.e., sarvāsravakṣaya] respectively.

Although the other eight powers are extensive, it is said that they are mixed up with the third fearlessness [mārgāntarāyikadharmavyākaraṇa] and the fourth fearlessness [duḥkhanirodha-pratipadvyākaraṇa].

Thus, although the fearlessnesses are contained in the ten powers, there is nothing wrong in speaking of them separately.

6. Literal Commentary on the Vaiśāradyasūtra

A. “I am fully and completely enlightened”

I am fully and completely enlightened. – The Buddha knows all dharmas without error (viparyāsa), fully (samyak) and unmistakably, in the same way as the other Buddhas of the past. He is therefore called Samyaksambuddha.

Thus the Buddha said to Ānanda: “That which is unknown to the entire world with its gods and men, the Buddha himself knows completely: this is why he is called Samyaksambuddha.”

But there are people who say that the Buddha does not know certain dharmas.

Question. – Who are these people?

Answer: In the same place, the Buddha said: A śramaṇa, a brāhmaṇa, a deva, Māra, Brahmā or someone else. They want to debate with the Buddha [and challenge him on his knowledge of certain dharmas].

What are these dharmas?

For some, it is the sacred texts of which the Buddha has not spoken, eighteen great holy texts:⁷⁰³ heretical sūtras, grammars (vyākaraṇa), arithmetical (saṃkhyā), Vedas, etc.

For others, it is the weight of Mount Sumeru, the thickness of the great earth (mahāpṛthivī) and the total number of plants.

For others, it is the fourteen difficult points to which the Buddha has not replied (avyākṛtavastu): is the world eternal (śāsvata) or non-eternal (aśāsvata), finite (antavat) or infinite (anantavat), etc.⁷⁰⁴

For others, it is material dharmas (rūpin) or non-material dharmas (arūpin), visible (sanidarśana) or invisible (anidarśana), resistant (sapratigha) or non-resistant (apratigha), impure (sāsrava) or pure (anāsrava), conditioned (saṃskṛta) or unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), etc. [According to them,] the Buddha knows only the causes and conditions of the category of things concerning the Dharma but, in regard to the various causes and conditions of other things, sometimes the Buddha does not know them completely.

[In the phrase: A śramaṇa, brāhmaṇa, deva, Māra, Brahmā, or some one else...], śramaṇa means a monk who has gone forth from home (pravrajita); brahmāṇa means a sage dwelling at home; deva means an earth deity or a deity of space; Māra is the six groups of Kāmadevas; Brahmā is one of the deities whose leader is Brahmā Devarāja and also all the deities of rūpadhātu; finally, some one else designates all the others with the exception of the previously mentioned.

[That he is able to speak] in accordance with the truth...i.e., being able to object correctly, with logic.

I do not see the slightest reason to fear...: reason (nimitta) means ‘grounds’. I do not see the least grounds for fearing that he will be able to attack me in accordance with the truth (saha dharmena).

Seeing none, I claim to occupy the place of a-li-cha (ārṣaṃ sthānam). [Note by Kumārajīva: In the language of the Ts’in, Cheng-tchou, ‘Holy Teacher’].

B. “I have destroyed all the impurities”

The Buddha proclaims: “I have destroyed all the impurities (kṣīṇāsrava).” If people say that he has not destroyed them, he is not afraid.

What are the impurities (āsrava)? These impurities are of three kinds: i) lust impurity (kāmāsrava); ii) existence impurity (bhavāsrava); iii) ignorance impurity (avidyāsrava).⁷⁰⁵

Furthermore, the impurities are mental events (caitasika dharma) associated with defiled minds (saṃkṣiptacittasaṃprayukta) arising in regard to the six sense organs (ṣaḍindriya).

Finally, see the Yi-ts'ie leou-tchang king (Sarvāsravasūtra) which distinguishes seven kinds of impurities.⁷⁰⁶

C. “I have stated the dharmas that constitute an obstacle”

[243c] By dharmas that constitute an obstacle to the path (āntarāyika) is meant the impure actions (sāsravakarman), the conflicting emotions (kleśa) to be remunerated in the bad destinies (durgati) and, insofar as they are worldly (laukika),⁷⁰⁷ generosity (dāna), morality (śīla), the observing of the ten good paths of action (kuśalakarmapatha) and the enjoyment of the dhyānas of delight. In short (saṃkṣepeṇa), everything that puts an obstacle to nirvāṇa, whether it be good (kuśala) or undefined (avyākṛta) is called ‘dharma constituting an obstacle to the path’ (mārgāntarāyikadharmā).

D. “The noble path indicated by me can lead to exit from the world”

Some say that this way (pratipad) is two things: the holy concentration (āryasamādhi) and the holy wisdom (āryaprajñā) and that these two things lead to nirvāṇa.

Others say that it is the path with its three elements (triskandhaka mārga): morality (śīla), concentration (samādhi) and pure (anāsrava) wisdom (prajñā).

Others say that it is four things: the four noble truths (āryasatya).

Others say that it is the five supramundane faculties (lokottarendriya).

Others say that it is the six elements leading to emancipation (niḥsaraṇīya dhātu).⁷⁰⁸ ⁷⁰⁷ I.e., insofar as they still constitute an attachment to the world.

Nissaraṇaṃ h'etaṃ vihesāya yadidaṃ karuṇā cetovimutti... Nissaraṇaṃ h'etaṃ aratīyā yadidaṃ muditā vetovimutti... Nissaraṇaṃ h'etaṃ rāgassa yadidaṃ upekhā cetovimutti... Nissaraṇaṃ h'etaṃ subbanimittānaṃ yadidaṃ animittā cetovimutti... Nissaraṇaṃ h'etaṃ vicikicchākathaṃkathāsallassa yadidaṃ asmīti mānasamugghāto*.

Transl. – There are six elements leading to emancipation: emancipation from malice is liberation of the mind by means of loving-kindness; emancipation from harm is liberation of the mind by means of compassion; emancipation from sorrow is liberation of the mind by means of joy; emancipation

Others say that it is the seven factors of enlightenment (saṃbodhyaṅga).

Others say that it is the eight members of the noble path (āryāṣṭāṅgamārga) leading to nirvāṇa.

Some scholars (upadeśācārya) say that it is all the pure paths (anāsravamārga) leading to nirvāṇa.

“I see not the slightest reason to fear that a śramaṇa, brāhmaṇa, etc., can say according to the truth that that is not true. Not seeing anyone, I claim to occupy the ārṣa sthāna.”

E. “I hold the place of Holy Teacher”

Question.- Why does the Buddha claim that he occupies the ārṣa sthāna?⁷⁰⁹ from desire is liberation of the mind by means of equanimity; emancipation from all the signs [of desire, matter and permanence] is liberation of the mind by means of the signless; emancipation from the arrow of doubt and uncertainty is complete destruction of the pride of ‘I am’.

For the corresponding Sanskrit sources, see Daśottara, p. 77-80; Mahāvvyut., no. 1596-1602.

⁷⁰⁹ A canonical expression showing some interesting variations:

1. In the Pāli texts: āsabhaṃ thānaṃ (āsabhanthānaṃ, āsabhaṭṭhānaṃ) paṭijānāti: “He lays claim to the place of the bull”: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 69; Saṃyutta, II, p. 27; Anguttara, II, p. 8,9; III, p. 417; V, p. 33; Vibhaḍga, p. 317, 344; Paṭisambhidā, II, p. 174.

The commentary of Majjhima, II, p. 26 explains: Āsabhaṃ thānaṃ ti seṭṭhaṭṭhānaṃ, uttamaṭṭhānaṃ. Āsabhā vā pubbabuddhā, tesam thānaṃ ti attho: “The place of the bull, i.e., the best place, the supreme place. Or else, the bulls are the Buddhas of the past and he occupies their place.”

In the corresponding Sanskrit texts: Udāram ārṣabhaṃ sthānaṃ pratijānāti: “He lays claim to the noble place of the bull”: cf. fragments of the Daśabalasūtra (L. de La Vallée Poussin, Documents sanscrits de la seconde collection M.. A. Stein, JRAS, 1911-1912, p. 1063; E. Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke budd. Sūtras, p. 209, 211, 215; Mitteilungen des Instituts für Orientforschung, VII, 3, 1958, p. 400); Avadānaśataka, II, p. 105, l. 15; Kośavyākhyā, p. 645, l. 31-32; Pañcaviṃśati, p. 211, l. 5; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 1448, l. 12; Bodh, bhūmi, p. 386, l. 13.

Ārṣabha is an adjective derived from ṛṣabha ‘bull’.

2. The variant ārṣaṃ sthānaṃ partijānāti “he lays claim to the place of the Rṣi” is vouched for by the Bodh. bhūmi, p. 385, l. 15-18 (Yogācārabhūmi, T 1579, k. 49, p. 569a24). As we will see, it is preferred by the most prominent Chinese translators and Edgerton wrongly condemns it in his Dictionary, p. 105. The Bodh. bhūmi explains: Āryāṣṭāṅga mārgaṇa labhyatvāt sarvopadravabhayāpagatvāc cārṣam ity ucyate. ātmanas tadadhigamaṃpatijānāt pratijānātīty ucyate: “Faced with being attained by means of the eightfold noble path and being free of all suffering and all fear, this place is called ‘of the Rṣi’. As he maintains that he has acquired it himself, he lays claim to it.”

Ārṣa is an adjective derived from ṛṣi and means ‘related to the sage, archaic’.

3. The Chinese versions of the Āgamas do not come out in favor of either variant. Guṇabhadra renders the phrase by sien fo tchou tch'ou, ‘place of the earlier Buddhas’ (Tsa a han, T 99, k. 14, p.

Answer. – His own qualities (guṇa) are complete (sampanna) and, moreover, he makes beings find happiness (sukha) and the good (hita).

If the Buddha obtained a pleasant abode (sukhavihāra) for himself but did not bring about the good of others, he would not occupy the ārṣa sthāna.

If he brought about only the good of beings but did not fulfill his own qualities completely, he would not occupy the ārṣa sthāna either.

But since he himself has the qualities and also brings about the good of beings, he lays claim (pratijānāti) to occupy the ārṣa sthāna.

Furthermore, the Buddha has destroyed evil for himself and also destroys evil for others. Destroying these two evils, he is absolutely pure (paramaviśuddha). Preaching the Dharma in a wondrous way, he occupies the ārṣa sthāna.

Moreover, the Buddha turns, explains, teaches and propagates this [wheel of the Dharma] of the four noble truths (āryasatya), the wheel of three revolutions (triparivarta) and twelve aspects (dvadaśākāra).⁷¹⁰ This is why he affirms that he occupies the ārṣa sthāna.

Finally, as he has driven away all doubts (saṃśaya) and wrong views (mithyādrṣṭi), the Buddha is able to answer all the most profound questions (atigambhīra praśna). This is why he occupies the ārṣa sthāna.

[Note by Kumārajīva: Ārṣa means absolute, supreme, very high. Not falling back, not refusing, not collapsing, completely fulfilling the qualities, not having any weakness is called ārṣa sthāna.]

F. “In the assemblies I utter the lion’s roar”

In the assemblies, I utter the roar of the lion. – By assemblies (parśad) is meant the eight assemblies: i) assembly of śramaṇas, ii) assembly of brāhmaṇas, iii) assembly of warriors (kṣatriya), iv) assembly of devas, v) assembly of Cāturmahārājikas, vi) assembly of Trāyastriṃśa devas, vii) assembly of Māra, viii) Brahmā assembly.⁷¹¹

Beings hope to find wisdom in the bosom of these eight assemblies and this is why only these eight assemblies are mentioned in this sūtra.

But the Buddha utters the lion’s roar (siṃhanādaṃ nadati) in all the [244a] assemblies. This is why this sūtra adds: and in all the other assemblies. Why? Because those who hear the voice (ghoṣa) of the Buddha constitute all those assemblies.

Moreover, some say: “The Buddha preaches the Dharma alone and in secret”. This is why it is specified that it is in these assemblies that the Buddha declares that he possesses the ten powers and the four fearlessnesses. Hence the phrase: In the assemblies I utter the lion’s roar.

Finally, the Buddha declares: “I am absolutely truthful. I am the teacher of the whole world and I am omniscient (sarvajña). Let those who doubt or who do not believe come and I will explain to them.” This is why the sūtra says: In the assemblies I utter the lion’s roar.

The Buddha utters the lion’s roar. He is like the king of the lions (siṃharāja).

[Prosopeia of the Buddha-lion.]⁷¹² – This lion-king is born of a pure race. He dwells in the deep mountains and great valleys. He has a square jaw, large bones and his flesh is fat and full. His head is large, his eyes are wide, brilliant and clear. His eyebrows are arched and pure white. His muzzle is big, heavy and massive. His teeth are sharp, joined, pointed, and he shows a pink tongue. His ears are pricked up high and his mane is striking. The forepart of his body is broad; his skin and flesh are firm. He has a long spine, a narrow waist and an invisible belly. He has a long tail, sharp claws and well-planted paws. He has a big body and great strength. When he comes out of his den, he bends and stretches his spine. Striking the ground with his paw, he manifests his great power. He does not let the hour of his meal pass by, he announces the dawn and shows the strength of the lion-king. He terrifies the deer, bears, tigers, leopards and wild boars. He awakens those who have been sleeping for a long time; he humbles the strong and powerful. He opens the way for himself by uttering loud roars. When he roars in this way, those who hear him are either joyful or fearful. The animals who live in holes hide; those who live in the water dive deeply; those who live in the mountains withdraw; the tame elephants shake off their fetters and flee in bewilderment; the birds fly off into the sky and, gaining altitude, disappear in the distance.⁷¹³

The Buddha-lion is very similar. He is born into the great families of the six perfections (pāramitā) and the four ancient stocks of saints (āryavaṃśa).⁷¹⁴ He lives in the high mountain of cessation (nirodha) and the deep valley of the dhyānas and the samāpattis. The acquisition of the knowledge of all the aspects ⁷¹¹ These eight assemblies are mentioned in the canonical sources: Dīgha, II, p. 109; III, p. 260; Majjhima, I, p. 72; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 307-308; Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa, p. 138, 142, 300. The lists show some variations.

On the other hand, Kumārajīva and Hiuan-tsang resolutely favor the variant ārṣaṃ sthānam:

The former transcribes it as a-li-cha tch’ou (Traité, T 1509, k. 25, p. 243b25) and translates it as cheng-tchou tch’ou ‘the place of the holy Teacher’ (ibid., and Pañcaviṃśati, T 223, k. 5, p. 255b28; k. 24, p. 395a22). The latter, resorting to the equivalence ṛṣi = sien, translates it as ta sien tsouen wei, ‘the place of the great immortal’ (Mahāprajñāpāramitā, T 220, vol. VII, k. 415, p. 81b9; Vibhāṣā, T 1545, k. 31, p. 158a22; Abhidharmasamuccayavyākhyā, T 1606, k. 14, p. 760c21).

⁷¹⁰ See Vimalakīrti, p. 107, note.

(sarvākārajñāna) is his head. The accumulation of the roots of good (kuśalamūla) is his muzzle. The pure right vision (anāsrava samyagdr̥ṣṭi) is his brilliant eye. The practices of concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā) are his high wide eyebrows. The four fearlessnesses are his white sharp canine teeth. The unhindered liberations (apratihatavimokṣa) are his perfect muzzle. The four right efforts (samyakpradhāna) are his strong chin. The thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment (bodhipākṣika) are his sharp teeth, joined and pointed. The practice of the meditation on the horrible (aśubhabhāvana) is his pink tongue. Mindfulness (smṛti) and wisdom (prajñā) are his pricked-up ears. The eighteen special attributes (āveṇikadharmā) are his dazzling shiny mane. The three gates of deliverance (vimokṣamukha) are the fore-part of his body with firm flesh. The three wonders (prātihārya)⁷¹⁵ are his long spine. The perfection of the sciences and practices (vidyācaraṇasampad) is his invisible belly. Patience (kṣānti) is his narrow waist. The practice of solitude (praviveka) is his long tail. The four foundations of magical power (rddhipāda) are his well-planted paws. The five faculties (indriya) of the āsaikṣa are his sharp claws. The ten powers (bala) are his enormous strength. The collection of the pure dharmas (anāsravadharma) is his perfect body. The royal concentrations of the Buddhas (buddhasamādhirāja) are the den out of which he comes. It is with the four unhindered knowledges (pratisaṃvid) that he stretches out (vijr̥mabhati). It is on the earth of the dharmas that he strikes the paw of his unhindered liberations (ānantaryavimokṣa). Based on the ten powers, he does not [244b] let the time of saving beings pass by. It is to the entire world with its gods and men that he announces (the morning of deliverance). He manifests all the qualities of the king of Dharma. He terrifies the heretics (tīrthika), the scholars (upadeśācārya) and the heterodox. He awakens to the four truths those who have been sleeping. He humbles the pride and haughtiness (mānastambha) of those who are attached to the five aggregates (pañcaskandha) as their self. He opens the way through the theories (upadeśa) and wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) of the heretics (pāsanda). Bad people (mithyācarita) are afraid and good faithful people (adhimukta) rejoice. He spurs on the lazy, he comforts his disciples and he destroys the heretics (tīrthika). The gods of long life (dīrghāyusa) who for ages have enjoyed heavenly bliss finally recognize impermanence (anityatā). Thus, beings who hear the lion's roar of the four truths all experience a mind of disgust (nirvedacitta) for the world; being disgusted, they withdraw from it; being withdrawn from it, they enter into nrvāṇa.

This is the meaning of the expression: In the assemblies, I utter the lion's roar.

Moreover, there are differences between the roar of the Buddha and the roar of the lion.

When the lion roars, all the animals (paśu) fear either death or the sufferings of coming close to death. When the Buddha roars, it is to abolish the fear of death.

When the lion roars, he causes the fear, from age to age, of the sufferings of death. When the Buddha roars, he announces death in the present lifetime and the absence of all later suffering.

When the lion roars, his voice is rough and unpleasant and nobody likes to hear it because it brings fear of saṃsāra. When the Buddha roars, his voice is sweet (mṛduka): those who hear it do not tire of it and everybody is deeply happy. It is heard everywhere at a distance and can bring two kinds of happiness: i) the happiness of a rebirth among the gods and ii) the happiness of nirvāṇa.

These are the differences.

Question. – But when the Buddha roars, it is to frighten his listeners also; how does his roar differ from that of the lion?

Answer. – Those who hear the roar of the Buddha are somewhat afraid for some moments but afterwards are greatly benefited.

People attached to the idea of a self (āmacittābhiniviṣṭa), hoping for the happiness of this world (lokasukhādhimukta), bound by the errors (viparyāsa) consisting of believing to be eternal [that which is not eternal], having their minds disturbed by wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi): these are the ones who are afraid [when they hear the Buddha's preaching]. Thus it is said in a sūtra:

“When the Buddha preaches the four truths (satya), even the higher gods are afraid and think: ‘So we too are impermanent (anitya), full of suffering (duḥkha), impersonal (anātman) and empty (śūnya). As a result of what mistake have we believed in eternal bliss?’”⁷¹⁶

This is the difference.

Furthermore, all those who hear the roar of the lion are afraid except those who have renounced desire (vīrāga). When the Buddha roars an invitation to nirvāṇa, even those who have renounced desire are afraid.

When the lion roars, the good and the bad are afraid. When the Buddha roars, only the good are afraid.

Furthermore, when the lion roars, he frightens at all times. When the Buddha roars, he does indeed frighten beings a little by revealing the world's defects for those who hope to be born there no more. But by making them see the qualities and advantages of nirvāṇa, he drives away all the fears of the world, he closes the bad destinies (durgati), he opens the good path and he makes people reach nirvāṇa.

Finally, there are twenty reasons why the Buddha's voice is called the lion's roar: 1) it depends on the ten powers; 2) it is not too concise; 3) it is not too [244c] prolix; 4) it has the accents of Brahmā; 5) it is wondrous (adbhūta); 6) it leads the great assemblies; 7) it frightens wicked Māra; 8) it throws Māra's people into disorder; 9) it makes the gods rejoice; 10) it delivers one from Māra's net; 11) it breaks Māra's fetters; 12) it breaks Māra's fish-hook; 13) it bypasses Māra's domain; 14) it increases its own system; 15) it reduces others' systems; 16) its fruit of retribution is not deceptive; 17) his preaching is not futile; 18) worldly people (prthagjana) enter into the noble Path; 19) those who have entered the noble Path obtain complete destruction of the impurities (āsravakṣaya); 20) according to needs, one acquires the three Vehicles. This is why the Buddha's voice is called the roaring of the lion.

In its general characteristics (sādhāraṇalakṣaṇa) and its specific characteristics (svalakṣaṇa) this is the meaning of the Roar of the Lion.

G. "I turn the Wheel of Brahmā"

I turn the Wheel of Brahmā. – Because it is pure (viśuddha), it is called 'of Brahmā'. The wisdom of the Buddha (buddha prajñā) and of the Dharma associated with his wisdom (tatprajñāsamprayuktadharma) is called 'Wheel'. Because those who adopt it follow the Dharma (anudharmaṃ caranti), it is a wheel.⁷¹⁷

[The Wheel of Brahmā]. – This wheel has the four perfect foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) as its hub (nābhi). The five spiritual faculties (indriya) and the five strengths (bala) are its spokes (ara). The four foundations of magical power (ṛddhipāda) are its solid rim (nemi) and the right efforts (samyakpradhāna) are the joints. The three liberations (vimokṣa) are its pegs (āṇī). Concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā) are the coachman. Pure morality (anāsravaśīla) is the perfume with which it is sprinkled. The seven factors of enlightenment (sambodhyaṅga) are the varied flowers with which it is ornamented. Right view (samyagdrṣṭi) is its turning to the right. Purity of faith (cittaprasāda) is its beauty. Right exertion (samyagvīrya) is its speed. The fearless lion's roar is its pleasant sound which frightens Māra's wheel, breaks the twelve-membered wheel [of dependent origination] (dvādaśāṅgapratītyasamutpada), destroys the wheel of saṃsāra, drives away the wheel of the passions (kleśa), derails the wheel of karma, stalls the wheel of the world and crushes the wheel of suffering. It brings forth the joy of the yogins and the respect of gods and men.

No one [other than the Buddha] can turn this Wheel for it consists of the Dharma of the Buddha. This is why the latter declares: I turn the Wheel of Brahmā.

[The Wheel of the Buddha and the wheel of the cakravartin.] – Moreover, the Buddha turns the Wheel of the Dharma like the noble cakravartin king turns the jewel of the wheel.⁷¹⁸

Question. – What resemblance is there between the Buddha and the noble cakravartin king?⁷¹⁹

Answer. – This king is pure and takes birth in an unmixed lineage (vaṃśa). In accordance with his family (kula), his actions are perfect. All the physical signs (lakṣaṇa) adorn his body. His royal virtues are complete and he is able to turn the jewel of the wheel. Anointed with perfumed water on his head (mūrdhābhiṣikta), he takes up his royal rank and reigns over the four continents (caturdvīpa). He has destroyed banditry so well that no one dares to oppose him. His treasury of jewels is abundant and the morale of his troops is raised by the presence of the seven jewels (of the cakravartin). He wins over (saṃgrahavastu) all beings by the four methods of captivating. He exercises the royal law well and delegates the noble families. He governs the kingdom by means of his prefects, his soldiers and his ministers. He loves to distribute his most precious wealth. From beginning to end, his knowledge and his mindfulness are unchanging.

The Buddha, king of the Dharma, is just like that. The Buddha - Śākyamuni, Dīpaṃkara, Ratnapuṣpa, etc. – takes birth in the pure family of the Buddhas. He actualizes the bodily positions (īryāpatha) of the previous Buddhas. He possesses all of the thirty-two physical marks (lakṣaṇa) that serve him as [245a] adornments. His attitudes as Holy Teacher (ārṣeryāpatha) being perfect, he turns the true Wheel of Dharma. He receives the crucial anointment with the elixir of wisdom (prajñārasāyana): he is the elder in the triple world (jyeṣṭha). He destroys the bandits that are the conflicting emotions (kleśa). None dare to transgress the precepts (śīla) that he has put in place; the assemblies of śaikṣas and aśaikṣas rejoice. The immense precious treasure of his Dharma is filled. The seven factors of enlightenment are his ornament; the eighty-four thousand articles of the Dharma (dharmaśkaṇḍha) are his troops. By means of the four supramundly means of captivating (lokottara saṃgrahavastu), he wins over beings. He knows the skillful means (upāya), he preaches the Dharma of the four noble truths (āryasatya): that is the attitude of a king of Dharma. Great generals (senāpati) such as Śāriputra,⁷²⁰ Maitreya, etc., govern the Buddha's kingdom well. He loves to share his most precious wealth: the pure spiritual faculties (indriya), the powers (bala), the [factors] of enlightenment (sambodhyaṅga). He carefully seeks for the good of beings and the mindfulness that he keeps is firm.

These are the similarities.

Furthermore, the Buddha is superior to the noble cakravartin king.

The noble cakravartin king has not eliminated all the passions (kleśa); the Buddha has eliminated them definitively.

The noble cakravartin king is plunged in the mud (pañka) of old age (jarā) and death (maraṇa); the Buddha has come out of it.

The noble cakravartin king is subject to the emotions; the Buddha has transcended them.

The noble cakravartin king follows the dangerous path of saṃsāra; the Buddha has transcended it.

The noble cakravartin king is immersed in the shadows of error (mohatamas); the Buddha lives in the supreme light (paramāloka).

The noble cakravartin king reigns over a maximum of four continents (caturdvīpa); the Buddha reigns over innumerable and infinite universes.

⁷¹⁷ More details will be found in Manorathapūraṇī, III, p. 9-10.

⁷¹⁸ The wheel (cakra) is one of the seven jewels with which the cakravartin king is furnished: cf.

Dīgha, II, p. 17, 172-177.

⁷¹⁹ A subject already discussed above, p. 116F.

⁷²⁰ Śāriputra was called dharmaśenāpati 'general of the Dharma' Apadāna, I, p. 29, 44; Theragāthā, p. 96), while Ānanda bore the title of dharmaśāhānāgarika 'treasurer of the Dharma'.

The noble cakravartin king has at his disposal material jewels (āmiṣaratna); the Buddha has at his disposal the jewels of the spirit (cittaratna).

The noble cakravartin king aspires to celestial bliss (divyasukha); the Buddha who has attained the bliss of the summit of existence (bhavāgra) has renounced it.

The noble cakravartin king derives his happiness from others; the Buddha fosters happiness by his own mind.

This is why the Buddha is far superior to the noble cakravartin king.

Moreover, the noble cakravartin king whose hand turns the jewel of the wheel encounters no obstacle in space; the Buddha who turns the Wheel of the Dharma encounters neither obstacle nor resistance in the entire world with its gods and men.

Those who see the jewel of the wheel eliminate the material poisons (viṣa); those who encounter the Wheel of the Dharma of the Buddha eliminate the poison of all the passions (kleśa).

Those who see the jewel of the wheel avoid calamities (vipatti) and torments (viheṭhana); those who encounter the Wheel of the Dharma of the Buddha see the calamities and the torments of all wrong views (mithyādr̥ṣṭi) and all doubts (vicikitsā) disappear.

The king with his wheel governs four continents (caturdvīpa); the Buddha with the Wheel of the Dharma governs the entire world with its gods and men and makes them obtain mastery over the Dharma (dharmavaśita).

These are the resemblances.

Moreover, the Wheel of the Dharma has great superiority over the jewel of the wheel.

The jewel of the wheel is deceptive; the Wheel of the Dharma is absolutely truthful.

The jewel of the wheel increases the fire of the three poisons (triviṣāgni); the Wheel of the Dharma extinguishes the fire of the three poisons.

The jewel of the wheel is impure (sāsrava); the Wheel of the Dharma is pure (anāsrava).

The jewel of the wheel is connected to the happiness resulting from the five objects of enjoyment (pañcakāmaḡuṇa); the Wheel of the Dharma is connected to the happiness of the Dharma.

The jewel of the wheel is a basis for fetters (saṃyojanasthāna); the Wheel of the Dharma is not a basis for fetters.

The jewel of the wheel has a limited domain (mitagocara); the Wheel of the Dharma has an unlimited domain (apramaṇagocara).

The jewel of the wheel can be acquired from lifetime to lifetime thanks to [245b] a single purity of mind (cittaviśuddhi) or a gift; the Wheel of the Dharma is acquired thanks to all the causes for good actions and the wisdoms accumulated for innumerable incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa).

The jewel of the wheel no longer turns when the king is dead; the Wheel of the Dharma still keep turning after the Buddha's nirvāṇa.

The jewel of the wheel belongs to one single person; the Wheel of the Dharma belongs to all beings capable of being converted (vaiṇeyasattva).

[Wheel of Brahmā or Wheel of the Dharma.] – Moreover, [in the expression Brahmācakra], brahma means vast (br̥hat), for the Wheel of the Buddha or the Wheel of the Dharma extends everywhere in the ten directions.

Furthermore, it is called the Wheel of Brahmā because the Buddha teaches the four abodes of Brahmā (brahmavihāra), because at the very beginning, when the Buddha attained enlightenment, Brahmā, the king of the gods, invited him to turn the Wheel of the Dharma, because at Benares when the Buddha turned the Wheel of the Dharma and Ājñāta Kaundinya obtained the Path, the Buddha voice penetrated as far as the Brahmā heaven, or else because there are people who respect the god Brahmā and want to please him.

Question. – Sometimes the Buddha says Wheel of the Dharma, sometimes Wheel of Brahmā.⁷²¹

Answer. – There is no difference between Wheel of Brahmā and Wheel of Dharma. However, according to some, we say Wheel of Brahmā when it discloses the four immeasurables (paramāṇacitta), and Wheel of the Dharma when it teaches the four noble truths.

Furthermore, we say Wheel of Brahmā when the path is acquired thanks to the four immeasurables, and Wheel of the Dharma when it is acquired thanks to some other thing.

The Wheel of Brahmā teaches the four dhyānas, and the Wheel of the Dharma teaches the thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment (bodhipāṅśikadharmā). The Wheel of Brahmā teaches the path consisting of the practice of concentration (samādhībhāvanā), and the Wheel of the Dharma teaches the path consisting of the cultivation of wisdom (prajñābhāvanā).

These are the various distinctions to be made between the Wheel of Brahmā and the Wheel of the Dharma.

7. Nature and Order of the Fearlessnesses

Question. – What is the nature (svabhāva) of the fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya)?

Answer. – When the Buddha attained enlightenment, he obtained all the attributes of Buddha, the powers (bala), the absence of fear (abhaya), etc. Subsequently, he obtained the dharmas associated with knowledge free of fear (abhayañānasamprayuktadharmā), dharmas called fearlessnesses.⁷²² Similarly also [the dharma] associated with the four immeasurables is called māitra.

⁷²² The Kośabhāṣya explains, p. 414, l. 8: Jñānakṛtaṃ vaiśāradyaṃ yujyate, na jñānam eva:

“Fearlessness is the result of knowledge, but it is not knowledge.”

Question. – What is the order (krama) of these four fearlessnesses?

Answer. – In the first fearlessness, the Buddha declares that he knows all dharmas (sarvadharmābhisambodhi). Since he knows all dharmas, he affirms that he has destroyed the impurities (āsravaṣaya). Since he has destroyed the impurities, he claims to know the dharmas that are obstacles to the Path (mārgāntarāyikadharmas). Since he has destroyed these dharmas that are obstacles, he preaches the Path (mārgavyākaraṇa).

Furthermore, the first fearlessness is like the master physician (bhaiṣajyaguru) in possession of all the remedies (oṣadhi). The second proclaims the destruction of all sicknesses (vṛādhikṣaya). The third knows what one should abstain from. The fourth proclaims the foods that it is necessary to take.

Finally, in the first fearlessness, the Buddha speaks of the awareness [of things] under all their aspects (sarvakārajñāna). In the second fearlessness, he speaks of the absence of all the passions (kleśa) and their traces (vāsanā). In the third fearlessness, he preaches a Dharma without deceit or fault. In the fourth fearlessness, he deals with things that bring one to nirvāṇa.

Second Section THE TEN POWERS AND THE FOUR FEARLESSNESSES ACCORDING TO THE MAHĀYĀNA

PRELIMINARY NOTE

In the preceding chapter and in the first section of the present chapter, the Traité has spoken of the ten powers (bala) and the four fearlessnesses (vaiśāradya) of the Buddha according to the doctrine of the Sūtras and the Abhidharma. Now it will discuss the conceptions of the Mahāyāna in regard to the same subject.

It will position itself successively from the absolute truth point of view (paramārthasatya) and the relative truth point of view (saṃvṛtisatya).

1. From the absolute point of view, the balas and the vaiśāradyas are without distinctive natures and, like all other dharmas, come within the emptiness of non-existence (anupalambhaśūnyatā) in terms of which “dharmas, whether past, future or [present, do not exist at all” (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 197, l. 15-16: ye dharmā atītānāgatapratyutpannās te nopalabhyante).

Bala and Vaiśāradya fall under the judgment of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 146, l. 9-20; Śatasāhastikā, p. 839, l. 13-842, l. 17):

“The bodhisattva does not grasp (nopalabhate) the ātman, whatever the names by which it is designated: sattva, jīva, poṣa, puruṣa, puṭgala, manuja, mānava, kmāraka, vedaka, jānaka, paśyaka. He does not grasp things, skandha, dhātu, āyatana, or their pratītyasamutpāda. He does not grasp the noble truths, duḥkha, samudaya, nirodha, mārga. He does not grasp the threefold world, kāma-, rūpa- and ārūpyadhātu. He does not grasp the levels of concentration, apramāṇa, dhyaṇa and ārūpyasamāpatti. He does not grasp the thirty-seven auxiliaries of enlightenment, smṛtyupasthāna, samyakpradhāna, ṛddhipāda, indriya, bala, bodhyaṅga and mārga. He does not grasp the Buddha attributes, daśabala, caturvaiśāradya, aṣṭādaśāveṇika. He does not grasp the categories of saints, srotaāpanna, sakṛdāgamin, anāgamin, pratyekabuddha, bodhisattva, buddha. If he does not grasp them, it is because of their absolute purity (atyantaviśuddhitā). What is this purity? Non-production (anutpāda), non-manifestation (aprādurbhāva), non-existence (anupalambha), non-activity (anabhisamkāra).”

2. From the relative or conventional point of view, it is permissible to consider things and to find their distinctive characteristics for, just as empty space (ākāśa) does not oppose matter, so “the emptiness of non-existence is not an obstacle to any dharma.”

Provided that he is not attached at all to his mind - in other words, provided that he recognizes its fundamental non-existence - the bodhisattva can, for the purpose of saving beings, discourse very well on the various attributes of the Buddha: the ten balas, the four vaiśāradyas, the four pratisamvids and the eighteen āveṇikabuddhadharmas.

The sūtras and the Hīnayāna Abhidharmas make no distinction between Buddha attributes and bodhisattva attributes for the valid reason that the bodhisattva is a future Buddha and between the former and the latter there can be only a difference of degree and not of nature.

The Prajñāpāramitāsūtras have remained at this stage. Thus the Pañcaviṃśati (p. 203-212), setting out to define the Mahāyāna, suggest twenty-one practices to be completely fulfilled (paripūrayitavya) or to be imitated (śikṣitavya). The first seventeen are dharmas of the śrāvaka: 1) four smṛtyupasthānas, 2) four samyakpradhānas, 3) four ṛddhipādas, 4) five indriyas, 5) five balas, 6) seven bodhyaṅgas, 7) eight mārgāṅgas, 8) three samādhis, 9) eleven jñānas, 10) three indriyas, 11) three samādhis, 12) ten anusmrtis, 13) four dhyaṇas, 14) four apramānas, 15) four samāpattis, 16) eight vimokṣas, 17) nine anupūrvavihāras. The last four are Buddha dharmas: [18) ten tathāgatabalas, 19) four vaiśāradyas, 20) four pratisamvids, 21) eighteen āveṇikabuddhadharmas]. Nowhere is there any mention made of dharmas belonging strictly to the bodhisattva.

But in a later approach, other Mahāyānasūtras have deemed it proper to propose, apart from these Buddha attributes, a series of bodhisattva attributes distinct from the preceding, but also including ten balas, four vaiśāradyas, four pratisamvids and eighteen āveṇikadharmas.

Although the Traité presents itself simply as a faithful commentary on the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra, it does not hesitate to borrow these lists of bodhisattva dharmas from the more recent Māhayānasūtras. Its or their authors want to appear as knowledgeable of the latest progress in scholasticism with the result that, from the scholastic point of view, an important Mahāyanist production has been intercalated between the Prajñāpāramitāsūtras and the Traité.

With the exception of the eighteen āveṇikabuddhadharmas which the old texts do not mention, the lists of Buddha attributes, namely, the ten balas, four vaiśāradyas and the four pratisaṃvids, have been fixed since the time of the canonical sūtras (nikāya and āgama) and are maintained practically without any change throughout the later literature.

It was not the same for the lists of bodhisattva dharmas, the elaboration of which has given room for hesitation and alteration. Here I [Lamotte] will examine only the Mahāyānasūtras with which the Traité was familiar and which make up its sources and I will designate them by the following:
